Ver. 6. Drechsler refers ליהוה to מלאה: the sword is to the Lord (the Lord has His sword) full of blood. But then it would need to read הַחֶרֶב, as the sword has already been mentioned. Would one translate: "Jehovah has a sword that is full of blood," that again does not suit the previous mention of the sword verse 5, though this translation would best suit the three other instances of the use of ליהוה in this section (verses 2, 6, 8). The context requires the rendering "the sword of the Lord is full of blood." For verses 6, 7 manifestly tell what the sword, (that ver. 5 was to come on Edom), when actually come, has done to Edom. This is intimated by describing the sword after the execution. Thus the same sword as ver. 5 is meant. The article is wanting because חרב ליהוה, (instead of חרב יהוה, which occurs only 1 Chron. xxi. 12) seems to be vox solemnis, (Jud. vii. 20; Jer. xii. 12; xlvii. 6).——הֻדַּשְּׁנָה instead of הֻתְדַּשְּׁנָה, Hothpaal from דשן, comp. verse 7; xxx. 23; Green's Gram., § 96, a.——That מִן before דָּם is to be explained according to ii. 6, does not seem probable. Rather it seems that the notion of causality, that lies in הדשנה מחלב, has passed over to what follows: such as was before intimated, the sword has become from the blood of the sacrificial beasts.——כָּר again only xvi. 1.——עַתּוּד again only i. 11; xiv. 9.——אֵילִים again in Isa. i. 11; lx. 7. זֶבַח and טֶבַח (verse 3) correspond in sense and sound. On זבח see list.

Ver. 8. The Plural שִׁלּוּמִים occurs only here: comp. the sing. Hos. ix. 7; Mic. vii. 3.——If the pointing לְרִיב is correct, then רִיב is to be construed as substantive. For as such it is in the construct state and has given its tone to the governing noun; then ל does not stand directly before the tone syllable. But if it is a verb, then it has the tone, and ל in that case receives pretonic kamets (comp. לָרִיב iii. 13). As noun רִיב means causae actio, defensio, in the same sense as the verb with following accusative (i. 17; li. 22) is used (comp. xix. 20).

Ver. 10. לְנֵצַח נְצָחִים (the Masoretic form of writing נֵצַח occurs four times; Ps. xlix. 20; 1 Sam. xv. 29; 1 Chron. xxix. 11) occurs only here.——קָו; תֹהוּ see list.

Ver. 12. חֹרֶיהָ is put absolutely before.——מְלוּכָה; אֶפֶס, see list.

Ver. 13. אַרְמוֹן comp. xxiii. 13; xxv. 2; xxxii. 14.——סִירִים; קִמּוֹשׂ; and חוֹחַ (kindred חָח xxxvii. 29) occur only here in Isaiah. מִבְצָר, locus munitus xvii. 3; xxv. 12.——נָוֶה see list.

Vers. 13, 14, 15. שָׂעִיר, אִיִּים, צִיִּים, בְּנוֹת יַעֲנָה, תַּנִּים, comp. on xiii. 21, 22.——חָצִיר (= חָצֵר, locus septus) occurs again in Isaiah only xxxv. 7 (see Comm. in loc.).——פָּגַשׁ in Isaiah only here.——אַךְ has here also its restrictive sense. When Gesenius (Thes. p. 80) says: that the vis restringendi relates non ad proximum sed ad sequens quoddam vocabulum, and translates here accordingly: non nisi spectra ibi habitant, non nisi vultures ibi congregantur, the two statements exclude each other. For where only spectra dwell, the vulture cannot also dwell, and vice versa. To express that, the אַךְ must be joined to לִילִית and דַיּוֹת (vers. 14, 15). But both times it is joined to שָׁם. Hence it appears that the Prophet would say: only there does the lilith rest, only there does the vulture congregate: i. e., there is no other place so suitable for them.——Hiph. הִרְגִּיעַ again li. 4 in another sense; in xxviii. 12 we had the noun מַרְגֵּעָה "resting place." Also מָנוֹחַ "resting place," only here in Isaiah; comp. Gen. viii. 9; Lam. i. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. If the Prophet would not deal only in indefinite generalities in regard to the judgment on the nations of the earth, he must give prominence to the case of one nation instar omnium. Among neighboring nations Moab, and Edom, and Ammon, were most detested by the Israelites (comp. Deut. xxiii. 3-6; Ezek. xxxv. 5 sqq.; Amos i. 11; Obad. 10 sqq.; Ps. cxxxvii. 7, etc.). As Isaiah elsewhere, in a similar connection, mentions the Moabites by way of exemplification (xxv. 10 sqq.), it is natural he should give similar prominence also to Edom, as he does here and lxiii. 1 sqq. Now, because the sword of Jehovah has already become drunken in heaven with blood, it descends to earth, because it finds no more work above.

2. For my sword——of Zion.—Vers. 5-8. The relation of this section to what precedes is this: the Prophet has said (vers. 2, 3), what the Lord purposes to do on earth. החרימם and נתנם ver. 2 are to be understood of acts of the will, not of performance: ver. 3 describes prophetically what shall once take place on earth in consequence of that divine decree. Ver. 4 pictures the judgment that shall be executed on the heavens, but here the Prophet combines intention and performance. He contemplates the judgment of God as beginning in heaven, and continued on earth.

[On the construction of כִּי see Text. and Gram. "It may be construed in its proper sense, either with ver. 3 (HITZIG), or with the whole of the preceding description. All this shall certainly take place for my sword (the speaker being God Himself) is steeped," etc.—J. A. ALEX., in loc.].

The expression is a bold poetic one. Isaiah speaks of the sword of the LORD again xxvii. 1; lxvi. 16. But only here does he personify it. He may, as regards the sense, have in mind Deut. xxxii. 41–43. Inevitable and irresistible are the judgments of the LORD. This the Prophet expresses by saying that the sword of the LORD, intoxicated with the judgment accomplished on "the host of the high ones that are on high" (xxiv. 21), and thirsting for more blood, descends to earth, and that first on Edom, as the nation that above all has become an object of the divine ban. (חֵרֶם the segregatio ad internecionem, 1 Kings xx. 42; Isa. xliii. 28). Vers. 6, 7 describe the effects of the execution. The sword of the LORD is not only full of blood, but is fattened, dropping fat. As in the second clause of ver. 6, the Edomites are regarded as a sacrifice, they are here compared to sheep, goats and rams.

Bozra stands for Edom also lxiii. 1. Concerning this city see on Jer. lxix. 13.

The enumeration of buffaloes, bullocks and bulls (ver. 7) denotes that the entire nation shall perish, great and small, high and low. רְאֵם (only here in Isaiah, elsewhere only Num. xxiii. 22; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9 sq.; Ps. xxii. 22; xxix. 6; xcii. 11). It is now universally understood to mean the buffalo (see HERZ. R.-Encycl., XI. p. 28). פָּרִים see on i. 11. אביר meaning "bull" occurs only x. 13 K'thibh. ירד meaning "to fell" trees, beasts or men, is peculiar to Isaiah (see xxxii. 19). For Jer. xlviii. 15; l. 27; li. 40 the use of the word is not quite the same. In consequence of the slaughter the earth itself is drunk with blood, and fat with fat, comp. on vers. 5, 6. The parallelism reigns not only in these verses, but in the entire complexity of vers. 6–8. For the description of the judgment in ver. 6 a. and ver. 7 correspond, and the reasons assigned ver. 6 b. and ver. 8. But progress appears in the thought because ver. 8 gives particularly the object of the "sacrifice" and the "slaughter." The LORD will thereby satisfy His vengeance, and give Zion justice by a righteous recompense.

The expression for the day of the Lord's etc., recalls ii. 12 and lxiii. 4. But the Prophet seems moreover to have in mind Deut. xxxii. 35, 41. For in those passages, as here, the notions of vengeance and recompense underlie the discourse.

But beside this, our passage lay before Jeremiah. For Jer. xlvi. 10 is penetrated with elements drawn from Isa. xxxiv. 5–8. The following considerations show that our passage is the source from which Jer. drew. 1) The grand, drastic boldness and loftiness of the language of our passage, of which the words of Jer., after the fashion of that Prophet, are but a tempered imitation. 2) Isaiah uses the expression רִוְּתָה twice (vers. 5, 7); Jer. says, רָוְתָה. It is much more likely that Jeremiah would dilute the strong expression of a predecessor, in his well-known fashion (see my comm. on Jer. Introd. § 3) than that an author living much later in the exile, should intensify the normal but weaker expression of Jer. 3) Jer. says יוֹם נְקָמָה; Isaiah יוֹם נָקָם. Now in general נקם is the older form of the word, and is used only in Lev. xxvi. 25; Deut. xxxii. 35, 41, 43; Judg. xvi. 28; Ps. lviii. 11; Prov. vi. 34; Mic. v. 14, and in Isa. (xxxv. 4; xlvii. 3; lix. 17; lxi. 2; lxiii. 4). In the exceptions Ezek. xxiv. 8; xxv. 12, נְקֹם נָקָם is evidently said for the sake of the effect of sound; in Ezek. xxv. 15 the expression וַיִּנָּקְמוּ נקם is used along with נְקָמָה. On the other hand נְקָמָה is the form exclusively used by Jeremiah, and in Ezekiel it is the prevalent form (the exceptions being given above) and beside these is used only here and there (Num. xxxi. 2, 3; Lam. iii. 60; Ps. cxlix. 7). But it is not probable that a writer later than Jeremiah has introduced the old form into a passage borrowed from Jeremiah.

3. And the streams—emptiness.—Vers. 9–11. Edom was situated at the southern point of the Dead Sea. The following description recalls the pitchy and sulphurous character of this sea and its surroundings. It seems as if the Prophet would allude to that event which, recorded in Gen. xix. 24, 25, 28, had impressed that character on the region. At least the sulphur, the overturning (הפך) and the ascending smoke are traits that he seems to have borrowed from that passage. זֶפֶת occurs again only Exod. ii. 3. גפרית we had already where xxx. 33 the breath of God is called "a stream of brimstone." When the streams are flowing pitch and the dust of the land is sulphur, the whole land will become a fearful place of conflagration. Day and night (the expression occurs Deut. xxviii. 66, beside comp. Isa. iv. 5: xxi. 8; lx. 11), forever, for it is the flame of the last judgment, the burning shall continue. The burning land is the subject of תכבה which is used intensively also xliii. 17; lxvi. 24.—Ver. 10. On דור as defining time see on xiii. 20. מדור לדור occurs only here. חָרֵב exarescere, exsiccari, comp. xix. 5, 6; xliv. 27; lx. 12. אֵין עֹבֵר again only lx. 15. It does not agree well to say of the same land that it shall become an everlasting burning, and that it shall be a pathless desert. But the Prophet describes the future by means of the present, and contemplates the earth as an Edom cursed of God, and thinks of the latter as a scorched desert land. [The same may be said of the similarly inconsistent descriptions in all that follows in this section.—TR.].

Ver. 11. As such the land is inhabited only by beasts of the desert. [On the names of beings enumerated in this and the following verses see

J. A. ALEX., comm. in loc., especially on לילית ver. 14.—TR.]. קאת (from קיא "to vomit") is the pelican (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17; Zeph. ii. 14), קפד "the porcupine" (see on xiv. 23; Zeph. ii. 14). ינשוף "the owl" (only here in Isa. comp. Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 16),—ערב "the raven" (in Isaiah only here). As right building can only be done by means of measuring line and plummet (Job xxxviii. 5), so shall right destruction be directed by aid of the same implements. The image is the same as Amos vii. 7-9, comp. 2 Kings xxi. 23; Lam. ii. 8. "The stone" is the weight that makes the line plumb. The expression אבני בהו is ἅπ. λεγ.; and בהו Isaiah uses no where else (see Gen. i. 2; Jer. iv. 23).

["The sense of the whole metaphor may then be—that God has laid this work out for Himself and will perform it (BARNES),—that even in destroying He will proceed deliberately, and by rule (KNOBEL), which last thought is well expressed in ROSENMUELLER'S paraphrase (ad mensuram vastabitur, ad regulam depopulabitur)."—J. A. ALEXANDER.]

4. They shall call——with her mate.—Vers. 12-15. The Prophet now describes the desolation as it affects the territory of the nobility of Edom, both as to their persons and their castles. חריה being nominative absolute, the words must be translated: "as to her nobles, there are none there that call out a monarchy (election of king, accession to regency)." As the presence of the nobility is the necessary condition of a king's election, and not vice versa, I regard this translation as more correct than the other which is also grammatically possible, viz.: "there is no kingdom that they may proclaim." Moreover it is logically more correct that in the phrase with ו the word put before absolutely should be the subject. Royalty in Edom was not inherited, but Esau's descendants formed a high nobility from which the king proceeded by election (Gen. xxxvi. 15 sqq.; 31 sqq.). חור, liber, ingenuus, nobilis Isaiah uses only here. Comp. Eccl. x. 17; Jer. xxvii. 20 and often.

[On חריה, J. A. ALEXANDER gives a copious synopsis of interpretations and then adds: "This great variety of explanations, and the harshness of construction with which most of them are chargeable, may serve as an excuse for the suggestion of a new one, not as certainly correct, but as possibly entitled to consideration." Beside the meaning nobles, חרים in several places "no less certainly means holes or caves (see 1 Sam. xiv. 11; Job xxx. 6; Nah. ii. 13). Now it is matter of history not only that Edom was full of caverns, but that these were inhabited and that the aboriginal inhabitants, expelled by Esau, were expressly called Horites (חרים) as being inhabitants of caverns (xiv. 6; xxxvi. 20; Deut. ii. 12, 22). This being the case, the entire depopulation of the country, and especially the destruction of its princes, might be naturally and poetically expressed by saying that the kingdom of Edom should be thenceforth a kingdom of deserted caverns." For the appropriateness of description see in ROBINSON'S "Researches" the account of Petra.—TR.].

Ver. 13. The ruin of the nobility is followed by that of their palaces. They are said to mount up (עלתה) but only ironically, for they appear great and high only by the rank wild growth on them.

Not only beasts of the desert, but also repulsive demons of the desert disport themselves in the desolate ruins of Edom. The Prophet mentions a female being, the ghost-like, restlessly wandering (comp. Matt. xii. 43) Lilith, but which just there in those dreadful places finds a congenial resting place. The name לִילִית certainly comes from לַיִל "the night," and denotes a being of the night, a spectre. According to the TALMUD Lilith is the chief of the nocturnal Schedim, of the לִילִין or טַלְנִין (comp. BUXTORF, Lex. rabb., p. 1140 and 877), and bears the name אִגְּרַת בַּת מַחֲלַת, i. e., "Agrath the (female) dancer." Comp. KOHUT, Jüd. Angel. und Dämonol., 1866, p. 61 and 86 sqq. Certainly Lilith is a production of popular superstition, to which various attributes and forms of appearance are ascribed. Comp. BUXTORF, l. c. BOCHART, Hieroz. III., p. 829, ed. ROSENMUELLER, GESEN. Thes. p. 749. [SMITH'S Dict. of Bible, under the word Owl]. לילית is ἅπ. λεγ.

["In itself it means nothing more nor less than nocturnal, and would seem to be applicable to an animal or to any other object belonging to the night." "This gratuitous interpretation of the Hebrew word" (viz., as referring to the superstitions mentioned above) "was unfortunately sanctioned by BOCHART and VITRINGA, and adopted with eagerness by the modern Germans who rejoice in every opportunity of charging a mistake in physics, or a vulgar superstition on the Scriptures. This disposition is the more apparent here, because the writers of this school usually pique themselves upon the critical discernment with which they separate the exegetical inventions of the Rabbins from the genuine meaning of the Hebrew text. GESENIUS for example, will not even grant that the doctrine of a personal Messiah is so much as mentioned in the writings of Isaiah, although no opinion has been more universally maintained by the Jews, from the date of their oldest uncanonical books. In this case, their unanimous and uninterrupted testimony goes for nothing, because it would establish an unwelcome identity between the Messiah of the Old and New Testament. But when the object is to fasten on the Scriptures an odious and contemptible superstition, the utmost deference is paid, not only to the silly legends of the Jews, but to those of the Greeks, Romans, Zabians and Russians." "Beside the fact that לילית means nocturnal, and that its application to a spectre is entirely gratuitous, we may argue here, as in xiii. 25, that ghosts as well as demons would be wholly out of place in a list of wild and solitary animals. Is this a natural succession of ideas? Is it one that ought to be assumed without necessity?" . . . "Of all the figures that could be employed, that of resting seems to be the least appropriate in the description of a spectre." . . . The quotation of Matt. xii. 43 in this connection is "strange" and "incongruous," "where the evil spirit is expressly said to pass through dry places seeking rest and finding none." . . . "The sense is sufficiently secured by making לִילִית mean a nocturnal bird (Aben Ezra), or more specificially, an owl (Cocceius), or screech-owl (Lowth). But the word admits of a still more satisfactory interpretation, in exact agreement with the exposition which has already been given of the preceding terms as general descriptions rather than specific names. If these terms represent the animals occupying Idumea, first as belonging to the wilderness (צִיִּים), then as distinguished by their fierce and melancholy cries (אִיִּים), and then as shaggy in appearance (שָׂעִיר), nothing can be more natural than that the fourth epithet should also be expressive of their habits as a class . . . nocturnal or belonging to the night."—J. A. Alexander, in loc.—Tr.].

Ver. 15. Bochart in his Hieroz., II. p. 194 sqq., has proved that קִפּוֹז means arrow-snake. In lonely places, out of danger it harbors and lays its eggs. פִּלֵּט Piel = "to cause slipping away," like the Hiph. lxvi. 7: the imperf., with Vav consecutive makes what must hypotactically be regarded as a repeated fact, appear paratactically as occurring once. בָּקַע "to cleave," for by cleaving open the young are brought forth, comp. xxxv. 6; lviii. 8; lix. 5. דָּגַר "to cherish" (only here and Jer. xvii. 11), cherishes the young in its shadow (i. e., of its own body)—דַּיָּה "vulture," again only Deut. xiv. 13. The expression אִשָּׁה רְעוּתָהּ only here and ver. 16 in Isaiah. Drechsler justly construes it as asyndeton, and as in apposition with the subject, as must be done also ver. 16.

["As to the particular species of animals referred to in this whole passage, there is no need, as Calvin well observes, of troubling ourselves much about them. (Non est cur in iis magnopere torqueamur). The general sense evidently is that a human population should be succeeded by wild and lonely animals—implying total and continued desolation."—J. A. Alexander. For rich illustration of the subject from modern travellers see Barnes' Notes on Isaiah, in loc.—Tr.].

3. CONCLUDING REMARK: SUMMONS TO COMPARE THE PROPHECY WITH ITS FULFILMENT.

Chapter XXXIV. 16, 17.

16 Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read,
No one of these [a]shall fail,
None shall want her mate:
For my mouth it hath commanded, and [b]his spirit it hath gathered them.
17 And he hath cast the lot for them,
And his hand hath divided it unto them by line:
They shall possess it for ever,
From generation to generation shall they dwell therein.

[a] fails, Neither one nor the other does one miss.

[b] its breath.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 16. Comp. כָּתַב with עַל xxx. 8; Jer. xxxvi. 29; Deut. xxvii. 3, 8, etc.——וּקְרָאוּ comp. xxix. 11, 12.——The LXX. reads הָרְשׁוּ instead of הִרְשׁוּ, and refer the word to what goes before. Moreover it has somehow confounded מֵעַל־סֵפֶר with מִסְפָּר, and derived קָרְאוּ from קָרָא occurrere, for it reads thus: ἐκεῖ ἔλαφοι συνήντησαν καὶ ἴδον τὰ πρόσωπα ἀλλήλων ἀριθμῷ παρῆλθον. In the παρῆλθον is doubtless a reference to Gen. ii. 19. Strangely enough late expositors (Knobel, Meier) adopt this rendering through misconception of the passage.——I do not believe that the feminines in אחת מהנה and אשה רעותה relate only to the living beings enumerated in vers. 5-15. For why are not other traits of the prophecy, murder, burning, etc., to be fulfilled? And why conceive of all the living beings as feminine? The Prophet changes the gender ver. 17. I agree with those that take these feminines in a neuter sense, and as relating to all the traits of the predicted judgment, which is grammatically quite justifiable (comp. xli. 22).——נֶעְדָּר is used xl. 26, as here, in the sense of desiderari, deesse.——As אִשָּׁה אֲחוֹתָהּ is said of inanimate things (Exod. xxvi. 3, 5, 6, etc.) so the same is possible of אשה רעותה (asyndeton like ver. 15). פקדו is = "to miss," (properly: to verify by inspection the non-existence, comp. 1 Sam. xx. 6; xxv. 15). The 3d pers. plur. denotes the impersonal subject = "one."—פִּי occasions great difficulty. Some (as Drechsler) would refer the suffix in פִּי to the Prophet and in רוּחוֹ to God. But could the Prophet say: my mouth has commanded it? He could only say "announced," (הִגִּיד or the like). Thus the Vulg. translates: quod ex ore meo procedit, ille mandavit. But the LXX. has simply, ὅτι κύριος ἐνετείλατο αὐτοῖς. It is better, with several Rabbis and Delitzsch, to refer both suffixes to God: "my mouth has commanded it and its spirit, i. e., the spirit of my mouth has gathered them." Still this is a strange form of expression. For it appears as if the Lord distinguished between His spirit and the spirit of His mouth, as if the latter were not His spirit; a distinction that does not appear Ps. xxxiii. 6; Job xv. 30. Moreover the explanation of GESENIUS, who would take הוא for the nomen regens belonging to פִּי (comp. מִימֵי הִיא Nah. ii. 9), is not satisfactory. This construction is quite abnormal; for Nah. ii. 9 is not similar. With the exception of the clause "for my mouth—hath gathered them," not only the entire preceding part of the chapt. but also verses 16, 17 are spoken only by the Prophet. A corruption of the text was very possible, in as much as פִּיהוּ, by reason of the הוא after רוּחוֹ, could easily change to פִּי הוּא. Hence I think that we must simply translate "his mouth."——קִבְּצָן (Piel, see list) is to be referred to the same objects as the fem. suffixes preceding.

Ver. 17. הִפִּיל גּוֹרָל only here in Isaiah; comp. Ps. xxii. 19; Ezek. xxiv. 6, etc. גּוֹרָל alone and חִלֵּק see list.——קָו and יִירָשׁוּהָ and יִשְׁכְּנוּ בָהּ comp. on verse 11.——לְדוֹר וָדוֹר see verse 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet translates himself in spirit into the time when his prophecy shall have been fulfilled. As a pledge to his present readers of the reliability of his predictions he, so to speak, stakes his own and God's honor on the fulfilment, which must be compromised by the non-fulfilment. For what the mouth of the LORD has announced, that the Spirit of the LORD will bring to pass. Though the immediate reference of these words is to the prophecy against Edom, it lies in the nature of things that the present summons concerns in the same way all predictions of the Prophet. It is hard to see why only the prophecy against Edom should be provided with such a postscript as the present. It is therefore a natural conjecture that this postscript stands connected with the position, and general significance of this prophecy against Edom. The latter concludes part first: for with xxxvi. the historical pieces begin. We have found, too, this prophecy against Edom to be an exemplification in one nation of what is to happen to all (vers. 1–4). We may then take this postscript as pertaining to all the preceding threatening prophecies, because all of them are, so to speak, comprehended in this last one against Edom. Now as chap. xxxiv. is certainly more recent than most of the foregoing pieces, it is probable that this postscript was first added when the collection was made, to which perhaps the expression "Book of the LORD" refers. But, one may ask, why is this postscript put at the end of xxxv.? The verses 16, 17 are by their contents most intimately connected with xxxiv. 5–15. But why such an appeal to the written word only after a threatening prophecy? Christ, too, speaks the significant words "behold I have told you before" (Matt. xxiv. 25; Mar. xiii. 23) after announcing judgments. God's salvation comes to the pious, and they know from whose hand it comes. But the wicked will not hear of God's sending judgments. They ascribe them to accident or fatalistic necessity. Therefore it specially concerns them to prove, that the judgment is something announced beforehand, and thus is something previously known and determined, that it is therefore the act of Him who knows all His works from the beginning of the world (Acts xv. 18). Added to this, xxxv., points forwards more than backwards. It is the bridge to chapters xl.–lxvi., as it were, the morning twilight of the day of salvation, which dawns with chap. xl.

2. Seek ye——dwell therein. Vers. 16, 17. The summons to read in the written book seems to me to indicate that the Prophet has just been busy with a book and finished it, which he calls "the book of the LORD." GESEN., and DRECHSL., explain this to mean that the Prophet "had in mind the insertion of his oracle in a collection of holy Scriptures;" that he "knew it to be a part of a greater whole, into which, in its time, it must be adopted." But then why does he think this only of this prophecy? Even though elsewhere there is mention of recording single prophecies for the purpose of appealing to them afterwards (viii. 1; xxx. 8), still there is nowhere, beside the present, any mention of an entire book that deserved to be called "the book of the LORD." But we evidently stand here at a boundary. The prophecies of part first conclude. Chapters xxxvi–xxxix., form an historical supplement. With xl., the second part begins. And at this significant point a "book of the LORD" is mentioned. This is certainly not to be explained by saying that in closing his prophecy the Prophet happened here to mention the future book of which it was to become a part. It is much more likely that the Prophet provided this prophecy with such a conclusion, when he put this prophecy at the end of a great book, that he called Jehovah-book, as containing the entire Jehovah-word announced by him. The expression סֵפֶר יְהוָה occurs only here. Only a work in which Jehovah had space to give an all-sided revelation of His nature and will, deserved this name. And only a Prophet that was conscious of having been God's faithful instrument in all he had said and written, could set such a title to his book.

The prophecy must be fulfilled because God is author of it. This is the general sense. But as to particulars פִּי occasions difficulty, on which see Text. and Gram. The Spirit of God, or perhaps more correctly the breath of God drives, or rather blows together, from all quarters what God needs in one place for the accomplishment of His counsel. Compare an analogous use of קִבֵּץ Mic. i. 7. The various beings or powers mentioned in vers. 5–15 are partly masculine, partly feminine. The Prophet repeats with emphasis that the total of them, i. e., the representatives of both genders are endowed with the land of Edom in eternal possession. He has similarly expressed the difference in gender by the different gender terminations, iii. 1.

[On ver. 17. "An evident allusion to the division of the land of Canaan, both by lot and measuring line. (See Num. xxvi. 55, 56; Josh. xviii. 4–6). As Canaan was allotted to Israel, so Edom is allotted to these doleful creatures."—J. A. ALEXANDER.]

4. OBVERSE OF THE JUDGMENT: ISRAEL'S REDEMPTION AND RETURN HOME.

CHAPTER XXXV. 1–10.

1 [a]THE wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them;
And the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose.
2 [b]It shall blossom abundantly,
And rejoice even with joy and singing:
The glory of Lebanon [c]shall be given unto it,
The excellency of Carmel and Sharon,
They shall see the glory of the LORD,
And the excellency of our God.
3 Strengthen ye the weak hands,
And confirm the feeble knees.
4 Say to them that are of a [1][d] fearful heart,
Be strong, fear not:
Behold, your God [e]will come with vengeance,
Even God with a recompense;
He will come and save you.
5 Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened,
And the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped.
6 Then shall the lame man leap as an hart,
And the tongue of the dumb sing:
For in the wilderness shall waters break out,
And streams in the desert.
7 And the [f]parched ground shall become a pool,
And the thirsty land springs of water:
[g]In the habitation of dragons, where each lay,
Shall be [2]grass with reeds and rushes.
8 And an highway shall be there, and a way,
And it shall be called The way of holiness;
The unclean shall not pass over it; [3]but it shall be for those:
The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.
9 No lion shall be there,
Nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon,
It shall not be found there;
But [h]the redeemed shall walk there:
10 And the ransomed of the LORD shall return,
And come to Zion with songs
And everlasting joy upon their heads:
They shall obtain joy and gladness,
And sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

[1] Heb. hasty. [2] Or, a court for reeds, etc. [3] Or, for he shall be with them.

[a] Be glad desert—rejoice steppe, etc. [b] Bloom, bloom let it. [c] is given. [d] disconcerted.
[e] vengeance comes, recompense of God! He comes that He may save you. [f] mirage.
[g] In the habitation of jackals is their encampment, an enclosure for reeds and rushes. [h] redeemed ones.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. [The Author, like the LXX., translates the futures of this verse, (and also of ver. 2) as imperatives. But, as J. A. ALEX. says, "there is no sufficient reason for departing from the strict sense of the future."—TR.]. The abnormal form יְשֻׂשׂוּם must not be regarded as an error in copying, as has been done by LOWTH, EICHHORN, HITZIG, UMBREIT, OLSH. (Gram.). Nor can the ending וּם be treated as a suffix, as is done by GESENIUS, ROSENM., MAURER, DRECHSLER, who regard it as put for בָּם with reference to "the felicitous revolution of all things that is announced in the present chapter." Such a reference would be harsh, and a departure from the analogy of the construction of verbs of rejoicing. It is better (with ABEN EZRA, KIMCHI, EWALD, (§ 91, b), KNOBEL, DELITZSCH) to explain the form as an assimilation of the ן in יְשֻׂשׂוּן to the following ם: as in Numb. iii. 49 פְּדוּיִם stands for פִּדְיוֹן מ׳, and as, according to Wetzstein (excursus in Delitzsch, p. 688), at the present day even in Arabic n becomes m before a labial. In Greek also τὴμ μητέρα occurs for τὴν μητέρα. On the recurrence of שׂוּשׂ, צִיָּה, ערבה in Isaiah, see list.

Ver. 2. גִּילָה see list. The inf. רַנֵּן again only Ps. cxxxii. 16.——כבוד י׳ and הדר see list.

Ver. 3. The words are manifestly borrowed from Job iv. 3, 4. By a comparison of the Hebrew original it is seen that the first clause quite agrees with the words of Job; but the second combines elements of the two following clauses in Job, and כשלות is substituted for כרעות. But the two expressions חזק ידי רפ׳ and אמץ ברכים (כרעות or כשלות) occur only in these two places.

Ver. 4. Drechsler, Delitzsch, as some Rabbins before them, take נָקָם as acc. modalis (Drechsler: "Rächens kommt er," i. e., as much to do vengeance, as also in vengeance, in exhibition of vengeance). But no example can be cited of designating the object of coming by the accusative, or of the use of נקם adverbially as denoting the manner of appearance, like the use of נוראות, הֶבֶל, שֶׁקֶר, בֶּטַח, etc. The parallel passages that are cited (xiii. 9; xxx. 27; xl. 10) prove only that אלהיכם can be joined to יבוא as its predicate, something that is not doubted. The accents indeed favor this connection here, but they are not binding. In an entirely similar sentence as to structure (Jer. xxiii. 19; xxx. 33) they make such a distribution as I think is also the correct one here. With most expositors, therefore, I take הנה אלהיכם as first clause, which incontestibly is grammatically possible (comp. e. g. xvii. 14; Gen. xii. 19), and נקם יבוא as the second. Thus by הנה, as it were with the index finger, the Prophet points to God as He draws near, and then with the following words explains His coming. Vengeance, says he (comp. on xxxiv. 8), comes, divine recompense. גמול א׳ is in apposition with נקם. אלהים denotes not merely the author, but also the manner of the recompense: it is such as God only can visit, viz., as just in principle as it is complete in execution. The expression therefore recalls חִתַּת א׳ "the terror of God," Gen. xxxv. 5; אַרְזֵי אֵל Ps. lxxx. 11; עֲצֵי ה׳ Ps. civ. 16, etc.——הוא יבוא ו׳ emphasizes the coming of the Lord for a positive object.——The form וְישַׁעֲכֶם stands for וְיוֹשִׁיעֲכֶם, as Prov. xx. 22 וְיֹשַׁע for וְיוֹשִׁיעַ. The abbreviated (Jussive) form denotes that the clause is to be construed as marking intention: "that he may save you."

Ver. 5. חֵרֵשׁ, see list.

Ver. 6. דִּלֵּג "to spring" (Ps. xviii. 30) and איל only here in Isaiah. פסח comp. xxxiii. 23.——אִלֵּם, see list.

Ver. 7. אֲגַם and מַבּוּעַ (Eccl. xii. 6), see list.——צמאון again only Deut. viii. 15; Ps. cvii. 33.——Both as to sense and grammar it gives a harsh construction to take רבצה in apposition with נוה, and to refer the suffix to תנים. What need is there of saying that the נוה of the jackal is also its רבץ? Nor would I, with Drechsler refer the suffix in רבצה to מים: for רבץ is a place of repose (comp. lxv. 10; Jer. l. 6; Prov. xxiv. 15). רבצה is manifestly to be referred to Israel. It is true that in what precedes there is no word to which the suffix ־ָה may be grammatically referred. But we know the great liberty of the Hebrew, in which verbal and nominal endings, as also suffixes are referred to ideal notions or such as are implied in the context (comp. on xxxiii. 4). It is in this case to be referred to some feminine notion of the author's mind, such as Zion or daughter of Zion. The following words, too, חציר י׳ are an echo of xxxiv. 13 b (חציר לבנות י׳). Hence the latter passage seems to me to indicate what must be the explanation of the present, and that we must here also take חציר in the sense of חָצֵר. This interchange, indeed, does not occur in any other than the passages named. But grammatically it is not impossible (comp. פָּלִיט and פָּלֵט, יָגִיעַ and יָגֵעַ, עָתִיק and עָתֵק, Ewald, § 149, e) and the sense demands it in xxxiv. 13. For the ostrich does not eat grass. Hence I construe חציר in this place as חָצֵר and in apposition with נְוֵה ת׳.

Ver. 8. The וְ before הוא might be taken in a causal sense (Ewald, § 353, a). But it seems to me more suitable to regard the clause והוא למו as the negative correlative of לא יעברנו טמא, and to translate וְ accordingly by "but" (Ewald, § 354, a, p. 843). Note here, too, what freedom the Prophet takes with the gender of the words. The fem. לָהּ after יקרא is immediately followed by the masculines יַעַבְרֶנּוּ and הוא.——דרך is most commonly masculine (fem. only Deut. i. 22; Ps. i. 6; cxix. 33; Ezra viii. 2). But it is incredible that this interchange of gender is conditioned by the double gender of דרך, for that would not justify such interchange in one and the same passage. But לָהּ relates to the notion מַסְלוּל, i. e., מְסִלָּה which is here in an exceptional way represented by the other word.——הלך is part. absolutum, and prepositive conditional clause. In respect to the sense comp. xlii. 16.——אויל again only xix. 11.

Ver. 9. פריץ only here in Isaiah.——The 3 pers. fem. in תמצא is to be referred חַיַּת, for this 3.pers. fem. involves an ideal plural (comp. on xxxiv. 13)——גאולים again only li. 10; lxii. 12; Ps. cvii. 2; [but also, see list].

Ver. 10. פדוי, נשג, יגון, אנחה, see list. ששון ושמחה, comp. xxii. 13; li. 3, 11; lxi. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As in all sections of Isaiah's prophecies, so here the perspective closes with a glorious future (comp. xi. and xii.; xxiii. 15–18; xxvii.; xxxiii. 13–24). As exile is the sum of all terrors for the Israelite, so exile's end, return to Zion to everlasting, blessed residence there is the acme and sum of all felicity. Thus here the prospect of joyful return home is presented to Israel in contrast with the frightful judgments that (xxxiv.) are to come upon the heathen, and at the same time as a transition and prelude to chapters xl.–lxvi.

The desert through which the way lies shall flourish like Carmel and Sharon (vers. 1, 2). There all the weary and languishing shall receive new strength (ver. 3). The fearful and timid shall gain fresh courage at the prospect of the vengeance and deliverance from their God (ver. 4). The blind shall see; the deaf hear (ver. 5), the lame walk, the dumb speak; springs shall well up in the desert (ver. 6); the mirage shall become reality, the lair of the jackal will become a place of grass and water fitted for an encampment (ver. 7). A highway will appear that shall be a holy way. For as, on the one hand, nothing unclean shall go on it, so, on the other, the simple ones of Israel will not lose their way on it (ver. 8). No ravenous beast shall render it insecure. Only the redeemed of the LORD shall travel it (ver. 9). They shall return on it to Zion with joy. Then shall everlasting joy go in there, and sorrow and sighing flee away (ver. 10).

2. The wilderness——of our God.—Vers. 1, 2. These verses, as it were, prepare the theatre in general for the return of Israel. This return is to be through the desert. There is not a word to intimate that the Prophet has a definite desert in view. The march of Israel through the Arabian desert when returning from the Egyptian captivity, is as much the type for all home returns of Israel, as that first captivity is the type for all that follow. For so says Isa. xi. 16: "And there shall be an highway for the remnant of her people, which shall be left from Assyria, like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." The Nile and Euphrates shall be made passable by dividing their beds into seven small streams (xi. 15), and the desert, (according to Jer. xxxi. 21), by setting up signs and way-marks, and preparing the road. Especially in Isa. xliii. 19 sq.; xlviii. 21 it is promised that those returning home shall enjoy abundance of water in the desert. Thus then our passage sees in the wilderness the chief territory for the march of the home-returning Israelites. The desert shall conform to the blessed people that wander through it. It will change its nature. Hitherto a place of curse, abode of demons (xxxiv. 14), it will become a place of blessing, a paradise. The principle of a higher, spiritual, eternal life, the principle of glorification will become operative in it. This idea of the glorification of nature is peculiar to Isaiah (see iv. 2; vi. 3; xi. 7 sqq.). חבצלת translated "rose," occurs only here and Song of Solomon ii. 1. It is variously translated rose, lily, narcissus, crocus. That it denotes some sort of bulbous plant appears from בָּצָל (Numb. xi. 5) which means "onion." ח is often used to form quadraliterals, comp. חַנָמַל, חֲזָקֵל, GESEN., Thes., p. 436. Some suppose that the meadow-saffron, colchicum autumnale is meant, because the Syriac translates the word chamzaloito (see GESEN., Comm. in loc.). But it seems impossible that such a poisonous weed could be meant here and Song of Sol. ii. 1. If a bulbous plant is meant, it may (distinguished from שׁוֹשַׁנָּה, the lilium candidum, the λείριον of the Greeks), be the lilium bulbiferum, the fire lily (comp. PLIN. Hist. nat. XXI. 5, 11, est et rubens lilium, quod Graeci κρίνον vocant). In fact the LXX., translate it here by κρίνον. But it might even be the narcissus, "the miraculous flower, at the sight of which gods and men wonder, that raises itself out of the earth with a hundred heads, whose fragrance rejoices heaven, sea and earth" (VIKTOR HEHN, Kulturpflanzen, u. Hausthiere, Berlin, 1870, p. 164). ARNOLD (HERZ., R.-Encycl., XI. p. 25) holds this view. [The translation "rose" is true to the poetry if not to the botany.—BARNES, J. A. ALEXANDER]. But however this may be, the meaning is, that the entire steppe, covered with the bloom of this flower, shall appear like one single individual flower of the sort. Lebanon. (see list) Sharon (ibid.) and Carmel appear united, xxxiii. 9, as types of the most glorious vegetation. הֲדַר must be referred to the gloriously adorned meadows. For just because they are honored with beholding the glory of God, they must themselves appear in adornment to suit.

3. Strengthen——the desert.—Vers. 3-6. The Prophet ver. 3 addresses his own word of encouragement to the returning ones, and then ver. 4 prescribes to them the words with which they are to reassure any that are dismayed (see on xxxii. 4 where the word is used for hurry in judging), to whom the undertaking may seem too bold and daring. The words "be strong, fear not" are evidently borrowed from Deut. xxxi. 6 (comp. 2 Chr. xxxii. 7). How can Israel fear since the LORD their God hastens to them to visit vengeance on the enemy and to redeem His people!

What is said vers. 5, 6 of opening eyes, ears and tongues, and of the free use of members before crippled, we will need to understand as much in a spiritual as in a corporeal sense. For the "hasty of heart," ver. 4, proves that also spirit and spiritual defects on the part of the returning Israelites are still to be removed. And פקח is the specific technical term for opening the eyes generally (only once of the ears xlii. 20) and for opening the spiritual eyes in particular (xxxvii. 17; xlii. 7). ["As HENDERSON justly says, there is no proof whatever that Christ refers John the Baptist to this prophecy (Matt. xi. 5; Luke vii. 22): He employs none of the formulas which He uniformly uses when directing attention to the Old Testament (e. g., in Matt. ix. 16; xi. 10; xii. 17; xiii. 14), but simply appeals to His miracles in proof of His Messiahship: the language is similar, but the subjects differ. To the question, whether this prediction is in no sense applicable to our Saviour's miracles, we may reply with CALVIN, that though they are not directly mentioned, they were really an emblem and example of the great change which is here described. So, too, the spiritual cures effected by the gospel, although not specifically signified by these words, are included in the glorious revolution which they do describe.—J. A. ALEXANDER].

The clause ver. 6 b. gives a reason, not specially for the healing of the dumb, lame, etc., but in general for the exhortation to be of good cheer that is given to those returning, and to rejoice that is given to the desert itself from ver. 1 onwards. Abundance of water shall be given in the desert. This explains why the desert is to flourish and rejoice, and those that journey through it should be of good cheer. נבקע "to break out" (comp. at xlviii. 21) stands in the well-known metonymic sense as elsewhere (see list). But this verse forms at the same time the transition to what follows, viz.: the more particular description of the road, by which the redeemed shall return.

4. And the parched——flee away.—Vers. 7-10. [שָׁרָב it is now agreed denotes the illusive appearance often witnessed both at sea and land, called in English looming, in Italian fata morgana, and in French mirage. In the deserts of Arabia and Africa, the appearance presented is precisely that of an extended sheet of water, tending not only to mislead the traveller, but to aggravate his thirst by disappointment. "More deceitful than mirage" (or serab) is an Arabian proverb. The word (which occurs again in the Old Testament only xlix. 10) adds a beautiful stroke to the description, not only by its local propriety, but by its strict agreement with the context. Comp. J. A. Alex., and Barnes, in loc. Herz., R.-Encycl. XXI., p. 607. Curtius, VII. 5, 3 and 4.—Tr.].

This torture shall not be experienced by the returning Israelites. Instead of the mocking atmospheric illusion there shall be an actual lake, and the dry region shall become a region of bubbling (מַבּוּעַ) springs. Where before was only the lair of jackals, there Israel will bivouac as in a place where now is a green spot hedged in for cane and reed. The Prophet has in mind his own description xxxiv. 13 b.

On רִבְצָהּ and חָצִיר see Text. and Gram. By the construction defended there we see that the Prophet explains why a former lair of jackals has now become fit for a resting place. It has become a fence enclosure for reed and cane. Once dry, it is now moist; so much so that plants requiring great moisture grow there. Wherever the moisture extends these plants grow. Their station, therefore, being sharply defined, may be called really a septum, a hedge. But this is a natural fence, not artificial; depending on organic life, not on stone walls. It is well remarked by Gesenius (Thes. p. 512) that the meanings of חָצִיר and חָצֵר hang together. For the nomadic חָצֵר extends exactly as far as there is חָצִיר. So also the Greek χόρτος (by which the LXX. generally translate חָצִיר) is at once fodder, grass and fence, court (comp. hortus and chors, cors, cohors). We may then in the text take חָצִיר as having the additional notion of the natural hedge, the district of vegetation. קָנֶה "cane" see xix. 6. גֹּמֶא, properly the papyrus reed (see on xviii. 2) stands here for rushes generally (Job viii. 11). Ver. 8. The Lord's care extends further: He will make in the desert an embanked highway, a causeway; an impossible construction for men! מַסְלוּל (= מְסִלָּה see list) is ἅπ. λεγ. The expression "a highway and a way" is plainly a hendiadys. This way shall be holy. The Lord built it and destined it to lead to His house. It is a pilgrim way. Hence nothing unclean, neither unclean person nor thing, may come up on it; it belongs only to them, i. e., the Israelites, which notion here, as well as in רִבְצָהּ (see Text. and Gram.), must be regarded as ideally present. Another advantage of this via sacra is that even the simple-minded ("Thumbe"), cannot go astray on it. For whoever goes on it is a sanctified one, under God's protection and care. הֹלֵךְ דֶּרֶךְ is in contrast with לֹא יַעַבְרֶנּוּ טָמֵא: an unclean person will not cross the way, but as regards him who goes, i. e., who has once entered on the way,—even fools will not go astray. All that can make unclean or occasion danger will remain at a distance from the holy way. (Comp. comm. on xliii. 20). Instead of that, redeemed, and only they shall journey on it. Hence the way will be a, or rather the way of salvation. Ver. 10, which is identical with li. 11, defines the goal of the travellers and the success of their journey.

The ransomed of the Lord will return home. The idea שׁוּב in all its modifications plays a great part in Isaiah and Jeremiah. Comp. on vii. 3; x. 20-22; Jer. iii. 1; xxxi. 22. Joy and peace as the promised blessings (Deut. xxviii. 2, 15) the redeemed shall receive, but sorrow and sighing shall flee. [On their heads may be an expression denoting that joy is manifest in the face and aspect. Gesenius, Barnes.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxiv. 1-4. Because Rev. vi. 12-17 has express reference to this passage, some would conclude that the Prophet here has in view only that special event of the world's judgment (the opening of the sixth seal). But that is not justified. For other passages of the New Testament that do not specially relate to the opening of the sixth seal are based on this passage (Matth. xxiv. 29; 2 Pet. iii. 7 sqq.; Rev. xiv. 11; xix. 11 sqq.). It appears from this that the present passage is, as it were, a magazine from which New Testament prophecy has drawn its material for more than one event of fulfilment.

2. On xxxiv. 16. The word of God can bear the closest scrutiny. Indeed it desires and demands it. If men would only examine the Scriptures diligently and with an unclouded mind and love of truth, "whether these things are so," as did the Bereans (Acts xvii. 11; Jno. v. 39)!

3. On xxxv. 3. "The Christian church is the true Lazaretto in which may be found a crowd of weary, sick, lame and wretched people. Therefore, Christ is the Physician Himself (Matth. ix. 12) who binds up and heals those suffering from neglect (Ezek. xxxiv. 16; Isa. lxi. 1). And His word cures all (Wisd. xvi. 12). His servants, too, are commissioned officially to admonish the rude, to comfort the timid, to bear the weak, and be patient with all (1 Thess. v. 14). Therefore, whoever feels weak, let him betake himself to this Bethania; there he will find counsel for his soul." Cramer.

4. [On xxxv. 8, 9. "They who enter the path that leads to life, find there no cause of alarm. Their fears subside; their apprehensions of punishment on account of their sins die away, and they walk that path with security and confidence. There is nothing in that way to alarm them; and though there are many foes—fitly represented by lions and wild beasts—lying about the way, yet no one is permitted to 'go up thereon.' This is a most beautiful image of the safety of the people of God, and of their freedom from all enemies that could annoy them." "The path here referred to is appropriately designed only for the redeemed of the Lord. It is not for the profane, the polluted, the hypocrite. It is not for those who live for this world, or for those who love pleasure more than they love God. The church should not be entered except by those who have evidence that they are redeemed. None should make a profession of religion who have no evidence that they belong to "the redeemed," and who are not disposed to walk in the way of holiness. But for all such it is a highway on which they are to travel. It is made by leveling hills and elevating valleys; across the sandy desert and through the wilderness of this world, infested with the enemies of God and His people. It is made straight and plain, so that none need err; it is defended from enemies, so that all may be safe; because 'He,' their Leader and Redeemer, shall go with them and guard that way." BARNES in loc.]

FIFTH SUBDIVISION.

THE HISTORICAL PIECES: CONTAINING THE CONCLUSION OF THE ASSYRIAN AND THE PREPARATION FOR THE BABYLONIAN PERIOD.

CHAPTERS XXXVI.—XXXIX.

These four chapters run parallel with 2 Kings xviii. 13—xx. 19. It is not hard to see why they are here. Chaps. xxxvi. and xxxvii. represent to us the contemporaneous fulfilment of the prophecies relating to Assyria. Chaps. xxxviii. and xxxix. show how "from afar" (מרחוק) was begun the spinning of the first threads of that web of Babylonish complications that were at last so fatal. There is good internal ground for putting side by side these two retrospective and prospective histories, which DELITZSCH aptly compares to the head of Janus. It is, moreover, natural that the retrospective should come before the prospective piece. But researches among the Assyrian monuments have established beyond doubt that the overthrow of Sennacherib did not occur in the fourteenth, but in the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah; therefore not in 714 B. C., but in 700 B. C.

According to the annals and according to the Canon of Ptolemy, Sargon ascended also the throne of Babylon in 709 B. C. (see on xxxviii. 1). For the latter calls the year 709 the first of Ἀρκέανος, i. e., Sargon. Therefore Sennacherib cannot possibly have reigned as early as 714. The lists of regencies (comp. SCHRADER, p. 331, 268 sqq.) say distinctly that Sennacherib, after the murder of his father on the 12th Ab (July) of the year 705, ascended the throne. LENORMANT, as learned as he is positive in his opinions (Les prem. civilis, II. p. 237) says: "In fact the attack of Sennacherib on the kingdom of Judah is fixed in a precise way at the third campaign of that king and at the year 700 B. C. by the text of the annals of his reign inscribed on a cylinder of baked earth possessed by the British Museum. It is said, in fact, that it precedes by one year the installation of Asurnadinzum as viceroy in Babylon, an event which, in the astronomical Canon of Ptolemy, is inscribed in 699. Consequently the expedition against Judah took place in the twenty-eighth and not in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah." It appears not clearly made out whether Sennacherib's expedition against Judah occurred in 701 or in 700. LENORMANT says 700, but SCHRADER (l. c.) is still in doubt. The difference is unessential. It appears to be occasioned by different computations of the beginnings of the years. I will follow that of LENORMANT.

Now while it appears that chaps. xxxvi. and xxxvii. relate the events of 700 B. C., or of the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah's reign, it is equally certain chaps. xxxviii. and xxxix. relate the events of 714, or of the fourteenth year of Hezekiah. For according to xxxviii. 5 (see comm. in loc.) the LORD prolongs Hezekiah's life fifteen years. We know also from 2 Kings xxi. 1 (2 Chr. xxxiii. 1) that Manasseh was twelve years old when he succeeded his father Hezekiah. From this results that he could only have been born after the seventeenth year of Hezekiah's reign. In the fourteenth then he was not yet born. And this explains both the grief of Hezekiah (xxxviii. 3) and his great joy (xxxviii. 19). But the following considerations show that Hezekiah's sickness and recovery and the embassy from Babylon did not occur before Sennacherib's overthrow: 1) The treasury chambers, still full, in contrast with 2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq. (see xxxix. 2 and comm.). Had this been the spoil of an enemy, Hezekiah would have displayed it as such, and the Prophet (see comm. at xxxix. 6) would not have called it "that which thy fathers have laid up in store." 2) The deliverance from Assyria is spoken of as in the future (xxxviii. 6). 3) We do not find in Hezekiah's psalm (xxxix. 10 sqq.) the slightest reference to the miraculous deliverance spoken of in xxxvi. and xxxvii. which would be inexplicable if that glorious event were a thing of the past.

Accordingly it appears that chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. are not chronologically arranged, but according to their contents, as already explained. [On the misunderstandings to which this has led and the possible change of the captions, see Introduction, §§ 3, 4.] The important question arises: which of these records is the original one—this in Isa. xxxvi.—xxxix., or the parallel one in 2 Kings xviii. 13—xx. 19? It seems to me that no impartial reader can remain in doubt on this subject. The text of the Book of Kings is the older.

This appears probable from the fact that it is more comprehensive and stands in an historical book. For as certainly as prophecy needs history, so certainly it needs only such facts as verify its fulfilment. And the presumption is that this in Isaiah being the shorter, has been abbreviated for the ends of a prophetic book. Moreover it is better to think, if any alterations must be admitted, that they are of the nature of abbreviations, rather than arbitrary additions, which is the alternative, if the shorter text be regarded as the older. These probabilities become certainties when we view the difference in these passages in concreto. The differences on the part of Isaiah form two chief classes, abbreviations and corrections. Additions, i. e., where the text in Isaiah gives something more than the Book of Kings, there are none, except the psalm of thanksgiving, xxxviii. 9–20. But this exception proves the rule. For it proves that the author of each book had in view his own object. Such a psalm suits better in a prophetic book to which song and prayer are kindred elements, than to historic annals. Moreover this psalm is so far important that it proves that, beside the two writings before us, there must have existed a third, that probably served as the source of both.

The abbreviations in Isaiah's text are of two sorts. They are partly the omission of historical data that seemed unsuited to the aim of the prophetic book. To this sort belong xxxvi. 1, 2; xxxvii. 36; xxxviii. 4–7 (where the whole text is much contracted). And partly also they are omissions of rhetorical and grammatical redundancies. Such are xxxvi. 2, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 17; xxxvii. 4 (comp. ver. 17 and xxxix. 2), 11, 21, 25; xxxix. 2. I will refer for the particulars to the following commentary. But here I will call special attention to a few passages. Can any one deny that the accumulation of predicates in 2 Kings xviii. 17 b ויעלו ויבאו ירושלים ויעלו ויבאו ויעמדו are contracted into one word in Isa. xxxvi. 2, wherein, besides, ויעמדו must become ויעמד because Isaiah leaves out two of the three ambassadors? Or can it be denied that the picturesque, circumstantial וידבר ויאמר of Kings has been contracted to the simple ויאמר, Isa. xxxvi. 13? Or must the editor of 2 Kings xviii. 29 have added the surprising מידו? Did not rather the editor of the Isaiah text leave that word out because it was superfluous for him and seemed harsh?

But still more common are the differences that are due to corrections. They are the following: xxxvi. 5, 7, 10, 11, 13, 15, 19, 21; xxxvii. 2, 6, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 23, 24, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8. I will notice here the following: xxxvi. 5 we have אָמַרְתִּי instead of אָמַרְתָּ. The latter—though at first sight strange—is undoubtedly correct (see comm.). Can המקום have come from הארץ (2 Kings xviii. 25 and Isa. xxxvi. 10), or והחרישו, 2 Kings xviii. 36, have come from ויחרישו, Isa. xxxvi. 21? Is the כי of xxxix. 8 changed into הֲלוֹא אם, 2 Kings xx. 19? These few examples and the others that are commented on more at length in the exposition below seem to prove irrefragably that we have in 2 Kings a more original text. DELITZSCH (in DRECHSLER'S Comm. II. p. 151 sqq. and in his own Comm., p. 373) is certainly right in saying that our chapters were not composed by the author of the Book of Kings himself, or drawn from the annals of the kingdom. I agree perfectly with his explanation of the difference between annalistic and prophetic writing of history, and according to which he ascribes our chapters to a prophetic source. I also quite agree with him, that an account composed by Isaiah must essentially be that source. For he justly appeals to the fact that, according to 2 Chr. xxvi. 22, Isaiah wrote a history of king Uzziah, and elsewhere weaves historical accounts into his prophecies (vii., viii., xx.), and in them speaks of himself partly in the third person, as he does in xxxvi.—xxxix. I moreover willingly admit that the mention of the locality xxxvi. 2, on account of almost literal agreement, connects with vii. 3, in fact presupposes it. And finally I have no objection to the statement that the author of 2 Kings had Isaiah's book before him, and that 2 Kings xvi. 5 compared with Isa. vii. 1, may be adduced as proof. I even add to this that the two passages now reviewed are proof of this. For the author of 2 Kings could have accepted for his book the arrangement according to the contents and contrary to the chronology, only on the ground of the book of prophecy that lay before him. But I must controvert the view that 2 Kings xviii. 13—xx. 19 is drawn from Isa. xxxvi.–xxxix. as its source. For reasons already given I think the text of 2 Kings the more original and better.

Isaiah may have written down an account of the remarkable events of which our chapters treat, a matter that is at least highly probable. From this source was first drawn what we have in xxxvi.—xxxix. These chapters are so suitable and even necessary where they are, that we may refer the idea of them to the Prophet himself, and even admit that he directed his account to be adopted into his book of prophecy, not unaltered, but with a suitable transposition of events and abbreviation of the text. Both were done, but the latter not quite in the sense of the Prophet. The result was as described in the Introduction, §§ 3, 4 (at the end). But we must not suppose the false dates of xxxvi. 1; xxxviii. 1; xxxix. 1 were put by this first editor. The author of the Book of Kings, too, who wrote in the exile (probably 562–536 B. C.) must have known the right relations of these chapters and the proper dates. For he had at the same time before him that historical account of the Prophet as his source, and reproduced it more perfectly and unaltered than his predecessors that had used it for the prophetic book. Possibly, while following the order of Isaiah, he may have retained the original dates of their common source. But in time, and for reasons easily conjectured, his text would experience the same alterations as to dates as did the parallel passages in Isaiah, and perhaps by the same hand. And if, in respect to chronological arrangement of the account, the Book of Kings differed from the prophetic book and agreed with their common original source, then it is probable that a later hand, perhaps the same that changed the dates in Isaiah, brought the Book of Kings in this respect into accord with the prophetic book.

Thus it is found, that the transposition of events in the prophetic book for material reasons has become the origin of that discrepancy between the Assyrian and Bible chronology of this historical epoch. We have seen in respect to the taking of Samaria that these two sources completely agree.

Also for Manasseh's time the agreement is satisfactory. Only for Hezekiah's time there existed this fatal difference of fourteen years in reference to the all-important event of Sennacherib's overthrow. This difference is seeming. It dissolves when we consider the misunderstandings occasioned by the transposition of the chapters.

So it can have been. I do not say that it must have been so. For in these ancient matters we will hardly be able ever to make out the exact course things have taken. Only that chap. xxxvi.—xxxix. are not derived from Isaiah in their present form, but have proceeded by alteration and abbreviation from the original account of Isaiah seems to me certain.*

DELITZSCH, in proof of the authenticity of the present text of Isaiah, appeals to 2 Chron. xxxii. 32: "in the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, (and) in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel." He finds in this that "an historical account of Hezekiah out of the collection of Isaiah's prophecies with the superscription חזון passed over into the "book of the kings of Judah and Israel." I admit that the words of the Chronicler have this sense, which is favored by 2 Chron. xx. 34. But what is gained by that? Only that then, when the Chronicler wrote, the books of Isaiah and Kings were in existence, and that he supposed the text in Kings to be taken from Isaiah. He might have been moved to take this view by the recognized priority of Isaiah's book, and by the conviction that Isaiah was certainly the author of the text contained in his book. But this view of the Chronicler does not weaken the fact that the text in 2 Kings is more original and purer than that in Isaiah.

It has been objected to the claim of originality for the text in 2 Kings, that 2 Kings xxiv. 18—xxv. 30, although the original text, is still more corrupt than the parallel text, Jer. lii. This is in general true (see my comm. on Jer. lii.). But there one sees that the text of 2 Kings, being the older and more disintegrated, is, on account of adverse experiences, less preserved. But the text of Isa. xxxvi.–xxxix., on the contrary, has not become worse in process of time and by unfavorable circumstances, but it is from its origin worse through the faulty epitomizing and unfortunate emendations of its author.

The division of the chapters is very simple. Embassies play a great part in them. Chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii. contain the conclusion of the relations between Israel and Assyria. This first part has six subdivisions. 1) The embassy of Sennacherib to Hezekiah, chap. xxxvi. 2) The embassy of Hezekiah to Isaiah, xxxvii. 1–7. 3) The writing of Sennacherib to Hezekiah, xxxvii. 8–13. 4) Hezekiah's prayer, xxxvii. 14–20. 5) Isaiah's message to Hezekiah, xxxvii. 21–35. 6) The deliverance, xxxvii. 36–38. The second part that paves the way for the relations to Babylon has three subdivisions: 1) Hezekiah's sickness and recovery, chap. xxxviii. (a. sickness, vers. 1–3; b. recovery, vers. 4–8; psalm of thanksgiving, vers. 9–20 [22]). 2) The Babylonian embassy, xxxix. 1–8.

* [The reader versed in studies belonging to the general subject of Introduction will be reminded by the foregoing of the Urevangelium, the original Gospel, the fascination of German critics of the New Testament. Its foundation is conjecture, and nothing better than probability at best. Though one accumulate a mountain of such conjectural probabilities, they will no more sustain a fact or make a fact than a cloud will sustain a pebble or condense into a pebble. The same may be said of the Author's original Isaiah history. On the general subject treated of in the foregoing, J. A. ALEXANDER, in his introduction to chapter xxxvi., says: "The simple, common-sense view of the matter is, that since the traditional position of these chapters among the writings of Isaiah corresponds exactly to the known fact of his having written a part of the history of Judah, the presumption in favor of his having written both the passages in question cannot be shaken by the mere possibility, or even intrinsic probability of other hypotheses, for which there is not the least external evidence." And again on xxxviii. 1 he says: "Why may we not suppose that the overthrow of Sennacherib occurred in the interval between Hezekiah's sickness and the embassy from Merodach-baladan? It is altogether natural that the Prophet, after carrying the history of Sennacherib to its conclusion, should go back to complete that of Hezekiah also."—TR.]

I.—THE CONCLUSION OF THE RELATIONS OF ISRAEL TO ASSYRIA.

CHAPTERS XXXVI., XXXVII.

1. THE EMBASSY OF SENNACHERIB TO HEZEKIAH.

CHAP. XXXVI. 1–22.

1 Now it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah, that Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them.
2 And the king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish unto Jerusalem unto king Hezekiah with a great army. And he stood by the conduit of the upper pool in 3 the highway of the fuller's field. Then came forth unto him Eliakim, Hilkiah's son, which was over the house, and Shebna the [1a]scribe, and Joah, Asaph's son, the recorder.

4 And Rabshakeh said unto them, Say ye now to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great 5 king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is this wherein thou [b]trustest? [c]I say, sayest thou, (but they are but[2] vain words) [3]I have counsel and strength for war: now

6 on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me? Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this [d]broken reed, on Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into 7 his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust in him. But if thou say to me, We trust in the LORD our God: is it not he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and said to Judah and to Jerusalem, 8 Ye shall worship before this altar? Now therefore [e]give [4]pledges, I pray thee, to my master the king of Assyria, and I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou 9 be able [f]on thy part to set riders upon them. How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of the least of my master's servants, [g]and put thy trust on Egypt 10 for chariots and for horsemen? And am I now come up without the LORD against this land to destroy it? The LORD said unto me, Go up against this land, and destroy it.
11 Then said Eliakim and Shebna and Joah unto Rabshakeh, Speak, I pray thee, unto thy servants [h]in the Syrian language; for we understand it: and speak not to 12 us [i]in the Jews' language, in the ears of the people that are on the wall. But Rabshakeh said, Hath my master sent me to thy master and to thee to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit upon the wall, that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you?
13 Then Rabshakeh stood, and cried with a loud voice [i]in the Jews' language, and 14 said, Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria. Thus saith the 15 king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you. Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us: this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.
16 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, [5][6]Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me: and eat ye every one of his vine, and every one of his fig tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern;
17 Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land, a land of corn and 18 wine, a land of bread and vineyards. Beware lest Hezekiah [j]persuade you, saying,
The LORD will deliver us. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out 19 of the hand of the king of Assyria? Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad?
where are the gods of Sepharvaim? and [k]have they delivered Samaria out of my 20 hand? Who are they among all the gods of these lands, that have delivered their land out of my hand, that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?
21 But they held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's command-22 ment was, saying, Answer him not. Then came Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, that was over the household, and Shebna the [1a]scribe, and Joah, the son of Asaph the recorder, to Hezekiah with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

[1] Or, secretary. [2] Heb. a word of lips. [3] Or, but counsel and strength are for war.
[4] Or, hostages. [5] Or, seek my favor by a present. [6] Heb. make with me a blessing.

[a] the chancellor. [b] confidest. [c] I say it is mere lip work the counsel and strength for carrying on war.
[d] bruised. [e] make a wager. [f] for thee (i. e., for thy advantage).
[g] And trustest thou, etc.? [h] in Aramaic. [i] in Judaic.
[j] incite. [k] (where were your gods) that delivered Samaria, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. The form חֵיל occurs only here and 2 Kings xviii. 17 as stat. absol. Yet comp. חֵל, which differs in meaning xxvi. 1.——כבד in the sense of "considerable for number," comp. Num. xx. 20; 1 Kings iii. 9; x. 2; 2 Kings vi. 14.——יעמד, abbreviated compared with 2 Ki. xviii. 17 b.; see introduction to this chapter. 2 Kings xviii. 18 begins with "And when they had called to the king," which are wanting here in accordance with the tendency to abbreviate.

Ver. 5. Instead of אמרתי 2 Kings has אָמַרְתָּ. I regard the latter as the correct reading, and that in Isaiah to be a correction, occasioned by not knowing that אך דבר שפתים is parenthetical, and thus not understanding how Hezekiah could speak words that in the mouth of the Assyrian king could have good sense, but in Hezekiah's none. According to the question ver. 4, "what confidence," etc.? the contents of this confidence is set forth: "thou sayest namely: counsel and strength for war." The words אך ד׳ ש׳ are parenthetical, and words of the Assyrian, by which he gives his opinion of the expression imputed to Hezekiah. This expression is put as an exclamation, thus as a clause without explicit predicate. This is a somewhat pathetic form of sentence. It reveals an intention of making Hezekiah's words appear to be empty pathos, absurd boastfulness. If the entire first clause of verse 5 were to be construed as the utterance of the Assyrian, then the second clause must begin with כִּי instead of עתה. For then a reason would need to follow showing Hezekiah's words to be empty boast. But if ver. 5 a contain in its chief clause Hezekiah's words, then עתה is perfectly in place. For then by means of it Hezekiah is summoned to establish his (so-called) boast. Come, now! in what dost thou trust that thou rebellest against me?

Ver. 6. עתה before הנה, and לך after בטחת are missing here for abbreviation's sake.——אשר יסמך וגו׳ is paratactic.

Ver. 7. תאמר for תאמרון and the omission of בירושלים at the end of the verse are further marks of simplifying and abbreviating.

Ver. 8. לְךָ after לתת evidently means "to thy advantage." It is dat. commodi: meaning, "thou mayest use these horses for your advantage against me, in case you can mount them with riders."

Ver. 9. השיב פנים elsewhere means "to turn away, refuse," in reference to suppliants (comp. 1 Kings ii. 16, 17, 20). Only here is it used of turning away an attack. But comp. xiv. 27.——פֶּחָה, which occurs first 1 Kings x. 15, of Solomon's פחות הארץ, i. e., governors of the land, has been since Benfey (Monatsnamen, p. 195), derived from the Sanscrit, from pakscha, socius, amicus. But Schrader (p. 88 sq.) places the Semitic origin of the word beyond doubt. He lays stress on its appearance in such ancient Hebrew documents, and maintains that this is proved by the Assyrian documents. "In Assyrian the word is used and modified like any other word of pure Semitic origin. From a singular pahat is formed a plural pahati; not less immediately from the root the abstract pihat = satrapy." The word does not occur again in Isaiah; but does in Jer. li. 23, 28, 57; Ezek. xxiii. 6, 23; Hag. i. 1, 14; ii. 2, 21; Mal. i. 8.——Preceding ותבטח there is no explicit verbal form on which the Vav consecutive can support itself; but the Prophet connects it with the implied affirmation "thou canst thyself do nothing."

Ver. 10. 2 Kings xviii. 25 begins without וְ. The ועתה here is likely imitated from vers. 7, 8, 9. But ver. 10 is not parallel with what precedes. For the Assyrian here turns their weapons against them. Hence the reading in 2 Kings is the correct one. Moreover the first clause of ver. 10 has על־הארץ instead of על־המקום 2 Kings xviii. 25, which also appears to be a correction, occasioned either by the thought that Sennacherib did not come up merely against Jerusalem, or by the fact that הארץ stands also in the second clause, or both. That על is exchanged here for אל is of inferior significance (comp. xxxix. 9).

Ver. 12. The consonants of the K'thibh, according to the view hitherto prevalent (comp. e. g., Fuerst in the Propylaea Masoræ, p. 1366), are to be pointed חֲרָאֵיהֶם (2 Kings xviii. 27 חֲרֵיהֶם) which word implies a singular חֲרָא. But Delitzsch points חֲרָאֵיהֶם or חֲרֵיהֶם, taking חֲרִי as the ground form, which is quite possible. The word occurs beside only 2 Kings vi. 25, where perhaps simply חֲרֵי יוֹנִים is to be read. The meaning is stercus, excrementum. For the Masorets the expression is indecent. Hence they substitute צוֹאָתָם (from צֹאָה = צֵאָה excuntia, comp. iv. 4; xxviii. 8; Prov. xxx. 12); as immediately afterwards for שֵׁינֵיהֶם (from שַׁיִן, Plur. שֵׁינִים, urina, only here and 2 Kings xviii. 27) they put מֵימֵי רַגְלֵיהֶם.

Vers. 11, 12. The differences between the present readings and 2 Kings are inconsiderable. In verse 11 "son of Hilkiah" is omitted, אלינו before יהודית instead of עמנו (a correction because the latter seemed too familiar). In verse 12 אליהם is omitted before Rabshakeh; we have האל instead of העל before אדניך (in order to restore likeness of expression when there is likeness of meaning; 2 Kings however would avoid the many אל), חראיהם instead of חריהם (the א in Isaiah being intended likely to make the etymology more noticeable). Here then appears a tendency to abbreviate and correct.

Vers. 13, 14. נָשָׁא, unused in Kal, may be used in the Hiph., also in the direct causative sense, and hence may mean "to cause נָשָׁא, i. e., fraudem, deception," which explains the construction (here and Jer. xxix. 8) with the dative, along with the construction with the accusative (Gen. iii. 13; Jer. xxxvii. 9; 2 Kings xix. 10, etc.).——In ver. 13 the וידבר of 2 Kings xviii 28 omitted as superfluous: we have דברי instead of דבר because they are many words. Ver. 14 does not end as 2 Kings xviii. 29 with מִיָּדוֹ, which is both abbreviation and removal of the harshness of combining "let not Hezekiah deceive," which are the words of the king and "from his hand," which are spoken by the ambassador.

Ver. 15. העיר gives an easier construction than את־העיר 2 Kings xviii., though the latter is the correct reading. As to the third pers. fem. תנתן see 1 Sam. xxx. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 2; Ps. xxxiii. 9; Lam. iii. 37. On יַבְטַח comp. Jer. xxviii. 15; xxix. 31.

Ver. 16. אִכְלוּ וּשְׁתוּ are imperatives by attraction of those preceding and supply the place of Futures.

Vers. 17, 18. The end of the verse shows considerable abbreviation compared with 2 Kings xviii. 32, which see. Isaiah omits the description of the land of exile as superfluous, and also the repetition of the warning against Hezekiah.——פֶּן beginning ver. 18, (occasioned by the omission last mentioned), stands here independent of any foregoing verb, of which there are other examples (Job xxxvi. 18; Jer. li. 46).——הֵסִית or הֵכִית properly means "stimulare, to incite, set on," from which develops the meaning "seduce, deceive" (comp. Josh. xv. 18; 1 Sam. xxvi. 19; 2 Sam. xxiv. 1).——The omission of הַצֵּל found in the parallel of 2 Kings xviii. 33 is again a plain proof of abbreviation.

Ver. 19. If the text of the second clause be correct (וְכִי here instead of the simple כִּי 2 Kings xviii. 34), the construction is bold and unusual. The subject of הצילו is wanting and must be supplied from what precedes. It might be, say: ישראל or ואַיֵּה אלהי את־שמרון? ——Isaiah omits the words הֵנַע וְעִוָּה that appear in 2 Kings xviii. 34. These words are in both texts, Isa. xxxvii. 13 and 2 Kings xix. 13. Delitzsch supposes they are patched into 2 Kings from Isa. xxxvii. 13. To me it seems more probable that they were purposely omitted in our verse. For consider that xxxvii. 10-13 Hezekiah is addressed. There it is said: "Let thy God not deceive thee; where is the king of Hamath," etc.? Thus the sense there is: it will be no better for thee, king Hezekiah, than for the king of Hamath, etc. But xxxvi. 14-20 the people are addressed: Let not Hezekiah deceive you by pointing you to Jehovah's help. Where are the gods of Hamath, etc.? Readers that construed the words הנע ועוה as verbs (see on xxxvii. 13) must have found it as improper to say: deos expulit et subvertit, as they found it proper to say: regem expulit et subvertit.

Ver. 20. The plural הצילו does not conflict with מִי, for this interrogative is found only in the singular: this singular may be taken as collective.——כִּי, after a question referring to the future, may be taken in the sense of ut; but fundamentally it means quod, and has a causal sense: Who has delivered? Are there any way gods (beside the Assyrian gods) that deliver? because (according to your opinion) Jehovah will deliver Jerusalem.——[" The parallel 2 Kings xviii. 35 omits these before lands; another exception to the general statement that the narrative of Isaiah is an abridgement.—J. A. A.].

Ver. 21. ויחרישו instead of והחרישו העם of 2 Kings xviii. 36. Hezekiah had commanded his representatives to make no response. With that ויחרישו corresponds. The reading of 2 Kings is usually translated: "and they kept silence, the people," עם being construed in apposition. Rather than this strange construction I think a more probable rendering is: "and they hushed the people." חָרַשׁ means mutum esse, silere (Ps. xxviii. 1; xxxv. 22; l. 3, etc.). Hiphil means first mutum reddere, ad silentium redigere aliquem. Yet it is true that it occurs seldom in this sense (Job xi. 3). Usually Hiphil is direct causative — "mutitatem facere, to make silence, to be silent." Here, "they made the people be silent" would imply that many of them wanted to reply to the words of ver. 12 sqq., but that Hezekiah's messengers, even before Rabshakeh had finished, had commanded silence and themselves made no response. According to this the perfect והחרישו does not merely continue the recital, but states an accompanying circumstance that had already occurred before Rabshakeh had done speaking. But the reviser of Isaiah's text was not acquainted with this meaning of the Perfect [!]. He thought the word meant only to continue the recital. Therefore he changed it to the Imperfect with Vav consec.

Ver. 22. קרועי בגדים, the participle in the construct state retains the construction of its verb with the accusative; comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 31.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In the fourteenth year (after the sickness of) Hezekiah Sennacherib conquered all Judea excepting the capital. He sent Rabshakeh from Lacish with a considerable army to demand the surrender of the latter. Rabshakeh first seeks to convince the messengers of Hezekiah that they could rely neither on Egypt (ver. 6), nor on Jehovah (ver. 7), nor on their own might (vers. 8, 9), especially as the king of Assyria had undertaken his expedition against Judea by Jehovah's express commission (ver. 10). These words he had spoken in the dialect of Judea. Hezekiah's messengers having requested him to speak in Aramaic (ver. 11), Rabshakeh answered that his mission was properly just to the dwellers of Jerusalem hearkening there on the city wall (ver. 12). Then he calls with a loud voice to them (ver. 13) not to let Hezekiah deceive them by any illusion about their own power, or about the aid of Jehovah (vers. 14, 15). Let them rather give themselves up to the king of Assyria. He will for the present leave them in peaceful possession of their own (ver. 16), till He shall come for the purpose of deporting them to a good land like their own (ver. 17). They must the less expect help from Jehovah seeing no god had been able to protect his land from the power of Assyria (vers. 18–20). By Hezekiah's command the messengers made no reply, but with rent garments, in token of dismay at what they heard, they conveyed the message to the king (vers. 21, 22).

2. Now it came——took them.—Ver. 1. According to the Assyrian monuments Sennacherib (Assyrian Sin-ahi-irib or Sin-ahi-ir-ba, i. e., Sin (= Luna) multiplicat fratres, Heb. הִרְבָּה אַחִים) became king in the year 705 B. C., on the 12th of the month Ab (SCHRADER, p. 331). He was the son and successor of Sargon, and reigned to the year 681. Sennacherib relates to us the events of his third campaign on two monuments with nearly identical inscriptions, viz.: an hexagonal clay cylinder, and the bulls at the portal of the palace at Kuyyundschik. Their contents is chiefly as follows. Sennacherib moved first against Phœnicia. King Eluläeus of Sidon fled to Cyprus. The Assyrians conquered all Phœnicia, and Sennacherib installed Etobal as king. The kings Menahem of Samaria (?), Etobal of Sidon, Abdilit of Arvad, Urniski of Byblos, Mitinti of Ashdod, Puduil of Ammon, Kamosnadab of Moab, Malikram of Edom, the whole of the kings of the westland (?) did homage and brought presents. But Zidka of Ascalon would not do homage. Hence he was expelled and another put in his place. Also the cities of his territory (?) Bet-Dagon, Joppa, Benebarak, Azur were conquered. The inhabitants of Ekron had imprisoned their king Padi, who held faithfully to the Assyrians, and "in the shadow of the night" had delivered him to Hezekiah. But the kings of Egypt and Meroe, as allies of the Palestinian opponents of Assyria, had led up a great army. In the vicinity of Altaku (Eltekeh Josh. xix. 44; xxi. 23 in the territory of Dan, between Timnat and Ashdod) there was a battle. The Assyrians claimed the victory.

Thus it appears that what was undertaken against Judah formed merely an episode of this expedition. Sennacherib relates that he took forty-six of the fortified cities of Judah, and shut Hezekiah up in his capital "like a bird in its cage." He then threw up fortifications against Jerusalem and caused the exit of the great gate to be broken through. The conquered cities he gave to Mitinti of Ashdod, Padi of Ekron, and Ismibil of Gaza. Thereupon Hezekiah was greatly alarmed and agreed to pay tribute, and by his messengers payed thirty (30) talents of gold and eight hundred (800) talents of silver. So far the Assyrian inscriptions.

One sees how accurately they agree with the Bible account, in our text and in 2 Kings xviii. The Bible account says three hundred talents of silver (2 Kings xviii. 14). This difference is only apparent. For 800 Assyrian talents are exactly equal to 300 Palestinian (SCHRADER, l. c., p. 197, 25).

But with this agreement there is a considerable discrepancy in these two accounts in respect to chronology. Both accounts agree in giving the year 722 B. C., for the taking of Samaria by Sargon. But before and after this the statements diverge. According to the monuments Sennacherib became king only 705 B. C., while the Biblical account places this expedition which he himself calls his third in the year 714. This difference between the Assyrian and Biblical chronology is limited for the time after 722 to the date of expedition of Sennacherib against Palestine and Egypt. For, as SCHRADER (p. 300) expressly says, in respect to the time of Mannasseh both reckonings "agree satisfactorily:" [For the Author's method of reconciling this discrepancy in date, see the general Introd. § 3, and the introduction to chapters xxxvi.-xxxix.]. The omission of three verses 2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq., relating to the payment of ransom show the designed abbreviation of this account.

3. And the king——the recorder.—Vers. 2, 3. SCHRADER (p. 199) remarks on Rabshakeh that there occurs no mention on the monuments of the chief cup-bearer, as a high dignitary and officer of state. But rab-sak is mentioned. That however is not the chief cup-bearer. For sak means chief, captain, collective chiefs. Therefore rab-sak is the chief of the captains (comp. rab sarisim, rab tabbachim), perhaps the chief of the general's staff. Then the form רַבְשָׁקֵה is a Hebraizing occasioned by accordance of sound with מַשְׁקֶה Gen. xl. 1 sqq. Chald. מַשְׁקֵי or שָׁקֵי, which means pincerna, pocillator. The names Tartan and Rabsaris 2 Kings xviii. 17 are omitted here. Lacish, whence this detachment of troops came, is the modern Umm-Lâkhis, in the S. W., of Judea near the border of Philistia, on the road from Jerusalem to Gaza. This was the extreme southern point to which Sennacherib penetrated at that time. On the approach of the Egyptian army he retired to Altaku (Eltekeh) that lay N. E. of Lacish. There is a bas-relief (SCHRADER, p. 170) with the inscription: "Sennacherib, the king of the nations, the king of the land of Assyria, sits on an exalted throne and receives the spoil of the city Lacish."

And he stood, etc. The locality is described by exactly the same words that vii. 3 describe the place where Isaiah was to meet Ahaz. That now the Assyrians stand in such threatening attitude by the conduit of the upper pool is the fruit of Ahaz having so insolently rejected the promise given him at that time, and in the same place, and having preferred to call Assyria to his aid. We do not err, therefore, in understanding by this literal agreement of the naming of the place in both passages, that an intimation of the divine nemesis is intended. On Eliakim the chamberlain and Shebna the scribe see xxii. 15, 20 sqq. The סֹפֵר "scribe" appears as a state officer first under David, 2 Sam. viii. 17, where he is distinguished from several other officers. He was the king's secretary, who wrote all that the king's service demanded. Thus his office would lead him to meddle with every branch of government, and we find him expressly mentioned in matters of finance (2 Kings xxii. 3 sqq.), and of war (2 Kings xxv. 19; Jer. lii. 25). The מַזְכִּיר (LXX. ὑπομνηματογράφος, ἐπὶ τῶν ὑπομνημάτων, VULG., a commentariis), is certainly not the monitor (THENIUS), but the one that was charged with recording the res gestas of the king, and of the kingdom, and preserving them for posterity (comp. 2 Sam. viii. 16; xx. 24; 2 Kings iv. 3; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8). As is well-known, national archives are found not only among civilized but also among uncivilized people. Of Joah, Asaph's son, nothing more is known. Both the names are Levitical, comp. 1 Chr. vi. 6; xxix. 12; xxvi. 4. In 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8 is mentioned a Joah son of Joahaz, who was recorder to king Josiah.

4. And Rabshakeh——destroy it.—Vers. 4-10. On the Assyrian monuments the kings designate themselves, or are designated, "great king," "mighty king," "king of the nations." The Assyrian seeks to prove to Hezekiah that his only recourse is to yield himself unconditionally to the great king. "That thou rebellest." It may be asked: does this refer to the matter mentioned 2 Kings xviii. 7, or to that mentioned 2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq., viz.: the refusal to surrender the city in addition to the ransom? Both must be understood. For to the Assyrian, that refusal was only a symptom that the rebellious disposition was not sufficiently broken.

In showing further, how nugatory every thing was on which Hezekiah relied, he calls Egypt a bruised reed, that breaks when one rests on it and pierces the hand. This reproach was well founded. Isaiah himself says the same xxx. 3, 5, 7 in other words. Ezek. xxix. 6, 7, employs this figure, amplifying it. In another sense and connection Isaiah uses the image of the bruised reed xlii. 3, where רצוץ and שׁבר used together show that the former word does not mean "broken" but "bruised." What the Assyrian says ver. 6 is an undeniable truth. But he omits making it general as the prophets did. For what was true of Egypt was equally true of Assyria, and of any other world-power. They do no favor for nothing, but sell their aid so dear, that it becomes doubtful whether friend or foe harms the most. [The charge of relying on Egypt may be true, or it may be a malicious fabrication, or a shrewd guess from analogy.—J. A. ALEXANDER.]

Ver. 7. As proof that even Jehovah cannot be expected to help; the Assyrian appeals to the fact that Hezekiah has done away with all the high-places and altars of Jehovah, and has left remaining only a single spot for worship in Jerusalem. As is well-known Hezekiah did away with all high-places in Judea, even those that were monotheistic, consecrated to Jehovah (2 Kings xviii. 4, comp. J. G. MULLER in HERZ. R.-Encycl., VI. p. 176), and thus had stringently carried out the principle of the one, and only authorized central sanctuary. In 2 Chr. xxxii. 12 it reads "ye shall worship before one altar, and burn incense upon it," instead of, as here, "ye shall worship before this altar." The Assyrian, ignorant of the higher commandment that had prompted Hezekiah's obedience, saw in this conduct a reduction, an arrest of Jehovah-worship. Less probable is the explanation that the Assyrian has in mind what is related 2 Kings xvi. 10-17, and has confounded Ahaz and Hezekiah. For such confusion is hardly credible. Ver. 8. He next holds up to contempt Hezekiah's own power. His derisive proposition intimates both the abundance of Assyria's cavalry and war chariots (comp. chap. v. 28) and the weakness of Judah in this respect. עָרַב is "to pledge," then "to pledge for others," i. e., go security, and in fact in the double sense of a benefit to be done to a third party (e. g., עָרְבֵנִי xxxviii. 14, אֶעֶרְבֶנּוּ Gen. xliii. 9) or of a performance incumbent on a third party. But there is a pledging when two or more bind themselves to a performance in common, even when the pledging is not specifically made prominent or is silently presumed. Thus the word acquires the meaning, "to enter into, become one, to mix oneself in with." Here the notion sponsio appears evident: pledge thyself, i. e., unite thyself by a mutual pledge with the king of Assyria. But as under the present circumstances the one party pledged himself to conditions he thinks impossible to the other, the pledging acquires the significance of a wager, in which sense also CLERICUS has taken the word.

Ver. 9. Two inferences are drawn from the representation of ver. 8; the positive, that Hezekiah cannot hope to resist the least captain of Assyria, and the negative, that this personal inability explains how Judah must be leaning on Egypt. The relation of פחת אחד to what follows is not simple genitive of the subject (commander of the small servants, KNOBEL), but is a partitive genitive: of one captain from among the most inferior servants of my lord, i. e., who belongs to the most inferior servants of my lord. Ver. 10. The Assyrian feigns to have received a commission direct from Jehovah to go against Judah and destroy it. That this was false appears from xxxvii. 6, 21 sqq., where the LORD Himself pronounces the words of the Assyrian blasphemous, and takes Judah in protection after a grand fashion. The Assyrian may possibly have heard something of Isaiah's prophecies, who, he may have known, was then in Jerusalem, which prophecies treated of a subjection of Judah to Assyria (comp. vii. 17 sqq., x. 5 sqq.). These and similar prophetic utterances may have afforded the occasion for this pretext. But no prophecy "go up against this land and destroy it," nor anything like it exists in Isaiah, or any other Prophet.

5. Then said Eliakim——words of Rabshakeh.—VERS. 11–22. Hezekiah's messengers had so far hearkened in silence. But apprehensive of the effect of the words of ver. 10 on the people assembled on the wall, they beg the messenger of the Assyrian not to speak the Jewish tongue but to speak in Aramaic. The people might easily take this pretended mandate for reality. Had not the LORD Himself called Assyria "the rod of mine anger" (x. 5)? Discouragement might arise from this among the people, and paralyze every effort at self-defense. יהודית means primarily the dialect of the tribe of Judah. It was thus spoken in Jerusalem and was the purest and best Hebrew. Rabshakeh spoke this dialect. A considerable time had elapsed since that fatal resort of Ahaz to Assyria spoken of in chap. vii., certainly more than twenty-five years. During this time the Assyrian rulers were in constant intercourse with Judah, and were properly attentive to Jewish affairs. This explains how there would be in their court persons that could speak the dialect of Judah. Besides the Assyrian and Hebrew languages were daughters of the same Semitic stem, and an Assyrian would find no great difficulty in learning Hebrew. See the Assyrian Grammars of OPPERT. 1859 and of MENANT, 1868. Eliakim would not have called the dialect of the northern Israelites, Jewish had Rabshakeh spoken that. For at that time the name Judah had not become the national name as it did after the exile. At the latter period יהודית comprised all that was Hebrew, even what had perhaps attached itself to the tribe of Judah from the isolated elements of the other tribes (comp. Neh. xiii. 24). By ארמית Eliakim understood, not the mother-tongue of the Assyrian, but the Syro-Chaldaic-Aramaic, thus the language whose territory lay between that of the Hebrew and of the Assyrian and that was suited for mediating between them. According to ALEX. POLYHISTOR. in EUSEBIUS, Chron., arm. I., p. 43, Sennacherib erected a monument to himself with a Chaldaic inscription, and with the later Persian kings Aramaic seems to have been the government language for intercourse with the nations of western Asia (Ezr. iv. 7). Our passage shows that Aramaic would not be known to all people of Judah without study and of course.

Eliakim's remonstrance only exposed a weak place, of which Rabshakeh immediately took advantage. He noticed, that his words were regarded as likely to produce an impression among the people prejudicial to Hezekiah's intention, and at once he acts as if his mission were to the people, and not at all to Hezekiah, though ver. 4 and 2 Kings xviii. 18, 19 show the contrary. He proceeds therefore to warn the people to save themselves from the dreadful fate that impended, and to beware of letting Hezekiah deceive them. In עִמָּכֶם, "with you," end of ver. 12, there is emphasis implying reproach for those addressed. The Assyrian means: those sitting on the wall will fare well with us (comp. "come out to me" ver. 16), but they will have to endure the dreadfulest distress with you. Vers. 16, 17. Rabshakeh makes definite proposals in the name of the king of Assyria, in opposition to the designs of Hezekiah against which he warns them. "Make with me a blessing," i. e., an alliance of blessing, he says. ברכה is not merely the blessing itself, but also, by metonymy, either what the blessing involves (comp. Gen. xii. 2 ויהיה ברכה), or what the blessing produces (e. g., a rich gift 1 Sam. xxv. 27, etc.). Thus here the alliance, the treaty is called ברכה because, in the opinion of the Assyrian, it would be a source of blessing. The word occurs in this sense nowhere else. יצא with אל often occurs in the sense of deditio: 1 Sam. xi. 3; 1 King xx. 31; Jer. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 2, 21. To eat his vine and his fig tree, and drink his waters (metonymic expressions, comp. on i. 7; v. 18) is a figurative description of a peaceful and undisturbed existence (comp. Mic. iv. 4; 1 Kings v. 5). On ver. 17 SCHRADER remarks: "Such a recommendation of surrender to the Assyrian were even for an Assyrian a little maladroit." I cannot see that. The fate that Rabshakeh proposed was relatively a mild one. Humanly speaking, there was no hope of deliverance. If the Assyrian would revenge the revolt of Hezekiah on the capital, who would hinder him? Even after a glorious defence, which was sure to be attended with much suffering, they must prepare for entire destruction attended with great cruelties. This or the proposition of vers. 16, 17 were the alternatives to the Assyrian. It certainly never entered into his mind to treat them with sentimental mildness. "A land of bread and vineyards" is a more comprehensive expression than "a land of corn and wine." For "bread" (see xxviii. 28) represents here every sort of vegetable that gives bread, and in vineyards not only vines grow, but also other noble trees (comp. כרם זית Judg. xv. 5).

Vers. 18–20. Rabshakeh repeats the warning against illusive hopes of help from Jehovah, and would prove that they are illusive by appealing to facts that showed how the heathen gods had been unable to save their lands. The question where are the gods of Hamath and Arpad? etc., is not meant as denying the existence of these gods generally, but only to demonstrate their inability and unworthiness to let themselves be seen, i. e., to show themselves in a clear light. They are brought to shame and must hide themselves. On Hamath and Arpad see x. 9. According to the Assyrian monuments (see SCHRADER, p. 152), Sargon, in the second year of his reign, therefore a year after the conquest of Samaria, conquered king Ilubid of Hamath, and took as the royal share of the spoils 200 chariots and 600 horsemen. From this is inferred that he transported most of the rest of the inhabitants. And in fact we read 2 Kings xvii. 24 that, among others, people from Hamath were transplanted in Samaria. Arpad, that is never named except with Hamath, does not appear in the inscriptions after Sargon (SCHRADER, p. 204). It likely shared therefore the fate of Hamath. Rabshakeh does not mean to enumerate here the conquests of Sennacherib. But he would remind the men of Judah of examples of transplanted nations well-known to them. By which Assyrian king it was done was unimportant. It was enough that Assyrian kings could do this. The words vers. 18, 19, are, besides a fulfilment of the prophecy x. 7–11.

Vers. 21, 22. Hezekiah's prohibition of any reply was wise. A single incautious word might occasion great harm, as was in fact proved by Eliakim's blundering interruption ver. 11. Every reply needed to be maturely considered. Those were serious and significant moments in which only he ought to speak who was qualified, and authorized to represent the entire nation.

2. HEZEKIAH'S MESSAGE TO ISAIAH.

CHAPTER XXXVII. 1–7.

1 AND it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that he rent his clothes, and 2 covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the LORD. And he sent Eliakim, who was over the household, and Shebna the [a]scribe, and the elders of the priests covered with sackcloth unto Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz.
3 And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and of [1]blasphemy: for the children are come to the birth, and there is 4 not strength to bring forth. [b]It may be the LORD thy God will hear the words of Rabshakeh, [c]whom the king of Assyria his master hath sent to reproach the living
God, and will [d]reprove the words which the LORD thy God hath heard: [e]wherefore
5 lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is [2]left. So the servants of king Hezekiah
6 came to Isaiah. And Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say unto your master,
Thus saith the LORD, Be not afraid of the words that thou hast heard, wherewith 7 the [f]servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me. Behold, I will [3]send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumor, and return to his own land; and [g]I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.

[1] Or, provocation. [2] Heb. found. [3] Or, put a spirit into him.

[a] chancellor.
[b] peradventure.
[c] with which the king commissioned him.
[d] administer punishment for the words.
[e] and thou wilt lift up a prayer.
[f] the boys.
[g] I fell him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3. יום צרה comp. Ps. xx. 2; l. 15; Obad. xii. 14; Nah. i. 7, etc.——The expression יום תוכחה is taken from Hos. v. 9.——נאצה from נָאַץ contemnere, aspernari (i. 4; v. 24; lx. 14), contemtus, opprobrium occurs only here. In Neh. ix. 18, 26 נֶאָצָה is found in the sense of βλασφημία, blasphemy. Our present word must be taken in this sense (comp. verse 4).——The expression the "children are come עד־משבר" occurs again only 2 Kings xix. 3. But comp. Hos. xiii. 13.——לדה inf. nom. again only Jer. xiii. 21.

Ver. 4. שלח אשר שלחו, with double acc. like verbs of teaching, commanding: comp. lv. 11; Exod. iv. 28, etc.——אלהים חי, except here and ver. 17, the expression always reads א׳ חיים (Deut. v. 23; 1 Sam. xvii. 26, 36; Jer. x. 10; xxiii. 36). The constant absence of the article in the expression is noteworthy. Thus it appears to me to designate God, not as the only living God, but only in general as living God in contrast with the dead idols, whereby is not expressly excluded that there may be still other א׳ חיים (comp. δόξας βλασφημεῖν Jude 8).——The two perfects והוכיח and ונשאת connect with the imperfect ישמע. Many older expositors have explained והוכיח to be an infinitive, and have taken it as the continuation of לחרף. But then one must make the word mean "to contemn," which it does not. It must therefore be construed as perfect. The meaning is direct causative: "exercise reproof," (comp. ii. 4; xi. 4). The prefix בְּ before דברים has a causal sense: "and he will use reproof (judicial decision) (moved) by the words, etc." Comp. I. 1; lvii. 17.——The perf. ונשאת formally connects with the Imperf. ישמע although materially the reverse is the proper relation.——השארית הנמצאה is the remnant in fact as opposed to that which ought to be. Comp. xiii. 15; xxii. 3.

Ver. 6. גדף occurs only in Piel (Num. xv. 30; Ps. xliv. 17; Ezek. xx. 27; 2 Kings xix. 6, 22); it means "to wound, insult, blaspheme."

Differences between the text of Isaiah here and 2 Ki. xviii. appear in verses 2, 4, 6. In verse 6 Isaiah has אליהם instead of לָהֶם because the former is the more usual, at least in these chapters (comp. 2 Kings xviii. 19, 22, 25, 26, 27; xix. 3, 10; xx. 1, 8, 14, 16, 19). The simple לְ after אמר occurs only once, 2 Kings xviii. 22.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. And it came——Amoz.—Vers. 1, 2. It is perhaps not unimportant to note that, except here, when Isaiah speaks of putting on sackcloth he uses the expression חגר שק (iii. 24; xv. 3; xxii. 12) and never employs the general article that occurs in Kings, and elsewhere also (2 Kings vi. 30, comp. 1 Kings xxi. 27). The expression "elders of the priests" beside here and 2 Kings xix. 2, occurs only Jer. xix. 1. ŒHLER (HERZ., R.-Encycl., XII. p. 182 sq.), distinguishes these priest-elders from the שָׂרֵי or רָאשֵׁי הַכֹּהֲנִים (2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Ezr. x. 5; Neh. xii. 7), and understands by the latter the overseer of the priestly class, and by the former only "the most respected priests on account of their age." The embassy to Isaiah as one sees from those composing it, was one commensurate with the importance of the subject, and also very honorable for Isaiah.

["Hezekiah resorted to the temple, not only as a public place, but with reference to the promise made to Solomon (1 Kings viii. 29) that God would hear the prayers of His people from that place when they were in distress." On ver. 2. "The king applies to the Prophet as the authorized expounder of the will of God. Similar applications are recorded 1 Kings xxii. 9; 2 Kings xxii. 14; Jer. xxxvii. 3."—J. A. ALEX.].

2. And they said——in his own land.—Vers. 3-7. One may say that צרה "anguish" relates only to the Jews, תוכחה "rebuke" is received from the LORD through the Assyrians, and the object of נאצה, "contempt," is Israel and their God. Thus it appears, they intimate that the matter concerns, not them only, but also God, and that in an active and in a passive sense. [The metaphor in the last clause expresses, in the most affecting manner, the ideas of extreme pain, imminent danger, critical emergency, utter weakness, and entire dependence on the aid of others.—J. A. ALEX.]. Judah had done all in its power to keep away the supreme power of Assyria. But the latter has taken the whole land (xxxvi. 1); and moreover an immense sum of gold has been sacrificed (2 Kings xviii. 14). But the Assyrian demands the capital itself, and Judah is powerless to hold him back. There is no going backwards, i. e., what was done in vain to ward off the Assyrian cannot be made a thing not done; and there is no going forwards, i. e., there are no means left to ward off the worst. Therefore the very life is in peril. Such is the meaning of the figurative language. In ver. 4 the messengers present their request. It begins timidly with אולי, "peradventure." It refers to two things: 1) that Jehovah will hear and punish the words of Rabshakeh, 2) that Isaiah will make supplication. The order may seem an inverted one. But they produce the things sought for, not in the order in which they are to be realized, but according to their importance. The most important is that Jehovah hears and punishes. The means to this is Isaiah's intercession. ["The preterite שמע denotes a past time only in reference to the contingency expressed by ישמע. Perhaps he will hear and then punish what he has heard. The reproach and blasphemy of the Assyrian consisted mainly in his confounding Jehovah with the gods of the surrounding nations (2 Chr. xxxii. 19), in antithesis to whom, as being impotent and lifeless, He is here and elsewhere called the living God.—J. A. ALEX.]. Comp. viii. 9; Ps. cvi. 28; cxv. 4 sqq. "To reproach the living God," strongly reminds one of the blasphemy of Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 26, 36, 45. Such an one the Assyrian here appears. "The remnant extant" (see Text. and Gram.). The deportation of the Ten Tribes, and xxxvi. 1 show that Jerusalem was at that time only a weak remnant of the theocracy.

[Ver. 5 "is a natural and simple resumption of the narrative, common in all inartificial history. It affords no ground for assuming a transposition in the text, nor for explaining ויאמרו ver. 3, as a subjunctive."—J. A. ALEX.]. Vers. 6, 7, contain Isaiah's answer. The Assyrian messengers are contemptuously called נערים, i. e., "boys, striplings" of the king of Assyria. The expression Behold, I am putting a spirit in him designates the subjective side of a resolve accomplished in the king of Assyria, and he shall hear a report the objective cause. It had manifestly been the purpose of the king of Assyria to go immediately at that time against Jerusalem. Sending Rabshakeh was the prelude to it. On the return of the latter with Hezekiah's refusal, the advance on Jerusalem was instantly to be made. This is confirmed vers. 9, 10 by the warning to Hezekiah not to cherish unwarranted expectations from the unlooked for diversion made by the Ethiopian army. Thus the Prophet says here, "I impart to him a spirit, i. e. I occasion him a mind, a tendency of the will (comp. xix. 14; xxix. 10, etc.), and he shall hear a report." This is the first stage of the deliverance. It intimates that the Assyrian's next intention now at once to advance on Jerusalem shall not be realized. But that only wards off the immediate danger. Perhaps to reprieve is not to relieve. Thus the Assyrian himself seems to have thought according to vers. 10–13. But there is no danger. He shall not come before Jerusalem at all (ver. 33), but shall return into his land, and there fall by the sword. Let those believe that, "and I will fell him by the sword," etc., is ascribed to Isaiah by the narrator post eventum, who cannot believe that there may be such a thing as a spirit of God, that can look freely into the future, and, when it seems good to him, can declare the future.

3. THE WRITING OF SENNACHERIB TO HEZEKIAH.

Chapter XXXVII. 8–13.

8 So Rabshakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria [a]warring against Libnah:
9 for he had heard that he [b]was departed from Lacish. And he heard say concerning Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come forth to make war with thee. And when 10 he heard it, he sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying, Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, Let not thy God, in whom thou trustest, deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria.
11 Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands by de-12 stroying them utterly; [c]and shalt thou be delivered? Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Re-13 zeph, and the children of Eden which were in Telassar? Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah?

[a] fighting. [b] had decamped. [c] and thou wilt be delivered.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 9. The variations from 2 Kings xix. 9 are slight; על here instead of אל, and a second וישמע instead of וישב 2 Kings xix.; which latter is doubtless the correct reading. That second וישמע seems to be merely a copyist's error, unless the reviser of the Isaiah text overlooked the familiar adverbial meaning that the word has here.

Ver. 10. On וישׁיא, comp. on xxxvi. 14.——בוטח בו see on xxxvi. 7.——ולא תנתן see on xxxvi. 15.

Ver. 11. להחרימם (see xi. 15; xxxiv. 5) is that verbal form which we translate by the ablative of the gerund.

Ver. 13. The words הנע ועוה are difficult. The Masorets seem to have regarded them as verbs, seeing that they have punctuated the former as perf. Hiph., and the latter as perf. Piel. So also the Chald. (expulerunt eos et in captivitatem duxerunt) and Symmachus (ἀνεστάτωσεν καὶ ἀνεσκίνωσεν). But the context demands names of localities. The LXX. translates 2 Kings xix. 13 'Ανὰ καὶ 'Aουά; also the Vulg. both 2 Kings and our text.

In vers. 11–13 the variations from the text in 2 Kings xix. are inconsiderable. But such as they are they also give evidence of an effort at simplification and accommodation to the prevalent usus loquendi. For example Isaiah, תְּלַשָּׂר (according to sound) instead of 2 Kings תְּלַאשָּׂר (which would correspond to the Assyrian Tul-Assuri, i. e., hill of Assyria).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. While the events narrated vers. 1–7 were taking place, Rabshakeh returned to report to his master, whom he found at Libnah. The news received there of the movement of the king of Ethiopia made it impossible to undertake anything against Jerusalem just then. In the event of a prolonged siege, Sennacherib might find himself in the bad situation of having the Jews in his front, and Tirhakah in his rear. This he must not risk. But to check the triumph of Hezekiah, he sends the message of vers. 10–13, which is virtually a repetition of Rabshakeh's words xxxvi. 18–20, except that while the latter warned the people against Hezekiah Sennacherib warns Hezekiah not to let his God deceive him.

2. So Rabshakeh——saying.—Vers. 8, 9. Rabshakeh it seems did not tarry long before Jerusalem for a reply. The silence (xxxvi. 21) that followed his words was itself an answer. He returned, therefore, to his master to report that neither in king nor people did he meet with any disposition to make a voluntary submission. Libnah, in the siege of which he found his master engaged, was an ancient Canaanite royal city (Josh. x. 29 sqq.). It belonged (Josh. xv. 42) to the low country of Judah, and was later (Josh. xxi. 13; 1 Chr. vi. 42) a Levitical and free city. It must have been near to Lacish (Josh. x. 29 sqq.), and between that place and Makkedah. Van de Velde supposes it is identical with the Tell of 'Arâk-el-Menschîjeh, because "this is the only place in the plain between Sumeil (Makkedah) and Um-Lakhis, that can be recognized as an ancient fortified place" (Herz., R.-Encycl., XIV. p. 753). Ver. 9. The subject of "he heard" beginning ver. 9 is, of course, Sennacherib. Tirhakah was the third and last king of the twenty-fifth or Ethiopic dynasty. Sabako, or Sevechos, I. and II., were his predecessors. He resided in Thebes, where, on the left bank of the Nile, in the palace of Medenet-Habu, sculptures still exist, that represent Tirhakah wielding the war-mace over bearded Asiatics. See WILKINSON, "Popular Account of the Ancient Egyptians," I. p. 393 sqq. According to HEROD., II., 141, there appears as his contemporary, probably as subordinate king (comp. EWALD, Gesch., d. V. Isr. III. p. 678), Sethon, a priest of Hephastos, who ruled over middle and lower Egypt. According to the Assyrian monuments, Sargon conquered Seveh (Sevechos) king of Egypt in the year 720 B. C., at Rephia (comp. on xx.). Again in 715, the canon of regents mentions a payment of tribute by the Pharaoh of Egypt. In the arrow-headed inscriptions of Sennacherib's time, the name of Tirhakah has not been found as yet. But Asurbanipal (Sardanapalus), the grandson of Sennacherib, and successor of his son Esarhaddon, relates, that he directed his first expedition against the rebellious Tar-ku-u of Egypt and Meroe (SCHRADER, p. 202 sq.). As Sennacherib reigned till 681, and Esarhaddon till 668, the statement of MANETHO, that Tirhakah arose 366 years before Alexander's conquest of Egypt, agrees, of course, better with the Assyrian statement, according to which Sennacherib came to the throne in 705, and undertook the expedition against Egypt in 700, than with the chronology hitherto accepted, that places this expedition in 714 B. C.

3. Thus shall ye——and Ivah?—Vers. 10–13. [The design to destroy, not the people's confidence in Hezekiah, but Hezekiah's confidence in God, makes Sennacherib's blasphemy much more open and direct than that of Rabshakeh.—J. A. ALEX.]. The servant could in flattery ascribe conquests to his master (xxxvi. 18–20) which the latter (ver. 11 sqq.), more honestly acknowledges as the deed of his predecessors. ["Others, with more probability, infer that the singular form, employed by Rabshakeh, is itself to be understood collectively, like "king of Babylon" in chap. xiv."—J. A. ALEX.]. Gozan, in the form Guzanu, is often mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions, and that as a city (SCHRADER, p. 323, 9), and a province (ibid. p. 327, 11, 12; p. 331, 8). But opinions differ as to its location, some taking it for a Mesopotamian locality (GESEN., KNOBEL, on the authority of PTOLEMAEUS V. 18, 4, also SCHRADER, p. 161, because, in an Assyrian list of geographical contents, Guzana is named along with Nisibis, and in our text with Haran and Rezeph. But others, on the authority of Arab geographers, seek for Gozan in the mountainous region northeast of Nineveh. There is a river Chabur there, flowing from the mountain region of Zuzan. This Chabur, a left branch of the Tigris, appears to be the חָבוֹר נְהַר גּוֹזָן mentioned 2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 11, and must be distinguished from the כְּבָר or Chaboras (Chebar) Ezek. i. 3, etc., that is a branch of the Euphrates. Comp. DELITZSCH in loc.: EWALD, Gesch. d. V. Isr. III. p. 638, 658: "The Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes," by ASAHEL GRANT. According to 2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 11, Gozan belongs to the lands into which the Israelites were deported. Now we find these (Ezek. i. 3; iii. 15, 23; x. 15, 22) settled on the כְּבָר, i. e., Chebar. The subject is not yet cleared up. Haran, occurs often as Harran in the inscriptions as a Mesopotamian city (SCHRADER, p. 45). It is a very ancient city (Gen. xi. 31; xii. 5; xxvii. 43, etc.), and well-known to Greeks and Romans under the name Κάῤῥαι, Carrae [famous for the great defeat of Crassus.—TR.], (see PLUTARCH, vit. Crassi, 25, 27 sq.). Rezeph, too, is a Mesopotamian city, west of the Euphrates, that frequently appears in the inscriptions as Ra-sa-ap-pa or Ra-sap-pa. Later it appears under the name Resafa, or Rosafa (comp. EWALD, l. c. III. p. 639). Regarding the "B'ne Eden in Telasser," it must be noted that Ezek. xxvii. 23 mentions a people עֶדֶן, that were merchants dealing between Sheba, i. e., Arabia and Tyre, along with חָרָן and כַּנֵּה (i. e., כַּלְנֵה or כַּלְנוֹ Isa. x. 9). Moreover Amos i. 5 mentions a בֵּית עֶדֶן that, as part of the people of Syria, was to emigrate to Kir. Telasser is mentioned only once in the inscriptions, where it is related, that Tiglath-Pileser brought an offering in Tul-Assuri to the god "Marduk (i. e., Merodach) that dwelt at Telassar" (SCHRADER, p. 203 sq.). We must thus consider Eden and Telassar as Mesopotamian localities, though views differ much as to their precise locations. The question (ver. 13) "where is the king of Hamath," etc., is a repetition of xxxvi. 19, excepting that we have here "king" instead of "the gods." It is moreover remarkable that here it reads: מֶלֶךְ לָעִיר ס'. The reason for this form of expression, if it is not a mere variation, is not clear. For analogies see Josh. xii. 18; Num. xxii. 4, and in the Chaldee Ezra. v. 11. ["Another explanation of these words is that suggested by Luzzatto, who regards them as names of the deities worshipped at Hamath, Arpad and Sepharvaim, and takes מלך in the sense of idol or tutelary deity, which last idea is as old as CLERICUS. This ingenious hypothesis Luzzatto endeavors to sustain by the analogy of Adrammelech, and Anamelech, the gods of Sepharvaim (2 Kings xvii. 31), the second of which names he regarded as essentially identical with Hena. In favor of this exposition, besides the fact already mentioned that the names, as names of places, occur nowhere else, it may be urged that it agrees not only with the context in this place, but also with 2 Kings xviii. 34, in which the explanation of the words as verbs or nouns is inadmissible."—J. A. ALEX.].

4. HEZEKIAH'S INTERCESSION.

Chapter XXXVII. 14–20.

14 And Hezekiah received the letter from the hand of the messengers, and read it:
and Hezekiah went up unto the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord.
15, 16 And Hezekiah prayed unto the Lord, saying, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, that [a]dwellest between the cherubim, thou art the God, even thou alone, [b]of all the 17 kingdoms of the earth: thou hast made heaven and earth. Incline thine ear, O
Lord, and hear; open thine eyes, O Lord, and see: and hear all the words of 18 Sennacherib, which hath sent to reproach [c]the living God. Of a truth Lord, the 19 kings of Assyria have laid waste all the [1]nations, and their countries, And have
[2]cast their gods into the fire: for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, 20 wood and stone: [d]therefore they have destroyed them. Now therefore, O Lord our God, save us from his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that [e]thou art the Lord, even thou only.

[1] Heb. lands. [2] Heb. given.

[a] seated on the, etc. [b] to. [c] living divinity.
[d] and. [e] thou Jehovah alone (art it).

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 14. ספרים, properly scripta, stands, like the Latin literae, for one writing (comp. 1 Kings xxi. 8; 2 Kings x. 1, where verse 2 ספר interchanges with ספרים; 2 Kings xx. 12, comp. Isa. xxxix. 1). The singular suffix following refers to the singular notion ספר, scriptum.

Ver. 15. The contents of this verse forms in 2 Kings xix. the beginning of ver. 15, and instead of אל־יהוה לאמר, which is the more usual form of speech, it reads in 2 Kings לפני י׳ ויאמר.

Ver. 16. אתה הוא האלהים. Grammatically it is, of course, not impossible to take הוא as predicate and האלהים as in apposition with it. But then הוא is in effect a formal, rhetorical emphasis of the predicate. But if הוא is construed in apposition with the subject, then it is materially significant. For then it acquires meaning "talis," and refers emphatically to the being of God as the inward ground of His works. This emphatic sense (= talis) הוא has in reference to men Jer. xlix. 12.

Ver. 17. עינך, according to the punctuation and according to 2 Kings xix. 16, עֵינֶיךָ, is to be construed as plural. פקח is used only of opening the eyes and the ears xlii. 20, comp. Dan. ix. 18.

Ver. 18. Instead of את־כל־הארצות we read in 2 Ki. xix. 17 את־הגוים. If the reading in Isaiah be correct, then the following ואת־ארצם can only mean that the Assyrians have destroyed their own land, and that "by depopulation in consequence of constant war" [comp. xiv. 20.—Tr.]. But אכנם introduces a concession of the truth of what the Assyrian says, who boasts only of what they have done to other nations. It must then be admitted that 2 Kings has the more correct reading. There appears to be an alteration in Isaiah, probably occasioned by the החריבו less used of nations than of lands, and possibly also by the לכל־הארצות ver. 11.—החריב, which reminds of החרים ver. 11, means properly "to make withered," then generally "to waste, desolate." In its radical meaning and primarily it is used of lands, then also of nations (xlix. 17; lx. 12; Jer. l. 27). [ארצות is used here in the sense of nations, as the singular seems sometimes to denote the inhabitants of the earth or land. This would at the same time account for the masculine suffix in ארצם.—J. A. Alex. The Author's hypothesis to account for the variation in Isaiah's text is noticed by J. A. Alex., as urged by Gesenius, as is the case with much beside that the Author has to present on the same subject. In reference to the present instance J. A. Alex. says: "Besides its fanciful and arbitrary character as a mere make-shift, and its gratuitous assumption of the grossest stupidity and ignorance as well as inattention in the writer, it is sufficiently refuted by the emphatic combination of the same verb and noun lx. 12,—(which) proves that such a writer could not have been so shocked at the expression as to make nonsense of a sentence merely for the purpose of avoiding it. The reader will do well to observe, moreover, that the same imaginary copyist is supposed, in different emergencies, to have been wholly unacquainted with the idioms of his mother tongue [comp. Dr. Naegelsbach above at xxxvi. 21 on החרישו, and at xxxvii. 9 on וישמע], and yet extremely sensitive to any supposed violation of usage. Such scruples and such ignorance are not often found in combination. A transcriber unable to distinguish sense from nonsense would not be apt to take offence at mere irregularities or eccentricities in the phraseology or diction of his author." The wisdom of this remark will no doubt in most minds outweigh the considerations that the Author offers, in the progress of his commentary on the present section, in proof of our text being second hand.—Tr.]

Ver. 19. ויאבדום describes, according to the succession of verbs נתן—החריבו, the concluding result.

Ver. 20. אתה יהוה. In 2 Kings xix. 19 the reading is יהוה אלהים, and according to the accents these words belong together, whether construed as predicate or apposition with the subject אתה. Moreover the author of the Isaiah text seems to have combined them, and for this reason to have treated אלהים as superfluous. But it is certainly the most natural to separate the two words and take אלהים as predicate so that we obtain the sense: "that thou Jehovah alone art God." Then the Isaiah text must be so understood, and יהוה be taken as in apposition with the subject אתה, while the notion God is supplied from the context: "that thou Jehovah, alone art (it, viz. God)."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. And Hezekiah——saying.—Vers. 14, 15. We learn here for the first that the messengers were to deliver a written message, for vers. 9, 10 spoke only of an oral commission. The spreading out of the letter was a symbolic transaction. It verified on the one hand, the reality of the present necessity, on the other, it would, as it were, itself cry to heaven, the blasphemy of it should itself call down the divine vengeance. It recalls all the passages where mention is made of impiety that cried to heaven: comp. e. g., Gen. iv. 10; Job xvi. 18; xxiv. 12; xxxi. 38; Hab. iii. 11.

2. O LORD——thou only.—Vers. 16-20. That the Cherubim are only symbolic and not personal angel forms, as LANGE would have it (Gen. iii. 24) is hard to believe. What Ezekiel saw (i. 4 sqq.; ix. 3; x. 2 sqq.), were not mere symbols, for symbols are likenesses, in which from a known greatness one infers the unknown. That partially agrees with the Ezekiel visions. For the rest these are of a transcendental nature. They open to us glimpses into the depths of the divinity, consequently into realities in fact, but into such before which we stand as before one that speaks in tongues. We must modestly refer the cherubim to the class of riddles that will not be resolved until the next life. It is a reflection of those heavenly functions of the cherubim, as they are described in Ezekiel, when we see the cherubim forms appear on the ark of the covenant as the bearers of the presence of God in the midst of the congregation of the Old Testament (Exod. xxv. 18 sqq.). From the Kapporeth, from out the space between the two cherubim (ibid. 22) the LORD will reveal Himself. Hence He is repeatedly designated as the ישב הכרבים (1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; xxii. 11; 1 Chr. xiii. 6; Ps. lxxx. 2; xcix. 1). The thou art the God, even thou Hezekiah took from the glorious prayer of thanksgiving of his ancestor David (2 Sam. vii. 28) in which the latter made known his faith in the glorious promise given to his house (ibid. ver. 12 sqq.). [See Text. and Gram.]. In reference to God, comp. Ps. xliv. 5. Moreover one needs to examine closely in its context every single passage which may besides be drawn hither (Deut. xxxii. 39; Isa. xli. 4; xliii. 10, 13, 25; xlviii. 12; li. 12; Neh. ix. 6, 7), see on xli. 4. Hezekiah evidently is at pains right thoroughly to emphasize the aloneness of God. Rabshakeh and Sennacherib himself (ver. 12) had most incisively expressed the heathen idea that every land has its gods. In contrast with this Hezekiah most decisively makes prominent that Jehovah is not merely a God, but the God alone for all nations of the earth: and that because he made heaven and earth (Gen. i. 1; Isa. xliv. 24; li. 13, etc.).

The causal clause for they were no gods, etc. ver. 19, gives at once the reason why those victories of the Assyrians were possible, and the negative ground of comfort for Israel's hope. They could desolate those lands and destroy their gods, because the latter were only men's work of wood and stone. But therein lay the reason for Israel's hope. For Israel's God was something very different: therefore the victory over those gave no ground for inferring that Assyria would conquer also the God of Israel. Ver. 20 contains the prayer itself.

["The adverb now is equivalent to therefore, or since these things are so. The fact that Sennacherib had destroyed other nations, is urged as a reason why the LORD should interpose to rescue His own people from a like destruction: and the fact that He had really triumphed over other gods, as a reason why He should be taught to know the difference between them and Jehovah."—J. A. ALEX.].

5. ISAIAH'S MESSAGE TO HEZEKIAH CONCERNING THE DANGER THREATENED BY SENNACHERIB.

CHAPTER XXXVII. 21-35.

21 THEN Isaiah the son of Amoz sent unto Hezekiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [a]Whereas thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of As-22 syria: this is the word which the LORD hath spoken [b]concerning him;
The Virgin, the daughter of Zion hath despised thee,
And laughed thee to scorn;
The daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head [c]at thee.
23 Whom hast thou reproached and [d]blasphemed?
And against whom hast thou exalted thy voice,
And lifted up thine eyes on high?
Even against the Holy One of Israel.

24 [1]By thy servants hast thou reproached the LORD, and hast said,
By the multitude of my chariots am I come up
To the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon;
And I will cut down [2]the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof;
And I will enter into the height of his [e]border, and [f]the forest [3]of his Carmel.
25 I have digged and drunk water;
And with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers [g]of the [4]besieged places.
26 [5]Hast thou not [h]heard long ago, how I have done it;
And of ancient times, that I have formed it?
Now have I brought it to pass,
That thou shouldest be to lay waste defenced cities into ruinous heaps.
27 [i]Therefore their inhabitants were [6]of small power,
They were dismayed and confounded:
They were as the grass of the field, and as the green herb,
As the grass on the housetops,
And [j]as corn blasted before it be grown up, 28 [i]But I know thy [7]abode, and thy going out, and thy coming in,
And [k]thy rage against me.
29 Because [k]thy rage against me, and thy [l]tumult, is come up into mine ears,
Therefore will I put my hook in thy nose,
And my bridle in thy lips,
And I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest.
30 And this shall be a sign unto thee,
Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself;
And the second year that which springeth of the same:
And in the third year sow ye, and reap,
And plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.
31 And [8]the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah
Shall again [m]take root downward,
And bear fruit upward:
32 For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant,
And [9]they that escape out of Mount Zion:
The zeal of the LORD of hosts shall do this.
33 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the king of Assyria,
He shall not come into this city,
Nor shoot an arrow [n]there,
Nor come before it with [10]shields,
Nor cast a bank against it.
34 By the way that he came, by the same shall he return,
And shall not come into this city, saith the LORD.
35 For I will defend this city to save it
For mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake.

[2] Heb. the tallness of the cedars thereof, and the choice of the fir trees thereof.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21. שׁלח is here, not merely "to send" generally, but to send a message, as appears from לאמר: comp. Gen. xxxviii. 25; 2 Sam. xiv. 32; 1 Kings xx. 5; 2 Kings v. 8, etc.——The clause אשׁר התפללת וגו׳ can be construed grammatically as the premise to the apodosis זה הדבר וגו׳ ver. 22, or as a relative explanatory clause to יהוה אלהי י׳ ver. 21. The latter is possible because in Hebrew, by a prepositive אשׁר, even the casus obliqui of the pronouns of the first and second persons can receive a relative meaning. Comp. xli. 8, 9; lxiv. 10; Gen. xlv. 4. But the latter explanation seems to me unsuitable because a clause like "I to whom thou hast prayed," does not sound well in the mouth of God. For does not that assume that Hezekiah might have prayed to some other? But the harshness of the first explanation, according to which in the premise Jehovah Himself speaks, while in the conclusion He is spoken of, is an objection to it. Hence the reading of 2 Kings xix. 22, at the end, שָׁמַעְתִּי, which the Isaiah text omits as needless, is the more correct; especially as there appears to be an intentional echo of God's promise to Solomon 1 Kings ix. 3.

Ver. 22. The accents designate the verb בָּזָה as Milra. According to that, it would be either part. fem. from בּוּז, or 3 pers. masc. Kal from בָּזָה. The latter would be grammatically possible, so far as בזה can be regarded as prepositive predicate. But, although בוז and בזה mean the same, still the latter is more frequently joined with the accusative and the former with the dative. For בזה occurs with לְ only 2 Sam. vi. 16 (1 Chron. xv. 29), whereas בוז mostly appears joined with לְ (Prov. vi. 30; xi. 12; xiii. 13; xiv. 21; xxiii. 9; xxx. 17; Zech. iv. 10; Song of Sol. viii. 1, 7). Besides these בוז occurs only Prov. i. 7; xxiii. 22. As the Masoretic pointing is not binding, I would rather regard our בזה as 3 pers. fem. Kal. from בוז, corresponding to לְעֲגָה.——Also לעג is mostly joined with לְ; Ps. ii. 4; lix. 9; lxxx. 7; Prov. xvii. 5; xxx. 17; Jer. xx. 7, etc.——הניע ראש a gesture of derision as in Ps. xxii. 8; cix. 25; Job xvi. 4; Lam. ii. 15.

Ver. 23. חרף and גדף comp. vers. 4 and 6.—קדוש י׳ is a specifically Isaianic expression.

Ver. 24. This verse contains a number of variations on 2 Kings xix. 23, that, from the stand-point of our author, represent emendations.——On קומה see x. 33. ——In יער כרמלו of an adjective notion is made a substantive. For כרמל has here its appellative meaning: "fruitful field or garden."

Ver. 25. יארי מצור comp. on xix. 1 and 6.

Ver. 26. למרחוק is, like מימי קדם (simplified from למימי 2 Kings xix. 25), to be referred to what follows. Properly the prep. מן before רחוק would suffice; but the Hebrew favors the cumulation of prepositions (comp. 2 Sam. vii. 19; Job xxxvi. 9; 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. etc.). By the prefixed לְ is expressed the thought that the divine doing relates to a period beginning far back. —On ימי קדם comp. xxiii. 7; li. 9.—By עתה הבאתיה (comp. xlvi. 11) the Prophet affirms that precisely what the Assyrian pretended he had done by his own power, was only the accomplishment of Jehovah's thought. Hence ותהי must also be construed as 2 pers. masc. and referred to the Assyrian. היה with לְ following is used in the sense of "to serve for something" as in v. 5; xliv. 15.——השאות is Hiph. from שאה strepere, tumultuari. But the word means also the noise, the cracking of something falling in, and hence not only Kal (vi. 11) and the corresponding Niph. (ibid.) and Hiph. (our text and 2 Kings) have the meaning "to fall in ruins, to be laid waste," but also the substantive שָׁאוֹן means interitus, pernicies (Ps. xl. 3; Jer. xlvi. 11).——The words גלים נצים, according to Heb. usage, express the result of the destruction in the form of apposition with the thing to be destroyed; comp. vi. 11; xxiv. 12. נצים is part. Niph. from נצה, and occurs in the sense of "waste" only here and Jer. iv. 7.

Ver. 27. The expression קִצְרֵי־יָד "short-handed," i. e., weak, original in Num. xi. 23, occurs again only l. 2; lix. 1, the adjective קָצֵר only here.——חתו ובשו as in xx. 5.——Everywhere else the expression "grass of the field" reads עֵשֶׂב הַשָּׂדֶה as in Gen. ii. 5; iii. 18, etc.—— ירק דשא only here; comp. Ps. xxxvii. 2.——In 2 Kings xix. 26 the fourth comparison is שְׁדֵפָה "blasting," or "blasted field," instead of שְׁדֵמָה "a field." It is no doubt a stronger figure, and as a climax, more in place. It is far more likely that it is the primitive reading and that our text is secondary.

Ver. 29. On יַעַן first depends the infin., which then as in xxx. 12, continues in the verb fin.——Instead of שַׁאֲנַנְךָ 2 Kings xix. 27 has שַׁאֲנַנְךָ. [In some editions it is precisely the reverse.—Tr.]. Are both Infin. as Olshausen (§ 187, a and § 251, b, p. 552) maintains; or is only the former, as Ewald seems to assume (§ 157, b, comp. § 120, a) [also Green, see § 122, 1 and 187, 1, d.—Tr.]? To me the latter seems more probable, for I do not see why, when שַׁאֲנַן is infin., it would be pointed שַׁאֲנַנְךָ, whereas this is quite easily explained if שַׁאֲנַנְךָ be derived from the adjective שַׁאֲנָן "quiet."

Ver. 30. אָכוֹל in the inf. absol. presents the verbal notion without determining the time or manner. The Prophet thereby affirms simply what actually is, what occurs according to nature.——שָׁחִיס is ἅπ. λεγ. 2 Kings xix. 29 has סָחִישׁ. The latter word is devoid of any etymological basis, as there is no root סָחַשׁ either in Hebrew or the kindred dialects. Moreover there is no agreement about the root of the form שחיס. There is no root שָׁחַס in Hebrew. Of various explanations, that may deserve the preference which connects שחיס with the Arabic schahis, which means "scattered, standing thin," unless perhaps the fundamental meaning is "to divide itself, to cut loose from," so that שחיס would mean "that which separates itself from the root, grows out of it." שחיס would then be the sprouts of the root (Aquila and Theod. translate αὐτοφυῆ).——The imperative in זרעו וגו׳ involves so far an exhortation that the Prophet would say to the Israelites to lay aside all anxiety about the enemy for the third year, and carry on agriculture confidently.——Instead of ואכול K'ri has וְאִכְלוּ which is also the reading of 2 Kings xix. 29, and seems to be the more original. For ואכול may be suspected of being imitated from the same word beginning the verse, and moreover it would involve a certain emphasis which, accurately considered, would be out of place here. It would = "and—in short—eat your fruit;" thus it would recapitulate and say in brief. It can, however, naturally refer only to כרמים (comp. lxv. 21; Jer. xxix. 5, 28; Amos ix. 14).

Ver. 32. The word צבאות is wanting in K'thibh of 2 Kings xix. 31. The books of Kings have this word of the divine name only three times, viz., 1 Kings xviii. 15; xix. 10 and 14; 2 Kings iii. 14 in the history of the prophets Elijah and Elisha. In Isaiah, on the other hand, it is of frequent occurrence; see ix. 6 (7) the parallel passage and on i. 9.

Ver. 33. שָׁם here stands for שָׁמָּה as in 1 Sam. ii. 14; 1 Kings xviii. 10; Jer. xix. 14.——קִדֵּם is never used in the transitive sense = "to make come before, cause to meet," so as to construe the word with a double accusative of the place and the nearer object. But as after other verbs the instrument can be designated by the accusative (comp. i. 20), as well as the use of בְּ, so also קִדֵּם can be used with בְּ (comp. Deut. xxiii. 5; Isa. xxi. 14; Ps. xcv. 2) and with the simple accus. instrum. as in Ps. xxi. 4. We have here a double accusative of the place and of the instrument.

Ver. 34. יָבֹא intimates that the Assyrian must be thought of as not in the land, but on the way to Jerusalem.

Ver. 35. On גַנּוֹתִי see on xxxi. 5; xxxviii. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. To Hezekiah's prayer (vers. 16–20) the LORD gives an answer through Isaiah, which announces the triumph of Jerusalem (ver. 22), convicts the Assyrian of blasphemy against God, in that he spoke haughtily against the Holy One of Israel, and ascribed to himself the glory of conquests in which he was only the instrument (vers. 23–27). But the LORD knows him thoroughly, and will make him know himself by unmistakable treatment (vers. 28, 29). To Judah a sign is given, that it is to be free forever from the Assyrian (vers. 30–32). For the immediate future it is announced that the Assyrian shall not even come near Jerusalem, but shall return home by the way he came; and God is declared to be the protector of Jerusalem (vers. 33–35).

2. Then Isaiah——at thee—Vers. 21, 22. See Text. and Gram. Jerusalem shall see the Assyrian retreating with aims unaccomplished. Then it will look after him (אַחֲרֶיךָ) with derision. ["HITZIG supposes that the shaking of the head, with the Hebrews as with us, was a gesture of negation, and that the expression of scorn consisted in a tacit denial that Sennacherib had been able to effect his purpose. Thus understood, the action is equivalent to saying in words, no, no! i. e., he could not do it. A similar explanation is given by HENGSTENBERG, on Ps. xxii. 8."—J. A. ALEX. For another view see BAEHR, on 2 Kings xix. 21.—TR.].

3. Whom hast thou reproached——besieged places.—Vers. 23–25. The question extends to "thine eyes;" and thus "against the Holy," etc., is the answer to all the preceding questions (VITRINGA, GESEN., DELITZ.). Others construe "against the Holy," etc., with the foregoing words "and lifted up," etc., as the answer; so that the question ends with "voice." But against the latter it may be urged that the question and answer do not correspond; the question is not answered, and the answer given refers to something about which nothing is asked. According to our construction it is asked: "Whom hast thou blasphemed, and against whom hast thou insolently raised voice and eyes (comp. Ps. xviii. 28; ci. 5; Prov. vi. 17; xxi. 4)?" The answer is: "against the Holy," etc.; wherein, according to familiar usage, the form of the answer corresponds to the final member of question. This appears more evident in 2 Kings xix. 22, as עַל־קְדוֹשׁ י׳ connects more exactly with עַל־מִי ח׳. ["EWALD carries the interrogation through the verse, and renders ו at the beginning of the last clause, that or so that, while HITZIG makes the whole of that clause an exclamation. This construction is more natural—the answer begins with the next verse where he is expressly charged with blasphemy against Jehovah."—J. A. ALEX.].—Vers. 24, 25 express more exactly how he has blasphemed. It was done by his servants. (The "hand of" figurative expression for "organ, service, means" generally xx. 2; Jer. xxxvii. 2; l. 1; Hag. i. 1, 3; ii. 1). The emphatic thought is that servants of men have blasphemed the LORD of the world.

This blasphemy consisted mainly (xxxvi. 7, 15, 18) in representing trust in Jehovah as folly, and in the inference that, because they had conquered heathen nations, it was logically necessary that the people of God might be conquered, and thus in placing Jehovah on a level with idols. Moreover what they did, they supposed they had done by their own might, and that what was to be done yet could be done in the same way. Isaiah expresses this thought in vers. 24, 25, with close adherence to the circumstances, so as to divide as it were the task of the Assyrian into two parts. The first part was the conquest of the Syrian, Phœnician and Palestinian districts. All these lands lie about Lebanon. One traveling from Nineveh by Carchemish to Phœnicia must in any case go past Lebanon, which, by its lofty, snow-covered summits, gives distant notice of the locality of these lands. Lebanon therefore may serve as an emblem. Moreover in the Scriptures it is not uncommon to represent Zion under the image of Lebanon (comp. Jer. xxii. 6, 7, 23; Ezek. xvii. 3), partly because in general Lebanon is the image of what is lofty and admirable (comp. ii. 13; x. 33 sq.; xxxv. 2; lx. 13; Hos. xiv. 6 sqq.; Zech. xi. 1 sq.), partly and especially because the king's palace in Zion had grown on Lebanon, i. e., was built of cedars of Lebanon, (comp. 1 Kings vii. 2 "house of the forest of Lebanon," or "house of the forest," Isa. xxii. 8). It is inconceivable that Sennacherib or one of his predecessors ever scaled Lebanon with horse and chariot, and destroyed the cedars. The Prophet rather makes him boast that he had conquered the lands of Lebanon. And Hamath, Arphad, Syria, Phœnicia, the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, the greater part of Judah and Philistia, were actually in his possession. With reference to this, one might well represent him as saying: I have ascended up the heights of the mountains, up the sides (properly the shanks, comp. on xiv. 13) of Lebanon. The chief work seemed done, the chief summits were surmounted. It only remained to penetrate into the inmost part, and there destroy the ornament of Lebanon, its glorious standing timber of cedar and cypress. By עָלִיתִי the Prophet manifestly refers to what has been accomplished, i. e., the occupation of the Lebanon districts. But ואכרת and ואבוא refer to what remains to be done. Only Jerusalem remained for Sennacherib to conquer (comp. on xxxvi. 1). Thus the best, the real ornament, the central point of the Palestinian Lebanon lands was not yet his. Jerusalem with its temple and its king's palace, the two Lebanon houses (because with both cedars of Lebanon had so much to do, comp. 1 Kings vi. 9 sqq.; vii. 2 sqq.) might well be compared to the crown of Lebanon with its ornament of cedars. Such is the understanding of THENIUS and BAEHR, with whom I agree. The expression "tall-growth of its cedars, choice of its cypress," quite agrees with the Latin mode of expression, by which can be said e. g. cibum partim unguium tenacitate arripiunt, partim aduncitate rostrorum"(CIC. Deor. Nat. II. 47, 122). Comp. FRIEDR. NAEGELSBACH'S Latein-Stilistik, § 74; Isa. i. 16; xxii. 7; xxv. 12; xxx. 30. The Prophet does not ascribe to the Assyrian the intention of destroying the height of the cedars, while he would leave them their other qualities, but that he would utterly cut down the high cedars as they are.——On ברוש, the cypress, comp. on xiv. 8. "The height of his end or border" is also no more than his highest summit. The notion height is not already expressed in "the uttermost," as BAEHR supposes. For a mountain has an uttermost in every direction. One may therefore speak of an uttermost in the direction upward, and of a height of the uttermost.—The forest of his garden-land is then the forest that, as it were, forms the garden of Lebanon, that adorns Lebanon like a pleasure park. The most luxuriant, glorious standing forest of Lebanon is meant.

In ver. 25 the Prophet speaks of the second task presented to Sennacherib, which was to conquer Egypt. That concerned a certain campaign, not in a mountainous region, but in a level land, partly waste and without water, partly abounding in water. While Sennacherib stood on the south of Palestine the great army had no superabundance of water. When, e. g., we read of Moses' request to Edom (Num. xx. 17 sqq.) it cannot seem strange that the Prophet imputed to Sennacherib the boastful assertion that so far he has provided his mighty host with water in a strange land, that he has dug wells, because the existing ones were insufficient, and had drunk away their water from the inhabitants. For such is the meaning of מים זרים 2 Kings xix. 24, which our author has omitted for the sake of simplicity. Had the Assyrian traversed the desert et-Tih, digging wells would, of course, have been a still greater necessity. But on the border of it, whither Sennacherib penetrated, it may have been needful. He boasts, moreover, that where there is much water, and the water is a bulwark for the inhabitants, as the Nile with its canals is to Egypt, he will easily destroy this bulwark. For by the sole of his tramp shall the streams of Egypt be dried up. Thus his warriors will dry up the streams of Egypt like a puddle, merely by the tramp of their feet. The expression "sole of the tramp" is found only here. It is metonymy. Still in respect to the act of stepping, "step" and "foot" are often interchanged. Comp. Ps. cxl. 5 with lvi. 14; cxvi. 8; Ps. xvii. 5 with xxxviii. 17, etc. ["The drying up of the rivers with the soles of the feet is understood by VITRINGA as an allusion to the Egyptian mode of drawing water with a tread-wheel (Deut. xi. 10)."—J. A. ALEX.].

4. Hast thou not heard—-thou camest? —Vers. 26–29. The Assyrian imagined that he pushed, and he was pushed. He regarded all he did as the product of his own free fancy, and of his power to do. The Prophet however says to him that he had only been an instrument in the hands of God. With "hast thou not heard," the Prophet, so to speak, appeals to the better understanding of the Assyrian. Has it not somehow, if not from without, still from within, come to thy hearing (comp. Ps. lxii. 12) that it is not as thou thinkest? Does not thy conscience, the voice of God within thee say that it was not thou that hast planned and carried out all this, but that I, the Almighty God, long ago (xxii. 11; xxv. 1) laid it out and have accomplished it? Therefore the Assyrian was to be a thorough destroyer of things. But when God destroys the things, He intends always a corresponding effect on the persons. The latter is the thought of ver. 27. Their inhabitants (i. e., of the cities named ver. 26), as short-handed, (i. e., weak), are dismayed and confounded. Then with strong figures this effect is more nearly characterized. The sorely visited inhabitants are compared to the "grass of the field," "the green herb," "the grass on the house tops" (in shallow soil, weak rooted; the expression again only Ps. cxxix. 6), "the grain field before the standing fruit" (i. e., all blade and no stalk), and thus soft and tender like grass.——But not only is the foregoing true of the Assyrian as the instrument of God's purpose, but all his doing and not doing has been directed by the LORD without his knowing it: what he proposed at home, his march forth, his coming into the Holy Land, and his hostile raging against the people of God, all was under the notice of the LORD, and must run the course determined by Him. "Sitting, going forth, coming home," are expressions for the total activity of a man (comp. Deut. xxviii. 6; Ps. cxxi. 8; cxxxix. 2). רגז stands for every vehement emotion whether of fear, of anger, or of joy (comp. v. 25; xiii. 13; xiv. 9, 16; xxiii. 11; xxviii. 21, etc.). The Hithp. occurs only here and ver. 29. Because the Assyrian with this התרגז had sinned against the LORD and rebelled, and would not hear of his being dependent on the LORD, but only the report of his proud security came to the LORD, he must feel his dependence in the most incisive way. He must return home by the way he came, as it were, led by a ring through the nose like a wild beast (comp. Ezek. xix. 4, 9; xxix. 4; xxxviii. 4), or by a bridle between the lips, like a tame beast. On the ruins of Chorsabad are figures of prisoners whom the "royal victor holds to a rope by means of a ring fastened in their lips." Comp. THENIUS on 2 Kings xix. 28.

5. And this shall——do this.—Vers. 30–32. The Prophet turns to Hezekiah. In vers. 22, 29 he had in a general way held out the prospect of the pitiful retreat of the Assyrian out of the Holy Land. Now he names a sign to the king that shall be a pledge of the promise given and place it in the right light. It may be asked: how can this sign, that requires two years for its accomplishment, be a pledge for an event that is to take place at once; according to 2 Kings xix. 35, even that very night? I believe that two things are to be considered here. First: Israel receives the promise, not merely of a momentary, but of a definite deliverance from the power of Assyria. This appears evident from our prophecy itself. The scorn with which Zion greets the retreat of the Assyrian (ver. 22) would be ill-timed if he could return to take vengeance. According to ver. 29 he is so thoroughly led off that he is certain to have no wish to come back. According to vers. 33, 35 he is not to come before Jerusalem. It is not said, however, that this shall not happen only this time and in the present danger. The Assyrian shall never come any more. Assyria is done away. The Theocracy has nothing more to fear from it. We have shown above that this thought occurs in chaps. xxviii.—xxxiii., especially in xxxiii. It cannot surprise one that a promise so all-important, that Assyria shall nevermore hurt the Theocracy, is guaranteed by a sign requiring years for its realization. A promise to be fulfilled after some hours properly requires no pledge.

In the second place: it is to be noticed that there is no exact statement in our prophecy as to the way in which Assyria is to be expelled from Judah. It is neither said that it shall be so suddenly, nor in this fashion. Hence the question might arise after the event, whether this sudden expulsion is to be explained by accidental or natural causes, or as the operation of divine omnipotence. Did the LORD give a sign and the sign come about, it would prove that that first mighty blow carried out against Assyria was also intended by the LORD. But it may be asked: how can a series of events serve for a sign, which in fact take a very natural course, which could not happen otherwise? It might be urged that it took mighty little prophetic insight to know that no regular seeding and harvest could be possible before the third year. That is true. Yet only He for whom there is properly no future could know beforehand that in the third year there would certainly be a seeding and harvest. For it was quite possible that the Assyrian invasion would last for years still. What the Prophet predicts here is the favorable aspect of the future that was in general possible. Better could not happen. I construe ver. 30 essentially as DRECHSLER does, and think that the subject has been needlessly made hard. According to the Assyrian monuments, the expedition of Sennacherib against Syria, Palestine and Egypt occupied only the one year, 700 B. C. For in the year 699 we find him on another theatre of war, employed against Suzub of Babylon. Comp. the canon of Regents in SCHRADER, p. 319, and our remarks on xxxix. 1. If, then, this campaign lasted no longer than a year, still it certainly demanded the whole of the time of a year suitable for warfare. Therefore Sennacherib certainly was in Palestine in Spring before the harvest, and when it was ripe seized on it, for his immense army. He conquered in fact the whole land, and shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem "like a bird in its cage." But he must have remained in Canaan till late in the year. For when one considers that in this year he made the conquest of Phœnicia, several Philistine cities (Beth-Dagon, Joppa, B'ne-Barak, Azur), forty-six fortified cities of Judah, besides countless castles and smaller places, and then also fought a considerable battle with the Ethiopic army, there is presented a labor for whose accomplishment three-quarters of a year does not appear too much time. But with that the invasion lasted so long that the season for preparing a harvest had passed by; especially when it is considered that the inhabitants needed first to assemble again, put their houses to rights, and provide beasts of labor, as their stock must certainly have fallen a prey to the enemy. Comp. xxxii. 10, 12, 13 and xxxiii. 8, 9, which may be taken as a suitable description of the condition brought about by this invasion. For the year after the invasion, therefore, there was no product of the land to be expected in general, but such as would spring up of itself. Not before the third year could there be regular cultivation and a corresponding harvest. And, as already said, that was much, in fact, the best that could happen as things then were. For that end it would be necessary that the Assyrian by the end of the second year should no more be in the land, and have no more power to hinder field-labor. According to this explanation, we have no need of assuming a Sabbatic year, nor a year of jubilee, nor a return of the Assyrian out of Egypt to Palestine, nor an invasion lasting three years, nor that agriculture in Palestine at that time was carried on in the same ceremonious way that, according to WETSTEIN (in DELITZSCH, p. 389 sq.), is the case now-a-days. Naturally, during the invasion, in the first year, there was no fruit of harvest to eat, since the Assyrian had carried it off, but only ספיח (Lev. xxv. 5, 11; Job xiv. 19). The word comes from ספח, which undoubtedly means effundere, profundere, infundere (Hab. ii. 15; Job xxx. 7; Isa. v. 7), in Niph. and Hithp.: "to pour" (of rivers), "to mouth, debouch," i. e., se adjungere, adjungi (xiv. 1; 1 Sam. xxvi. 19). ספיח, therefore, is effusio, "the outpour, what is poured out, spilt." Thus all field produce is meant that comes from spilling at seeding or harvest, or that comes from such spilt fruit. In the present case it would be first the former, like crumbs from the rich man's table, and then the latter, of which the Israelites would get the benefit. On שחיס see Text. and Gram. See in GESEN. and KNOBEL proof that in warm countries grain propagates itself partly by spilt seeds and partly by shoots from the root. [The stooling of winter wheat is familiar to agriculturists.—TR.]

But the Prophet has not only deliverance from ruin to announce to Judah, but also new growth. The escaped (פליטה, comp. iv. 2; x. 20; xv. 9) of the house of Judah (בית י׳, again only xxii. 21), the remnant (comp. xi. 11, 16), shall add on root downwards (xxvii. 6). It shall, however, also bear fruit upwards, thus be a firm-rooted and fruitful tree. It is true that Judah somewhat more than an hundred years later was uprooted. Still it was not, like Israel, quite and forever wrested away from its indigenous soil, but only transplanted for a while, to be replanted again, in order to go and meet a new and final judgment, with which, however, was also combined a transition into a new and higher stage of existence. And precisely for this higher stage of existence the remnant, according to our passage and former statements of the Prophet (iv. 3; vi. 13; x. 20 sqq.), formed the point of connection. By ver. 32 a the Prophet explains how this revivescence of Judah shall be brought about. All Judah fell into the hand of the enemy, and by him was hostilely treated and desolated. Only the capital remained unhurt. Therefore in it had been preserved an untouched nucleus, formed partly of the inhabitants of Jerusalem themselves, partly of such men of Judah as had taken refuge in the capital. Hence the Prophet can say: "out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and the escaped from mount Zion." For of course the repeopling and restoration of the land must proceed from Jerusalem, as from the intact core and heart of the land. On the last clause of ver. 32 see on ix. 6. The words here are evidently intended in a consolatory sense, and to intimate that what the Lord has promised, He will perform with zeal.

6. Therefore thus saith——David's sake.—Vers. 33-35. In these verses, what was given in the foregoing in a general way is now definitely formulated and applied to the present situation. The Prophet affirms most positively that Jerusalem shall not be besieged by the Assyrian. It is commonly assumed that the Assyrian of course enclosed Jerusalem, and that he met the fearful overthrow narrated ver. 36 before its walls. But when Sennacherib received intelligence of the approach of the Ethiopian army, he was at Libnah. From there he retired a little further north to Altakai (Eltekeh), where occurred the battle. Evidently he avoided encountering the Ethiopian near, and especially obliquely south of Jerusalem, so as not to tempt the Jews to aid the enemy, and to avoid having to sustain their attack on his rear. But it is thought that the "great army" (xxxvi. 2) with which Rabshakeh appeared before Jerusalem remained there while he returned to the king (ver. 8). The text, however, says nothing of this, and moreover, it is internally not probable. For with the prospect of encountering so great a host as the army of Egypt and Ethiopia doubtless was, Sennacherib would not have weakened himself by sending away a great part of his own army. He might have sent a small corps of observation: but the 185,000 men of which ver. 36 speaks certainly did not lie before Jerusalem. There is therefore a climax in ver. 33. First it says, Sennacherib shall not come into the city. Then, he shall not shoot an arrow into it. In sieges among the ancients, the shield played a great part as a protection against spears, stones, etc., that were hurled down from the walls, as also against melted pitch (comp. Herz. Real-Encycl. IV. p. 392 sqq.). סללה, "the besiegers' wall" (2 Sam. xx. 15; Jer. vi. 6; Ezek. iv. 2, etc.). Ver. 35 is causal as to its contents. The first clause names, as the reason of the Assyrian's expulsion, Jehovah's purpose to protect Jerusalem. But the reason for this protection is the promise given to David (2 Sam. vii. 12 sqq.; comp. 1 Ki. xv. 4) whereby the honor of the Lord itself was at stake (comp. xliii. 25; xlviii. 11) and thus the preservation of Jerusalem was necessary. It is true that Jerusalem was destroyed, after all, at a later period, and the kingdom of David demolished; but this occurred under circumstances that did not exclude a restoration. Had Judah been destroyed at that time by Sennacherib, it would have had the same fate as the kingdom of Israel.

6. THE DELIVERANCE. Chapter XXXVII. 36-38.

36 Then the angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morn-37 ing, behold, they were all dead corpses. So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, 38 and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh. And it came to pass, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword; and they escaped into the land of [1]Armenia: and Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead.

[1] Heb. Ararat.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Then the angel——in his stead.—Vers. 36-38. In 2 Kings xix. 35 it is said: "And it came to pass that night that the angel," etc. If these additional words were supplied by some later copyist or glossarist, it is incomprehensible how they do not appear in both texts. For whoever made the addition must have wished to be credited. But in order to credibility both documents must agree in this respect. Or if it be assumed that these words were originally in the Isaiah text, but were omitted by some one who could not harmonize them with the view of ver. 29; then the question arises: why did not the same one omit the words at 2 Kings xix.? We must therefore hold that the words in 2 Kings xix. are genuine, and that the Author of our text omitted them, as he has done much beside, because they appeared to him superfluous or obscure. Of course, on a first view, this datum may appear strange. The events narrated in vers. 9-35 are unmarked by any data to indicate the time they required. Thus it may appear that they followed in quick succession, and that there is left no room for the battle between Sennacherib and Tirhaka, if the 185,000 were destroyed the night following Isaiah's response. Yet that battle must have occurred between the announcement of Tirhaka's approach (ver. 9) and the destruction of the 185,000.

According to the inscriptions on the hexagon cylinder (Schrader, p. 171) and on the Kujundschick bulls (ibid. p. 184), the battle of Altaku took place even before the payment of tribute by Hezekiah. But Schrader is undoubtedly correct in remarking (p. 190): "he (Sennacherib) purposely displaces the chronological order and concludes with the statement of the rich tribute, as if this stamped its seal on the whole, whereas we know from the Bible that this tribute was paid while the great king was encamped at Lacish, and before the battle of Altaku (2 Kings xviii. 14)." The Assyrian documents, therefore, cannot prevent us from placing the battle in the period between vers. 9–36. But it could not have been attended with decisive results. For had Sennacherib sustained a decisive defeat, he must have retreated, and the destruction of the 185,000 would not have been necessary. On the contrary, had he conquered, then the Egyptians must have retreated, of which we have no trace. Moreover the Assyrian account of the battle sounds pretty modest. For though it speaks of a defeat of the Egyptians, and of the capture of "the charioteer and sons of the Egyptian king, and of the charioteer of the king of Meroe," yet there is wanting that further statement of the number of prisoners taken, the chariots captured, etc., statements that otherwise never fail to be made. SCHRADER also concludes from this that it must have been a Pyrrhus victory, if a victory at all. According to xxxi. 8, Assyria was even not to fall by the sword of man. The LORD had reserved him for Himself.

If the battle of Altaku occurred as we have said, then it follows that the events narrated, vers. 9–36, cannot have occurred in such very rapid succession. "In that night," 2 Kings xix. 35, therefore does not refer to a point of time immediately near the total events previously narrated. It seems to me to relate only to the day in which Isaiah gave his response. When Sennacherib heard of the approach of Tirhaka (ver. 9) he did not necessarily send off at once his message to Hezekiah. He had likely more important matters on hand. It sufficed for his object if he sent his messengers two or three days later. Then the messengers would require several days to reach Jerusalem. If, then, on the same day [of its receipt] Hezekiah spread the letter of the Assyrian before the LORD, still it is not at all to be assumed that the response immediately followed. That could not follow sooner than the LORD commissioned the Prophet. But the LORD postponed His response to the moment when the fulfilment could follow on the heels of the promise. It is apparent that, after days of anxious waiting, the facts of the comforting assurance and of the unspeakably glorious help, coming blow on blow, must have had a quite overpowering effect. It is, after all, but the LORD's wise and usual way, in order to exercise men in faith and patience, to let them wait for His answer, that, when they have stood the trial, He may then let His help burst in on them mightily, to their greater joy (comp. Ps. xxii. 3; Prov. xiii. 12; Jer. xlii. 7; 1 Sam. xiv. 37, 41 sq., etc.).

The mention of "the angel of the LORD" calls to mind the destruction of the first-born in Egypt (Ex. xii. 12 sqq.), and the plague in Jerusalem (2 Sam. xxiv. 15 sqq.). In these three places the angel is said "to smite" (הִכָּה Exod. xii. 12 sq.; 2 Sam. xxiv. 17 or נָגַף Exod. xii. 13, 23; 2 Sam. xxiv. 21, 25). He is therefore designated as מַשְׁחִית "destruction" (Exod. xii. 13, 23; 2 Sam. xxiv. 21, 25). But in 2 Sam. xxiv. 15 the destruction wrought by the angel is expressly called דֶּבֶר, "pest," which word is employed by Amos iv. 10, probably with reference to that destruction of the first-born. Thus, then, in our passage a pest is to be understood as the sword with which the angel smote the host of Assyria; to the rejection of other explanations, such as a tempest, a defeat by the enemy, or forsooth poisoning (comp. WINER, R. W. B., Art. Hezekiah). Even that plague in David's time carried off in a short space (probably in less than a day, according as one understands עת מועד 2 Sam. xxiv. 15) 70,000 men in Palestine. Other examples of great pest-catastrophes in ancient and modern times, none of which however equal what is told here, see in GESEN. and DELITZSCH. What is told here receives indirect confirmation from HEROD. (II. 141), who narrates that "Sanacharibos, king of the Arabians and Assyrians" was compelled to retreat before king Sethos at Pelusium, because swarms of field mice had gnawed away the leather work of the Assyrian arms. As a monument of this victory there stands in the temple of Hephaestos [Vulcan], whose priest Sethos was, a stone statue of this king with a mouse on his hand, and the superscription "ἐς ἐμέ τις ὁρέων εὐσεβὴς ἔστω." This superscription HERODOTUS accounts for, by narrating that this king in his necessity before the battle prayed to his god, and received the assurance of divine help. If this be perhaps a trace that the overthrow of Sennacherib was recognized as evidently a demonstration of divine help, so, too, the mouse is probably a reminiscence of the rescuing plague. For the hieroglyphics employ the mouse as the symbol of wasting and destruction; so that the narrative of HERODOTUS contains probably only the signification of the mouse supporting statue ascribed to it by those of later times. This combination was first made by J. D. MICHAELIS, who has been followed by GESEN. [?], HITZIG, THENIUS [BARNES, J. A. ALEX., per contra see BAEHR, 2 Kings xix.]. Comp. LEYRER in HERZ., R.-Encycl. XI. p. 411.

Though the plague is a natural agent, still the great number carried off in one night is something wonderful. It appears inadmissible to me to assume with HENSLER and others (DELITZSCH, too,) a longer prevalence of the plague. The deliverance of Israel was not to come about by the sword of Egypt, nor by a natural event of a common sort. Both Israel and the heathen must recognize the finger of God, that every one may fear Him and trust in Him alone. Comp. x. 24 sqq.; xiv. 24–27; xvii. 12–14; xxix. 1–8; xxx. 7–15 sqq., 30 sqq.; xxxi. 1–9; xxxiii. 1–4, 10 sqq., 22 sqq. The subject of וישכימו is the surviving Assyrians, as those who actually in the morning came upon the corpses. In מתים is evidently to be made prominent the notion of inability to act, especially to fight. The strong warriors of Sennacherib were become motionless, harmless corpses. The ויסע וילך וישב, as has often been remarked, recalls CICERO's abiit, evasit, excessit, erupit. The three verbs depict the haste of the retreat. In "and dwelt at Nineveh" the verb וישב has manifestly the meaning of remaining, comp. Gen. xxi. 16; xxii. 5; xxiv. 55; Exod. xxiv. 14, etc. In fact, after this overthrow, Sennacherib reigned still twenty years, and undertook five more campaigns. But these were all directed toward the north or south of Nineveh. He came no more to the west (SCHRADER, l. c. p. 205). What is narrated, therefore, in ver. 38, did not occur till twenty years after this.

According to OPPERT (Exped. scient. en Mesop. II. p. 339) נִסְרֹךְ means "binder, joiner," and as the prayers that have been found addressed to him have for their subject chiefly the blessing of marriage, the conclusion seems justified that Nisroch corresponded to Hymen of the Greeks and Romans. SCHRADER assents to this view, only that, according to him, the root "sarak" in Assyrian means "to vouchsafe, to dispense," rather than "to bind," so that נסרך would more properly be "the good, the gracious" or "the dispenser." An inscription of Asurbanipal, the son and successor of Esar-haddon, in which he narrates his mounting the throne in the month Iyar, calls this month "the month of Nisroch, the lord of humanity" (SCHRADER, p. 208). In the list of gods found in the library of Asurbanipal (comp. on xlvi. 1, and SCHRADER in the Stud. and Krit., 1874, II. p. 336 sq.), the name of Nisroch is not found. While Sennacherib worshipped in the house of his god, his two sons slew him. An awful deed: parricide and sacrilege at the same moment, each aggravating the other. Such was the end of the haughty Sennacherib who had dared to blaspheme the God of Israel. He, who had boasted that no god nor people could resist him, must fall before the swords of his sons. He that regarded himself unconquerable by the help of his idols, must suffer death in the temple and in the presence of his idol. [How different the experience of Hezekiah in the temple of Jehovah, and the fate of Sennacherib in the temple of his idol!—TR.]. HENDEWERK cites, as parallel instances of monarchs murdered while at prayer, the cases of Caliph Omar, and the emperor Leo V. No mention has been discovered thus far, in the Assyrian inscriptions of the murder of Sennacherib, whereas they do inform us of the murder of his father Sargon. POLYHYSTOR, among profane historians, relates (in EUSEB. Armen. Chron. ed. Mai, p. 19) the murder of Sennacherib. But he only names Ardumusanus, i. e., Adrammelech as the murderer. ABYDENUS, on the other hand (ibid. p. 25) makes Nergilus the son of Sennacherib succeed the latter. This one was murdered by his brother Adramelus, and the latter in turn by his brother Axerdis. Here Adramelus is evidently = Adrammelech, Axerdis = Esarhaddon. Nergilus, however, according to SCHRADER's sagacious conjecture, = Sarezer. For Sarezer in Assyrian is Sar-usur, i. e., protect the king. But to this Imperative is prefixed the name of the god that protects, so that the complete name may sound, sometimes Bil-sar-usur, sometimes, Asur-sar-usur, sometimes Nirgal-sar-usur, etc. But the name may also be used in an abbreviated form, viz.: with the omission of the name of the god: so that thus this Sarezer when the name in full was spoken, may have been Nirgal-sar-usur. ABYDENUS then may have preserved the first half of this name, while the Bible preserved the latter half (SCHRADER, p. 206.) Adrammelech occurs as the name of a god 2 Kings xvii. 31. The word in Assyrian is Adar-malik, i. e. Adar is prince. (SCHRADER, p. 168).

According to Armenian tradition, the two sons of Sennacherib were to have been offered in sacrifice by their father (see DELITZSCH in loc.). According to the book of Tobit (i. 18 sqq.), Sennacherib wreaked his vengeance for the overthrow he suffered on the captives of the Ten Tribes. On the other hand he was a hated person by the Jews, whence also they held his murderers in high honor. Later Rabbins were of the opinion that these became Jews, and in the middle ages their tombs were pointed out in Galilee (comp. EWALD, Hist. d. V. Isr. III. p. 690, Anm.). Our text says the parricides escaped to the land of Ararat, i. e., Central Armenia. The Assyrian for Ararat is Ur-ar-ti. The word often occurs in the lists of government as the designation of Armenia (comp. SCHRADER, p. 10, 324, lines 37-40, 42, 44; p. 329, lines 31, 39). According to Armenian historians, the posterity of those two sons of the king long existed in the two princely races of the Sassunians, and Arzerunians. From the latter descended the Byzantine Emperor Leo the Armenian, from whom in turn a long row of Byzantine rulers were descended. "Not less than ten Byzantine Emperors, if such were the case, may be regarded as the posterity of Sennacherib: so that thus the prophecy of Nah. i. 14 received its fulfilment only very late. DELITZSCH, in loc.; RITTER, Erdkunde, X. p. 585 sq. Esar-haddon in Assyrian is Asur-ah-iddin, i. e., Asur gives a brother (SCHRADER, p. 208). According to the canon of regents (ibid. p. 320), Esarhaddon ascended the throne in the year 681 B. C. EWALD places the date of Isaiah's entrance on his office under Uzziah in the year 757, his death under Manasseh in the year 695 (Gesch. d. V. Isr. III. p. 844, 846). DELITZSCH, following DUNCKER sets the beginning of Esar-haddon's reign in the year 693, and admits that in this case Isaiah must have been almost ninety years old. Now in as much as, according to the very certain data of the Assyrian documents, Isaiah, if he lived when Esar-haddon's reign began, must have become almost 100 years old, one must recognize at least in vers. 37 sq., an addition by a later hand, which also DELITZSCH admits. [The reader that desires to inform himself more particularly on these questions of chronology, and to see a defence of Isaiah's data, is hereby referred to BIRK's Comm. on Isa., Appendix III., "THE ASSYRIAN REIGNS IN ISAIAH." The same article will serve as an introduction to the English literature on the subject.—TR.].

II.—THE WAY PREPARED FOR THE RELATIONS WITH BABYLON. HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS AND RECOVERY, AND THE EMBASSY FROM BABYLON THIS OCCASIONED.

CHAPTERS XXXVIII. XXXIX.

1. HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS AND RECOVERY.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

a) The Sickness. XXXVIII. 1–3.

1 IN those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, [1]Set thine house
2 in order: for thou shalt die, and not live. Then Hezekiah turned his face toward 3 the wall, and prayed unto the LORD, and said, Remember now, O LORD, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah wept [2]sore.

[1] Heb. Give charge concerning thy house.

[2] Heb. With great weeping.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. In לָמוּת we have a constructio prægnans, in as much as the preposition depends on a notion of movement onward, nearing, that is latent in the verb חָלָה. Unless לְ be regarded as a particle denoting design; he was sick in order to die, in which case the consequence would be represented as intention, as elsewhere similarly the reason is substituted as an object in clauses with כִּי, עַל, כֵּן. It is said in like manner Jud. xvi. 16, וַתִּקְצַר נַפְשׁוֹ לָמוּת. In the parallel place 2 Chr. xxxii. 24 עַד־לָמוּת stands for our לָמוּת, which corresponds essentially with the first of the two explanations given above.——The expression "to command his house," for "to make his last will known to his house" is found again only 2 Sam. xvii. 23, where, however, the preposition אֶל is used instead of לְ. The expression כִּי־מֵת אַתָּה וְלֹא תִחְיֶה denotes the dying as certain, surely determined, by using the positive affirming participle (which presents death as abstract, timeless fact, thus a fact determined as to substance, though undetermined as to form, comp. Gen. xx. 3) and the negative clause וְלֹא תִחְיֶה that excludes the contrary. As analogous to the meaning "to remain living," comp. חִיָּה = "to retain alive," vii. 21 and the comment.

The differences between our text and 2 Kings xx. 1-3 are inconsiderable as to sense, and yet are characteristic: חִזְקִיָּהוּ omitted at the beginning of ver. 2, and לֵאמֹר substituted at the end for our וַיֹּאמַר beginning ver. 2. Here our passage again gives evidence of an amended text. The absence of a subject for וַיַּסֵּב, when previously Hezekiah and Isaiah and Jehovah had been named, and Hezekiah in fact the furthest from the predicate, lets it be possible (though only grammatically) to think of Isaiah or Jehovah as subject. And the emphatic וַיֹּאמַר ver. 3 corresponds to the importance of the brief prayer much better than the short לֵאמֹר, that is only equivalent to our quotation marks. Thus we see here again that 2 Kings has the more original text. For it is inconceivable that the correcter and completer text has been changed into that which is less correct and complete. [The foregoing reasoning on the differences of the two texts must strike most readers as simply the fruit of a foregone conclusion. When, moreover, one takes the latter statement concerning וַיֹּאמַר and לֵאמֹר and compares the two texts at Isa. xxxvii. 15 and 2 Ki. xix. 15, this impression is confirmed. See the Author's comm. on xxxvii. 15 under Text. and Gram. There we find precisely the reverse of what the Author remarks here on the occurrence of the two words in the parallel texts. In using לֵאמֹר xxxvii. 15, instead of the וַיֹּאמַר found in 2 Kings, does the Isaiah text do injustice to the importance of the solemn prayer of Hezekiah in the Temple? And does he fail to observe how much better "the emphatic וַיֹּאמַר corresponds to that importance?" The reader is also referred to the comparison between vii. 1 (in loc.) and 2 Kings xvi. 5. When all the details of this argument, (viz. for the text of 2 Kings being more original and the Isaiah text being amended from that, and so still more remote from a genuine Isaiah text), have been gone over, we may anticipate that the conclusion of most students will agree with the opinion of J. A. ALEX., (see his comment on xxxvii. 17, 18), who characterizes most of it as "special pleading" and "perverse ingenuity."—TR.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In the fourteenth year of his reign, Hezekiah fell dangerously ill. It was no doubt a proof of especial divine grace when Isaiah announced to him his approaching end, and thereby gave him time to command his house. But Hezekiah was terrified at the intelligence. He prayed weeping to the LORD, and appealing to his life spent in the fear of God.

2. In those days——wept sore.—Vers. 1–3. We have, above in the introduction to chaps.

xxxvi.–xxxix. sufficiently shown what is the relation of chaps. xxxviii.–xxxix. to the two that precede it. It can no longer be a matter of doubt that the time of Hezekiah's sickness preceded the overthrow of Sennacherib. The former as certainly belonged to the year 714 as the latter to the year 700. The transposition of the chapters, which was for the sake of the connection of the subject matter in them with the general contents of the book, occasioned the belief that the overthrow of Sennacherib also happened in the year 714. In consequence of this, expositors only differ in this respect, that some put all the events narrated xxxvi.–xxxvii. before those narrated xxxviii.–xxxix. while others put the sickness of Hezekiah before xxxvi.–xxxvii. but the embassy after them. An end is made to all this by the fact, now put beyond doubt, that Sennacherib only began to reign in the year 705, and made his first and only campaign against Phœnicia, Judea and Egypt in the year 700. For these reasons "in those days" ver. 1 and "at that time," xxxix. 1 are equally unauthentic and not genuine. Both must owe their origin to emendation. [See introduction before xxxvi. Comp. SMITH's Dict. of the Bible, article Hezekiah.].

It cannot be certainly determined what was the nature of Hezekiah's sickness. Many have inferred from הַשְּׁחִין ver. 21; 2 Kings xx. 7, that he had the plague, and have associated this with the plague in the Assyrian camp. (xxxvii. 36), and even used this as proof that Hezekiah's sickness occurred after Sennacherib's overthrow. But שְׁחִין (שָׁחַן, a root unused in Hebrew, but meaning in the dialects ("incaluit, calidus fuit") stands not only for the plague boil (bubo), but also for other burning ulcers, as it occurs in reference to leprosy (Lev. xiii. 18 sqq.), and other inflammable cutaneous diseases (Exod. ix. 9 sqq.; Deut. xxviii. 27, 35; Job ii. 7). If הַשְּׁחִין ver. 21 be not taken collectively, so that there was only one boil, then the next meaning would be a carbuncle (i. e., a conglomeration of ulcerous roots). In respect to God's promises and threatenings being, as it were, dependent on the subjective deportment of men, for their realization, comp. Jer. xviii. 7 sqq.; where especially the רֶגַע, connecting with the celerity with which the potter transforms the clay, denotes the celerity with which the LORD, under circumstances alters His decrees. Comp. my remarks in loc. Hezekiah turned his face to the wall because at that moment he neither wished to see the face of men, nor to show his countenance to men. He would, as much as possible, speak with his God alone.. It was different with Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 4. לֵב שָׁלֵם is animus integer, i. e., a whole, full, undivided heart (1 Kings viii. 61; xi. 4). It is an Old Testament speech, that Hezekiah makes. A Christian could not so speak to God. Hezekiah applies to himself the standard that Ps. xv. offers, and that Christ proposes in the Sermon on the mount (Matt. v. 21 sqq.).

b) The Recovery. CHAP. XXXVIII. 4-8.

4,5 THEN came the word of the LORD to Isaiah, saying, Go, and say to Hezekiah,
Thus saith the LORD, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I 6 have seen thy tears: behold, [a]I will add unto thy days fifteen years. And I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria: and I will de-7 fend this city. And this shall be a sign unto thee from the LORD, that the LORD
8 will do this [b]thing that he hath spoken; Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down [c]in the [1]sun dial of Ahaz, ten degrees backward.
So the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down.

[1] Heb. degrees by, or, with the sun.

[a] I add. [b] word. [c] auf der Stufenuhr Achas' vermoege der Sonne, or, on the degrees, or steps of Ahaz with the sun.—J. A. ALEX.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5. On the construction of הִנְנִי יוֹסִף see on xxviii. 16; xxix. 14.

Ver. 21. The word דְּבֵלָה, st. constr. דְּבֵלַת, beside the text, and 2 Kings xx. 7, occurs only 1 Sam. xxx. 12; 1 Chr. xii. 40. The Greek word παλάθη, which means a cake of dried fruits, especially of figs, seems to have been derived from דְּבֵלָה through the Aram. דְּבֵלְתָא.

The 3 pers. plur. יִשְׂאוּ has for subject those who naturally performed the service in question. We use in such cases the indefinite subject they (Germ. "man"): (comp. Jer. iii. 16 sq.; Isa. xxxiv. 16).——מָרַח occurs elsewhere only in the substantive form מְרוֹחַ (contritus scil, testiculos contritos habens, Lev. xxi. 20.) The meaning is "to crush, triturate." It is thus a constructio prægnans: let them crush figs (and lay them) on the boil. On שְׁחִין. See on ver. 1.

In 2 Kings xx. 7 at the end of the verse it reads וַיֶּחִי, "and he lived," i. e., recovered, instead of as here וְיֶחִי, "that he may live." Our text appears to be an effort to remove a difficulty. For וַיֶּחִי seems primarily to mean that Hezekiah immediately recovered. But that such was not the case is seen from the king's asking: "what shall be the sign that the LORD will heal me, and that I shall go up to the temple the third day?" (2 Ki. xx. 8). It was, therefore, no instantaneous cure: and this our text would intimate by וַיֶּחִי. But the word in 2 Kings xx. 7 is only an anticipation of the narrator, who states the effect immediately after the application of the means although other events intervened.

Vers. 21, 22, are an epitome of 2 Kings xx. 7, 8, with the omission of what is less essential. But it is to be noted, as a further proof of the second-hand nature of our text, that the words "what is the sign," etc. 2 Ki. xx 8 have there their proper foundation in that the promise is expressly given (2 Kings xx. 5) that the king should go up to the temple, whereas that item is wanting in our ver. 5.——Whether or not our vers. 21, 22 were intentionally or accidentally put where they are by some later copyist cannot be certainly determined, and is in itself indifferent. But it seems to me most natural to assume that some later person, with the feeling that there was a disturbing gap, thought he must supply it from 2 Kings. An interpolation between vers. 6, 7 would have involved a change in his actual text, thus he supplemented at the end. As they are found in the LXX. the addition must be very ancient. They are important, too, as proof in general that the text in our chaps. has suffered alterations; and especially that the dates have been changed.

On the text at ver. 8 b. An important difference is to be noted between this and 2 Kings xx. 9–11. Our text assumes an actual going backward of the sun, probably, as is also assumed by many expositors, because it was thought that this miracle must be put on a level with the sun standing still at Gibeon (Josh. x. 12). In the Book of Sirach (Ecclus. xlviii. 23) it is expressly said: "in his days the sun went backward and he lengthened the king's life." The older and original text of the Book of Kings knows nothing of this construction.*

* [This use of Ecclus. xlviii. 23 conflicts with the appeal the Author makes to the same text in his Introduction, § 4 (at the end), in support of the genuineness of the Isaiah text. If it there serves to prove that an entire section, viz., the historical part, xxxvi.—xxxix. is Isaiah's own work, it must certainly prove as much for the particular language that Sirach actually refers to.—Tr.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Then came the word——was gone down.—Vers. 4–8. In 2 Kings xx. 4 we are told that the word of the Lord came to the Prophet when he had hardly left the king, when he had not yet traversed the עִיר תִּיכֹנָה, or, as the K'ri and the ancient versions have it probably more correctly, חָצֵר תִּיכֹנָה, i. e., the inner court of the residence. Therefore actually רֶגַע (Jer. xviii. 7), i. e., suddenly, Jehovah recalled the announcement so categorically made ver. 1. Just that so harsh sounding announcement had brought forth that fervent sigh of prayer from the depths of Hezekiah's heart. Precisely this was intended. Necessity must teach Hezekiah to pray. The Lord calls Himself "the God of thy father David" in order to give Hezekiah one more comforting pledge of deliverance. For He intimates that He will be still the same to him that He had been to David. The Lord had heard the prayer, He had seen the tears. Both were well pleasing to Him, He regarded both. And thus He promises the king that He will add yet fifteen years to his life.

I cannot accord with all that Baehr remarks on our passage (see the vol. on 2 Kings xx. 4 sqq.). But I agree with him when he says: "The Prophet announces to the suppliant that God has heard him, and promises him not only immediate recovery, but, in fact, that he shall reign as long again as he has already reigned." Accordingly Hezekiah must already have reigned fifteen years. This could easily be the case if the historian (xxxvi. 1) reckoned the fourteen years from the first day of the calendar year, beginning after Hezekiah's becoming king, while the Lord reckoned so favorably for Hezekiah that He counted the fragment of the first calendar year when he began to reign and the fragment of the current year as a whole year. Then is explained how by divine reckoning Hezekiah reigned 15 + 15 years, and by human reckoning only 14 + 15. In 2 Kings xx. 5 the additional promise for the immediate future is given: "Behold, I will heal thee: on the third day thou shalt go up unto the house of the Lord." This is manifestly omitted in our text because included in the larger promise. The promise of ver. 6 is of course conceivable even after the overthrow of Sennacherib. For the latter was to the Assyrians, though a serious, yet by no means an annihilating blow. They could recover themselves after it, and fall on Judah with augmented force and redoubled rage. But our passage stands primarily in undeniable connection with xxxvii. 35, especially when we regard it in the construction of 2 Kings (comp. 2 Kings xix. 34 with xx. 6, where only אֶל for עַל and the לְהוֹשִׁיעָה wanting in xx. 6 makes the difference). If we are correct in construing the temporal relations of xxxviii., xxxix., to xxxvi., xxxvii. (see on xxxviii. 1), then our passage is older than xxxvii. 35. But the latter passage promises deliverance from Sennacherib in words evidently taken on purpose from our passage, so that the promise there given to Hezekiah appears as a renewal and repetition of that he had received already fourteen years before. In addition to this, both our passage and xxxvii. 35 have their common root in xxxi. 5. There as here גנון and הציל occur together; there, too, גנון is illustrated by the touching image of a hovering bird. There it is expressly said that, not Egypt shall protect the people of Israel, but Jehovah has reserved this care for Himself. And this deliverance of Judah from Assyria was in fact definitively and forever decided by the defeat of Sennacherib. Assyria, as we have already seen, is done away. The deportation of Manasseh (2 Chr. xxxiii.) was more a benefit for Judah than a punishment. One may say: Sennacherib's losing his army, not by the sword of Egypt, but by the hand of the Lord, is the true and proper fulfilment of the promises, xxxi. 5; xxxvii. 35; xxxviii. 6. For these reasons I believe that our passage is to be referred to Sennacherib's defeat and, because that was decisive for Judah's relations to Assyria, to no later event. But then our passage also puts a decisive weight in the scale in favor of the assertion that the events narrated xxxviii. precede the events narrated xxxvi. and xxxvii.

In our text are wanting after ver. 6 the words that 2 Ki. xx. 7, 8 are found in the proper place, viz.: "And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs," etc. Instead we have in vers. 21, 22 an epitome of what is there said. We will, therefore, anticipate here the exposition of these verses. The Prophet proceeds at once to the fulfilment of the promise of vers. 5, 6. To this end he orders a piece of fig-cake to be laid on the diseased spot. דבלה means a round (sometimes four-cornered) cake of dried summer figs, that were pounded in a mortar and put up in this form for better preservation and transportation (see WINER, R.-W.-B. art. Feigenbaum [SMITH's Bib. Dict. art. Figs]). It is well known that anciently, as now-a-days, too, figs were applied as an emollient to hasten the gathering of a boil. Comp. GESENIUS on ver. 1 and BAEHR on 2 Kings xx. 7. Already JEROME mentions the opinion that the sweet fig was a contrarium, i. e., an aggravation of the evil, and adds: "Ergo, ut Dei potentia monstraretur, per res noxias et adversas sanitas restituta est." According to SEB. SCHMIDT, Hebraei communiter et Christianorum quidam (e. g., GROTIUS) share this opinion. We are told in the Scriptures of countless miraculous cures in which divine omnipotence made no use of natural means. Why such means were still sometimetimes employed (comp. Mar. vii. 33; viii. 23; Jno. ix. 6 sq.) we will hardly be able to fathom. If the means used in the present case were already known at that time as a cure of this disease, why did not the physicians apply it? Or was this cure still unknown at that time? Or did the physicians not understand the disease correctly? Or had the LORD, beside the object of the bodily cure, some other higher objects to which that means stood in a relation to us unknown? Such are the questions that men raise here, but can hardly answer to satisfaction.

Asking and giving signs is nothing unusual in the Old Testament, and especially in the life of our Prophet. The more the life of faith stands in the grade of childhood, the more frequent it is. Christ would give no sign on demand (Matth. xii. 38 sqq.; xvi. 1 sqq.; Luke xi. 16; John ii. 18; vi. 30). But Moses received and gave them in abundance (Exod. iv.). Also in the times of the judges and of the kings they were frequent (Judg. vi. 17, 36 sqq.; 1 Sam. ii. 34; x. 1 sqq.). Isaiah himself was more than once the medium of such signs (vii. 11 sqq.; viii. 1 sqq.; xx. 3 sq.; xxxvii. 30). They are sometimes threatening, sometimes comforting in their promissory contents, and are, accordingly, given now to the wicked as a warning, now to the pious for comfort and to strengthen their hopes. Thus Hezekiah here receives the second comforting sign. That his life shall be prolonged the LORD makes known to him by means of an implement used for measuring time. At Hezekiah's request the LORD actually causes the shadow on the sun-dial to go backward ten steps or degrees. Here we must note the not inconsiderable difference between our text and that of 2 Kings xx. 9 sqq. According to our text, the Prophet does not propose to the king the choice whether the shadow shall go forwards or backwards; moreover he does not call on the Lord to do the miracle. But the Prophet declares at once that he will (of course by the power of God) turn the shadow back. Finally our text says, ver. 8, that the sun returned back the ten degrees that it had gone down, whereas 2 Kings xx. speaks only of the return of the shadow (וַיָּשֶׁב אֶת־הַצֵּל וגו׳). The last mentioned difference is so far especially important because it intensifies the miracle. We have hitherto learned, in the character of an abstract that the Isaiah text bears, to recognize a mark of its later origin. This magnifying the miraculous may be regarded as a further symptom of the same thing. See Text. and Gram.

It is now admitted by all that by מַעֲלוֹת we are to understand a sun-dial. The ancient notion found in the LXX., in JOSEPHUS (Antiqq. X. 2, 1), the SYR., various Rabbis, SCALIGER (Praef. ad can. chronol.) was that the steps were a simple flight of stairs exposed transversely to the sun. But to this it is objected that one may imagine the withdrawal of the shadow from ten stair-steps, but not the going down. For the sun must stand so that the upright faces or risers of the stair cast their shadows on the flat steps. But then all the flats must be shaded equally from the top to the bottom. One may of course picture that the ten lower steps lost their shade, but not that the shadow descended ten steps further, as all the steps must already have their shadow. This ascent or descent of the shadow is only possible where there is one object to cast the shadow, and serve as an indicator, whatever may be its form. Hence all expositors understand a sun-dial to be meant. [The words in the Hebrew literally mean "the degree or steps of Ahaz in (or by) the sun." מַעֲלוֹת, like the Latin gradus, first means steps, and then degrees. The nearest approach to the description of a dial is in the words: "degrees of Ahaz," which certainly do not obviously mean a dial. As investigation shows, there is no historical necessity for assuming that a dial could not be meant, and that we must assume that the shadow here meant was the shadow cast upon the stairs of Ahaz. "The only question is, whether this (latter) is not the simplest and most obvious explanation of the words, and one which entirely exhausts their meaning. If so, we may easily suppose the shadow to have been visible from Hezekiah's chamber, and the offered sign to have been suggested to the Prophet by the sight of it. This hypothesis relieves us from the necessity of accounting for the division into ten, or rather twenty degrees, as Hezekiah was allowed to choose between a procession and a retrocession of the same extent." J. A. ALEX. A neighboring wall might have cast its shadow on such a stair, which might be called the shadow of the stair, as God's shadow is called "thy shadow." צִלְּךָ, Ps. cxxi. 5; comp. צִלָּם, Num. xiv. 9. The stair may have served designedly or undesignedly for a rude or even comparatively accurate gauge of time, or it may not.—TR.]

We learn from Herodotus (II. 109) that the Greeks received the sun-dial from the Babylonians, and he says expressly that the Greeks learned from them τὰ δυώδεκα μέρεα τῆς ἡμέρης.

Thus the Babylonians seem already to have known the division into twelve day and twelve night hours. The sun-indicator of Ahaz may also have had this division. For the mention of ten degrees does not warrant the inference that it was divided according to the decimal system. The sun-dial could easily pass from the Babylonians to the Syrians, and from the latter to the Jews. Ahaz was disposed to introduce foreign novelties (comp. 2 Kings xvi. 10 sqq.), and may have introduced this with other things from Syria. But this is only conjecture. The same is true of any thing that may be offered concerning the form of Ahaz's sun-dial [see BARNES in loco; SMITH'S Bib. Dict.].

As the Prophet offered the choice of letting the shadow rise or fall ten degrees, it must have been at a time of day that allowed room for both on the dial. Of course this room was measured by the length of time represented by the degrees. Did they represent hours or a like larger measure, then a gnomon arranged for only twelve would not have sufficed. But what was proposed could have been done did the degrees mark half or quarter hours. DELITZSCH says: "If the performance of the sign took place an hour before sundown, then the shadow, going back ten degrees, of half an hour each, came to where it was at noon." But how then could the shadow at 5 o'clock, P. M., go also ten degrees further down? Could the dial mark the tenth hour after noon? It is thus more probable that the Prophet came to the king nearer mid-day. [According to the old view defended above, it would be, say half-way, between sunrise and meridian.—TR.]

The expression מעלות is manifestly used with different meanings. It designates first the degrees or steps, however they may have been marked. And, in my opinion, it has this sense four out of the five times that it occurs in our passage. Moreover צל מעלות seems to me to be "the shadow of the degrees," not "the shadow of the gnomon." For it is not correct to say: "the shadow of the gnomon that is gone down on the gnomon of Ahaz." For if מעלות be taken in the concrete sense, meaning that particular gnomon, that would be to distinguish what in fact is identical. But if the word be taken generally=the sun-dial shadow that is on every dial in general, then מעלות is quite superfluous. Hence I think that מעלות means here the degrees, and "the shadow of the degrees" is the shadow that, connected with the degrees, marks the hours, be it that the degrees themselves cast the shadow, or that the shadow strikes the degrees (be they lines, points, circles, or the like), and thereby marks the position of the sun or the time of day. Moreover, the third, fourth and fifth time the word means "degrees." For in these it is only said that the sun has retrograded over the same degrees on which it went down. But the expression מעלית אחז is manifestly to be taken as a metonomy, as far as it is pars pro toto. The language had no name for the novelty. It had only a word for the chief features of it, and thus that became the name of the whole. אשר מעלות is both times the accusative of measure. בשמש stands in an emphatic antithesis: by means of the sun's movement, thus in consequence of a natural cause, the shadow had gone down; but I, says the Prophet in the consciousness of the will and power of Jehovah, I bring it about that, contrary to nature, it must return ten degrees. This could happen indirectly by refraction of the sun's rays (comp. KEIL on 2 Kings xx. 9), or perhaps directly by an optical effect. It remains a miracle any way. [See BARNES in loc. for a full presentation of this subject.] Various natural explanations see in WINER, R.-W.-B. Art. Hiskia. THENIUS (on 2 Kings xx. 9) supposes an eclipse of the sun, which, according to SEYFFARTH, took place September 26th, 713 B. C. But this date does not sufficiently agree with our event, nor would an eclipse explain the retrocession of the shadow. I believe that the LORD desired to give to His anointed, at a very important epoch of his personal and official life, the assurance that He, the LORD, could as certainly restore the sands of Hezekiah's life that were nearly run out, and strengthen them to renew their running, as He now lets the shadow of the sun-dial return a given number of degrees.

c) Hezekiah's Psalm of Thanksgiving.

CHAPTERS XXXVIII. 9–20.

No one doubts the genuineness of this song. That it was not composed during the sickness, appears from the second half, which contains thanks for recovery. But it is probable, too that the song was no involuntary burst of joyful and grateful feeling, such as might well forth from the heart in the first moments after deliverance. For, as DELITZSCH has remarked, the song bears evident marks of art, and of choice, and partly of antiquated expression. Such forms of expression are: פִּקַּדְתִּי (again only Exod. xxxviii. 21) and חֶדֶל (ἁπ. λεγ.) ver. 11; דּוֹר in the sense of "dwelling" (perhaps again Ps. xlix. 20), רֹעִי (adjective form only here), קִפַּד and דַּלָּה meaning "licium" (ἁπ. λεγ.) ver. 12; שִׁוָּה meaning "composuit animum" (again only Ps. cxxxi. 2) ver. 13; סוּס עָגוּר (again only Jer. viii. 7) and עָשְׁקָה (ἁπ. λεγ.) ver. 14; Hithp. הִדַּדָּה (again only Ps. xlii. 5) ver. 15; חָשַׁק ver. 17 and נִגֵּן ver. 20 with the accusative instead of the usual construction with בּ; בְּלִי as substantive = interitus, and joined with שַׁחַת (only here) ver. 17. Added to this are echoes from Job, especially in the first, lamenting part of the song: נִסַּע Niph. ver. 12 (again only in Job iv. 21). יְבַצְּעֵנִי ver.

12, comp. Job vi. 9 (chap. xxvii. 8); תשלימני ver. 12, comp. Job xxiii. 14. מיום עד־לילה ver. 12, Job iv. 20; דַלּוּ וג׳ ver. 14, comp. Job xvi. 20; ערבני ver. 14, comp. Job xvii. 3; חלם ver. 16, comp. Job xxxix. 4. Compare the list by DELITZSCH in DRECHSLER'S Komm. II. p. 620 sq. It is, therefore, conjectured, not without reason, that the learned king, well acquainted with the ancient literature of his people, produced this song later as he had time and leisure for it, as a monument both of his art and learning. Apart from the superscription ver. 9, the song has evidently two parts; a lament (vers. 10–14), and a joyful thanksgiving (vers. 15–20.

α) SUPERSCRIPTION. XXXVIII. 9.

9 The writing of Hezekiah, king of Judah, when he had been sick, and was recovered from his sickness.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

' It is doubtful if מִכְתָּב – מִכְתָּם. For although b. and m. are in general kindred sounds, still an interchange specially of the roots כָּתַב and כָּתַם never occurs. For neither נִכְתָּם (Jer. ii. 22, see my remarks in loc.), nor the noun כֶּתֶם has anything to do with כָּתַב. We have besides, as derived from the unused root כָּתַם only מִכְתָּם in the superscriptions of Ps. xvi. lvi.–lx. Why should the exchange of ב and ם be made just for this species of Psalm? Why was not מכתב used in the superscription of those Psalms as well as for our passage, if both words are actually of like meaning? Beside מכתב occurs elsewhere, and means either abstractly the writing, mode of writing (Exod. xxxii. 16; xxxix. 30; Deut. x. 4; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 22; Ezra. i. 1), or in the concrete sense, a something written, piece of scripture, copy (2 Chr. xxi. 12; xxxv. 4). Here, too, it means a writing, a written document or record. The word would give us to know that another source for this song lay before the author than for other parts of chapters xxxvi.–xxxix. The Book of Kings does not contain the song of Hezekiah. From that therefore the author could not take it. There lay before him a document that was either held to be a writing of Hezekiah's or actually was such. In fact we may take the word "writing" in the sense of original manuscript. For the unusual word, מכתב, doubtless chosen on purpose, and on purpose put first, intimates that not only the contents of the writing came from Hezekiah, but also that the manuscript of it was his. It may be remarked as a curiosity, that GROTIUS conjectures that the song was dictated to the king by Isaiah, thus was properly the production of the latter. Excepting this no one has doubted Hezekiah's authorship. He is known to have been a very active man in the sphere of art and literature. He was the restorer of the Jehovah-cultus in general, and of the instrumental and vocal temple music of David in particular (2 Chr. xxix.). According to Prov. xxv. 1, he had a college or commission, called the אַנְשֵׁי חִזְקִיָּה, which appears to have been charged with collecting and preserving ancient documents of the national literature. See DELITZSCH in DRECHSL. Komm. II. 2, p. 221. From the words בחלתו and ויחי מחליו we see that the sickness and recovery are treated as a total. In the second of these periods, inexactly defined, the song originated. The second period is named, not by the infinitive as the first, but by means of the verb. fin., according to that frequent Hebrew usage, in which the discourse quickly returns from subordinate to the principal form. Comp. xviii. 5.

β) THE DISTRESS. CHAPTER XXXVIII. 10-14.

10 I said in [a]the cutting off of my days,
I shall go to the gates of the grave:
I am deprived of the residue of my years.
11 I said, I shall not see the LORD,
Even the LORD, in the land of the living:
I shall behold man no more
With the inhabitants of the [b]world.
12 [c]Mine age is departed, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent;
I have [d]cut off like a weaver my life:
He will cut me off [e]with pining sickness:
From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.
13 [f]I reckoned till morning, that, as a lion,
So will he break all my bones:
From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.
14 Like [g]a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter:
I did mourn as a dove;

Mine eyes [g]fail with looking upward:
O LORD, I am oppressed; [h]undertake for me.

[1] Or, from the thrum.
[a] in the pause of my days.
[d] rolled up.
[g] languished upward.
[2] Or, ease me.
[b] non-existence.
[c] I composed myself.
[h] be my surety.
[e] My dwelling is broken up.
[f] a swallow, a crane.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10. Views differ very much about דְּמִי יָמַי. The Ancient Versions guess at it. The LXX. have ἐν ὕψει (they probably read רֻמִי); the VULGATE, "in dimidio" (if this was not for the sake of resemblance in sound between דמי and dimidium, then it was from a calculation that the point of culmination is at the same time solstitium). The SYRIAN, also, by reason of the same combination, has in mediis diebus meis;" TARG. JONATAN has in moerore dierum meorum; AQU. and SYMM. have ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ (they take the root דָּמָה = דָּוָה); the ARAB. and various Rabbins translate "in ademtione, excisione dierum meorum," in which they proceed from the meaning "to destroy," which דָּמָה certainly has, especially in the Niph. (comp. Hos. x. 15; Isa. vi. 5; xv. 1, etc.). Many modern expositors, following the precedent of EBERH. SCHEID (Diss. philol. exeg. ad Cant. Hisk. Lugd. Bat. 1769), translate the word as do the VULG. and SYR., viz., in dimidio, medio (comp. בַּחֲצִי יָמַי Ps. cii. 25). This meaning is supported by reference to the supposed still-stand of the sun in the midst of its course; but it is over ingenious and entirely isolated here. For in other places of its occurrence דֳּמִי undoubtedly means: "being still, pause" (lxii. 6, 7; Ps. lxxxiii. 2). Most expositors now adopt this sense (GESENIUS, MAURER, UMBREIT, DRECHSLER, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH). Yet they differ also; some understanding by the stillness the political still-stand consequent on Sennacherib's defeat (GESEN., MAUR., DRECHSLER), or that promised to follow the hoped-for retreat of the Assyrians (KNOBEL). Others refer to the expression בִּימֵי חָרְפִּי ("in the days of my harvest" Job xxix. 4), and suppose the meaning to be "the time of manly maturity when the spirit of men begins to be clearer and quieter" (UMBR.), or "the quiet course of healthful life" (DEL.). Thus all these expositors take דמי in a good sense, i. e., of quiet, happy condition, of rest of spirit, of vigor of life, vigor. But I cannot think it has this positive meaning. One must not transfer to דמה the sense of נוּחַ. The root דָּמָה has the predominant meaning "not to be, to bring to nought, to annihilate," whether this comes from the notion of making like (the earth), or elsewhere. For דמה means "to destroy," once in Kal. (Hos. iv. 5), always in Niph. (Hos. iv. 6; x. 7, 15; Isa. xv. 1; vi. 5; Jer. xlvii. 5; Obad. 5; Zeph. i. 11); in Piel in the solitary instance of this conjugation (2 Sam. xxi. 5). Kal. occurs beside only in the sense of negative rest, of being no more, ceasing (cessare): Jer. xiv. 17; Lam. iii. 49. And also דֳּמִי, in the three instances where it occurs (lxii. 6, 7; Ps. lxxxiii. 2), is primarily only a designation for ceasing to speak, being silent, as DELITZSCH himself remarks on lxii. 6. Accordingly I think that דמי ימי means rather "being still, standing still, the quenching of life-power." Thus the king would say: "as I noted that the clock of my life gradually stopped, I thought: now it goes in the gate of Hades." It is plain that, with this construction דמי ימי must be referred to אָמַרְתִּי, whereas those who construe דמי positively must refer it to אֵלֵכָה. For it is self-evident that one whose life-clock stops must enter the gates of Hades, whereas it needs to be made emphatic that one, still in the vigor of life, must make up his mind to this fatal entry. The Masorets understood the words in the latter sense; hence the pause in אֵלֵכָה indicated by Tiphhha. One is necessitated thereby to construe הלך emphatically "to go off," and the connection with בשערי שׁ׳ as a pregnant construction, which is needless with our exposition. The cohortative form in אלכה seems to me to mean that the speaker, as it were, spurs himself on to do what he must do, but does unwillingly (comp. EWALD, 228, a).——Pual פֻּקַּד occurs again only Exod. xxxviii. 21, where it means "to be mustered, inscribed, inventoried." It is plain that it cannot mean this here. Hence some take it = "made to miss, deprived of, frustrari." But DELITZ. justly remarks that then it ought to read הָפְקַדְתִּי (comp. on xxix. 6) GESEN. translates: "I am missed through the rest of my years," grammatically correct but flat. The most inviting is the rendering: "I am fined the residue of my years," which is grammatically possible since פָּקַד occurs with the accusative of the person meaning "to visit, punish" (Jer. vi. 15; xlix. 8; Ps. lix. 6).

Ver. 11. Concerning יָהּ see on xii. 2.——If the words עִם יֹשְׁבֵי חָדֶל are taken as parallel with בְּאֶרֶץ הַחַיִּים, then of course one must cast doubt upon חדל (ἅπ. λεγ.) as CHEYNE, DELITZSCH, DIESTEL and others do, and read חֶלֶד, i. e., "world in the sense of earthly presence" (αἰὼν οὗτος) Ps. xvii. 14; xlix. 2; lxxxix. 48. But if we are correct in referring בארץ החי to the object and not to the predicate (see comm. below), and if, according to the principle of parallelism, the same construction obtain in the second half of the verse, then the position of עוֹד after אָדָם, and then also the difficulty of connecting בארץ החי and also אדם עם חדל, show that עם ישבי חדל is not to be joined to the object but to the predicate, that therefore there is an antithetical parallelism. Therefore חֶדֶל is correct, and is to be taken in the sense μὴ εἶναι, of a relative not being, or being no more.

Ver. 12. If דּוֹר be taken in its usual sense of "ætas, time, life-time" (DRECHSLER) there ensues the disadvantage that the predicates נסע ונגלה do not fit to it. For they contain the notion breaking off, removal in respect to space, which is applicable to dwelling-space, room, but not to the time of dwelling. Hence most expositors recur to the dialects wherein דור (likely because of a relation to גּוּר) has very constantly the sense of "dwelling." Thus in Chaldee דּוּר is a very common word for "dwelling," Dan. ii. 38; iii. 31; iv. 9, 18, 32. Thence come the expressions of the Targum דָּיָר "the inhabitant," דִּירָא "the dwelling." In Syriac, too, dairo, dajoro, dairono is "the dwelling;" and in Arabic dar. It seems that the radical idea "rotundum, orbis" has in Hebrew developed more to the meaning "circuit, periodus, period, age," whereas in the dialects it has been restricted more to the meaning of the round tent-dwelling. Still there are not wanting examples to prove that in Hebrew also the word has retained its original sense of "being round" in reference to things of space. Thus xxii. 11 דּוּר means "ball;" xxix. 3 כַּדּוּר — circumcirca; Ezek. xxiv. 5 מְדוּרָה — דּוּר "the wood-pile in round layers." Indeed Ps. xlix. 20 דּוֹר very likely means specifically "dwelling." It is very probable that Hezekiah, a learned prince and well acquainted with the ancient monuments of the national tongue, in solemn poetry, availed himself of an antiquated expression.——נִסַּע used for pulling up the tent-pegs, xxxiii. 20; Niph. found again only Job iv. 21, and with the same meaning.——נִגְלָה from גָּלָה "to uncover," "to clear out the land, evacuare," then specifically "migrare," Niph. — "migrare factus, deportatus.——רֹעִי is an adjective formation from רֹעֶה — pastoricius: it occurs only here. That קָפַד (ἅπ. λεγ.) does not mean "to cut off" seems probable to me also. For all kindred roots קָפַץ, קָפַס, קָפָא, as also the derivative קִפּוֹד "the porcupine," indicate that it means "to contract, wrap together, lay together." Thus many moderns translate: "I have wound up my life." But if one so understands it: "I regard my life as wound up," i. e., done, finished, I have finished with life, then it seems to me not to suit the first person, nor the primary sense of קִפַּדְתִּי. My rendering (see Exeg. and Crit. below) makes plain why we find the first and then the third person. יְבַצְּעֵנִי (reminds strongly of Job vi. 9, comp. xxvii. 8).——מִיּוֹם עַד־לַיְלָה recall Job iv. 20; and תַּשְׁלִימֵנִי Job xxiii. 14.

Ver. 13. שִׁוָּה is "componere, complanare." We had the word with a physical sense xxviii. 25; here it has a moral sense like Ps. cxxxi. 2, where it means composui et compescui animum. In our text נַפְשִׁי is wanting. It is seen from this that the poet uses the word in that direct causative sense, so frequent in Hebrew, according to which שִׁוָּה can mean, not only "to make alike, even, mild, quiet," but also "to effect equality, evenness (aequitatem animi), equanimity, quietness."——כָּאֲרִי (pointed with the art. like Ps. xxii. 17), though referred by the Masorets to שִׁוִּיתִי, still manifestly, as to sense, belongs to what follows. For the lion is no example of that animum componere.——The retrospective כֵּן after a כְּ immediately preceding occurs here like it does directly after, at the beginning of ver. 14.

Ver. 14. The words כְּסוּס עָגוּר are difficult. First, as to סוּס, it is to be remarked that Jer. viii. 7, the only other place where the words occur, K'ri would read סִיס. This shows that the word has nothing to do with סוּס "horse," whatever may be the etymology of the latter word. The conjecture of VELTHUSEN (Beitrag zur Aufklaerung des Danklieds Hiskias zur Befoerderung theol. Kenntnisse von J. A. CRAMER, P. I. p. 61 not.), seems to me reasonable, that the Masorets, beside the pronunciation sus, intimate another siis or sis, because the latter better corresponds to the sound-mimicry of the word. For it is very probable that the bird receives its name from the sound it makes (like cuckoo, Uhu "owl," etc.).——עָגוּר. There is no root עָגַר in Hebrew. It is regarded as coming by transposition from גָּעַר increpare, but which in Ethiopic is said to mean "to sigh," in Arabic "to implore plaintively." BOETTCHER (Aehrenlese, p. 33) takes עָגוּר for a softened עָכוּר — "disturbed, troubled," and this "as the peculiar mark of the restless swallow that flies back and forth." But this does not suit Jer. viii. 7, where it is pure arbitrariness to omit ו.——It is certainly no accident that in many languages the crane is designated by a word containing the sound g (k) and r, and it shows that all these denominations are 'ονοματοποιητικά. The name in Arab, is Kurki; Aram., kurkeja; Greek, γέρανος; Lat. grus, etc. This meaning suits very well Jer. viii. 7, but is less suitable in our text.——כְּסִיס עָגוּר is the same as כְּסִיס כְּעָגוּר (FUERST): The asyndeton (the like occurs Nah. ii. 12; Hab. iii. 11) gives emphasis: "like a swallow, (still more) like a crane I sigh." There are cases where, not the species, but the individual forms the basis of comparison. Thus the rule that would require it, to read כְּעָגוּר if עָגוּר is co-ordinate and not subordinate, cannot be strictly carried out. Beside the examples just given, comp. Num. xxiii. 24; xxiv. 9, 6; Job xvi. 14.——הָגָה is used for the note of the dove also lix. 11, comp. Ezek. vii. 16; Nah. ii. 8.——עָשְׁקָה־לִּי; so punctuated עָשְׁקָה can only be perf. 3d per. fem., and the fem., is to be construed as neuter. But עָשַׁק occurs no where else in an intransitive sense. Hence, and for the sake of antithesis to עָרְבֵנִי (as LUZZATTO well remarks, see in DELITZSCH), it is better to read עָשְׁקָה, which must then be taken as substantative — "oppressio, anxiety."——דָּלַל "to hang down limp," Job xxviii. 4, then, generally, "languidum, debilem esse," comp. xix. 6; Ps. lxxix. 8; cxvi. 6; cxlii. 7.)——עָרְבֵנִי is sponde pro me. The construction with the accusative of the person like Gen. xliii. 9; xliv. 32; Prov. xi. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The poet depicts how he felt in the moment of extreme peril of life, when he thought he must enter the gates of Hades, and, as it were, pay the penalty of the remnant of his days (ver. 10). Then he believed he would for ever be robbed of the blessing that is enjoyed in contemplating the works of Jehovah and in the companionship of men, by his exile in the land of unsubstantial shades (ver. 11). He sees his body already broken up and removed away like the tent of a wandering shepherd; he was in the midst of the labor of weaving his life and rolling it up, like the weaver his web on the weaver's beam; but in the midst of this labor he sees his life suddenly cut off. By day still untouched, it is mortally smitten before night comes (ver. 12). In anxious expectation he drags on till morning. But that brings only new suffering. Like a lion the disease falls upon him to crush his bones, and anew it seems as if between day and night his life must end (ver. 13). Mortally sick, he can only utter weak murmurs and groans, like the complaining sounds of the swallow, the crane, the dove. Yet his languishing eyes look upwards; he has great anguish, but he is able still to call on the LORD to be surety for him (ver. 14).

2. I said——of the world.—Vers. 10, 11. אֲנִי before אָמַרְתִּי, beginning ver. 10, seems to stand in antithesis to וְאָמַר, ver. 15. I thought; the poet would say, that all was up; but the LORD thought otherwise. אמר stands for what one says, i. e., thinks inwardly to himself (comp. Gen. xxvi. 9; xliv. 28; 1 Sam. xx. 3, etc.).

The expression gates of Hades occurs only here: comp. Ps. ix. 14; cvii. 18; Job xxxviii. By the rest of my days Hezekiah means, of course, the extent of life he hoped for according to the natural conditions of life. It is the same as is expressed in "the half of my days" (Ps. cii. 25; Jer. xvii. 11). Having mentioned the evil that was in prospect (10 a), and named the good in a general way of which he was to be deprived (10 b), Hezekiah proceeds in ver. 11 to specify the particulars of this good. He puts first that he shall no more see JAH, namely, JAH in the land of the living. But can one any way see JAH? With the bodily eye, certainly not, and least of all in the land of the living. But to see Jehovah means nothing else than to observe and enjoy the traces of His being and essence. For "to see" stands here, as often, in the wider sense of perception of the senses generally (comp. Ps. xxxvii. 13; xxxiv. 13; Jer. xxix. 32; Eccl. iii. 13; ix. 9, etc.). [It is both more obvious and more edifying, and more to the honor of Hezekiah, to explain this seeing Jehovah by a reference to Psalm lxiii., especially vers. 2, 6; coll. ver. 20 of the text. The whole Psalm mutat. mutand. may be taken as the amplification of our ver. 11 a; or, vice versa, 11 a may be taken as Hezekiah's epitome of Ps. lxiii., which may have been his solace in the languishing night-watches. It is strong confirmation of this explanation of "the seeing," that Isaiah communicates to Hezekiah his near recovery by promising that in three days he shall enjoy what he here represents as the prime blessing of life: "the third day thou shalt go up unto the house of the LORD" (2 Kings xx. 5). The promise may be completed in the words of Psalm lxiii. 2: "to see (לראות) Jehovah's power and glory, as thou hast seen Him in the sanctuary." According to the exposition that follows, "the third day" might be from the beginning of the disease.—TR.]

The clause in the land of the living is a limitation and nearer definition. Not that he means that Jehovah is not to be observed in the land of the dead, and as if that land lay outside of Jehovah's power and dominion. How contrary to Old Testament Scripture that sentiment would be appears from Amos ix. 2; Job xxvi. 6; Psalm cxxxix. 8: Prov. xv. 11. Hence the poet defines his meaning: "I thought never more to see the JAH who reveals Himself in the land of the living." This is the first and greatest good that the deceased loses. But he loses also the companionship of men. And this, again, is not to be understood absolutely, but relatively. For in Hades the dead person is with other dead men. But they are even no right and proper men any more, but only shades. Comp. NAEGELSBACH: Homer Theol. VII. § 25, p. 398 sqq.; Die nachhomer. Theol. des griech. Volksglaubens VII. § 25, p. 413 sqq. (see Text. and Gram.).

3. Mine age——for me.—Vers. 12-14. The king depicts in these verses, by a succession of images, the progress of his sickness to its culmination, then the turn brought about by his believing prayer. דורי means "my dwelling" and not "mine age" (see Text. and Gram.). By this Hezekiah evidently means his body (comp. 2 Cor. v. 1, 4; 2 Pet. i. 13, 14). Though in the body still, he contemplates the separation of body and soul as already accomplished. Comparing the body to a shepherd's tent, which after a while is struck, so his tent he regards as already struck and removed. The next image is drawn from the weaver (see Text. and Gram.). I understand the words thus: I sit at the loom and roll up my life continuously on the weaver's beam; He cuts me off from the thrum (דלה, i. e., the ends of the threads attached to the beam). The LORD, by His cutting off, interrupts the labor of Hezekiah, who is, so to speak, weaving his life. "From day to night thou finishest me." This seems to depict the feeling of the poet at the close of his first day of suffering. Such was the rapid progress of the disease that it seemed about to do its work in one day. By evening, indeed, he was not dead, but only by the greatest effort the patient wards off despair. "I composed myself to the morning" (on שויתי see Text. and Gram.). On the following day the torments of the disease continue. He feels its power like that of a lion that crunches the bones of its prey (comp. Prov. xxv. 15, where is a different sense). A second time he thinks the evening will end his sufferings, and awaits the issue with murmurings and groanings comparable to the querulous notes of the swallow, crane and dove.

The second clause of ver. 14 forms the turning point. With painful longing, under severe oppression, the poet lifts his eyes to the LORD. His prayer is only a short one. He regards himself as a debtor hard pressed by his creditor, and prays the LORD to be surety for him. ערבני is, moreover, a literal quotation from Job xvii. 3. Hezekiah thinks of suffering Job, and concludes a similar event with the same appeal.

γ) THE DELIVERANCE. CHAPTER XXXVIII. 15-22.

15 What shall I say?
He hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it:
I shall [a]go softly all my years
[b]In the bitterness of my soul.
16 O LORD, by these things men live,
[c]And in all these things is the life of my spirit:
So wilt thou recover me, and make me to live.
17 [d]Behold, [e]for peace I had great bitterness:
But [f]thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of [g]corruption:

For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back.
18 For the grave cannot praise thee,
Death can not celebrate thee:
They [f]that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth.
19 The living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day:
The father to the children shall make known thy truth.
20 The LORD [g]was ready to save me:
Therefore [h]we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments
All the days of our life in the house of the LORD.
21 For Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaister upon 22 the boil, and he shall recover. Hezekiah also had said, What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the LORD?

[1] Or, on my peace came great bitterness. [2] Heb. thou hast loved my soul from the pit.

[a] walk solemnly. [b] For. [c] And to the full life of my spirit strengthen me thereby and let me live.
[d] Behold for peace bitterness inured to me. [e] destruction, or nothingness.
[f] that are gone down. [g] is present. [h] we will touch the stringed instruments.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15. The Hiph. הִדַּדָּה (denoting the solemn walk of those visiting the temple), occurs again only Ps. xlii. 5. To take it as meaning the walk of life seems to me unwarranted in view of that passage, and in the entire absence of any supporting passage. The same may be said of taking עַל here, as in other passages after verbs or nouns denoting cumulation (xxxviii. 5; xxxii. 10; Lev. xv. 25), in the sense of "according to." Nor may we take עַל = "spite of," which it never means. It is here simply causal.

Ver. 16. The suffix in עֲלֵיהֶם can only refer to the two notions אמר ועשׂה. The plur. masc., need not surprise: comp. Ezek. xviii. 26; xxxiii. 18, 19.——עַל joined to חָיָה denotes the ground or cause of life; and it is to be noted that a Hebrew regards as the basis of life what we regard as the means of living. Hence that from which one lives in the usual sense, i. e., his support, is joined with עַל (Gen. xxvii. 40; Deut. viii. 3). Much more הָיָה may stand with עַל when the absolute foundation of life is to be designated. The plural יחיו has for subject the living generally, for which we may use "one."——Among the many explanations, more or less forced, of the following clause, the most admissible seems to be that of GESENIUS, afterwards amplified by DRECHSLER. It takes all from ולכל to החייני as one clause, and thus has the double advantage of obtaining for ולכל a suitable reference and for the verbs at the close a suitable connection. "And to the totality, i. e., the completeness, full power of the life of my spirit mayest thou by the same both strengthen and make me live." בָּהֵן refers to אמר ועשׂה ver. 15. The change of gender is common in Hebrew. The insertion of בהן between כל and חיי corresponds to the frequent insertion of עוד after כל, a form of expression that occurs once in Hos. xiv. 3 in reference to נָשָׂא, and in Isaiah even xl. 12 in reference to בַּשָּׁלִשׁ. חָלַם with that meaning that alone suits here occurs only in this Hiph. and again in Kal, Job xxxix. 4. The meaning of Kal is "pinguis, fortis fuit;" thus Hiph. would mean "to make fat, strong, healthy." Instead of החייני the VULG. and TALMUD seem to have read תחייני. One Codex reads thus, and many expositors adopt it. In fact there is no alternative but either to read תְּחַיֵּנִי [LOWTH], or to take וְ before תחלימני in that demonstrative retrospective sense in which we had it xxxvii. 26; xvii. 14; ix. 4, and which, in fact, occurs generally in clauses that are expanded either extensively or intensively. Comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 10; Prov. xxiii. 24; Num. xxiii. 3; Isa. lvi. 6 sqq. According to this the וְ would refer to the remote וּלְכֹל. But והחייני would denote emphatically the chief result contemplated by the poet. Hezekiah was convalescent when he composed this song. He could therefore wish that he might be restored to the full power of his spirit. But if, instead of this imperative, one reads תחייני, then the double Vav before the verbs = et—et, as in ver. 15. The sense remains essentially the same.

Ver. 17. לשלום is not = בשלום. But the meaning is "for peace, for good it was bitter to me." It is not to be objected to this that then היה ought not to be wanting, for, apart from its absence being quite normal here (comp. ver. 20), מַר may itself be regarded as a verb ["preterite Kal of מור, not elsewhere used, though the Hiph. is of frequent occurrence."—J. A. ALEX.]. (Comp. xxiv. 9; Job xxii. 2; Ruth i. 20). But it is more likely that מר is adjective used as noun as in Ruth i. 13; Lam. i. 4. Comp. עָשְׁקָה לִּי, ver. 14.——According to our construction of לשלום we must regard ואתה חשקת a causal clause expressive of the situation.——חָשַׁק = "to be lovingly attached" (Deut. vii. 7; x. 15, etc.); but while elsewhere construed with בְּ, it is here (comp. נַגֵּן ver. 20, with the accusat. though elsewhere always with בְּ) joined with the accusat. of the object, and beside this with מִן to designate the terminus a quo of the way of deliverance (construct. prægnans) [coll. Heb. v. 7, καὶ εἰσακουσθεὶς ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας.—TR.].——The combination שחת בלי "the pit of destruction," occurs only here; even the substantive use of בלי does not occur elsewhere.

Ver. 18. לא before שׁאול ת׳, by a familiar usage, (xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. ii. 3, etc.) extends to the following clause.——The יורדי בור (comp. xiv. 19; Ps. xxviii. 1; lxxxviii. 5, etc.) are not those going down, but those gone down. For in Hebrew the Participle is in itself devoid of tense signification, which must be ascertained from the nature of what is affirmed or from the context. Here the hopelessness is during the endless stay in Hades.

Ver. 19. הודיע with אל arises from the direct causative use of this Hiph. For הודיע = "to make, prepare דַּעַת, knowing, knowledge." Accordingly he for whom the knowledge is prepared, i. e., to whom it is imparted must be in the dative. The object of knowledge is designated by אֶל in accordance with the frequent use of this preposition with verbis decendi (comp. Gen. xx. 2; 1 Sam. iv. 19; 2 Kings xix. 9, etc.).

Ver. 20. In יהוה להושיעני we are to supply הָיָה (comp. ver. 17; xxi. 1; xxxvii. 26). We must not translate: "Jehovah was there to save me," for Hezekiah certainly did not feel the saving hand of God as something that withdrew after accomplishing its work. He felt it as something still present. He still needed it, as appears from ver. 16. This is precisely the sense of this periphrastic construction, that it does not represent the verbal notion simply, but with the additional notion of continued occupation with something.——נִגֵּן is pulsare, and is used of playing stringed instruments (1 Sam. xvi. 16, 23, etc.). Hence נְגִינוֹת is to be understood of instrumentum pulsatile, (not cantus), as in the superscriptions of many Psalms: iv., vi., liv., etc.; Hab. iii. 19.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In this second part of his song Hezekiah expresses his gratitude to the LORD. "What shall I say?" he begins, as if he could not find the proper word to express in a suitable manner what he had been permitted to experience. In two brief words, he first expresses comprehensively what he has to say. "He promised it, and has also done it!" But I, as long as I live, will walk before the LORD, in gratitude for His imparting to me by means of bitter suffering so much joy (ver. 15). Such is, as it were, the theme. In what follows the details are amplified. First, the king expresses the great truth that God's word and act are the foundation of life for all, and adds the petition that God would by word and act, also fully restore him to life (ver. 16). This petition forms the transition to further thanksgiving. The poet acknowledges that his suffering had inured to his salvation: the LORD had precisely in the depth of suffering made him to know the height of His love. But how could such salvation accrue to the sinner? Because the LORD graciously forgave his debt (ver. 17). But also because it is in a measure important to the LORD Himself to preserve man alive. For in Hades there is no thanksgiving to God nor any more trusting in Him (ver. 18). Only the living can do this, and that both for themselves, and by handing down the praise of the divine faithfulness to their posterity (ver. 19). Because he knows the LORD to be near as his redeemer and Saviour, he will, in the church and in the house of the LORD, let his song sound as long as he lives (ver. 20). Verses 21, 22, which are here out of place, were explained above at ver. 6.

2. What shall I say——my soul.—Ver. 15. The sentiment is, that there is properly an infinite amount to say. What shall the poet select from mass of material. One may compare 2 Sam. vii. 20. Hezekiah resolves to make two things prominent: 1) that the LORD was as good as His word. 2) that he, for his part, will give solemn thanksgiving as long as he lives. The construction ואמר והוא ע׳ must not be taken as giving a reason. The antithesis of "saying" and "doing" reveals that we have here two correlative members, and that וְ before אמר does not point backward, but forward. The וְ—וְ is here simply =et-et. In the second number הוּא "idem" is added for emphasis. For the "truth" that is so lauded vers. 18, 19 only exists when the performer is identical with the promiser (comp. Num. xxiii. 19). Therefore אמר "He hath said" refers back to ver. 5, and stands in an emphatic sense, as in general the notion אמר is capable of various emphasis (comp. 2 Chr. xxxii. 24). The second clause of the verse expresses in brief the thanks that Hezekiah means to pay. He promises zealous Jehovah-worship (on אדדה see Text. and Gram.), as proof of his thanks for the misfortune sent him that had become the source of so much good fortune to him, as he expressly confesses ver. 17. The thought recalls xii. 2, where the Prophet thanks Jehovah for being angry at him.

3. O LORD——to live.—Ver. 16. These words contain a nearer definition of "he said and he did," ver. 15, from which is seen that the poet attaches great importance to this thought. By the words עליהם יחיו he first utters the general sentence, that all life rests on God's word and deed (DRECHSLER appropriately refers to the creative word and act Gen. i.). The following clause applies this universal truth to the poet himself. (See Text. and Gram.).

4. Behold, for peace —— thy truth.—Vers. 17–19. In these verses the poet gives in brief outline the story of his suffering and the deliverance from it. The bitter distress of death serves him as a foil that lets the light of the deliverance shine all the brighter. He praises the miraculous power of God that has brought it about that precisely what was bitter accrued to his salvation. Therefore he repeats emphatically מר "bitterness" (comp. חי חי ver. 19; xxiv. 16; xxvii. 5). This gracious deliverance comes from the LORD's no more remembering the poet's sins (Ps. xc. 8), and casting them behind Him (Ps. li. 11; Mic. vii. 19).

In vers. 18, 19 Jehovah's deliverance is explained from another side. It is shown that the LORD Himself has an interest in preserving Hezekiah alive. The Sheol (metonomy: the total for the individuals that constitute it) does not praise the LORD; death (also metonomy) does not celebrate Him: those that have gone down into the pit hope not in His faithfulness. We have here quite the Old Testament representation of the condition of the dead as something that excludes all free and conscious action. Thus in Ps. vi. 6 (5). "For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" Bring together also in one conspectus the expressions Ps. lxxxviii. 11–13; xxx. 10; Eccl. ix. 5, 6 and comp. Job xiv. 10 sqq.; Ps. cxv. 17. One sees that the spiritual activity of the dead was looked upon as paralyzed by the shades of death. They cannot hope, etc. points to the future as what precedes does to the past. The dead have as little remembrance of the benefits received from God in life, as they have hope in the faithfulness of God that rules over them and promises a better future. ["The true explanation of the words is given by CALVIN, viz., that the language is that of extreme agitation and distress, in which the prospect of the future is absorbed in contemplation of the present, and also that, so far as he does think of futurity, it is upon the supposition of God's wrath. Regarding death, in this case, as a proof of the divine displeasure, he cannot but look upon it as the termination of his solemn praises." —J. A. ALEX.].

With jubilant emotions, Hezekiah feels that he again belongs to the living, hence the repetition of חַי who lives, who lives, he praises, etc., and the joyous כַּיּוֹם חַיִּים as I this day, in which appears how much the contrast between the mournful yesterday, and the blessed to-day moves the heart of the poet. The words father to the children, etc., have a peculiar significance in Hezekiah's mouth. His successor Manasseh, according to 2 Kings xxi. 1, ascended the throne at twelve years of age. Consequently he cannot have been born at this time. Indeed, since it was customary for the eldest son to succeed, it is very probable that at that time Hezekiah had no son at all, which seems to be confirmed by יֵצְאוּ וגו׳, xxxix. 7. Considered from this point of view our words appear prophetic. Yet, when one reflects what sort of a son Manasseh was, it would almost seem to have been better had Hezekiah done nothing to avert the sentence of death ver. 1.

5. The LORD——house of the LORD.—Ver. 20. Concluding verse, containing once again the chief thought, and a summons to continual praise of Jehovah. "Jehovah is present to save me," see Text. and Gram. So will we touch my stringed instruments, ibid. The song accompanying the stringed instrument is not excluded, though the latter alone is mentioned. The plural has been urged as favoring the meaning "song." But could not the musical King Hezekiah understand various sorts of playing on stringed instruments? Or, if not this, may not the plural be that of the general notion? Some suppose, that by the plural נְנַגֵּן "we will touch," Hezekiah sets himself as the chorus-leader of his family. But one must not forget the Levitical musicians that he himself had instituted for the service of God's house (2 Chr. xxix. 30). Corresponding to the אֹדְּה ver. 15, Hezekiah thinks here not of private divine service, but of the worship of Jehovah in the temple. The preposition עַל is surprising. Perhaps one may compare Hos. xi. 11. Perhaps, too, the preposition has reference to the elevated way which, according to 2 Kings xvi. 18, led the king into the temple, and afforded him an elevated place from which he saw the greater part of the house beneath him. Moreover it is to be remarked, that tarrying in the house of the LORD has a prominent place in many Psalms: xv. 1; xxiii. 6; xlii. 5; xliii. 4; lxxxiv. 2 sqq. 11, etc.

2. THE BABYLONISH EMBASSY.

CHAPTER XXXIX. 1-8.

1 AT that time Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present to Hezekiah: for he had heard that he had been sick, and was 2 recovered. And Hezekiah was glad of them, and showed them the house of his [1]precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his [2][3]armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah showed them not.
3 Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, 4 They are come from a far country unto me, even from Babylon. Then said he,
What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All that is in 5 mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not 6 shewed them. Then said Isaiah to Hezekiah, Hear the word of the LORD of hosts:
Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried to Babylon: nothing shall be 7 left, saith the LORD. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be [4]eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon. Then said Hezekiah to Isaiah, Good is the word of the LORD which 8 thou hast spoken. He said moreover, For there shall be peace and truth in my days.

[1] Or, spicery. [2] Or, jewels. [3] Heb. vessels or, instruments.
[4] chamberlain.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

On ver. 1. The text of 2 Kings xx. 12 sqq., reads בְּרֹאדַךְ בַּלְאֲדָן instead of מְרֹאדַךְ. According to the monuments the reading of Isaiah appears to be decidedly the correct one. For the name in Assyrian is "Marduk-habal-iddina," i. e. Merodach gave a (or the) son (SCHRADER, p. 213). The form בראדך seems to have sprung from the attraction of sound of the three following words, which begin with ב. What has been said shows that Merodach-Baladan does not mean "Merodacus Baladani filius," as our text and 2 Kings seem to understand it. [This imputed misunderstanding seems quite gratuitous in the Author.—TR.]. We have here, also, an evidence of a later writer who was indifferently acquainted with the subject.——On ספרים comp. on xxxvii. 14.——Our text differs from 2 Kings xx. 12, in reading וַיִּשְׁמַע and וַיֶּחֱזַק. Both seem to me traceable to correction. The editor of the text in Isaiah might take offence at the double כִּי, and thus have replaced the first by וְ. But he also stumbled at its only being said 2 Kings: "he had heard that Hezekiah was sick." For it seemed to him that the wonderful recovery of Hezekiah, and the proof it gave of his being a ruler under the protection of a mighty god, had as much to do with the Babylonian's sending an embassy.

On ver. 2. Here, too, the two texts differ. The וַיִּשְׁמַע of 2 Kings xx. 13, is the more difficult reading, compared with which וַיִּשְׂמַח appears an emendation: being the easier and more natural reading.

On ver. 3. At the end of the verse our text has אֵלַי after בָּאוּ, which is wanting in 2 Kings xx. 14.

On ver. 5. Our text has צְבָאוֹת at the end, which is wanting 2 Kings xx. 16. It may be here the same as in the case of chap. xxxvii. 32, compared with 2 Kings xix. 31.

On ver. 6. Our text has בָּבֶל, 2 Kings xx. 17, בָּבֶלָה.

On ver. 7. Our text has יִקָּחוּ; 2 Kings xx. 18 only K'ri has this reading, whereas K'thibh reads יִקַּח. Certainly the latter is the more difficult, and יִקָּחוּ appears as an emendation. The sing. may be taken either as the predicate of an indefinite subject (one) or, more correctly, as seems to me, as predicate of a definite subject, which, however, is present only in idea, viz.: the king of Babylon.

On ver. 8. 2 Kings xx. 19 has הֲלוֹא אִם where our text has simply כִּי. הֲלוֹא אִם does not occur elsewhere. EWALD (§ 324 b), takes it in the sense of "yea, if only." But that is neither grammatically justified, nor does it give a clear meaning. According to my view of the context (see Exeg. and Crit. below) הֲלוֹא = nonne. I, therefore, take אִם not as a particle expressive of desire, as many do, but it has its conditional meaning, = "if, in so far as." The כִּי in the text of Isaiah has essentially the same meaning, as DELITZSCH also has admitted. For it says, that between the sentiments that Hezekiah had betrayed in reference to the ambassadors and his affirmation "good is the word," etc., there was no contradiction, because, in fact, while he lived peace and fidelity would certainly be undisturbed. At least, our text can be so understood. Whether its author really meant this, is another question. For it were possible, too, that he substituted for the obscure הֲלוֹא אִם the general, indefinite כִּי perhaps only in its pleonastic sense, that introduces the oratio recta.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As the text needs no special comment, it may be well for the better understanding of the circumstances involved, to present briefly the chief points of Babylonian history relating to them, according to the data of the Assyrian monuments as far as the latter have been deciphered. Our chapter speaks of two Baladans, viz.: Merodach-Baladan, who sent the embassy and Baladan his father. Yet there appears in this a misunderstanding. According to the Assyrian monuments (comp. LENORMANT, les premieres civilizations, Paris, 1874, Tom. II., in the essay "un patriote babylonien," p. 210) our Merodach-Baladan was a son of Jakin. Comp. also the ostentatious inscription of Tiglath-Pileser mentioned above at xxi. 1, which states that he received the homage of "Merodach-Baladan, son of Jakin, king of the sea, in the city of Sapiga." We remarked above at xxi. 1, that by tihamtu (תְּהוֹם, "sea, sea-land") is to be understood south Chaldea, the watery region at the mouth of the united rivers Tigris and Euphrates. Merodach-Baladan, when he did homage to Tiglath-Pileser, was king of Bit-Jakin (such was the name of the residence and of the small territory of his father), and so remained till the year 721. In the year 721, when Sargon ascended the throne, this energetic man, who was an enthusiast for the independence of Babylon, succeeded in mounting the throne of all Chaldea in Babylon. The canon of Ptolemy names Mardocempad, under this year as king of Babylon, a name that is universally regarded as identical with Merodach-Baladan. Sargon states, that in the first complete year of his reign (i. e., in the year 721), after having in the year 722 completed the conquest of Samaria, he marched against Merodach-Baladan. But his undertaking was not successful. For Merodach-Baladan maintained himself, and reigned, according to the Canon, yet twelve years as acknowledged king of Babylon. Not till the year 710 did Sargon again take the field against him. The struggle extended into the year 709, ending in the dethronement of Merodach-Baladan (see the interesting description of this campaign in LENORMANT, l. c. p. 243 sqq.). In this year Sargon himself mounted the throne of Babylon. The Canon, from the year 709 onwards, names 'Αρκέανος, i. e, Sarrukin or Sargon, as king of Babylon. But the courage of Merodach-Baladan was not yet broken. He fled back into his own hereditary land Bit-Jakin, a narrow strip of land on the Persian gulf, extending from Schat-el-arab to Elam. Sargon marched against him again and stormed first the strongly fortified position where Merodach-Baladan awaited him, then the city Dur-Jakin, his opponent's last refuge on the mainland. Merodach-Baladan escaped with great difficulty. But still he did not submit. Sargon was compelled, in the beginning of the year 705, to send his son Sennacherib against the obstinate rebel. But not long after, Sennacherib received in camp the intelligence of the murder of his father by a certain Belkaspai, probably a patriotic Chaldean and adherent of Merodach-Baladan's.

Then there followed a period of two or three years, filled up with the strifes of various pretenders to the crown, and hence designated by the Canon as καιρὸς ἀβασίλευτος. Thus it appears by the account of POLYHISTOR in EUSEBIUS (chron. armen. ed. MAI, p. 19), that after Sargon's death, his son and a brother of Sennacherib ascended the Babylonian throne. But after a short term this one was obliged to give place to a certain Hagisa, who, after not thirty days' reign, was killed by Merodach-Baladan. That this was our Merodach-Baladan can scarcely be doubted. The implacable enemy of the Assyrians boldly raised his head anew. Sennacherib marched against him and conquered him at Kis, a city that Nebuchadnezzar afterwards incorporated in the city territory of Babylon by means of his great wall. Sennacherib gave the throne of Babylon to a certain Belibus or Elibus, the son of a "wise man," whom, says the king, "they had brought up in the company of the small boys in my palace." Hence this Belibus was not an independent pretender, as would seem according to POLYHISTOR, but a subordinate king recognized by Sennacherib after the expulsion of Merodach-Baladan. According to the Canon of regents (SCHRADER, p. 319), this expedition against Merodach-Baladan fell in the year 704 B. C. In the year 700 Sennacherib accomplished his unfortunate expedition against Judah and Egypt, according to the entirely credible testimony of the Assyrian monuments. The news of his defeat appears to have been the signal for a new insurrection to the Chaldean patriots. For in the following year (699), according to the Taylor-cylinder (SCHRADER, p. 224), we find Sennacherib on the march against the rebellious Babylonians. Merodach-Baladan had allied himself with a young prince Suzub, son of Gatul, of the race of Kalban, and Belibus found it best to enter into negotiations with these opponents. For this, according to BEROSUS, he was deposed and carried prisoner to Assyria. Sennacherib first attacked Suzub, whose troops were defeated; he himself escaped. Then Sennacherib turned against Merodach-Baladan, who gave way before the threatening danger. He fled by ship to the city Nagit-Raggi, situated on an island in the Persian gulf. The territory of Bit-Jakin was desolated. Sennacherib made his son Esar-Haddon king of Akkad and Sumir, i. e., Babylon (699). After that were eleven years of quiet. During this period, Merodach-Baladan, whom the king of Elam, Kudhir-Nakhunta, had made lord of a strip of the coast, had moved the discontented elements of Babylon and Chaldea to emigrate in mass into his land. This led Sennacherib to build a fleet in Nineveh (they were called "Syrian ships" because Phœnician seamen manned them), with which he attacked the island and the coast possessed by Merodach-Baladan, and entirely devastated them (see the remarks on xliii. 14). At this point Merodach-Baladan disappears from history. It is related that the influential Babylonians then forsook him. On the other hand, they moved the king of Elam to send that Suzub to Babylon. Suzub, indeed, ascended the throne of Babylon. Their purpose was to cut Sennacherib from his own land. But the latter returned in time and defeated his opponents in two battles. He took Suzub prisoner, but spared his life. This happened in the year 687. But in the following year Suzub escaped from prison, was again proclaimed king in Babylon, and, in alliance with Umman-Menan, king of Elam, the successor of Kudhir-Nakhunta, and with Nabusumiskim, the eldest son of Merodach-Baladan, he opposed a considerable army to Sennacherib at Kalul on the Tigris. Sennacherib conquered again, and still again in another battle, by which he utterly destroyed the power of his opponents. He then resolved utterly to destroy Babylon: and this resolve was actually executed (685). Yet only four years after, the city was rebuilt. Sennacherib died 681, and his son and successor determined to put an end to the everlasting strife with the Babylonians by an opposite policy. He raised Babylon to equal rank with Nineveh, and made it his residence.

The eldest son of Merodach-Baladan, Nabusumiskun, was taken prisoner at the battle of Kalul and beheaded by Sennacherib. His brother next of age to him, Nabozirnapsatiasir, reigned after him in the land Bit-Jakin. A third brother, Nahib-Marduk, submitted to the Assyrians on the condition that he be put in possession of the land Bit-Jakin. Esar-Haddon, in the year 676, actually invaded the land and conquered it. Probably Nabozirnapsatiasir then lost his life (LENORMANT, l. c., p. 303). Nahir-Marduk's son, Nabobelsum, returned to the sentiments of his grandfather. He took part in the insurrection made by Samulsumukin, the second son of Esar-Haddon and viceroy of Babylon, against his elder brother Asurbanipal, great king of Assyria (651). Asurbanipal conquered. Samulsumukin burned himself in his palace in Babylon (648). After many negotiations, and finally after an expedition that devastated the whole land of Elam, the king of Elam, Ummanaldas, was obliged to promise that he would surrender Nabobelsum. The latter procured his death at the hands of a master of the horse. Asurbanipal, when the head of the corpse was sent to him, had it preserved in salt. A small bas-relief, found in the palace of Kujundschik, displays Asurbanipal banqueting in a garden with his wives, and the head of Nabobelsum hanging before him on a tree. Only thirty-five years later Nineveh was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares (605)!

According to our chapter, the embassy of Merodach-Baladan to Hezekiah fell in the time when the former reigned undisputed king of Babylon. As shown above, this was a period of twelve years, reaching from 721-709. It must not be supposed that Merodach-Baladan would not have sought the friendship of Hezekiah had he not heard of his victory over Sennacherib. An inscription of Sargon's (LENORMANT, l. c., 231) says of Merodach-Baladan: "For twelve years had he sent embassies contrary to the will of the gods of Babylon, the city of Bel, the judge of the gods." These twelve years are manifestly the twelve years of Merodach-Baladan's undisputed reign. During this period the latter had sought allies for the event of war breaking out again. Is it to be wondered if, under these circumstances, he should send such an embassy to Hezekiah? According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 31, the messenger came from Babylon to Hezekiah "to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land." The context shows that Hezekiah's miraculous recovery and the miracle of the sun-dial are meant. It is, therefore, probable that the report of this miracle penetrated to distant lands. If it came to astrological Babylon, what wonder if the king of this city had his attention drawn to the king of Judea, especially as it was known of this people that more than once they had been an opponent or an ally of the Assyrians that was not to be despised.

2. At that time——shewed them not.—Vers. 1, 2. The author would say that Hezekiah gave ear to the words of those ambassadors (see Text. and Gram.). Probably there is in this an intimation that they already made propositions of a political nature not displeasing to Hezekiah. And as he was pleased to hear what they said, so he wished them to see the things that gave him joy. There appears to me, therefore, in this antithesis of hearing and showing, to be a hint of Hezekiah's sin. נכת is an obscure word both as to derivation and meaning. In Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 11 נְכֹאת either means spices in general, or, which is more likely, a particular sort of spice (storax—or tragacanth gum. Comp. LEYRER in HERZOG'S Real-Eycyclop. XIV. p. 664). Many expositors are disposed to recognize in our נכתה (K'ri, 2 Kings xx. 13, נכתו) the same word, and to understand by בית נ׳ a spice magazine; on which LEYRER, l. c., remarks that this would imply a great monopoly carried on by the kings of Judah in this particular. Others generalize the meaning and regard "spicery house" as a denominatio a potiori for "provision house" in general. Others, finally, derive נְכוֹת, not from נָכָא ("to beat, pound," hence נכאת, "that which is pounded in a mortar"), but from a root כות, not used in Hebrew, but which is kindred to כּוּס, "to gather, preserve," and in Arabic means (Pi. kajjata) "to cram, stuff full." Of this נכת would be a Niphal form (xxx. 12), and mean "provision, treasure." Thus HITZIG, KNOBEL, FUERST (Lex. under כוס and כות), DELITZSCH (comp. EWALD, Gesch. d. V. Isr. III. p. 690, Anm. 1). The items that follow, in which, beside gold, silver and spiceries (בשמים, the most general expression for aromatic substances, comp. LEYRER, l. c., p. 661) are particularly named, of course correspond best with a word of such general significance as "provision." Still the subject is not satisfactorily cleared up. On "the precious ointment," MOVERS (who translates בית נכת "styrax house") makes the following remark: "Here Jewish expositors, no doubt on the best grounds, understand the balsam oil got from the royal gardens, comp. 2 Chron. xxxii. 27. Olive oil, that was obtained in all Judea, was not stored in the treasuries along with gold, silver and aromatics, but in special store-houses, 2 Chron. xxxii. 28" (Phön. II. 3, p. 227 Anm.). בית כלים is likely "the arsenal," as כלים often signifies all sorts of war implements, and the arsenal doubtless was of prime importance to those ambassadors. In this case כלים is identical with the בית היער of xxii. 8. It appears that Hezekiah in this display observed a climax descendens, beginning with the precious articles of luxury and ending with the things of practical need. אוצרות (probably the store-houses like e. g. Joel i. 17; 2 Chron. xi., etc.) to contain stores in case of siege. It is to be noted that had this embassy come after the overthrow of Sennacherib, Hezekiah would verily have had nothing to show "in his dominion" outside of Jerusalem. For the whole land outside of the capital had been in the power of the enemy, who would have left little worth seeing. "His store-house, the spiceries, the fine oil," do not intimate specially war booty. Moreover it would then need to read: Hezekiah showed them the spoil he had taken from the Assyrians. Comp. on ver. 6.

3. Then came Isaiah —— my days.—Vers. 3–8. Apart from the internal probability of it, one may conclude from ויבא that Isaiah came to the king with the inquiry of ver. 3 while the ambassadors were still in Jerusalem. For this Imperfect can only have the meaning that the coming was in a certain sense still an incompleted transaction, although the king had then shown them every thing (ver. 4). The Prophet regarded them as advenas, arrivals, and that is a quality they have as long as they are in Jerusalem (comp. xxxvii. 34 with 2 Kings xix. 33; Josh. ix. 8 with Gen. xlii. 7). But it also seems very probable to me that the Prophet addressed his inquiries to the king in the presence of the ambassadors, and that "these men" is to be understood δεικτικῶς. This suits entirely the free and exalted position that the prophets assumed as the immediate messengers and instruments of Jehovah, even toward the kings themselves. Comp. on vii. 14. If thereby those ambassadors enjoyed the opportunity of observing for once a genuine prophet of the true God in the exercise of his office, and if thereby the true God Himself drew near to them, it was one of those revelations of His being such as the LORD at times vouchsafed to the heathen, e. g., Moses before Pharaoh, Balaam before Balak, Elisha before Naaman, Daniel before the kings of Babylon. To the question what said these men? Hezekiah gives no answer, and Isaiah presses it no further. Their very presence there and the reception they found were adequate proof that Hezekiah allowed himself to treat with them, that once again, as he had done by the Egyptian alliance (xxvii.–xxxii.), he had extended to the world-power at least the little finger. That, in his answer, he lays stress on the far country, betrays an attempt to excuse himself. One cannot show men the door who come from a distance to show one honor and friendship. And Hezekiah ought not to do that. Neither ought he to indulge in vain boasting nor to seek false supports. O, had he only known how ill-timed both were in the case of Babylon! He would surely, without violating the duties of hospitality, have yet avoided with anxious care every approach to more intimate relations. That he adds the name Babylon so briefly to the preceding "they are come from a far country unto me" seems to betray a certain embarrassment, a presentiment

We stand here on a boundary of immeasurable importance. Assyria is done away, but Babylon rises aloft. Ahaz had formally introduced Assyria by seeking its help. Here Babylon offers itself. With cat-like friendliness it creeps up. Hezekiah ought to have maintained an attitude of polite refusal. His vanity betrayed him into boasting and coquetting. Still by just this he yielded himself to the world-power. The Theocracy was later, under Zedekiah, ground to pieces between Egypt and Babylon. Only by leaning solely and wholly on the Lord could it maintain itself between the southern and the northern world-power, between the Nile kingdom on the one hand, and the Euphrates-Tigris kingdom on the other. Hezekiah had unfortunately indulged in intimacies both with Egypt and with Babylon. The necessary consequence was that the Theocracy succumbed to the mightier of these. Hence it is announced to him that the precious things, of which he had made a boastful display, must go to Babylon, yea, that the posterity that was to issue from him who as yet was childless, would once do chamberlain service in the palace of the kings of Babylon. With this the Prophet points to a new and fatal future. Here, between the first and second parts of Isaiah, we stand on the bridge between Nineveh and Babylon. For what Nineveh was for the first part of Isaiah, Babylon is for the second.

Let it be particularly noted that Isaiah says: that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day (ver. 6). Had Hezekiah's treasures been emptied by the event narrated 2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq., the Prophet could not have spoken so. For then what the fathers had gathered came into the hands of Sennacherib; and whether, after the defeat of the latter, all was found again, one must doubt very much. Sennacherib, who knew that he would not be pursued, could take all the spoils with him. Therefore the expression: "what thy fathers have laid up shall be carried captive to Babylon" favors the view that Hezekiah showed the ambassadors the gatherings of his fathers, that therefore this embassy did not come after the defeat of Sennacherib. [If the foregoing has any force, it would equally prove that the Babylonish captivity must have preceded the invasion of Sennacherib, "for then, after the latter event, what the fathers had gathered came into the hands of Sennacherib," etc., as just above. —Tr.]

That סָרִיס is not simply the "eunuch" appears from Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1. The word often stands for court officer, chamberlain generally (1 Ki. xxii. 9; 2 Ki. viii. 6; ix. 32; xxv. 19, etc.). It is clear that בנין must not be understood of direct generation, and that is agreeable to usage. Hezekiah's son Manasseh went, indeed, as prisoner to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11), but he did not act as chamberlain. Yet the prophecy was fulfilled by what is related Dan. i. 3.

Hezekiah humbly submits himself to the declaration of the Lord. The expression Good is the word, etc. involves in general the sense of approval and acquiescence (comp. 1 Kings xviii. 24), especially that of submission under a severe judgment, but one that is recognized as just (comp. 1 Kings ii. 38, 42). For the meaning of כִּי (הלֹא אם, 2 Kings xx. 19), see Text. and Gram. I fall back on the conjecture given above, that the ambassadors were present at this interview. If one then considers that the prophecy of vers. 6, 7 presupposes war between Babylon and Judah, and that this poorly corresponds with the assurances of friendship just interchanged between Hezekiah and the ambassadors, he can see that the word of the Prophet would embarrass these parties. It would the king, because it must seem strange that he, at the moment when an honorable embassy had brought him offers of peace and friendship, should call the announcement of the termination of the friendship (though it should turn to his disadvantage) a "good word." It might appear as if he, Hezekiah, were a weathercock, an unreliable man, who in turning about knew how to transform himself from a friend into an enemy. To ward off this evil appearance from himself, Hezekiah speaks these words, which are primarily addressed to the ambassadors. He would say: is it not self-evident that I call the prophetic word good only on the assumption that peace and truth shall continue while I live? By this construction disappears also the objection that has been made to Hezekiah, as if he betrayed by this expression a sentiment like that depraved motto: "apres moi le deluge."

It may be seen from 1 Kings xxi. 27 sqq. that the Lord lets Himself be moved by a penitent mind to postpone punishment beyond the lifetime of the man whom it primarily threatens.—שלום ואמת occurs again Jer. xxxiii. 6; comp. xiv. 13; Esther ix. 30. It means here, manifestly, peace and faithfulness in the sense of political peaceableness and fidelity to alliances.*

* [In his conjectural interpretation of Hezekiah's conduct and its relation to Isaiah's prophecy the Author has only built on a foundation dating back to the earliest traditionary exposition. And the building, one must admit, agrees with the foundation. He has only built further than others, but in the same style. Yet, when so much is built, and of such a sort, one is constrained to look at the foundation to see if such a structure is justified. The Author admits that he resorts to conjecture; his confidence is in the natural reasonableness of it. But his work may be challenged down to the very foundation as, not only without warrant in Scripture, but actually against Scripture. See Baehr, on 2 Kings xx. p. 241. And if this appear to be so, then the judgment of expositors against Hezekiah, though it be the judgment of ages, must be reversed.

The only Scripture that can seem to give positive support to the (so commonly accepted) injurious view of Hezekiah's conduct in the case before us is 2 Chr. xxxii. 25, 31. Ver. 31 clearly relates to the transactions of our text. But ver. 25 as clearly does not, and must not be brought in to shed light on them. It is in the context separated from them by the statement of ver. 26, viz.: that "Hezekiah humbled himself for the pride of his heart, both he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so that the wrath of the Lord came not upon them in the days of Hezekiah." What follows this verse is but descriptive proof of the last statement in it, and included in this proof is ver. 31. See the comm. of Dr. O. Zoeckler in the Lange, B. W. in loc. p. 27. The rendering of the Eng. Ver. "Howbeit" for וְכֵן ver. 31 is forced, and that by the pressure of the very opinion here combated. It means "And so" or "in this manner." The particle introduces the additional statement of the trial Hezekiah underwent, and refers to the prosperity just described as having providentially led to it. Ver. 31 does not imply reproach of Hezekiah or anything contrary to what may be included under the statement of ver. 26. עֲזָבוֹ, God "left him," does not. For it remains to be determined to what he left him. The context must supply this, and we must not under-

Such poisonous arrows were used by Satan against Christ in the desert, and may be compared with this light (Matt. iv. 2 sqq.). One needs to arm himself against Satan's attack by God's word, and to resort to constant watching and prayer."—CRAMER.

The Assyrian urges four particulars by which he would destroy Hezekiah's confidence, in two of which he was right and in two wrong. He was right in representing that Hezekiah could rely neither on Egypt, nor on his own power. In this respect he was a messenger of God and announcer of divine truth. For everywhere the word of God preaches the same (xxx. 1–3; xxxi. 1–3; Jer. xvii. 5; Ps. cxviii. 8, 9; cxlvi. 3, etc.). But it is a merited chastisement if rude and hostile preachers must preach to us what we were unwilling to believe at the mild and friendly voice of God. But in two particulars the Assyrian was wrong, and therein lay Hezekiah's strength. For just on this account the LORD is for him and against the Assyrian. These two things are, that the Assyrian asserts that Hezekiah cannot put his trust in the LORD, but rather he, the Assyrian is counseled by the LORD against Hezekiah. That, however, was a lie, and because of this lie, the corresponding truth makes all the deeper impression on Hezekiah, and reminds him how assuredly he may build on the LORD and importune Him. And when the enemy dares to say, that he is commissioned by the LORD to destroy the Holy Land, just that must bring to lively remembrance in the Israelite, that the LORD, who cannot lie, calls the land of Israel His land (Joel. iv. 2; Jer. ii. 7; xvi. 18, etc.), and the people of Israel His people (Exod. iii. 7, 10; v. 1, etc.).

What appears indelicate at one time or in one country, may not only be tolerated, but common in another. 3) Isaiah is not at all responsible for the indelicacy of the language here. He is simply an historian. 4) It was of importance to give the true character of the attack which was made on Jerusalem. The coming of Sennacherib was attended with pride, insolence and blasphemy; and it was important to state the true character of the transaction, and to record just what was said and done. Let him who used the language, and not him who recorded it bear the blame."—BARNES in loc.].

stand simply divine desertion in general, especially as that conflicts with all the recorded facts. The verse itself only supplies the event of the Babylonian embassy, and we may include of course Isaiah's interpretation of it. To that the LORD left Hezekiah. Comp. 2 Chr. xii. 5 "and therefore I have left (עָזַבְתִּי) you in the hand of Shishak." It is gratuitous to infer that God left Hezekiah to the workings of his own heart. It is equally so to infer that, because God so left Hezekiah, therefore Hezekiah must first have left God, as in the case just cited. Without leaving God or his own humility (ver. 26) Hezekiah might be thus left of God to this extraordinary providence. Comp. Ps. xxii. 1 with Matt. xxvii. 46. לְנַסּוֹתוֹ וגו׳ "to try him," etc., does not imply reproach any more than the trial of Abraham Gen. xxii. 1. The sentiment of these words and even the very words are drawn from Deut. viii. 2, 16. As an obvious quotation from the most familiar part of the Law, the only proper completion of their sentiment must be found in the completion of the quotation. That must be: "to know what was in his heart to know whether he would keep his (God's) commandment or not." The records of Isa. xxxix. 8, and 2 Kings xx. 19 furnish the only documentary information of what was revealed by this trial to be in Hezekiah's heart. It was nothing but resignation and acquiescence in the will of God, the only form of obedience and keeping God's commandment that the case admitted. It is, therefore, not only gratuitous to infer that the trial revealed the sinful vanity of Hezekiah's heart, it is contrary to the very record. That he showed his treasures is thought to be evidence of such vanity. But this is only prejudice growing out of the very assumptions now combated. Why should this hospitality be so bad in Hezekiah, when that of Solomon to the queen of Sheba, substantially the same, is mentioned only with approval, and is even elevated to typical importance?

As for the rest of Hezekiah's answer Isa. xxxix. 8 b; 2 Kings xx. 19 b, "Good is the word of the LORD," etc., it may be interpreted best in the light of Deut. viii. 16. A promise of good is given there for the latter days of those that stand the proof of God's trials and keep His commandments. Hezekiah had the consciousness of such integrity (Isa. xxxviii. 3), he therefore gratefully rested in the expectation of such good for his latter days; in which he was also justified by the terms of Isaiah's prophecy, if not by some more explicit announcement (2 Chr. xxxii. 26).

The event of the Babylonian embassy, as it appears in our book, must be viewed as subservient to the ends of prophecy. It is told for the sake of the prophecy in vers. 5–7. Our Author himself well remarks (at the beginning of the introduction to chapters xxxvi.–xxxix.), that our chapters "show how 'from afar' (מֵרָחוֹק) was begun the spinning of the first threads of that web of complications, that were at last so fatal." The event of the embassy was providentially ordered for prophetic purposes. It may be compared to such events as Melchisedec, Esau selling his birth-right, the queen of Sheba's visit, the birth of Maher-shal-al, the wise men of the east at the crib of Christ, the inquiring Greeks, Jno. xii. 20–24. The questions of Isaiah, and the replies of Hezekiah as recorded, bring out precisely the traits needed for the prophecy about to be made. The "from a far country" was a providentially indited expression, like that of Caiaphas Jno. xi. 49, sqq. Previous prophecy, likely familiar to Hezekiah, had made known that a visitation of wrath was coming on Judah "from far" x. 3, xxx. 27. Now this event strangely brings to Jerusalem and its king representatives of the very people that were to be the instruments of this wrath, and the Prophet appears, and identifies them and their destiny. And from this onward the Babylonians become more distinctly the theme of prophecy. Hezekiah submits, not like one receiving a well merited rebuke, but like Moses when the people were turned back from Kadesh-Barnea. All that the Author says about negotiations looking to alliance between Hezekiah and Babylon, does not pretend to be more than shrewd conjecture. As it does not find one word of corroboration in the Scripture, it would be well to make little or no account of it. [The desire of Hezekiah was not primarily his own personal safety, or the safety of his kingdom. It was that Jehovah might vindicate His great and holy name from reproach, and that the world might know that He was the only true God. God save the mark! How has the world become so different in our day, especially in our evangelical church. Let a family be a little noble, and it is regarded as a reproach and injury to have a clergyman among its relations and friends, not to speak of a son studying theology and becoming a servant of the church. I speak not of all; I know that some have a better mind; yet such is the common course. Jeroboam's maxim must rather obtain, who made priests of the lowest of the people (1 Kings xii. 31). For thus the parsons may be firmly held in rein (sub ferula) and in political submission. It is not at all good where the clergy have a say, says an old state-rule of our Politicorum." FEUERLEIN, pastor in Nuremberg, in his Novissimorum primum, 1694, p. 553. The same quotes SPENER: "Is it not so, that among the Roman Catholics the greatest lords are not ashamed to stand in the spiritual office, and that many of them even discharge the spiritual functions? Among the Reformed, too, persons born of the noblest families are not ashamed of the office of preacher. But, it seems, we Lutherans are the only ones that hold the service of the gospel so low, that, where from a noble or otherwise prominent family an ingenium has an inclination to theological study, almost every one seeks to hinder him, or, indeed, afterwards is ashamed of his friendship, as if it were something much too base for such people, by which more harm comes to our church than one might suppose. That is to be ashamed of the gospel."

16. On xxxviii. 1. ["We see here the boldness and fidelity of a man of God. Isaiah was not afraid to go in freely and tell even a monarch that he must die. The subsequent part of the narrative would lead us to suppose that, until this announcement, Hezekiah did not regard himself as in immediate danger. It is evident here, that the physician of Hezekiah had not informed him of it—perhaps from the apprehension that his disease would be aggravated by the agitation of his mind on the subject. The duty was, therefore, left, as it is often, to the minister of religion —a duty which even many ministers are slow to perform, and which many physicians are reluctant to have performed.

No danger is to be apprehended commonly from announcing to those who are sick their true condition. Physicians and friends often err in this. There is no species of cruelty greater than to suffer a friend to lie on a dying bed under a delusion. There is no sin more aggravated than that of designedly deceiving a dying man, and flattering him with the hope of recovery, when there is a moral certainty that he will not and cannot recover. And there is evidently no danger to be apprehended from communicating to the sick their true condition. It should be done tenderly and with affection; but it should be done faithfully. I have had many opportunities of witnessing the effect of apprising the sick of their situation, and of the moral certainty that they must die. And I cannot now recall an instance in which the announcement has had any unhappy effect on the disease. Often, on the contrary, the effect is to calm the mind, and to lead the dying to look up to God, and peacefully to repose on Him. And the effect of THAT is always salutary." BARNES in loc.]

17. On xxxviii. 2. It is an old opinion, found even in the CHALD., that by the wall is meant the wall of the temple as a holy direction in which to pray, as the Mahometans pray in the direction of Mecca. But הקיר cannot mean that. Rather that is correct which is said by FORERIUS: "Nolunt pii homines testes habere suarum lacrymarum, ut eas liberius fundant, neque sensu distrahi, cum orare Deum ex animo volunt."

18. On xxxviii. 8:—

Quale putabatur Stoicus esse Deus.
Ille potest Solis cursus inhibere volantes,
At veluti scopulos flumina stare facit."
—MELANCHTHON.

19. On xxxviii. 12. "Beautiful parables that picture to us the transitoriness of this temporal life. For the parable of the shepherd's tent means how restless a thing it is with us, that we have here no abiding place, but are driven from one locality to another, until at last we find a resting-spot in the church-yard. The other parable of the weaver's thread means how uncertain is our life on earth. For how easily the thread breaks." CRAMER. "When the weaver's work is progressing best, the thread breaks before he is aware. Thus when a man is in his best work, and supposes he now at last begins really to live, God breaks the thread of his life and lets him die. The rational heathen knew something of this when they, so to speak, invented the three goddesses of life (the three Parcas minime parcas) and included them in this little verse:

Clotho colum gestat, Lachesis trahit,
Atropos occat.

But what does the weaver when the thread breaks? Does he stop his work at once? O no! He knows how to make a clever weaver's knot, so that one cannot observe the break. Remember thereby that when thy life is broken off, yet the Lord Jesus, as a master artisan, can bring it together again at the last day. He will make such an artful, subtle weaver's-knot as shall make us wonder through all eternity. It will do us no harm to have died." Ibid.—Omnia sunt hominum tenui pendentia filo.

["As suddenly as the tent of a shepherd is taken down, folded up, and transferred to another place. There is doubtless the idea here that he would continue to exist, but in another place, as the shepherd would pitch his tent in another place. He was to be cut off from the earth, but he expected to dwell among the dead. The whole passage conveys the idea that he expected to dwell in another state." BARNES in loc.].

20. On xxxviii. 17. ["Note 1) When God pardons sin, He casts it behind His back as not designing to look upon it with an eye of justice and jealousy. He remembers it no more, to visit for it. The pardon does not make the sin not to have been, or not to have been sin, but not to be punished as it deserves. When we cast our sins behind our back, and take no care to repent of them, God sets them before His face, and is ready to reckon for them; but when we set them before our face in true repentance, as David did when his sin was ever before him, God casts them behind His back. 2) When God pardons sin, He pardons all, casts them all behind His back, though they have been as scarlet and crimson. 3) The pardoning of sin is the delivering the soul from the pit of corruption. 4) It is pleasant indeed to think of our recoveries from sickness when we see them flowing from the remission of sin; then the cause is removed, and then it is in love to the soul." M. HENRY in loc.]

21. On xxxviii. 18. [Cannot hope for thy truth. "They are shut out from all the means by which Thy truth is brought to mind, and the offers of salvation are presented. Their probation is at an end; their privileges are closed; their destiny is sealed up. The idea is, it is a privilege to live because this is a world where the offers of salvation are made, and where those who are conscious of guilt may hope in the mercy of God." BARNES in loc.] God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance (2 Pet. iii. 9). Such is the New Testament sense of these Old Testament words. For though Hezekiah has primarily in mind the preferableness of life in the earthly body to the life in Hades, yet this whole manner of representation passes away with Hades itself. But Hezekiah's words still remain true so far as they apply to heaven and hell. For of course in hell, the place of the damned, one does not praise God. But those that live praise Him. These, however, are in heaven. Since then God wills rather that men praise Him than not praise Him, so He is not willing that men should perish, but that all should turn to repentance and live.

22. On xxxix. 2. "Primo (Deus) per obsidionem et bellum, deinde per gravem morbum Ezechiam servaverat, ne in praesumtionem laberetur. Nondum tamen vinci potuit antiquus serpens, sed redit et levat caput suum. Adeo non possumus consistere, nisi Deus nos affligat. Vides igitur hic, quis sit afflictionum usus, ut mortificent scilicet carnem, quae non potest res ferre secundas." LUTHER.

23. On xxxix. 7. "God also punishes the misdeeds of the parents on the children (Exod. xx. 5) because the children not only follow the misdeeds of their parents, but they also increase and heap them up, as is seen in the posterity of Hezekiah, viz.: Manasseh and Amon."—CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

[The reader is referred to the ample hints covering the same matter to be found in the volume on 2 Kings, chapters xviii.-xx. It is expedient to take advantage of that for the sake of keeping the present volume within reasonable bounds. Therefore but a minimum is here given of what the Author offers, much of which indeed is but the repetition in another form of matter already given.—TR.]

1. On xxxvii. 36. "1) The scorn and mockery of the visible world. 2) The scorn and mockery of the unseen world." Sermon of Domprediger ZAHN in Halle, 1870.

2. On the entire xxxviii. chapter, beside the 22 sermons in FEUERLEIN's Novissimorum primum, there is a great number of homiletical elaborations of an early date; WALTHER MAGIRUS, Idea mortis et vitae in two parts, the second of which contains 20 penitential and consolatory sermons on Isa. xxxviii. Danzig, 1640 and 1642. DANIEL SCHALLER (STENDAL) 4 sermons on the sick Hezekiah, on Isa. xxxviii. Magdeburg, 1611. PETER SIEGMUND PAPE in "Gott geheiligkte Wochenpredigten," Berlin, 1701, 4 sermons. JACOB TICHLERUS (ELBURG) Hiskiae Aufrichtigkeit bewiesen in Gesundheit, Krankheit und Genesung, 18 sermons on Isa. xxxviii. (Dutch), Campen, 1636. These are only the principal ones.

3. On xxxviii. 1. "I will set my house in order. This, indeed, will not be hard for me to do. My debt account is crossed out; my best possession I take along with me; my children I commit to the great Father of orphans, to whom heaven and earth belongs, and my soul to the Lord, who has sued for it longer than a human age, and bought it with His blood. Thus I am eased and ready for the journey." THOLUCK, Stunden der Andacht, p. 620.

4. On xxxviii. 1. "Now thou shouldest know that our word 'order his house' has a very broad meaning. It comprehends reconciliation to God by faith, the final confession of sin, the last Lord's Supper, the humble committing of the soul to the grace of the Lord, and to death and the grave in the hope of the resurrection. In one word: There is an ordering of the house above. In reliance on the precious merit of my Saviour, I order my house above in which I wish to dwell. Moreover taking leave of loved ones, and the blessing of them belongs to ordering the house. And finally order must be taken concerning the guardianship of children, the abiding of the widow, and the friend on whom she must especially lean in her loneliness, also concerning earthly bequests." AHLFELD, Das Leben im Lichte des Wortes Gottes, Halle, 1867, p. 522.

5. On xxxviii. 2-8. This account has much that seems strange to us Christians, but much, too, that quite corresponds to our Christian consciousness. Let us contemplate the difference between an Old Testament, and a New Testament suppliant, by noticing the differences and the resemblances. I. THE RESEMBLANCES. 1) Distress and grief there are in the Old, as in the New Testament (ver. 3). 2) Ready and willing to help beyond our prayers or comprehension (vers. 5, 6) is the LORD in the Old as in the New Testament. II. THE DIFFERENCES. 1) The Old Testament suppliant appealed to his having done nothing bad (ver. 3). The New Testament suppliant says: "God be merciful to me a sinner," and "Give me through grace for Christ's sake what it pleases Thee to give me." 2) The Old Testament suppliant demands a sign (vers. 7, 8; comp. ver. 22); the New Testament suppliant requires no sign but that of the crucified Son of man, for He knows that to those who bear this sign is given the promise of the hearing of all their prayers (Jno. xvi. 23). 3) In Hezekiah's case, the prayer of the Old Testament suppliant is indeed heard (ver. 5), yet in general it has not the certainty of being heard, whereas the New Testament suppliant has this certainty.

III.—THE SECOND PART.

THE TOTAL SALVATION TO COME, BEGINNING WITH REDEMPTION FROM THE BABYLONIAN EXILE AND CONCLUDING WITH THE CREATION OF A NEW HEAVEN AND A NEW EARTH.

CHAPTERS XL.-LXVI.

This second principal part is occupied with the redemption of Israel. And the Prophet contemplates this redemption as a total, although from its beginning, which coincides with redemption from the Babylonian exile, to its conclusion, it takes up thousands of years. For to the gaze of the Prophet, that, which in point of time, is most remote, is just as near as that which is nearest in point of time. He sees degrees, it is true; but the intervals of time that separate the degrees one from another he is unable to measure. Things of the same kind he sees along side of one another, although as to fact, the single moments of their realization take place one after another. Consequences that evolve out of their premises only after a long time he contemplates along with the latter. Thus it happens that the representations of the Prophet have often the appearance of disorder. To this is joined still another thing. Although, in general, the Prophet's view point is in the midst of the people as already suffering punishment and awaiting their redemption out of it, thus the view-point of the Exile, yet at times this relative (ideal, prophetic) present merges into the absolute, i. e., actual history of his own time where both have an inherent likeness. But this inherent likeness becomes especially prominent where the punishment of sin is concerned, which is the concern of both epochs in common, that is the epoch in which the Prophet lived, and the epoch of the Exile.

These are the chief points of view, which must be held fast in order to make it possible to understand this grand cycle of prophecy.

The twenty-seven chapters that compose this cycle subdivide into three parts containing each nine chapters. (This was first noticed by FRIEDRICH RUECKERT, Heb. Propheten übers. u. erläutert, 1831.)

The first Ennead (chapters xl.–xlviii.), has *Kores (Cyrus) for its middle point; the second (chapters xlix.–lvii.), the personal Servant of Jehovah; the third (chapters lviii.–lxvi.), the new creature.

In regard to the critical questions, see the Introduction.

[In regard to the above division the following may be appropriate which DR. J. A. ALEXANDER says concerning the division proposed by himself, and which does not materially differ from the one above, though it makes three heads of what above is comprised in the first (xl.–xlviii.). "These are the subjects of the Prophet's whole discourse, and may be described as present to his mind throughout; but the degree in which they are respectively made prominent is different in different parts. The attempts which have been made to show that they are taken up successively, and treated one by one, are unsuccessful, because inconsistent with the frequent repetition and recurrence of the same theme. The order is not that of strict succession, but of alternation. It is still true, however, that the relative prominence of these great themes is far from being constant. As a general fact, it may be said that their relative positions in this respect answer to those they hold in the enumeration above given. The character of Israel, both as a nation and a church, is chiefly prominent in the beginning, the Exile and the Advent in the middle, the contrast and change of dispensations at the end. With this general conception of the Prophecy, the reader can have very little difficulty in perceiving the unity of the discourse, and marking its transitions for himself. Abridged Ed. Vol. II. p. 18.].

A.—KORES. CHAPTERS XL.—XLVIII.

The first Ennead of chaps. xl.–lxvi. has two characteristic elements that distinguish it from the two following Enneads: 1) The Promise of a Hero that will come from the east, that will redeem Israel out of the Babylonian captivity, and who in fact is called by his name "Kores" xliv. 28; xlv. 1: 2) The affirmation that Jehovah, from the fulfilment of this fact predicted by Him, must also necessarily be acknowledged as the only true God, as also, on the other hand, from the inability of idols to prophesy and to fulfil must evidently be concluded that they are no gods. One sees from this that the Prophet wishes primarily to attain a double object by the first nine chapters of this book of consolation: First, Israel shall have the prospect presented of bodily deliverance by Cyrus; but Second, its deliverance also from the worship of idols shall be made possible by means of that promise. For the LORD intends to make it so evident that the deliverance by Cyrus is His work, and at the same time His victory over the idols that Israel can no longer resist acknowledging Him as alone divine. These two aims manifestly go hand in hand. But now a Third is added to them. Cyrus and Israel are themselves prophetic types that point to a third and higher one. Each of them represents one factor of the development of salvation. In that third both factors find their common fulfilment. Cyrus is only the initiator of the redemption. He brings to an end the seventy years' exile, and opens up the era of salvation. But the salvation which he immediately brings is still only a faint twilight. On the other hand, in himself considered, Cyrus is a grand and glorious appearance. He beams like the sun in the heavens, that is unobscured by clouds, and that, indeed, not only in our prophecy, but also in profane history. In this respect he prefigures the element of glory that must appear in the fulfiller of redemption. In chap. xlv. 1 He is called מָשִׁיחַ (Messiah, anointed). He is therefore the messiah in a lower degree. Lowliness, reproach, suffering, nothing of this sort is found in him. On the contrary Israel is the lowly, despised, much enduring servant of Jehovah, who, however, in his lowliness is still strong, and in the hand of Jehovah a mighty instrument, partly to punish the heathen nations, and partly to save them. This particular also attains its conclusion in Him who fulfils the redemption. Therefore He is called Messiah and Servant of Jehovah in one person. He unites both in one: the glory and the lowliness, the kingly form and the servant form. Thus it happens, that in xl.–xlviii. beside the promise of Cyrus (as far as it relates to the deliverance out of the Babylonian exile), and the proof of divinity (drawn from prophecy and fulfilment) which form the peculiar subjects of these chapters, we see those two other elements appear in a preparative way; the element of glory represented by Cyrus, and the form of the servant of God by the people Israel. Those first named subjects are concluded in xl.–xlviii. For after xlviii. nothing more is said either about Cyrus or about prophecy and fulfilment. But that in Cyrus and in the people (regarded as the servant of Jehovah) which is typical has its unfolding in the two following Enneads, of which the former is chiefly devoted to the servant of God, and the latter to the glory of the new creation. Thus, therefore, we may say: the first Ennead forms the basis of the two that follow, in as much as it carries out to completion the two fundamental factors of the initiation of the redemption by Cyrus, and the proof of the divinity of Jehovah drawn therefrom, but partly, too, in that it lays the foundation for the representation of Him who in the highest degree is the Servant of God and King.

Let us now observe how the Prophet carries out in detail the plan which we have just sketched in its outlines.

In chap. xl. after the prologue, the Prophet presents first the objective then the subjective basis of the redemption. For this chapter, after a general introduction (vers. 1–11) referring to the whole book, and thus also to the subsequent parts of chap. xl., contains first a presentation of the absolute power and wisdom of God, from which follows also the impossibility of representing Him by any natural image (vers. 12–26). If then redemption is objectively conditioned by the omnipotence and wisdom of God, so it is subjectively by that trust that Israel must repose in its God (vers. 27–31). This chap. contains, therefore, three parts, and has wholly the character of a foundation.

To chapter xli. we give the superscription: First appearance of the redeemer from the east and of the servant of Jehovah, as also the first and second realization of the prophecy relating to this as proof of the divinity of Jehovah. For in chapter xli. the Prophet begins by bringing forward as the principal person of his prophetic drama the form of him who as beginner of the redemption has to stand in the foreground of the first Ennead. He does not yet name him, but he draws him with traits not to be mistaken, and designates him as the one called of God, and his calling a test of divinity which it is impossible for idols to give (xli. 1–7). Immediately after the redeemer the Prophet lets the redeemed appear, viz.: the people Israel, whom he introduces as "servant of Jehovah" in contrast with the glorious potentate from the east, for in him must appear that other typical element, poverty and lowliness, which still does no detriment to his strength. The Prophet characterizes this servant of Jehovah primarily as the chosen one of God, whom God will not reject but will strengthen to victory (xli. 8–13), then again as poor and wretched, who, notwithstanding, will be a mighty instrument of judgment and rich in salvation and knowledge (xli. 14–20). After he has thus described the redeemer and the redeemed servant of God, he employs in conclusion precisely this prophecy of redemption a second time as the basis of an argument which has for its conclusion the sole divinity of Jehovah, and the nothingness of idols (xli. 21–29).

In Chapter xlii. the third principal person appears on the scene, viz., the personal Servant of God to whom both the chief personages before mentioned pointed; the first of them prefiguring His glory, the second His lowliness. He is represented first as meek, who at the same time will be a strong refuge of righteousness (xlii. 1–4); then as the personal representative of a new covenant, who shall mediate for all nations light and right; and at the same time this is the third prophecy which the LORD presents as pledge of His divine dignity (xlii. 5–9). These two strophes are like a ladder that leads up to the culmination. For chapter xlii. is a pyramidal structure. In verses 10–17 the Prophet has reached the point of the pyramid. In them the expression "Servant of God" is no longer used. And yet the discourse is concerning the same that ver. 1 was designated as the Servant of Jehovah. He appears here in His unity with Jehovah in which He Himself is El-Gibbor [God a mighty one]. As such, He issues out of Israel into the blind heathen world in order partly to judge, partly to bring them to the light of knowledge and of salvation. From this elevation the following strophes recede again. And in vers. 18–21 the Servant of Jehovah, who appears here again under this name, is portrayed as one, who can indeed make others see and hear, but Himself, as one blind and deaf, goes to meet His destruction, yet precisely thereby secures the favor of God, and becomes the founder of a new Tora (law). Unhappily this new institution of salvation is not accepted by unbelieving Israel. For this reason the Prophet sees Israel as a people robbed, plundered, and languishing in kennels and prisons (xlii. 22–25). From his heart he wishes that Israel might take warning from this threatening in time, and the sooner the better. But, alas, the Prophet knows that Israel, spite of the Exile, in which it has already so emphatically experienced the chastening hand of its God, will not yet lay to heart this warning. With this the second discourse concludes.

Having in xli.–xlii. introduced especially the chief persons of the redemption, viz.: the redeemer from the east, then the redeemed or servant (people) of God, finally the personal Servant of God, in whom the two former combine, the Prophet now portrays in xliii. chiefly the redemption itself. He gives first a survey of the chief particulars of the redemption (vers. 1–8). Having ver. 1 assigned the reason for the redemption, he depicts it, ver. 2, as one that shall come to pass spite of all difficulties; in vers. 3, 4, as such that it must come to pass though even heathen nations must be sacrificed for the sake of it; in vers. 5–7 as all-comprehending, i. e., as such that it will lead back into their home out of all lands of the earth the members of the people of Israel; finally, in ver. 8, is indicated the condition that Israel must fulfill in order to partake of this salvation, viz.: that it must have open eyes and ears in a spiritual sense. To this representation of the redemption in general, the Prophet adds (vers. 9–13) the statement, that recurs thus for the fourth time, that prophecy and fulfilment are a test of divinity, and that Israel in its capacity as servant of God is called to be witness by furnishing this test. After carrying out this thought, that recurs so like a refrain, the Prophet turns again to the chief thought of chapter xliii. He describes the return home of Israel especially out of the Babylonian captivity. Yet not without finding in the Lord's manner of bringing this about a reference to the distant Messianic salvation, in respect to its exercising also a transforming influence upon nature (vers. 14–21). In the fourth strophe of the chapter (vers. 22–28) the Prophet treats the thought of the inward, moral redemption, viz.: the redemption also from sin. He lets it be known here that this inward redemption will by no means follow close on the feet of the outward redemption from exile. For Israel has never kept the law. The Lord has already hitherto borne Israel's sin, and will in future blot out the guilt of it. But the Israel that contemns the grace of God in proud self-righteousness will have to be destroyed. The Lord, however, will break the power of sin by the rich effusion of the holy and holy-making Spirit upon that seed of Israel that shall be chosen to serve the Lord as His servant; and this is the thought of the fifth strophe that includes xliv. 1–5.

Having portrayed in xli. the first redeemer and then the redeemed, i. e., the servant (people) of God, then in xlii. the antitype of both, the second Redeemer and Servant of God in a personal sense, then in xliii. the redemption itself, and all this in such a way that, interspersed, He has appealed four times, in a refrain like repetition, to the ability of Jehovah to prophesy in contrast with the inability of idols, as proof of His divinity, the Prophet now xliv. 6 sqq., makes a decided use of this last element for which He has made such preparation. This entire chapter is an edifice whose substructure consists of the members of just that argumentation, that whoever can prophesy is God, and the crowning point of which appears to us in naming the name "Kores" (Cyrus), the way for naming it being now well prepared, and the motive sufficient. That is to say, in xliv. 6–20, for the fifth time, in a drawn-out recapitulation extending through three strophes, it is set forth that Jehovah, as the only true God, can alone prophesy, and that He is God He will now prove by a grand prophetic transaction for the salvation of Israel. Accordingly, in the first strophe (xliv. 6–11) the Prophet shows that Israel possesses the stronghold of its salvation in its living, everlasting God, who can prophesy, and has prophesied, which Israel also as a witness must testify to, whereas the senseless makers of idols must go to destruction. In the second strophe (xliv. 12–17), in order to set forth the senselessness of idol worship most convincingly, the manufacture of idols is described in a drastic way. In the third strophe (xliv. 18–20) in order on the one hand to explain the possibility of such senseless acts as making idols, the deep reason of it is pointed to, viz.: the blindness of men's hearts and minds; on the other hand however the Prophet points to the destructive effects of this insane behaviour. In the fourth strophe (xliv. 21–28) the Prophet attains finally the culmination. He first deduces briefly the consequences from the foregoing. Before all he reminds that Israel is Jehovah's servant, i. e., property, which the Lord has bought for Himself by graciously blotting out his guilt. This ransomed servant may return home (note the highly significant שׁוּבָה xliv. 22). Then there is a second brief reminder of Jehovah's omnipotent divinity, and, in contrast with it, of the necessary disgrace of idols and their soothsayers. In contrast with the latter it is finally declared with all emphasis: Jehovah makes true the word of His prophets. Therefore Israel will and must have a happy return home, and Cyrus shall the prince be called who shall accomplish this decree of Jehovah.

With this we have the culmination of the cycle of prophecy in chapters xl.–xlviii. and in respect of space have reached the middle of it. For, if, we leave aside xl., as a general laying of a foundation, and remember that the prophecy relating to Cyrus begins with xli., we have here at the close of xliv., four discourses behind us, and still four discourses before us.

In chapter xlv., the prophecy remains at the elevation which it attained at the close of chapter xliv. We may therefore designate this discourse as the culmination of the cycle of prophecy in xl.–xlviii. and its contents as "Cyrus and the effects of his appearance." For we are informed in xlv. 1–7 what shall be brought about by Cyrus, whom the Lord has chosen and designates as His anointed (מָשִׁיחַ), and what three-fold object will be secured thereby. But we learn xlv. 8–13 that Cyrus is the beginner and founder of the era of salvation promised to Israel, although according to appearance this seems not to be, and the faint-heartedness of Israel requires the assurance that Cyrus is certainly called to accomplish the outward restoration of the holy people and of the holy city. The Prophet even gives the further assurance, that, beside that northern world-power directly ruled by Cyrus, even the southern, i. e., Egypt with the lands of its dominion, convinced by the salvation accruing to Israel from Cyrus, shall be converted to Jehovah and will join itself to His people (xlv.

14–17). Finally, however, in consequence of the saving effect proceeding from Cyrus, this greatest advantage shall eventuate, viz.: that Israel, when it sees the heathen north and south converted to Jehovah, shall at last and definitively abjure idols, and give itself up wholly and entirely to its God, so that from that time on humanity entire shall have become a spiritual Israel (xlv. 18–25). In the seventh discourse (chapter xlvi.), as also in the eighth (chapter xlvii.) the obverse side of this picture of the future brought about by Cyrus is shown. In xlvi. namely, we have presented first the downfall of the Babylonian idols; but connected with this, also the gain that Israel shall derive from this, for its knowledge of God. That is to say, Israel will come to see that there is a great difference between Jehovah who carries His people, and those idols that are carried by beasts of burden into captivity (xlvi. 1–4). In fact Israel will know, too, which just such a difference exists between Jehovah and the images that are meant to represent Him (of which xl. 18, 25 has discoursed), for the latter also are idols that need to be carried (xlvi. 5–7). Israel will actually draw the conclusion that the LORD here presses home for the sixth time, viz.: that the God who can prophesy and fulfill, who, in particular, has correctly announced beforehand the ravenous bird from the east, must be the right God (xlvi. 8–11). But the Prophet foresees that not all Israelites will draw from the facts so far mentioned that advantage for their religious life that, according to Jehovah's intention, they ought. Will not this make problematical the realization of the promised salvation? He replies to this question, "No." For the righteousness and salvation of God must come in spite of the hard-heartedness of Israel (xlvi. 12, 13). The eighth discourse is occupied wholly with Babylon. It paints in drastic images the deep downfall of it, exposes the reasons (the harshness against Israel transcending the measure that God would have, and the secure arrogance xlvii. 1–7), and shows the uselessness of all the means employed to rescue Babylon, both those derived from the worship of demons and those which the connections with other nations seem to offer (xlvii. 8–15). The ninth discourse, finally, (xlviii.) is recapitulation and conclusion. After an address to Israel that displays the motives that prompt Jehovah's interest in the nation (xlviii. 1, 2) the Prophet makes prominent for the seventh time the importance of prophecy for the knowledge of God. He points Israel to the fulfilment of the old prophecies, that they had experienced and verified in order to move them to faith in the new that concern the redemption from exile (xlviii. 3–11). Then the chief contents of this new prophecy is repeated: what idols cannot, Jehovah can do, for He promises and brings on a redeemer that shall accomplish the will of God on Babylon (xlviii. 12–15). But Israel is summoned to go out of Babylon as out of an opened prison house, and to proclaim to all the world that the LORD by Cyrus has led His people out of Babylon and home, as He did by Moses out of Egypt (xlviii. 20–21). We join these verses close on ver. 15 because the contents of both passages demand it. The verses 16 and 17–19 are two insertions. The first, which is very obscure, appears to be a side remark of the Prophet's, to the effect that the wonderful things discoursed in xl.–xlvii. were to himself not known from the beginning, but learned only in the moment of their creation (in a prophetic sense, comp. on xlviii. 6), but now by the impulse of the Spirit he has made them known. Verses 17–19 are of a retrospective nature. They contain the lament of the LORD that Israel did not sooner give heed to His commands; for thereby it would have partaken of the blessing given to the patriarchs without the chastening agency of the Exile. Ver. 22 finally (which occurs again as to the words at the close of chap. lviii., and in respect to sense at the close of chap. lxvi.) is a refrain-like conclusion intended (in contrast with the consolatory words that begin the entire book of consolation chapters xl.–lxvi. and its principal parts) to call to mind the important truth, that this consolation is not unconditionally offered to all. For the wicked can have no share in it.

This, in its essentials, is my opinion of the plan and order of chapters xl.–xlviii.

I.—THE FIRST DISCOURSE.

The Prologue: the Objective and Subjective basis of Redemption.

CHAPTER XL.

1. THE PROLOGUE OF THE SECOND PART AND OF THE FIRST DISCOURSE.

CHAPTER XL. 1-11.

1 COMFORT ye, comfort ye my people,
Saith your God.
2 Speak ye [1]comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her,
That her [2]warfare is accomplished,
That [a]her iniquity is pardoned:
[b]For she hath received of the LORD's hand
Double for all her sins.
3 The voice of him that crieth [c]in the wilderness,
Prepare ye the way of the LORD,
Make straight in the desert a highway for our God.
4 Every valley shall be exalted,
And every mountain and hill shall be made low:

And the crooked shall be made [3]straight,
And [d]the rough places [4]plain:
5 And the glory of the LORD shall be revealed,
And all flesh shall see it together:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.
6 [e]The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry?
All flesh is grass,
And all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field:
7 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth:
Because [f]the spirit of the LORD bloweth upon it:
Surely the people is grass.
8 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth:
But the word of our God shall stand forever.
9 [5]O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain;
[6]O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings,
Lift up thy voice with strength;
Lift it up, be not afraid;
Say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!
10 Behold, the Lord God will come [7][g]with strong hand,
And his arm shall rule for him:
Behold his reward is with him,
And [8]his work before him.
11 He shall feed his flock like a shepherd:
He shall gather the lambs with his arm,
And carry them in his bosom,
And shall gently lead those [9]that are with young.

[1] Heb. to the heart. [2] Or, appointed time. [3] Or, a straight place.
[4] Or, a plain place. [5] Or, O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion.
[6] Or, O thou that tellest good tidings to Jerusalem. [7] Or, against the strong.
[8] Or, recompense for his work. [9] Or, that give suck.

[a] her guilt has been enjoyed. [b] that. [c] prepare in the wilderness.
[d] the connecting ridges become valley bottoms. [e] Hark! there speaks, "cry! And there replies: "what" etc.
[f] the breath of Jehovah blew on it. [g] as a strong one.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. The rhetorical form of anadiplosis (epanalepsis, epizeuxis) occurs, indeed, principally in the second part (xl. 1; xli. 27; xliii. 11, 25; xlviii. 11, 15; li. 9, 12, 17; lii. 1, 11; lvii. 6, 14, 19; lxii. 10; lxv. 1). But it occurs also not unfrequently in passages of the first part that are the acknowledged productions of Isa. (viii. 9; xviii. 2, 7; xxi. 11; xxviii. 10, 13; xxix. 1. Comp., beside xv. 1; xxi. 9; xxiv. 16; xxvi. 3, 15; xxvii. 5; xxxviii. 11, 17, 19. Agreeably to the character of this section, the Piel נִחַם occurs oftener in the second part: xl. 1; xlix. 13; li. 3, 12, 19; lii. 9; lxi. 2; lxvi. 13 (Pual liv. 11; lxvi. 13). Piel occurs twice in the first part: xii. 1; xxii. 4. The passages xlix. 13; li. 3, 12; lii. 9; lxvi. 13, are manifest echoes of the present passage——עַם with the suffix referring to Jehovah, as it suits the contents of the second part, is found there oftener than in the first: comp. iii. 12; x. 2, 24; xxxii. 13, 18, with xl. 1; xliii. 20; xlvii. 6; li. 4, 16; lii. 5 sq.; xxviii. 5; xxx. 26; lviii. 1; lxv. 10, 19, etc.

The expression יֹאמַר א׳, as an introductory formula, is peculiar to Isaiah; for it is found only in Isaiah, and that in both parts: i, 11, 18; xxxiii. 10; xl. 1, 25; xli. 21; lxvi. 9 (comp. KLEINERT, Echtheit der jesajan, Weissag, I. p. 239 sqq.). The Imperfect יֹאמַר corresponds to the aim of chapters xl.–lxvi. Comp., the formula with which the Prophet introduces the prophecies he addresses to the present church (שִׁמְעוּ דְבַר י׳ i. 10; נְאֻם י׳ i. 24; הַדָּבָר אֲשֶׁר חָזָה וגו׳ ii. 1, etc., comp. vii. 3, 7, 10; viii. 1, 5, 11; xiv. 28; xx. 2, etc.). יֹאמַר, taken exactly, is for us an untranslatable verbal form, that, according to its original sense, designates the thought neither as present nor future, nor in any way as one to be estimated by time measure, but one to be estimated by the measure of its mode of existence. That is, the Imperfect designates, not that which has objectively come into actual existence, but what is only present some way subjectively. In other words, יֹאמַר, standing at the beginning of the second part, characterizes it as addressed to an ideal church. In itself, indeed, יֹאמַר can mean, "he will speak." Thus it is taken by STIER, v. HOFMANN (Schriftbew. II. 1. p. 91, Ausg. v. J. 1853), and KLOSTERMANN (Zeitschrift f. Luth. Th. u. K. 1876, I. p. 24 sqq.); the last named of whom, however, errs in thinking that the following discourse vers. 3-11 gives the Imperfect the direction toward the future. For what follows, and is separated by intermediate members can never determine the specific sense of a Hebrew verbal form. יֹאמַר can, also in itself mean frequent repetition (DELITZSCH). But all these significations are too special. The subjective force of the Imperfect is capable of various signification according to the context. Here at the beginning we are much too little au fait, to assign to the word a construction as definite as those expositors would do. Here we know from the יֹאמַר only this much, that what follows is to be regarded, not as something that has just gone forth, something to be executed at once for the present church, but as an ideal word of God according to its point of departure and aim.——We have said above that עַם with a suffix referring to Jehovah occurs much oftener in the second part than in the first. The same is to be said of אלהים with the suffix referring to Israel. אֱלֹהַי occurs twice in the first part (vii. 13; xxv. 1), five times in the second (xl. 27; xlix. 4, 5; lvii. 21; lxi. 10); אלהינו six times in the first part (i. 10; xxv. 9; xxvi. 13; xxxv. 2; xxxvi. 7; xxxvii. 20), eight times in the second (xl. 3, 8; xlii. 17; lii. 10; lv. 7; lix. 13; lxi. 2, 6); אֱלֹהֶיךָ in the first part properly only once in the sense here under review (vii. 11; beside this xxxvii. 4, 10), six times in the second (xli. 10, 13; xliii. 3; xlviii. 17; li. 15; lv. 5); אֱלֹהַיִךְ occurs not at all in the first part, on the other hand nine times in the second (li. 20, 22; lii. 7; liv. 6; lx. 9, 19; lxii. 3, 5; lxvi. 9); אלהיכם in the first part only xxxv. 4, in the second xl. 1, 9; lix. 2; אלהיו in the sense meant here only l. 10; lviii. 2; אלהיה and אלהיהם occur in this sense in neither part. It is quite natural that the affectionate words of endearment should occur oftener in the book of comfort than in the book of threatening.

Ver. 2. The question might be raised whether כִּי is to be construed as a causal particle. But in that case קראו must be referred to what precedes, and that, say, in the sense of קִרְאוּ מַלְאוּ (Jer. iv. 5) in order that it may not stand as flat and superfluous. This construction is not allowable here because קראו must be closely connected with the preceding דברו על־לב.

We must therefore refer קראו to what follows, and כִּי, in the sense of "that," introduces the objective clause.——צָבָא only here and Dan. viii. 12 is used as feminine. The reason seems to me to lie in this, that in both passages the word is conceived as collective, i. e., as designation, not of a single conflict, but of a multitude of conflicts, of a long continued period of conflict.——מלא of time (comp. Gen. xxv. 24; xxix. 21; Jer. xxv. 12) occurs again in Isaiah only lxv. 20 in the Piel. ——The expression כִּפְלַיִם occurs elsewhere only Job xi. 6; the singular, also, כֶּפֶל, duplicatio, only Job xli. 4.

Ver. 3. Piel יִשֵּׁר, "make straight," occurs again only xlv. 2, 13.——עֲרָבָה, regio arida, apart from xxxv. 1, 6, occurs in part first only xxxiii. 9; whereas in part second, beside the present it occurs xli. 19; li. 3.——מסלה occurs in the same sense as here xi. 16; xix. 23; lxii. 10; comp. xxxiii. 8; xlix. 11; lix. 7. It occurs beside vii. 3; xxxvi. 2. It is "the highway, embankment road, chaussee."

Ver. 4. שָׁפֵל a word of frequent recurrence, especially in the second introduction: ii. 9, 11, 12, 17; v. 15; then x. 33; xxix. 4; xxxii. 18; also the antithesis of הר and גִּבְעָה in parallelism occurs very often in part first: ii. 14; x. 32; xxx. 17, 25; xxxi. 4, and somewhat oftener still in part second: xl. 4, 12; xli. 15; xlii. 15; liv. 10; lv. 12; lxv. 7.——עָקֹב in the present sense only here; comp. Jer. xvii. 9.——מִישׁוֹר xl. 4 in the ethical sense; xlii. 16.——רֶכֶס ἅπ. λεγ., from רָכַס alligavit Exod. xxviii. 28; xxxix. 21, like jugum from jungere, "the joining," particularly the union between two mountains, "the yoke."

Ver. 5. בִּקְעָה again in Isaiah only xli. 18; lxiii. 14. ——The expression כְּבוֹד י׳ is found in Isaiah again only xxxv. 2; lviii. 8; lx. 1. נגלה כבוד י׳ does not occur again in Isaiah. The expression seems to connect with נִרְאָה כבוד י׳ in the Pentateuch: Exod. xvi. 10; Lev. ix. 6; Num. xiv. 10, etc.——כל־בשר found again only xlix. 26; lxvi. 16, 23, 24; with following יַחַד again only in Job xxxiv. 15.——The clause וראו to יחדו is to be referred to what precedes, and not to what follows. For if ראו were to be taken in the sense of spiritual seeing, of knowing, still it would be a secondary thought that all flesh shall know that revelation as one that was announced beforehand. The chief thing will be that they will verify with their own eyes that revelation. And this seeing shall win them to the Lord. Moreover ראו evidently corresponds to the preceding נִגְלָה. Therefore the pronominal object must be supplied to ראו as is often the case. The causal clause כי פי י׳ ד׳ relates to all that precedes.

Ver. 6. Notice the verbal form אמר with a simple Vav copulativum. It does not say וַיֹּאמֶר. That would be to present this saying as a new chief member of the consecutio rerum, of the succession of facts that naturally unfold themselves. That might and perhaps would have happened were it a merely earthly transaction that is treated. To represent such in the completeness of its successive points, it must have read: וָאֶשְׁמַע קוֹל אֹמֵר וַיֹּאמֶר מָה אֶקְרָא וַיַּעַן וגו׳. But the Prophet translates us into the spirit world where time and space cease. There what with us develops one after another is side by side. For this reason the Prophet here makes use of a form of speech which otherwise serves only to fill out some trait or to mention accompanying circumstances: comp. vi. 3; xxi. 7; xxix. 11 sq.; lxv. 8.——כָּל־הַבָּשָׂר: בשר is meant collectively or as designation of the genus: whereas in כל־בשר ver. 5 (each flesh) it has individual signification.

Ver. 7. The perfects יָבֵשׁ and נָבֵל must not be compared with the aoristus gnomicus of the Greeks (nor even xxvi. 9; comp. my remarks in loc.). For only that Hebrew verbal form that has, too, the notion of succession, therefore includes that of time, viz.: the imperf., with Vav cons., can be compared with the Greek aorist. Here, as in xxvi. 9, the perf., designates timeless objectivity and reality. כי is not "for," but "when." Were it taken in the sense of "for," then the nature of the wind would be designated as the constant cause of the withering of vegetation. But it withers also when its time comes, without wind. But when a hot desert wind (xviii. 4; Jer. iv. 11) blows, then it withers especially quick. נָשַׁב flavit, inflavit, occurs in Kal only here. Hiph. Gen. xv. 11; Ps. cxlvii. 18.——There is much uncertainty about the origin of the particle אָכֵן. Gesen. (Thes. p. 668 under לָכֵן), Fuerst. (Lex. under אכן and כן) and Ewald § 205 d seem to me to be right in maintaining that אכן, on account of its derivation from כֵּן, has resident in it an argumentative meaning. Thus Fuerst. regards it primarily as "a strengthened כֵּן — therefore in a resumptive apodosis." He refers in proof to Exod. ii. 14 and to our passage. And in fact Exod. ii. 14 seems to involve the drawing of a conclusion. For after Moses perceived the defiant answer of the Hebrew man, he cries out: אָכֵן נוֹדַע הַדָּבָר. Would not this be most correctly rendered: "is the matter therefore really known?"——It is clear that the omission of ver. 7 in the Alexand. and Vatic. text of the LXX. is owing to arbitrariness, if not to oversight. Koppe, Gesenius, Hitzig, who regard the whole verse, or at least 7 b as a gloss, as "a very diluted, sense-disturbing thought," as "an ejaculation of a reader," only prove thereby how little they have understood the sense and connection of the prophetic discourse.

Ver. 8. The words יבשׁ חציר are taken verbatim from xv. 6, like נבל ציץ from xxviii. 1, where we find צִיץ נֹבֵל. The expression דבר יקום occurs in Isa. viii. 10, comp. vii. 7.

Ver. 9. Piel בשׂר is exclusively peculiar to part second: xli. 27; lii. 7; lx. 6; lxi. 1, a fact that need occasion no surprise. For it is natural that the word, which means εὐαγγελίζειν, should be found chiefly in the εὐαγγέλιον of the Old Testament.——הָרִים קול xiii. 2, lviii. 1.——בַּכֹּחַ comp. בְּכֹחַ יָדִי x. 13. With that exception כֹּחַ occurs only in the second part: (xxxvii. 3; xl. 26, 29, 31; xli. 1; xliv. 12; xlix. 4; l. 2; lxiii. 1.——The expression אַל תִּירָא is very frequent not only in Isaiah but also in the whole Old Testament; vii. 4; viii. 12; x. 24; xxxv. 4; xxxvii. 6; xl. 9; xli. 10, 13, 14; xliii. 1. 5; xliv. 2; li. 7; liv. 4, 14.——הנה אלהיכם strongly reminds one, and just by reason of what follows, of xxxv. 4. Comp. beside xxv. 9. The expression is found in no other Prophet.

Ver. 10. בְּחָזָק, בְּ essentiae. חזק occurs again xxvii. 1; xxviii. 2.——ארני יהוה occurs ten times in the first part: iii. 15; vii. 7; x. 24, etc., and thirteen times in the second part: xlviii. 16; xlix. 22; l. 4, 5, 9, etc.——The clause וזרע משלה לו is not co-ordinate with the foregoing chief clause, but subordinate to it. It is a clause expressive of situation (comp. Ewald, § 306, c; 341 a, sqq.), that more precisely explains the notion בחזק.——לו is properly Dat. commodi, not mere Dat. ethicus as in עֲלִי־לָךְ ver. 9, which is, moreover, to be seen from the masculine לוֹ. For were it Dat. ethicus, then, corresponding to the gender of זרע, it must read לָהּ.

Ver. 11. It is remarkable that the verb רָעָה is never used in part first in the sense of "to pasture," the action of the shepherd, although רֹעִים "shepherds" occurs xxxi. 4 (xxxviii. 12), (comp. v. 17; xi. 7; xiv. 30; xxvii. 10; xxx. 23). In part second, also, the word means "pasture" in the active sense only once: lxi. 5, three times "pasture" of beasts: xliv. 20; xlix. 9; lxv. 25.——רֹעֶה "shepherd" in part second: xliv. 28; lvi. 11; lxiii. 11.——עדר "the flock" found again xvii. 2; xxxii. 14.——טְלָאִים — טְלָיִים, from טְלִי occurs in Isaiah only here (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 4). Beside this טָלֶה lxv. 25.——חֵיק occurs again only lxv. 6, 7.——The word עָלוֹת is joined Gen. xxxiii. 13 with צאן and בקר; is used therefore of sucking beeves and sheep, 1 Sam. vi. 7, 10 of sucking beeves alone, Ps. lxxviii. 71 as here used of both without addition. The word occurs only here in Isaiah. But comp עוּל, "the suckling" xlix. 15; lxv. 20.——נִהֵל, which has in Gen. xlvii. 17 the meaning "to bring through," sustentare, 2 Chr. xxxii. 22, the meaning "to protect, hedge about," and also Isa. li. 18 the meaning "careful guiding," occurs in Isaiah beside here and the passage just named, only xlix. 10.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. We have here before us the Prologue both of the first discourse and of the entire prophetic cycle of xl. 12—lxvi. 24. For the representation of Jehovah as the comforter after protracted suffering (vers. 1, 2), as the true One, whose word abides when all that is earthly is destroyed (vers. 6-8), and as the true shepherd that leads His people with paternal care (ver. 11) corresponds to what follows (xl. 12 and onwards), wherein Jehovah is portrayed as the infinite, incomparable, almighty God, and the restorer of His people, so that we find in our passage the keynote of the whole of part second of Isaiah's prophecies. Their contents are predominantly consolatory; but our passage is like the outline of the thoughts of peace therein unfolded. The outward form of the discourse, moreover, bears the imprint of this inward correspondence. The entire second part is dominated by the fundamental number three. For it is composed of three subdivisions, of which each consists of three times three, therefore nine discourses. But our Prologue consists first of an introduction that contains twice three clauses. By three imperatives, namely ("comfort ye," "speak ye," "cry") it is announced that the Lord has a comforting message for His people, and by three clauses, each of which begins with כִּי ("that," "that," "for") is stated what is the contents of this joyful message (vers. 1, 2). Hahn was the first to maintain (what Delitzsch, too, finds "not without truth," p. 408) that these three clauses beginning with כִּי correspond to the three calls that follow (vers. 3-5, 6-8, 9-11) and to the three parts of the book, not only in respect to number but also their contents. That there is a correspondence in respect to number can hardly be doubted. But that the contents corresponds to the three times three corresponding degrees can only be made out by great ingenuity.

After the prologue of the prologue, there follow, as remarked, three calls, each of which comprises three Masoretic verses. But by the similar beginnings of the three calls, and by their internal arrangement, it appears certain that the Masoretic division into verses corresponds in general here to that division into periods intended also by the author. Only in regard to the first הנה (behold) at the close of ver. 9 (comp. below) there may be a divergence. Each of the three calls begins with a vivid dramatic announcement. And here, in fact, occurs a remarkable gradation. The first call is introduced by the simple קול קורא ("Hark! a call"). The second call begins with the extended formula, containing a summons to call קול אמר קרא ואמר מה אקרא. The third call, finally, begins with a still more comprehensive formula of summons. It contains three members: 1) go up on a high mountain evangelist Zion; 2) raise with might thy voice evangelist Jerusalem; 3) raise it, fear not, say to the cities of Judah. Herewith it is worthy of notice that the third member itself has again three verbs ("raise, "be not afraid," "say"). There follows then on this threefold formula of summons a threefold הנה (behold) vers. 9, 10. Here, perhaps, the Masoretic division into verses may not quite correspond to the meaning of the Prophet. For if the first הנה corresponds to the two that follow, then the clause introduced by it ought rather to be referred to what follows. Verse 9, accordingly, ought to end with the word Judah. The concluding verse (11) also contains three members: 1) he shall feed his flock like a shepherd; 2) he shall gather —— bosom; 3) shall gently lead —— with young. According to this the division into threes is not absolutely carried out in the prologue, but only just so far as it could be done without spiritless, outward mechanism, and tiresome monotony, and with such delicacy that it reveals itself only to close observation and not at all in a disagreeable way. Thereby the Prophet has proved himself to be a real artist. Moreover this tripartite division has its complete analogy in Isaiah's style in that twofold division that we noticed in the second introduction and in chaps. xxiv.—xxvii.

In regard to the order of thought, the three calls contain a threefold specification of that general announcement of salvation contained in vers. 1 and 2. The first call (vers. 3-5) expresses the thought that now is the time to get out of the way every outward and inward obstacle that may obstruct the promised revelation of glory. The second call (vers. 6-8) declares that all earthly glory—even of the elect people—must be destroyed before and in order that Jehovah's promise of glory may be fulfilled in its complete sense. The third call, finally, (vers. 9-11) summons Israel, which is in exile, to rally to its LORD, who comes as Redeemer, and to commit itself to His faithful, parental guidance.

2. Comfort——all her sins.—Vers. 1, 2. With three emphatically comforting words the Prophet begins. For the twice-repeated נחמו, that stands significantly at the head, as the stamp, so to speak, of the entire second part, is not alone comforting. The object "my people," that depends on it, is quite as much so. Although judged and exiled, Israel had not ceased to be Jehovah's people, the elect peculiar people. It is usual to understand the prophets to be the ones addressed. But it was not possible for every Israelite to hear the voice of a prophet directly. Hence there lies also in the words a summons to carry the prophetic word further. Every one shall help to comfort. Each one shall contribute his part, so that the comforting word of God may come to all the members of the people. Not once only will the LORD assure Israel of His consolation. With emphasis in ver. 2 He summons the same ones whom He had already commanded in ver. 1 to comfort His people, to speak to the heart of Jerusalem (personification and metonymy at the same time, comp. iv. 4; xl. 9; xli. 27). The phrase דבר על־לב (to speak out over the heart, to charm the heart, to cover with words, to sooth, to quiet) occurs elsewhere eight times in the Old Test.: Gen. xxxiv. 3; l. 21; Jud. xix. 3; Ruth ii. 13; 2 Sam. xix. 8; 2 Chron. xxx. 22; xxxii. 6; Hos. ii. 16. Whereas "speak ye to the heart" implies affecting address, קראו (call ye) involves rather the notion of loud, strong and clear speaking. By every means the conviction must be brought to the people that now the time of grace is at hand. —צָבָא, militia, "warfare" is used here figuratively as in Job vii. 1; x. 17; xiv. 14. As in general the trials and troubles of this life can be set forth as conflicts (comp. Eph. vi. 11 sqq.; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 3 sqq.; iv. 7), so here the whole time of Israel's affliction and suffering and especially the exile is designated as a time of conflict.

The second clause כי נרצה עונה ("for her guilt is thoroughly tasted"), is difficult. First of all it must be noted that the Prophet has here in mind the passages Lev. xxvi. 34, 41, 43. It is said there that when the judgment of exile shall come upon the people Israel the land will be desert, and by that means shall enjoy the rest which it could not enjoy so long as the land was inhabited by a disobedient people that would not observe the prescribed Sabbath seasons (אֵת אֲשֶׁר לֹא־שָׁבְתָה בְּשַׁבְּתֹתֵיכֶם בְּשִׁבְתְּכֶם עָלֶיהָ Lev. xxvi. 35). The land will then enjoy its time of rest (תִּרְצֶה אֶת־שַׁבְּתֹתֶיהָ ver. 34). רָצָה with the accusative is "to have pleasure in something, enjoy something, delectari aliquare." The Hiph. הִרְצָת that stands parallel with תִּרְצֶה is nothing else than a direct causative Hiphil which means "delectationem agere, to pursue pleasure," thus signifies continued, undisturbed enjoyment; as e. g. הִשְׁקִיט is not merely quietum facere but quietum agere (vii. 4), and like expressions, such as הִלְבִּין ,הִשְׁמִין, etc., signify not merely "make fat, make white," but a continued activity whose product is "to be fat, to be white." In contrast with this thought that the land shall enjoy its period of rest stands now the other (Lev. xxvi. 41, 43) that the people in exile shall enjoy their guilt: "the land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them; and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity" (וְהֵם יִרְצוּ אֶת־עֲוֹנָם "they shall enjoy their fault," ver. 43). This expression "enjoy their guilt," is manifestly ironical. Whereas the absence of the wicked people is for the land a benefit, an enjoyment, the people in exile must enjoy the fruit of their disobedience. They must at last taste how bitter and bad it is to forsake the LORD (Jer. ii. 19), after having been unwilling to believe that apostacy from the LORD was ruinous. If now רָצָה עָוֹן is frui culpa, delectari culpa, then נִרְצָה עָוֹן is the passive of it, and means "the fault is enjoyed, thoroughly tasted." Niph. נִרְצָה, it is true, occurs in many places where it is used of the favorable acceptance of sacrifices. But there it means "enjoyed," "accepted as lovely enjoyment," "to be pronounced welcome." Moreover this use is found only in Leviticus: i. 4; vii. 18; xix. 7; xxii. 23, 25, 27.

If עָוֹן ever had the meaning "guilt offering," then the matter would be quite simple. For then עונה נרצה would mean "their guilt offering is favorably accepted." But it never has this meaning. We can only say therefore that the Prophet construes נרצה in the sense of "is enjoyed," so that it forms the antithesis of ירצו עונם, Levit. xxvi. 41, 43.

That mournful time when Israel must enjoy the bitter fruits of its sin is now gone. The peculiar ironical antithesis of "the land shall enjoy her sabbaths," and "they shall enjoy their fault," has the effect that we are necessitated to hear now of an enjoyed, thoroughly tasted guilt-broth into which they have broken crumbs for themselves and have now eaten it up. The third clause beginning with כִּי is best construed as an objective clause parallel with the two preceding objective clauses. For if it were a causal clause, as HAHN would have it, it must be so indicated by an unmistakable causal particle opposed to the two objective particles preceding. But that the Perfect לקחה is not to be taken in a future sense ("in time to come receives," HAHN) is plain from the parallelism with the foregoing Perfects. Nor can כִּפְלַיִם mean the double amount of salvation (HAHN, comp. lxi. 7), for neither לקחה, nor בכל־חטאתיה suits that. The former does not for the reasons already given; the latter does not because it must in that case read תַּחַת. For how HAHN can say that the sins are the means by which Jerusalem comes into possession of a double amount of salvation is incomprehensible. If Jerusalem had not committed these sins, would it then have been the worse off for it? The Prophet can therefore only mean to say that Jerusalem has received double punishment, has been chastised with double rods. Then בְּ is the preposition of recompense, as the recompense may be regarded as the means in order to acquiring the thing ["comp. Gen. xxix. 18, בְּרָחֵל, properly by means of Rachel, as the price is the means by which one acquires the work or the wares." From Dr. N.'s Gramm.—TR.].

But how can it be said that Jehovah has laid on double the punishment deserved? How does this agree with His justice? One must remember first that the executors of the judgments against Israel did not merely restrict themselves to the measure of chastisement determined by Jehovah, but ex propriis intensified it, and thus brought on Israel a measure of punishment pressed down and shaken together (x. 7; Jer. l. 7, 11. 17, etc.). Yet if Jehovah permitted this, He is still accountable for it, seeing He could hinder it. And Jer. xvi. 18: "And first I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double" shows that this severe measure was intended by God. But was it really too severe? DELITZSCH is right in saying that the expression is not to be taken in a juristic sense. It is rather to be taken rhetorically. It is an hyperbola, meant to set forth the compassionating love of God in the clearest light. For this love is at once so high and so humble that it accuses and excuses itself as if it had done too much in the way of punishment. Thereby, too, it betrays the motive for that overflowing salvation it proposes to display. For if one has given others so much pain, he will gladly make it up by so much the greater benefaction.

It is to be noticed that in vers. 1, 2, first the Prophet speaks. For by means of "saith your God" he takes up the word himself in order to introduce the LORD as speaking the remaining words to עונה. In the latter half of ver. 2 the Prophet himself again speaks, as appears from "the hand of the LORD." The Prophet therefore partly cites the verba ipsissima of Jehovah, partly states what the LORD has done. This is the usual manner of prophetic announcements. It is necessary to note this here, because in what follows there is joined in climax fashion an unusual form of announcement.

2. The voice——hath spoken it.—Vers. 3–5. The Prophet hears a voice. He does not say whence or from whom the voice came. This is unusual. For if now and then in other cases the prophets hear terrestrial or super-terrestrial voices, still in every case the source of it is explained. The context makes known whence and why the voice sounds (comp. xxi. 11; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. x. 9). Here one learns only that a voice sounded. This is manifestly a rhetorical embellishment. The Prophet would make prominent thereby the importance of what follows by saying that it was important to him in an especially solemn way by a special superterrestrial voice. קול קורא can in itself mean: "a voice cries" (comp. e. g. Mic. vi. 9). But it is more drastic and consonant with other analogies to take the words as an exclamatory phrase and as a genitive relation (comp. vi. 4; xiii. 4; lii. 8; lxvi. 6). A heavenly messenger, then, brings the command to prepare for the Lord the way through the desert (vers. 3, 4). This command has evidently a double sense. For in the first place the people shall in fact be redeemed out of exile and be brought back home. And Jehovah Himself will conduct this return, as appears beyond doubt from vers. 9–11. But the LORD will lead them in order that the journey of the people may be made easy and prosperous without obstacle or attack (comp. xli. 17 sqq.; xliii. 1 sqq., 14 sqq.; xlviii. 20 sq.; xlix. 9 sqq.; lv. 12 sq.; lvii. 14). Such is certainly the immediate sense of our passage. In fact, the whole context, especially in its immediate connection with the comforting prologue, proves that it contains a promise and not an exhortation to repentance. With this agrees ver. 5, which plainly declares that vers. 3, 4 announce the fulfilment, evident to all the world, of a promise given long before by the LORD. But of course it cannot be doubted that the old figurative meaning given already by John the Baptist is also justified. For in the first place it comports with the universal and everywhere to be assumed principles of the divine pedagogy, that that physical desolation of the way homewards were not possible without an ethical desolation of the ways of the heart. And in the second place, since the language is such that it can mean both, this possibility of double-meaning makes it a natural conjecture that such was actually intended. In the third place it is to be noticed that this first voice announces the chief matter, redemption and return home, in a general way. The second (vers. 6–8) gives explanation respecting the when of its accomplishment. The third (vers. 9–11) defines the manner of fulfilment, and contains only in this respect those two points, one after the other, which in vers. 3–5 we observe in one another. For what is that "behold your God," ver. 9, but the announcement that the LORD by repentance and faith will come to His people? And what are vers. 10 and 11 but the statement that the LORD Himself as a parental guide will come home with His people?

בַּמִּדְבָּר ver. 3 is referred by the LXX., the VULG. and the Evangelists (Mat. iii. 3: Mark i. 3; Luke iii. 4) to what precedes. This is not only contrary to the accents, but to the very sound of the words, since בַּמִּדְבָּר evidently corresponds to the following בָּעֲרָבָה, and must be construed like the latter. John the Baptist, in the application of these words, calling himself a φωνὴ βοῶντος ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ (John i. 23), followed the LXX. He found in that sound of words familiar to his hearers, which our passage has in that translation, a fitting expression for what he would say, without meaning to give thereby an authentic interpretation of the original text (comp. THOLUCK, The Old Testament in the New, 1838, p. 5). For when DELITZSCH says: "One may, indeed ought, as it appears, to represent to himself that the caller, going out into the desert, summons men to make a road in it," I can find no point of support for this statement in the Hebrew text. The command to make a road in the desert does not of necessity sound out of the desert itself. If the matter itself presents no necessity for this view, I see nothing else in the Hebrew text to indicate that the voice which the Prophet heard sounded out from the desert. Therefore the meaning which the Baptist, following the LXX., gives to the words קוֹל קוֹרֵא בַּמִּדְבָּר seems to me to belong to the category of those free citations that occur so often in the New Testament in reference to Old Testament passages, and which constitute one of those departments of biblical hermeneutics that still remain the most obscure. Of course from our point of view no objection arises against the meaning and application given by the Evangelists (especially Luke iv. 3–6) to the words that follow בַּמִּדְבָּר.

The Piel פִּנָּה, used elsewhere also of clearing out a house (Gen. xxiv. 31; Lev. xiv. 36) occurs again in reference to ways, in the sense of "making clear, light, opening a road;" lvii. 14; lxii. 10; Mal. iii. 1, the last of which passages is likely a reference to the present. The subject of lvii. 14 and lxii. 10 is also that road on which the people shall return out of exile to their home. If the customary route from Babylon to Canaan did not pass through the desert, yet the properly nearest one did. And from יַשְּׁרוּ and ver. 4 it is seen that Israel was to go along, not only the most convenient, but also the directest way home. From Egypt, also, the people had to traverse the desert in order to reach Canaan. The notion "desert" plays an important part in all the pictures of the future that relate to the deliverance out of exile. How consonant to Isaiah's style it is to represent, that on their return home also from the second exile Israel will wander through the desert, may be seen from xi. 15, 16. The meaning of יַשְּׁרוּ is evidently that the way of the people shall go out straight, and thus be as short as possible. To be such, it must make no deviations either in horizontal or vertical directions. The former appears to be the meaning of ver. 3 b; the latter is made prominent ver. 4. The valleys (the form גֶּיא only here) shall raise themselves (נִשָּׂא used antithetically with שָׁפֵל 11, 12; comp. ii. 2, 13, 14; vi. 1; xxx. 25; xxxiii. 10; lii. 13; lvii. 7, 15), and all mountains and hills shall lower themselves [שָׁפֵל, see Text. and Gr.] the rugged places shall become even and the connection of mountains [רְכָסִים Bergjoch see Text. and Gram.] shall become valley depths. The Prophet would say, therefore, that the obstacles that would prevent the coming of the LORD into the heart of His people, and thereby hinder the coming of the people into their land, shall be rid away. And should not thereby the glory of Jehovah become manifest to the world? When the nations see how gloriously the people Israel serve their God and how gloriously He serves His people, will they not make efforts to attain the righteousness and salvation of this people and seek the LORD who is the author of both (comp. ii. 2 sq.)? The great, glorious promise, which the Prophet has just announced, must be fulfilled, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, and the mouth of the LORD does not lie. The expression occurs in Isaiah again i. 20; lviii. 14. Comp. on i. 2.

4. The voice——stand forever.—Vers. 6–8. The rhetorical dress of this second call, contains in relation to the first a climax. For there it is simply said: "voice of one crying." But here: "voice of one saying, cry! And answer: what shall I cry?" Thus a second voice here precedes the voice of the one calling, and summons him to cry. This is indeed primarily rhetorical embellishment. Yet this embellishment has its material reason. In the first place, not only is the importance of the call set in the clearest light, but also its divine source, as we have already seen was also the aim of קוֹל קֹרֵא ver. 3. In the second place we have this additional, that the caller must be summoned to call. The reason for this seems to me to be, that the second call expresses properly as its immediate thought something unpleasant. It is like a shadow that not only suddenly, but also almost incomprehensibly breaks in on the full light of the foregoing announcement of consolation. For is it not an oppressive thought, that not only all glory of the kingdoms of this world (that alone were indeed consolation for Israel), but also that all merely earthly glory of the elect people is subject to change? Is it not a deep humiliation that comes also on the people of God, that it is said to them, they must be divested of all their own human strength and adornment, and thus first share the fate of the totality of profane flesh, before the divine promise can be fulfilled to them? Behind the caller, therefore, there appears another that commands him to call out what, of himself, he would not have called. The first call is quite spontaneous: the second is by special command. The LXX. and VULG. take the view, that the summons to call is directed to the Prophet, whence they translate וְאָמַר by καὶ εἶπα, et dixi. But this is plainly caprice. The Prophet describes a visionary transaction: he relates only what he has seen and heard. וְאָמַר [see Text. and Gram.] must therefore signify that all that is related here took place simultaneously, and together, and not one after another. This suits capitally the pregnant brevity which the Prophet studiously observes here generally. He marks out the chief features with only a few strong touches of the brush. Hence he leaves unnoted whether we are to regard כל־הבשׂר וגו׳ as the language of the one calling or of the questioner. It could be both. The questioner could have noticed the answer without the Prophet hearing it. Or the caller could answer audibly to the Prophet. It was then unnecessary to make the questioner say again what was heard. In short, the Prophet tells us only once what from the nature of the case must have been spoken twice.

As vers. 3, 4 are no exhortation to repentance, so too vers. 6–8 are not meant to be a sermon on the perishableness of all that is earthly. For what fitness were there in such a sermon here? Israel is to be comforted; the downfall of the world-power at present so flourishing, the end of their period of conflict, and a corresponding period of glory and triumph is to be held up to view. But at the same time Israel is to be warned, in reference to its entrance upon these, not to surrender itself to rash, fleshly hopes. For the promises of that time of glory will not be so quickly fulfilled. Israel thinks, perhaps, that the present generation, that the nation as at present constituted, that the present reigning Davidic dynasty, that the present Jerusalem as now existing is to behold that glory. Just that is false hope. For all these are flesh, and therefore grass and flower of the field, and as such will and must perish. Thereupon, naturally, the fleshly Israel asks: how can then the promises of the LORD be fulfilled? If Jerusalem with the temple is destroyed, and the posterity of David extinct, the nation dissolved as a state and scattered in all lands, where then does there remain room and possibility for the realization of that which God has promised? The word of the LORD standeth forever, replies the Prophet. The perishing of all that is flesh in the people of God is no obstacle to the realization of what God has promised. On the contrary! The Prophet makes us read between the lines, that the word of the LORD, precisely because of its own imperishable nature, finds in what perishes rather a hinderance than a condition of its own fulfilment. Such is in general the sense of our passage. If we have correctly apprehended it, then the Prophet means thereby to prevent erroneous representations in regard to the time and manner of fulfilling what he has before, and especially in ver. 5, held in prospect.

Grass as an image of the perishable, Ps. xxxvii. 2; xc. 5 sq.; ciii. 15; cxxix. 6; Job viii. 12. Also flowers: Job xiv. 2; Ps. ciii. 15. The word חֶסֶד occurs only here in the sense of physical loveliness, agreeableness. Elsewhere it is always used of the ethical friendliness, favor, complacency of persons (men and God). But has not the poet a right to personify things, and to represent lovely, gracious appearance as the favor and friendliness that they show us? Whence the rendering δόξα (LXX.), gloria (VULG.) is inexact (more suitable εὐπρέπεια, Jas. i. 11), but to retain the meaning "piety" would be pedantry. If the loveliness of human things is like the grass and the flower of the field, then it must resemble these not only in blossoming, but also in casting its blossoms. The continuance of bloom here as well as there is short. Indeed grass and flower do not even complete the brief period of bloom appointed them by nature. They wither before their time when the LORD breathes on them with the scorching wind as with a hot breath. The wind is called רוּחַ ׳ה— not only because it is Jehovah that charges it with its mission, but because, as breath, as life respiration of nature, it has a likeness to the Spirit of God. Thus in other places not only is the Spirit of God that operates like the wind (1 Kings xviii. 12; 2 Kings ii. 16) designated רוּחַ ׳ה, but also the wind that operates like the Spirit of God (Hos. xiii. 15; Isa. lix. 19).

From the antithesis to the concluding words, the word of the Lord shall stand forever, we may infer that the Prophet in vers. 6–8 has in mind primarily the people Israel. For would the Prophet thus here in the prologue to his great consolatory discourse comfort the heathen? Does he not begin with the words: "comfort, comfort ye my people?" Thus we must understand by "the word that stands" primarily that word of promise given to Israel. The continuance of this is made prominent in contrast with the perishing of all flesh; thus, also, of the outward, fleshly Israel. From the general statement, "all flesh is grass," ver. 6, the Prophet draws the conclusion, ver. 7: therefore, verily, the people is grass, and to this is joined the further consequence that therefore the people as grass and flower must wither and fade (ver. 8). Hence the literal repetition of "the grass withereth, the flower fadeth." From what has been said already, it results of course that we must understand by הָעָם, ver. 7, Israel and not human kind (xlii. 5). At the same time it is made clear that there is nothing superfluous in the text, but rather that the Prophet employs only what is needful to express his thought. He would say that, even if in the remote future all that is earthly, and even what is earthly in the holy people, will have perished, still the word of the LORD will remain and demonstrate its truth by the fulfilment of its contents.

5. O Zion——that are with young.—Vers. 9–11. The third call begins also with a solemn summons to let the call sound forth, and this third formula of summons is the most copious of all, so that in this respect a gradation occurs. The Prophet so far had heard the summons to call and the contents of the call from above, so that he only cited to his readers things heard; but here it is himself that emits the summons to call, and defines the contents of what is to be called. As a man he turns to, an ideal person, it is true, yet one conceived as human, to Zion or Jerusalem personified, and commissions it to assemble all its children, that they may rally about the newly appearing, strong Saviour, and commit themselves to His faithful guidance into their home. The relation of this call therefore to the two that precede, is that it points to the gathering for the journey and the guidance and providence during the journey, after that the first call had treated of the inward and outward preparation of the way, and the second had dealt with the period of the journey. The first announcement of a call, ver. 3, contained one member; the second, which at the same time is a summons to call, ver. 6, contained two members; the last, ver. 9, that contains two summons, has three members. Thus we see the inward emotion of the Prophet grows more intense and seeks its expression in a climax. For this purpose the personification of the central point of the nation is distributed, that is to say, the function is assigned to a twofold personification, Zion and Jerusalem, although each of these two and both together represent only one subject, viz., the ideal centre of the nation that must now again become active and head the cities of Judah. This distribution of the role of representation among the two notions Zion and Jerusalem is frequent in both parts of our book: ii. 3; iv. 3, 4; x. 12, 32; xxiv. 23; xxxi. 9; xxxiii. 20; xxxvii. 22, 32; xli. 27; xlvi. 13; lii. 1, 2; lxii. 1; lxiv. 10. It is worthy of notice, that this form of expression is by no means found in all the prophets. First we find it in Joel: iii. 5; iv. 16, 17; next in Amos: i. 2; then in Micah, the contemporary of Isaiah: iii. 10, 12; iv. 2. It is remarkable that Jeremiah uses the expression only in two places: xxvi. 18, as a citation from Micah iii. 12, and li. 35. In Lamentations the expression occurs three times: i. 17; ii. 10, 13. It is found beside Zeph. iii. 14, 16 and Zech. i. 14, 17; viii. 3; ix. 9.

Zion must ascend a high mountain in order to be heard afar (comp. xlii. 11; the expression הר גבה again xxx. 25; lvii. 7). Zion and Jerusalem are addressed as מְבַשֶּׂרֶת. This word therefore has not the genitive relation to Zion and Jerusalem ="Zion's herald of joy." Such it is taken to be by the LXX., VULG., TARG., and after these by GESENIUS, HITZIG, KNOBEL, HAHN, etc. It is the attribute of Zion and Jerusalem, as the following reasons show: 1) According to the view of those that assume the genitive relation, מבשרת is to be construed collectively, and designate the messengers of salvation as a totality, so that it stands for מְבַשְּׂרִים and means the "embassy of salvation" (Heilsbotenschaft, KNOBEL). But even if grammatically this is allowable, still such a collective designation of messengers or of prophets is quite contrary to the usus loquendi. In this sense the sing. masc. מְבַשֵּׂר is used Isa. lii. 7; Nah. ii. 1. Moreover one would expect, in order to obviate indistinctness, that the verbs would be in the plural (עֲלוּ, הָרִימוּ, etc.). קֹהֶלֶת, which is quoted as analogous, means, according to Eccl. i. 1, not a plurality, but a single person. 2) HAHN says it were "inadmissible to use Jerusalem antithetically to the cities of Judah, seeing it belongs itself to them." But it is just the constant usus loquendi with Isaiah to distinguish Jerusalem and Judah (meaning the cities of Judah): i. 1; ii. 1; iii. 1, 8; v. 23; xxii. 21; xxxvi. 7; xliv. 26. This finds, too, its echo in later books: Jer. iv. 5; ix. 10; xi. 12; xxv. 18; Zech. i. 12; Psalm lxix. 36. Precisely this prominent part, which we thus see Jerusalem play, justifies us in maintaining that the Prophet means not to rank Jerusalem with the cities of Judah, but would summon it to exercise its primacy over them. It is even a very important point in salvation, that at once, still in the exile, the old domestic constitutional organism should have effect. Jerusalem must at once exercise her maternal right over her daughters (comp. e. g. Ezek. xvi. 48, 55). She must gather them like a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and require them to receive well their LORD and rally under His leadership for the return home. Involuntarily we are reminded here of the fact, that a great part of the Israelites, when they received the permission or rather summons to return home to Palestine, preferred to remain in the land of exile. These did not recognize the visitation of their God in that altered sentiment of the world-power toward the kingdom of God, in that wonderful summons to return home, as also later, when the LORD came in person to His own, His own did not receive Him (John i. 11). [See LANGE on John i. 11, which he refers to the theocratic advent in the Old Testament, and thus exactly to the present subject as included.—TR.] By Behold your God, the LORD is, as it were, presented to His people. What the LORD, who has thus appeared in the midst of His people, would now further reveal, how especially He would show Himself toward the people, this is now described by a series of imperfects only, because these were still purely latent facts. First, it is said the Lord comes as a strong one. Not only will the LORD be strong, but He will also show Himself strong. His arm will so rule that it shall benefit Him, not others, as is the case under a weak regent. As there lies in the for him the idea that He undertakes for Himself, so the following clause expresses that, opposed to others, He knows also how to preserve the suum cuique. He has for friend and foe the reward prepared that becomes each. One will not err in taking שָׂכָר, which is never used in malam partem, in a good sense. On the other hand, פְּעֻלָּה, which occurs also of retributive punishment (Ps. cix. 20; Isa. lxv. 7), may be understood in a bad sense. פעלה is primarily labore partum, that which is wrought out, then, generally, what is acquired, effected, retribution (Lev. xix. 13; Isaiah xlix. 4; comp. Job vii. 2; Jer. xxii. 13). The words הנה שכרו וגו occur literally again lxii. 11. זְרֹעַ occurs in the symbolical sense also xxxiii. 2, yet much oftener in part second: xl. 10; xlviii. 14; li. 5, 9; lii. 10; liii. 1; lix. 16; lxiii. 5, 12. The passages lix. 16; lxiii. 5 are especially worthy of notice, because the form of expression וַתּוֹשַׁע לוֹ זְרֹעוֹ occurs there reminding us of משלה לו. Verse 11 makes the impression as if thereby the prophet would obviate the dread of the hardships of the return journey, especially in reference to the delicate women and children. Hence it is said that the LORD will lead His people as a good shepherd leads his flock. The tender lambs that cannot walk, the good shepherd gathers in his strong arm and carries them in his bosom—that is, in the bosom of his garment.

2. JEHOVAH'S INFINITUDE AND INCOMPARABLENESS THE OBJECTIVE BASIS OF THE REDEMPTION.

CHAPTER XL. 12–26.

12 WHO hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand,
And [a]meted out heaven with the span,
And [b]comprehended the dust of the earth in a [c]measure,
And weighed the mountains in scales,
And the hills in a balance?
13 Who hath [a]directed the Spirit of the LORD,
Or being [a]his counsellor hath taught him?
14 With whom took he counsel, and who [a]instructed him,
And taught him in the path of judgment,
And taught him knowledge,
And showed to him the way of [4a]understanding?
15 Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket,
And are counted as the small dust of the balance:
Behold, he taketh up the isles as [d]a very little thing.
16 And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn,
Nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering.
17 All nations before him are as nothing;
And they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity.
18 To whom then will ye liken God?
Or what likeness will ye compare unto him?
19 The workman [e]melteth a graven image,
And the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold,
And casteth silver chains.
20 He that [f]is so impoverished that he hath no oblation
Chooseth a tree that will not rot;
He seeketh unto him a cunning workman to prepare a graven image, that shall not [f]be moved.
21 [g]Have ye not known? have ye not heard?
Hath it not been told you from the beginning?
Have ye not understood [h]from the foundations of the earth?
22 [a]It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth,
And the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers;
That stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain,
And spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in:
23 That bringeth the princes to nothing;
He maketh the judges of the earth as vanity.
24 Yea, they [i]shall not be planted;
Yea, they [j]shall not be sown:
Yea, their stock [k]shall not take root in the earth:
And [l]he shall also blow upon them, and they [m]shall wither,
And the whirlwind [n]shall take them away as stubble.
25 To whom then will ye liken me,
Or shall I be equal?
Saith the Holy One.
26 Lift up your eyes on high, and behold
Who hath created these things,[o]
That bringeth out their host by number:
He calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power;
Not one faileth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See the List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 12. מָדַד—שֹׁעַל—זֶרֶת—תִּכֵּן—שָׁלִשׁ—פֶּלֶס—מֹאזְנַיִם. Ver. 13. עֵצָה—הוֹדִיעַ. Ver. 14. הֵבִין—נוֹעַץ. Ver. 15. הֵן—נָטַל—דַּק—שַׁחַק—דְּלִי—מַר—אִיִּים—גוֹיִם. Ver. 16. דֵּי. Ver. 17. אַיִן—נֶגֶד—אֶפֶס—תֹּהוּ. Ver. 18. עֵרֶךְ—דְּמוּת. Ver. 19. פֶּסֶל—נָסַךְ—חָרָשׁ—צֹרֵף—רָקַע—רְתֻקָה. Ver. 20. תְּרוּמָה—רָקַב—לֹא־יִמּוֹט—מוֹסְדוֹת. Ver. 21. מֵרֹאשׁ. Ver. 22. חוּג—נֹטֶה—דֹּק—מָתַח. Ver. 23. רוֹזֵן—שֹׁפֵט. Ver. 24. אַף—בַּל—נָשַׁף—סְעָרָה—קַשׁ. Ver. 26. מָרוֹם—בָּרָא—מֵרֹב—אוֹנִים.

Ver. 12. The perfects שקל, תכן, מדד do not mean: who can or will measure, etc.? But: who has measured, etc. The fact that no one has been able can (poetically) serve for proof that it is on the whole impossible. מדד, which occurs only twice in Isaiah, is used by Ezekiel thirty-six times; a proof that the use of a word often depends, not on the subjectivity of the author, but also on the objectivity of the contents.——תָּכַן, related to תָּקַן on the one hand, and to כּוּן on the other, involves the fundamental meaning "to establish." In this sense it is used in various relations wherein it concerns determining a level, evenness, likeness. Piel תִּכֵּן is used Ps. lxxv. 4 of setting up pillars according to the balance; also of raising and leveling a road (Ezek. xviii. 25, 29; xxxiii. 17, 20), then of weighing itself (Job xxviii. 25), then of testing by means of weighing (Prov. xvi. 2; xxi. 2; xxiv. 12), and also of weighing out money (1 Ki. xii. 2). But when "determining the level," has once acquired the meaning "to test," it may stand for all kinds of making trial, even such as occurs without using the scales. Thus it stands here for a testing by measurement by means of the span, and in the same sense ver. 13 of testing and examining the divine spirit. Hence I have in both places translated תכן by "comprehend," because the former (spanning) is a physical, and the latter (examining) is a spiritual comprehending.——Notice that also ו' כל־עפר depends as object on תכן. On the insertion of בשליש after כל see xxxviii. 16. [Gesenius construed כָּל as "the whole" in his Lehrgebäude. But having afterwards observed that the Hebrew text has כָּל with a conjunctive accent, he corrected the error in his Lexicon and Commentary, and referred the word to the root כּוּל, which does not occur elsewhere in Kal, but the essential idea of which, as appears from the Chaldee and Arabic analogy, as well as from its own derivations in Hebrew, is that of measuring, or rather that of holding and containing, which agrees with the common English Version (comprehended)."—J. A. A. See Fuerst, Lex. s. v.—Tr.].

Ver. 13. The clause ואיש עצתו יודיענו is dependent on the interrogation ו' מי תכן. The imperf. is to be construed as jussive, and the paratactic Vav. copul. is to be translated in our syntactical way with "that," as also afterwards in the last clause of ver. 14.

Ver. 14. I think that משפט is to be taken in the wide sense meaning the norm that governs the life of every thing, thus in a certain sense, the natural law and right of everything (comp. e. g. מִשְׁפָּט אַרְמוֹן Jer. xxx. 18; comp. Exod. xxvi. 30; 2 Kings i. 7; Jud. xiii. 12).——לִמֵּד stands with בְּ only here; more frequently הוֹרָה is so construed: 1 Sam. xii. 23; Ps. xxv. 8, 12; xxxii. 8, etc.——דַּעַת and תְּבוּנָה conjoined also xliv. 19 (comp. Exod. xxxi. 3; xxxv. 31; Prov. ii. 6).

Ver. 15. יִטּוֹל is imperf. Kal from נָטַל = "tollere, to lift up."

Ver. 18. דִּמָּה Piel occurs in Isa., meaning "to think, combine, meditari" x. 7; xiv. 24: meaning "to make like," it occurs reflexively xiv. 14 in Hithpael; in part second xl. 25; xlvi. 5. דמה is joined here with אֶל as is נִמְשַׁל xiv. 10; elsewhere it is used with לְ: xlvi. 5; Lam. ii. 13; Song Sol. i. 9.

Ver. 19. הפסל (used Exod. xx. 4; Deut. v. 8; in Isa. see List) stands first emphatically as the chief notion.——רָקַע "to pound, beat" (Ezek. vi. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 43) then "to beat flat," with the hammer, to extend (xlii. 5; xliv. 24, also Piel has this meaning Exod. xxxix. 3; Num. xvii. 4), acquires in our text the meaning "to cover with something beaten out flat," so that רָקַע means "to plate over."——צֹרֵף stands last epanaleptically.—On the frequent omission of the pronominal subject by Isaiah comp. ii. 6; xxiv. 2; xxix. 8; xxxii. 12, etc.

Ver. 20. ["לו may either be reflexive (for himself), as some consider it in ver. 11, and as all admit לְךָ to be in ver. 9, or it may be referred to עֵץ. Having secured the stuff, he seeks for it a skilful workman. As עץ is an obvious antecedent, and as the reflexive use of the pronouns is comparatively rare, this last construction seems entitled to preference."—J. A. A.].

Vers. 22, 23 are without predicate. הישב, הנטה, הנותן are exclamations whose predicate must be supplied. The contents of the verses and what precedes (vers. 19-21) show that this must be "has made the earth."——According to Hebrew usage, the secondary forms (inf. and partic.) return to the principal forms (וימתחם verse 22 and עשה ver. 23). Comp. v. 8, 23; xxxi. 1; xxxii. 6.

Ver. 26. מרב אונים is nearer definition; אמיץ (xxviii. 2) is in apposition with המוציא and with the subject of יקרא.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The exceeding comforting introduction vers. 1–11 does not at once cheer up Israel. Doubts arise. Is the LORD in earnest when He promises? And can He do it too? Shall He that did not uphold us when we stood, lift us up again when we have fallen down? To these doubts, which he utters in express words ver. 27, the Prophet replies in the present section. He amplifies here the incomparableness, the aloneness and infinite sublimity of God. This idea underlies the whole passage.

2. Who hath measured——understanding.—Vers. 12–14. First a standard is given by which one may estimate God's elevation above all human ability to comprehend Him. The hollow hand, the span, the measure, the scales are human measures. Who does not instantly see the impossibility of measuring the divine works of creation with those measures? It is not meant that God has done this, as many expositors would explain. For even if appeal is made to the suffix in שׁעלו as referring to the divine hand, and though the suffix may be supplied to זרת and thus the divine span be understood, still this cannot be done in reference to the measures that follow, which are of human devising and make. Does the Prophet mean to say that there is a divine "measure, scales, balance" of which God made use at the creation? Certainly not. But he would say: what man is able to measure the divine works with his human measures, i. e., to submit them to supplementary inspection and test their correctness? This is confirmed by vers. 13, 14 where it is expressly said that no man before the creation influenced the divine creative thoughts in the way of counseling and guiding (so GESENIUS, HAHN, etc.). The immeasurableness of God is expressed by Jer. x. 6, 7 in this way, which passage especially in ver. 8 sq., unmistakably looks back to our text (see below). שָׁלִישׁ is probably the third part of an Epha, and thus like the סְאָה "seah, measure" (σάτον), of which the Epha contained three, according to the Rabbis, whence the LXX. often translated אֵיפָה "ephah" by τρία μέτρα (Exod. xvi. 36; Isa. v. 10). Comp. HERZ. R.-Encycl. IX. p. 149. Dust of the earth is an expression of the Pentateuch, Gen. xiii. 16; xxviii. 14; Exod. viii. 12, 13. Beside these comp. Job xiv. 19; 2 Sam. xxii. 43. פֶּלֶס distinguished from מאזנים, and certainly the Schnellwage [an apparatus like the steelyard], occurs Prov. xvi. 11. On הרים and גבעות occurring together, see on ver. 4.

As there underlies ver. 12 the thought that no one is in a position to inspect and test the Creator's work after its completion, so vers. 13, 14 would declare that no one could inspire and direct the Creator before He worked. Thus the Prophet asks: Who comprehended the Spirit of Jehovah? The context shows that the Spirit as the Spirit of Creation (Gen. i. 2) is meant. To comprehend the Spirit of God, according to ver. 12, means nothing else than to grasp it, so that he that grasps is greater than the Spirit of God; he spans and from all sides influences it. This passage is cited Rom. xi. 34; 1 Cor. ii. 16. At first sight ver. 14 appears to be only an amplification of ver. 13 b. But from with whom took he counsel it appears that the Prophet makes a distinction. There are counsellors who are consulted as authority and experts, whose word is law to be followed. In this sense, which corresponds also to תכן, ver. 12 seems intended. But there are also counsellors with whom one consults on an equality, but who, still, though equals, in one or other respect, by instruction, correction, defining, influence the determination that is to be made. This seems intended by ver. 14. The Prophet would say that neither in the one nor in the other sense did the LORD have counsellors. The last clause of ver. 14 and shewed to him the way of understanding signifies the consequence of the three preceding verbs of teaching: so that He taught him to know the way of judicious conduct.

3. Behold——and vanity.—Vers. 15–17. The absolute sublimity of God that has been revealed in the creation, is revealed also in history. In the former the Spirit of God showed itself to be conditioned by no one. In the latter the absolute dependence of men on God appears. Not merely single men, but whole nations count for no more before the almighty God than the small drop of a bucket that the bearer does not notice, or than the little crumb in the scale that does not influence the weight. Ver. 16 must be regarded as a parenthesis. For it stands between vers. 14, 15 on the one hand, and ver. 17 on the other, all which compare the greatness of God with earthly greatness, without itself presenting any comparison. Rather ver. 16 draws a conclusion from that incomparable sublimity of God: because He is so great, all the forests of Lebanon do not suffice for a worthy sacrificial fire, nor all the beasts of those forests for a worthy burnt-offering. Of course this very conclusion serves for a measure of the greatness of God, and it seems to me that the Prophet, along with "the nations" and "the isles," the most widely extended and the furthest, (comp. lxvi. 19; Jer. xxxi. 10), would apply as a measure also the earthly highest. But would He also make prominent again the weighty mass of the mountain? He would then for the fourth time have made use of the same figure. Hence, not the ponderous mass of the mountain itself, but as much of its riches in vegetation and animal life as is suitable for the service of the LORD, must serve Him for a figure. דַּי is "sufficientia, copia;" thus דֵּי בָעֵר, דֵּי עֹלָה = sufficientia, copia sufficiens, i. e., satis incendii, sacrificii. The construction is like Lev. v. 7 "if his hand cannot reach the sufficiency of a lamb," i. e., if he cannot bring enough to buy a lamb. Comp. Lev. xii. 8; Deut. xv. 8. Ver. 17 with all the nations joins close with "nations" ver. 15, and recapitulates and intensifies the contents of it. Modern expositors for the most part construe מאפס ו in a partitive sense, because it is nonsense to say: less than nothing, and because כאפס would properly mean "more than nothing." But those are strange scruples. אפס is "the ceasing to be, where there is nothing more, the not being:" תהו is "inanitas, emptiness, void." Now one may say that absolute nihilism, the horror of an absolute emptiness, void is still more impressive than a being that by its miserable nothingness makes not even an impression. And of course מאפס ו' = more than, viz.: in a negative sense. The Prophet, who indeed is governed here wholly by the idea of comparison, compares the nations and the nothing, and finds that the nations in respect to insignificance weigh down more than אֶפֶס and תֹהוּ.

4. To whom then——not one faileth.—Vers. 18–26. Having shown that no finite spirit may compare with God (vers. 12–18), the Prophet shows in these verses that it is also impossible to make any image or likeness of God. Because God has not His like, therefore there is no creature form that is like Him, and under whose image one may represent Him visibly. If this thought, coming in the middle between the promise vers. 1–11, and the inquiry ver. 27, would serve, on the one hand, to assure Israel that Jehovah has the power to keep what He has promised, so, on the other, this painting up the manufacture of idols appears intended to represent to Israel in glaring light, the folly and wrong of such a degradation of divinity to the sphere of common creatures. It is to be noted moreover that this warning in the first Ennead of our book appears in the form of an ascending and descending climax; the Prophet beginning with the more refined form of image worship, ascends to the coarser xliv. 8 sqq., and xlv. 16, and closes again with the more refined xlvi. 5–7. Let it be noted, too, that the Exile any way brought about the great crisis that had for its result an entire breaking with idolatry on Israel's part. Before the Exile they were Jews, and yet at the same time served idols. After the Exile, all that was called Jew renounced idolatry. Whoever still worshipped idols ceased also to be a Jew and disappeared among the heathen. Our passage, as all others of like contents in the second part of Isaiah, attacks still with vigor the coarse idolatry, such as it was in the time of Isaiah. At the close of the Exile such a polemic was no more in place. For then Israel was beyond this sin of its youth. To the overcoming of it the word of the redoubtable Prophet no doubt mightily con ributed.

That in general no one is like the LORD either in heaven or in earth, either among the gods or among the rest of creatures, is the constant teaching of the Old Testament, on the ground of Exod. xv. 11; Deut. iii. 24 (comp. Ps. xxxv. 10; lxxi. 19; lxxxvi. 8; lxxxix. 9; Mic. vii. 18 and CASPARI, Micha der Morastite, p. 16). But from this doctrine must be distinguished the other, of course closely connected with it, that one can and must make no visible image or likeness of God, because with that is given the more refined form of idolatry, that worships Jehovah Himself under an image (comp. on xlvi. 5). This is emphatically enjoined in the Decalogue (Exod. xx. 4; Deut. v. 8), and in Deut. iv. 12 sqq., the reason is given, that on Mount Sinai, Israel observed nothing corporeal of God except the voice. The Prophet here joins on to these propositions of the Law. He shows, by describing the genesis of such idols, how senseless it is to regard images of men's make as adequate representations of the divinity. He shows how all their parts are brought together in succession, by human labor, just as any other product of industry. How disgraceful is the origin of such an idol! Men are its creators. The exterior is gold, but the interior vulgar metal. To keep it from falling, it must be fastened to the wall with chains. When the idol is of wood, especial care must be taken against the wood rotting. And still how often it does rot! To keep the idol from falling it must be rightly proportioned and well fastened. Thus a god concerning which extreme care must be taken to keep it (inwardly) from rotting, and (outworldly) from falling down! מְסֻכָּן is "the reduced, impoverished." For סָכַן, related to שָׁכַן, is "sedere, desidere," מסכן, therefore, is "desidere factus," i. e., one that from standing is made to sit, thus brought down. Also the Arabic meskin = one brought to sit still, i. e., to inactivity, powerlessness (comp. FLEISCHER in DELITZSCH, in loc.). This meaning appears in מִסְכֵּן "poor" (Prov. iv. 13; ix. 15 sq.), and מִסְכֵּנוּת "poverty" (Deut. viii. 9). תְּרוּמָה is the consecrated gift, the voluntary offering presented for the service of the sanctuary; frequent in the Pentateuch after Gen., it occurs only here in Isaiah. הֵכִין is erigere, statuere, stabilire; see List. It is incomprehensible how there can be people among the Israelites to give to idols the honor that becomes divinity. Rightly the Prophet turns to such with the inquiry; are you not in a position to know better? This question he propounds in four clauses. When a man acquires a knowledge of anything, there must first be made to him the suitable communication, and he must corporeally hear it, and spiritually understand it. Hence the Prophet asks if all this has not occurred, only he asks in a reversed order. The spiritual understanding is the decisive and chief concern; hence he puts this first, making the two conditions of hearing and communicating follow. Notice that the Imperfect is used for the subjective transaction of hearing and understanding, while for the objective transaction of communicating the Perfect is used. In these three members the Prophet has, as yet, named no object. This follows in the fourth with the foundations of the earth. Here, too, he uses the Perfect, because he no longer distinguishes the subjective and objective transactions, but would only learn whether the knowledge in question is an actual fact or not. With GESENIUS, STIER, HAHN, I prefer to translate מוסדות fundatio rather than by fundamentum, for which there is adequate justification grammatically. For the word, like מַלְאָךְ, מִשְׁלוֹחַ, מוֹדַעַת, מִשְׁמַעַת, etc., can have primarily an abstract meaning (comp. EWALD § 160 b). This abstract meaning better suits the context, for it concerns, not the make up of the foundations themselves, but the way in which they originated. The Prophet manifestly refers back to vers. 12, 13. How the foundations of the earth were laid, and who laid them, respecting this we have, of course, received intelligence (מֵרֹאשׁ) from the beginning. It is that which has been transmitted from Adam on down, and which we have in its purest form in the Mosaic account of the creation. The Prophet certainly means this latter information, because for him it was the authentic one, divinely attested.

[Respecting the different tenses of the verbs in the first clause of ver. 21; J. A. A., says: "The most satisfactory, because the safest and most regular construction, is the strict one given in the LXX. (οὐ λνώσεσθέ; οὐκ ἀκούσεσθε;) revived by Lowth (will you not know? will you not hear) and approved by Ewald. The clause is then an expression of concern or indignation at their being unwilling to know. There is no inconsistency between this explanation of the first two questions and the obvious meaning of the third, because the proof of their unwillingness to hear and know was the fact of their having been informed from the beginning." The argument, he adds, is to show that they were without excuse, like that of Paul in Rom. i. 20; comp. Acts xiv. 17; xvii. 24.—Tr.].

In vers. 22, 23 (which are without a predicate, see Text. and Gram.), the Prophet would say: not the idols (vers. 19, 20) are the originators of the earth, but He that sits above the circle of the earth, spreads out the heavens and abandons the rulers to nothing. חָגָב "locust," is chosen here on account of likeness in sound to חוּג; it occurs again only Lev. xi. 12; Num. xiii. 33; 2 Chr. vii. 13; Eccl. xii. 5. דֹּק, according to the context "a thin fabric, cloth" (comp. דַּק ver. 15, "thin dust") see List. Ver. 24. In order to make still more impressive the nothingness of men of might as compared with the Almighty, a series of drastic images is used to paint the completeness and thoroughness of that bringing them to nought of which ver. 23 speaks. אַף בַּל occurs only here; but אַף אַיִן occurs xli. 26. Both, in the repetition, are the negative אַף—אַף (xlvi. 11). As the latter = et-et, so the former = neque-neque, or more correctly = et non—et non. For the sense is: both their planting and the scattering of their seed, and their taking root is not yet completed, when He has already blown on them, etc. Or more plainly: they are hardly planted, hardly sown, hardly rooted, but, etc. שֹׁרֵשׁ, "radices agere," only here and Jer. xii. 2; the passage in Jer. seems to rest on our text. Like the Simoon of the desert (comp. ver. 7) causes the young green herb to wither suddenly, so the Almighty suddenly withers the mighty ones and the wind-storm carries them off.

To the first inquiry "to whom will ye liken me" (ver. 18) the Prophet has replied by referring to the power of God over the earth and its inhabitants (vers. 21–24). Now he asks the question again, ver. 25, and replies by a reference to God's power over the heavenly constellations ver. 26. The Prophet uses the verb שָׁוָה in a precisely similar connection xlvi. 5. He has used this word before in various significations (see List). In the sense of "like, adequate, fitting" it occurs chiefly in Job (xxxiii. 27) and in Prov. (iii. 15; viii. 11; xxvi. 4). קָדוֹשׁ, poetically without article, occurs only here as abbreviation of the Isaianic קְדוֹשׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל, which on its part rests on vi. 3, which see. It appears to me suitable to the context to take that bringeth out their host, etc., as the answer to the question "who hath created," etc. For it is verily a very fitting demonstratio ad oculos to say: the same who day by day calls them all by name and without one of them failing, even He made them. He that can do the one, can do the other. He that leads out "their host" (צְבָאָם comp. xxiv. 21; xxxiv. 4) according to their number by name, that is just the Lord of hosts, Jehovah Sabaoth. The expression אַמִּיץ כֹּחַ occurs Job ix. 4. אִישׁ לֹא נֶעְדָּר comp. xxxiv. 16.

8. TRUST IN JEHOVAH THE SUBJECTIVE BASIS OF REDEMPTION.

Chapter XL. 27–31.

27 Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel,
My way is hid from the Lord,
And my judgment is passed over from my God?
28 Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard,
[a]That the everlasting God, the Lord,
The Creator of the ends of the earth,
Fainteth not, neither is weary?
There is no searching of his understanding.
29 He giveth power to the faint;
And to them that have no might he increaseth strength.
30 Even the youths shall faint and be weary,
And the young men shall utterly fall:

31 But they that wait upon the LORD shall [1]renew their strength[a]
They [b]shall mount up with wings as eagles;
They [c]shall run, and [d]not be weary;
And they shall walk, and not faint.

[1] Heb. change.

[a] eternal divinity is Jehovah that created. He does not tire, etc. [b] feather themselves anew. [c] omit shall.
[d] do not weary.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See the List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 28. קְצוֹת הָאָרֶץ—יָעֵף—יִגַע—חֵקֶר—תְּבוּנָה. Ver. 29. יָעֵף—אוֹנִים—עָצְמָה—הִרְבָּה. Ver. 30. בַּחוּרִים—כָּשַׁל. Ver. 31. קוה—חָלַף.

Ver. 27. אָמַר and דִּבֵּר in parallelism as here does not again occur; but xxix. 4 affords an analogy. עָבַר with מִן in the sense of "to depart unobserved, escape," occurs only here. Yet comp. in a physical sense עָבַר with מֵעַל Gen. xviii. 3.

Ver. 23. On the partic. pro verbo fin. compare on verse 19 (צֹרֵף).

Ver. 30. The verb in the first clause put first shows, as DELITZSCH well remarks, that the clause is to be construed as a sort of adversative clause, that is, as concessive: and though young men grow weary. The second clause returns from this potential construction to the simple, conformably to Hebrew usage, that demands the prompt return from all intensive discourse and verbal forms to the simple chief form.

Ver. 31. The expression קוֹי ה׳ occurs again only Ps. xxxvii. 9. In our text it is, according to the punctuation, to be spoken Koje, whereas in the Psalms it is to be spoken Kove (comp. DELITZSCH on our text). חָלַף (comp. חֵלֶף, ἀντί, Num. xviii. 21; חֲלִיפוֹת "the change of clothing") is "to change," and is used partly of changing place (transire, viii. 8; xxi. 1; xxiv. 5), partly of change of condition in pejus (perire, pass away, ii. 18) or in melius (hence revirescere, ix. 9; xli. 1).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Why sayest——not faint.—Vers. 27–31. One sees here plainly the purpose intended by the preceding discussion concerning the incomparableness of God. The Prophet sees that the long chastisement of the Exile would call up doubts in the spirits of the Israelites. Carried off into a heathen land, they will suppose that God's eyes do not penetrate to them, and that the wrong they suffer escapes His notice (ver. 27). On the parallelism of Jacob and Israel see ix. 7, and the List. This parallelism is a characteristic of Isaianic language, for it occurs in no other prophet so often. It is manifest that it is the people in exile that speak. Just because of their remoteness from the Holy land, the territory of Jehovah (comp. the prophet Jonah) they think their way, i. e., the course of their life is hidden from the LORD, and their right, i. e., the wrong done them by their oppressors, passes unnoticed by their God. This doubt of little faith the Prophet reproves by referring to the infinitude and incomparableness of God set forth in vers. 12–26. The words, ver. 28, hast thou not known, etc., are an echo of ver. 21. Jehovah is an eternal God, therefore He had no beginning as the idols had, which before the workmen made them (vers. 19, 20) were not. Jehovah also made the ends of the earth; therefore they must be known to Him, and wherever Israel may dwell in exile, it cannot say that its way is hidden from God (ver. 27). Just as little may one say of God, who created all things, that it is too great a labor for Him, or that His power is not adequate to help banished Israel. For He does not get tired. Nor can it be said that He wants the necessary penetration, the necessary knowledge of the measures to be adopted; for His discernment is infinite, unsearchable. תבונה occurs Deut. xxxii. 28, and often in Prov. (ii. 2, 3, 6; iii. 13, etc.) and in Job (xii. 12, 13; xxvi. 12; xxxii. 11). Ver. 29: Jehovah is so far from exposure to inability to do more, that He is rather the one who out of His inexhaustible treasure gives strength to all that are weary. Ver. 30: Merely natural force does not hold out in the long run. Of this the youth are examples. But those that hope in the LORD receive new strength, etc. Therefore Jehovah is the dispenser of power, but only on the condition that one by trust makes it possible for Him to bestow His treasures of grace. They feather themselves afresh as eagles, ver. 31. Since the LXX. and JEROME, etc., very many expositors, influenced by "they renew their strength," understand these words of the annual moulting of eagles; on which seems to be based the opinions of the ancients that this bird periodically renewed its youth. Comp. Ps. ciii. 5 and BOCHART, Hieroz. II., p. 745 sqq., ed. Lips., who enumerates the fabulous representations of the ancients on this point. HITZIG objects to this exposition that הֶעֱלָה as causative of עָלָה as used v. 6, does not occur elsewhere, and that it must read נוֹצָה instead of אֵבֶר. But הֶעֱלָה, though not in that sense, occurs often in another much more nearly related to our passage. For not to mention where it is used of putting on sackcloth (Amos viii. 10) and of coating over with gold (1 Kings x. 17), it also stands for covering the bones with flesh and skin (Ezek. xxxvii. 6). And this may the more be taken as analogous to covering the naked bird-body with feathers, seeing that the foliage of trees is called עָלֶה "the mounting up, growing up over" (comp. redeunt jam gramina campis, arboribusque comae). Regarding the second remark of HITZIG's, it is true that one might rather expect נוֹצָה, since it appears undoubted from Ezek. xvii. 3, 7 that אבר is the pinion, נוצה the feathers in general. But our passage does not deal in zoological exactness. Moreover the context has more especially to do with pinions as the chief organ for flying. The second clause describes the intended effect: rapid, untiring forward effort. The first clause says what makes this effect possible: ever new power, ever new, eagle-like rejuvenescence. That the rejuvenescence of the eagle extended to the entire body BOCHART, l. c., expressly shows to have been a view of the Hebrews in distinction from the Greeks. For he says in reference to Mic. i. 16: "Tam Graeci, quam Hebraei calvitium avibus tribuunt. Ita, ut hoc solo differant, quod, cum avium calvitium juxta Graecos pertineat ad solum caput, id Hebraei calvitium extendunt ad totum corpus." Thus we may assume that the Prophet, whether correct or not according to natural history is immaterial, referred the renewal to the pinions. Now as "they feather themselves afresh" says figuratively the same that "they shall renew their strength" says literally, we need not wonder that the second half of the verse does not carry out the figure and say: they shall run, etc., they shall fly, etc. The Prophet emphasizes the promise of unwearied power to run and walk, doubtless, because he has in mind primarily the people returning from the Exile and the toilsome journey through the desert. Thus the conclusion of the discourse corresponds quite exactly to the conclusion of the Prologue ver. 11.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Quia haec posterior pars (prophetiarum Jesajae) prophetia est de Christo et evangelio, pertinet ad nostra quoque tempora, immo est proprie nostra. Quare nobis commendatior esse debet." LUTHER.

2. On ver. 1. "Est mandatum ad apostolos, quibus novum praedicationis genus mandatur. Quasi dicat: lex praedicavit hactenus terrores, vos consolamini, mutate doctrinam, praedicate gratiam, misericordiam et remissionem peccatorum." LUTHER.

3. On ver. 2. "Non auribus tantum, sed cordi potius concionandum est, hoc nempe sibi vult Jehova, dum ait: Dicite ad cor Hierosolymae. Et huc quoque pertinet illud tritum: nisi intus sit, qui praedicat, frustra docentis lingua laborat." FOERSTER.

4. On ver. 3 sqq. "John the Baptist was the first of those messengers and heralds of our redemption of whom the redemption from Babylon was only a type. But the latter comprehends all other ministers of the word that God has sent and will send to the end of the world to conduct wretched souls out of this miserable desert, and out of the prison of the law to the heavenly city of God. The way is prepared for the LORD when we cast away the great stones and immoveable idols, viz., pride and trust in works, and acknowledge our sin. For they utterly bar the entrance of grace." HEIM and HOFFMANN.

5. On ver. 3 sqq. "When we attentively observe the quiet, yet mighty movement of the LORD through the world's history, we see how before His going the vallies elevate themselves and the mountains sink down, how steep declivities become a plane, and cliffs become flats. Let us not fear to pass through the deserts of life if God be with us! It is a walk along lovely, level paths." UMBREIT.

6. On ver. 3. ["Applied to the Messiah, it means that God was about to come to His people to redeem them. This language naturally and obviously implies, that He whose way was thus to be prepared was JEHOVAH, the true God. That John the Baptist had such a view of Him is apparent from what is said of him. John i. 34, comp. i. 15, 18; iii. 31; x. 30, 33, 36. Though this is not one of the most direct and certain proof-texts of the divinity of the Messiah, yet it is one which may be applied to Him when that divinity is demonstrated from other places." BARNES.]

7. On ver. 8 b. By the word of the LORD was the world made (Gen. i.; John i. 3; Ps. xxxiii. 6), and He upholds all things by the word of His power (Heb. i. 3). By His word, too, heaven and earth are kept for the day of judgment (2 Pet. iii. 7). For heaven and earth shall pass away, but His word will not with that also pass away (Isa. li. 6; Ps. cii. 27; Matth. v. 18; Luke xxi. 33). Rather the word of the LORD will not return empty to Him, but it shall accomplish that which He pleases, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto He sent it (Isa. lv. 11). And when all earthly forms, in which the word of the LORD invests itself, grow old and pass away like a garment, still the eternal truth concealed in these forms will issue forth only the more glorious from their demolished shapes, and all that have lived themselves into the word of God and have trusted in Him shall rise with Him to new life.

8. On ver. 8 b. "Verbum Dei nostri manet in aeternum. Insignis sententia, quam omnibus parietibus inscribi oportuit. . . . Hic institue catalogum omnium operum, quae sine verbo Dei in papatu fiunt: ordo monachorum, missa, cucullus, satisfactio, peregrenationes, indulgentiae, etc. Non sunt verbum Dei, ergo peribunt, verbum autem Domini et omnes, qui verbo credunt, manebunt in aeternum." LUTHER.

9. On vers. 10, 11. What a huge contrast between these two verses! In ver. 10 we see the LORD coming as the almighty Ruler and stern Judge; but ver. 11 He appears as the true Shepherd that carries the lambs in His bosom, and leads softly the sheep giving suck. Sinai and Golgotha! The tempest that rends the mountains and cleaves the rock, the earthquake and the fire, and then afterwards the quiet, gentle murmuring (1 Kings xix. 11 sqq.)! For His deepest being is—love (Luke ix. 55 sq.; 1 John iv. 8).

10. On ver. 11. "Christus oves suas redimit pretiose, pascit laute, ducit sollicite, collocat secure." BERNHARD OF CLAIRVAUX.

11. On ver. 16. "Fancy never invented a mightier sacrifice. Magnificent Lebanon the altar in the boundless temple of nature—all its glorious cedars the wood for the fire—and the beasts of its forest the sacrifice." UMBREIT.

12. On ver. 16. The reading of this place in Church, Christmas A. D. 814 moved the Emperor Leo V. the Armenian to take severe measures against the friends of images. The passage moves FOERSTER to propose the question whether it is permitted to make pictures of God and to possess paintings representing divinity. He distinguishes in respect to this between οὐσία and ἐπιφάνεια or revelatio, and says, no one can picture God κατ' οὐσίαν, but κατ' ἐπιφάνειαν, i. e. iis in rebus, quibus se revelavit one can and may picture Him. This reply is manifestly unsatisfactory. For it is not about res, quibus Deus se revelavit that one inquires. That one may picture things by which, or in which God has revealed Himself, thus certainly created things, cannot be contested from the standpoint of Christian consciousness. But the question is: is it allowable to picture the person of God, or more exactly, the person of God the Father? For it has long been settled that it is allowable to picture Christ the man. But though there are many paintings of God the Father, still it is no wonder that not only strict Reformed, but that earnest Christians of fine feeling generally take offence at them. It seems to me to depend on whether this offence is absolute or relative. Is it not allowable to represent in colors what the prophet Daniel represented in words in that vision of the four beasts, vii. 9 sqq.? May one not paint the "Ancient of days"? And if it be God the Father that appears here under this name, which is certainly most probable, may one not paint Him in this form that He gives Himself as allowably as one may paint the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, and with that paint the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove? But who is able to do that? Who is able to worthily represent the Ancient of days? I regard that as the most difficult task of art. To him that can do it, it is allowable also. He that attempts it and cannot do it need not wonder if men take offence at his picture. So far no one has been able to do it, and hardly will any one ever be able. Hence the best thing is to let it alone.

13. On ver. 26. ["It is proof of man's elevated nature that he can thus look upward and trace the evidences of the power and wisdom of God in the heavens, that he can fix his attention on the works of God in distant worlds. This thought was most beautifully expressed by one of the ancient poets:

Pronaque cum spectent animalia caetera terram;
Os homini sublime dedit; coelumque tueri,
Jussit et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus.

OVID Met. Lib. I. 84-86.

In the Scriptures, God not unfrequently appeals to the starry heavens in proof of His existence and perfections, and as the most sublime exhibition of His greatness and power, Ps. xix. 1-6. And it may be remarked that this argument is one that increases in strength, in the view of men, from age to age, just in proportion to the advances which are made in the science of astronomy. It is now far more striking than it was in the times of Isaiah." BARNES.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On vers. 1-5. "Why is the advent of Jesus on earth to-day still a ground of comfort and joy? 1) By Him the season of bondage ends (ver. 2); 2) the curse of sin is removed (vers. 2, 3): 3) the promised new creation is introduced (ver. 4); 4) the mouth of the LORD has revealed the glory." To prepare the way of the LORD we must be convinced. 1) Of the vanity of the creature. 2) Of the validity of the promise of God." M. HENRY.]

4. On vers. 6-8. "What shall I preach? 1) So I asked with the Prophet, and looked into the face of this motley, multi-formed time. 2) So again I asked, and looked into the depths of my own poor, weak soul. 3) So I asked once more, and looked to thee, my charge that the Lord of the Church has given me to lead." KLIEFOTH. Installation sermon at Ludwigslust, printed in Zeugniss der Seele, Parchim und Ludwigslust, 1845.

5. On ver. 11. ["God is the Shepherd of Israel (Ps. lxxx. 1); Christ is the good Shepherd, John x. 11. 1) He takes care of all His flock. 2) He takes particular care of those that most need it: of lambs, those that cannot help themselves, young children, young converts, weak believers, sorrowful spirits. [1] He will gather them in the arms of His power. [2] He will carry them in the bosom of His love and cherish them there. [3] He will gently lead them. After M. HENRY.]

6. On vers. 12-17. To what the contemplation of the sublimity of God admonishes us. 1) The consideration of His infinite greatness admonishes us to be humble. 2) The consideration of His infinite power admonishes us to trust Him. 3) The consideration of His infinite wisdom admonishes us to be obedient.

7. On vers. 22-24. When might takes precedence of right and the unrighteousness of the powerful gets the upper hand, then we ought 1) To consider that our cause is no other than that of God; 2) that even the mightiest are before Him only like locusts, or like the trees that the wind sweeps away; 3) wait patiently till the hour comes for the LORD to show His power.

8. On vers. 25-31. "Jubilate! 1) Holy is the LORD our God in His ways (ver. 25). 2) Almighty is the LORD our God in His works (vers. 26-28). 3) Rich is the LORD our God in His gifts of grace (vers. 29-31)." SCHEERER. Manch. G. u. Ein G., 1868.

"They only wait on Him in a proper manner who expect His blessing in the common modes in which He imparts it to men—in the use of those means and efforts which He has appointed, and which He is accustomed to bless." The farmer does not wait for God to plow and sow his field; but having plowed and sown he waits for the blessing. After BARNES, in loc.]

II.—THE SECOND DISCOURSE.

The First Appearance of the Redeemer from the East and of the Servant of Jehovah, and also the First and Second Conversion of the Prophecy relating to this into a Proof of the Divinity of Jehovah.

CHAPTER XLI.

1. THE FIRST CHIEF FIGURE: THE DELIVERER CALLED FROM THE EAST. THE FIRST APPLICATION OF THE PROPHECY AS A TEST OF DIVINITY.

CHAPTER XLI. 1–7.

1 KEEP silence before me, O islands; and let the people [a]renew their strength;
[b]Let them come near; then let them speak:
[c]Let us come near together to judgment.
2 Who raised up [1]the righteous man from the east,
Called him to his foot,
Gave the nations before him,
And made him rule over kings?
[d]He gave them as the dust to his sword,
And as driven stubble to his bow,
3 He pursued them, and passed [2]safely;
[e]Even by the way that he had not gone with his feet.
4 Who hath wrought and done it, [f]calling the generations from the beginning?
I the LORD, the first,
And with the last; I am he.
5 The Isles saw it, and feared;
The ends of the earth were afraid,
Drew near, and came.
6 They helped every one his neighbour;
And every one said to his brother, [3]Be of good courage.
7 So the [g]carpenter encouraged the [4]goldsmith,
And he that smootheth with the hammer [5]him that smote the anvil,
[6]Saying, it is ready for the sodering:
And he fastened it with nails, that it should not be moved.

[1] Heb. righteousness. [2] Heb. in peace. [3] Heb. Be strong.
[4] Or, founder. [5] Or, the smiting. [6] Or, Saying of the soder, It is good.

[a] shall renew. [b] They shall come, they shall speak.
[c] We will come. [d] His sword shall make them as dust, his bow, etc.
[e] He returns not the way on his foot-prints. [f] he that called. [g] the smith.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. החריש—קרב. Ver. 2. העיר—מזרח. Ver. 3. רדף. Ver. 4. פעל—דור—ראשון—אחרנים. Ver. 5. חרד—אתה. Ver. 6. עזר—חזק. Ver. 7. חרש—צרף—מחליק—פטיש—הלם.

Ver. 1. We have a pregnant construction in החרישו אלי comp. Job xiii. 13.

Ver. 2. The perfect מִי הֵעִיר is only the prophetic perfect, representing the fact of awaking, not as one actually past, but as actually certain, i. e., all the same as happened. It indicates thus the objective reality, but not the time, as indeed generally the Hebrew modi express primarily not the time but the modality of being. The same is true of חֲעִירוֹתִי ver. 25.——What is the object of הֵעִיר? Modern expositors, since VITRINGA, so far as I see, are all of them of the opinion that the words צֶדֶק יִקְרָאֵהוּ לְרַגְלוֹ, to be construed as a relative clause, are the object: him whom right (salvation, victory) meets at his feet. This exposition rests on the Masoretic punctuation But this does not give an absolute rule. It has the great disadvantage that it compels us to take יִקְרָא in the sense of יִקְרֶה and לְרַגְלוֹ, accordingly, in the sense of "before him," "ante pedem ejus." Now the first would present no difficulty, since קרא occurs often enough in the sense of קרה. But the latter is very serious since לְרֶגֶל in all other places of its occurrence means "to follow on the feet of." In Gen. xxx. 30 it stands directly in antithesis with לְפָנַי: "little hadst thou before me, but it spreads out to a multitude behind me" (on my foot לְרַגְלִי). Deut. xxxiii. 3 תֻּכּוּ לְרַגְלֶךָ is "they turned after thy foot-print," (comp. SCHRADER in loc.). Compare the usage in 1 Sam. xxv. 42; Job xviii. 11; Hab. iii. 5. Only in these passages does רֶגֶל occur with לְ denoting place. Thus the objection to taking לרגלו in the sense of "obviam, towards," is certainly justified. Then we must take קרא and לרגלו in their common meaning, "to call," and "after him." Moreover we must take צדק as object of העיר as all the ancient translations and many later expositors have done. The LXX.: τίς ἐξήγειρεν ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν δικαιοσύνην, ἐκάλεσεν αὐτὴν κατὰ πόδας αὐτοῦ; VULG. quis suscitavit ab oriente justum, vocavit eum, ut sequeretur se, etc.——The expression יתן לפניו reminds one of Deut. xxviii. 7, 24, 25.——If we take יַרְדְּ as Hiph. of רָדָה, "conculcare," then it means "conculcare faciet." Of course מְלָכִים is object: he will make him trample down kings." But it might be taken as Kal. (יֵרְדְּ instead of יֵרְדְּ on account of the pause). The only difference in sense would be: "he will himself trample down." ——יתן כעפר וגו׳. It seems to me over-ingenious, when DELITZSCH construes the כְּ as the mere intimation of a comparison that is left to the reader's fancy to be completed. All depends on making חרבו and קשתו subject. That it does not read תִּתֵּן because חֶרֶב and קֶשֶׁת are feminine, makes not the least difficulty. For the ideal subject is "he" that holds the sword and bow. Comp. xvii. 5; li. 5. RUECKERT, KNOBEL and others needlessly supply אֲשֶׁר before יתן. After יתן one may supply אֹתָם, as often the pronominal object is omitted (comp. Gen. ii. 19; vi. 19 sqq., and especially 1 Kings xxii. 6, 15, where also the object is omitted after נתן); or, still more simply, one may regard כעפר and כקש as the immediate object of יתן: "his sword shall make like dust, his bow like scattered chaff," i. e., sword and bow when set to work will produce that effect, likeness to dust and chaff.——Note the assonance in יַרְדְּ and יִרְדְּפֵם, נִדָּף, קַשׁ, יִרְדְּפֵם and קַשְׁתּוֹ.

Ver. 3. שָׁלוֹם either adjective or adverbial accusative.——I believe that יַעֲבֹר and יָבוֹא stand in antithesis. For, as is well known, בּוֹא often has the sense of going back in antithesis to verbs meaning "to go thither, go out." Thus יצא and בוא are often used in antithesis; comp. Josh. vi. 1; 1 Kings iii. 7. Hence they are used of the rising and setting of the sun (Gen. xix. 23; Isa. xiii. 10, and Gen. xv. 12, 17; xviii. 11, etc.). Comp. xxxvii. 28; Num. xxvii. 17: 1 Sam. xxix. 6; 1 Kings xv. 17; 2 Chron. i. 10, etc.). But בוא also stands in antithesis to other verbs in this sense; thus Ps. cxxvi. 6. "Forth goes the bearer of the seeding, hither comes with rejoicing the bearer of his sheaves." Consider in addition that probably ברגליו corresponds to לרגלו ver. 2. For בְּרֶגֶל פ׳ is to the question "where?" the same that לְרֶגֶל פ׳ is to the question "whither?" Thus to go בְּרַגְלֵי פ׳ very often means "to go on the track of one" (comp. Exod. xi. 8; Judg. iv. 10; viii. 5; 1 Sam. xxv. 27; 2 Sam. xv. 17, etc.). One may, indeed, translate ברגליו in our text: "he will not measure backwards with his feet the way;" for in itself it may very well mean that (comp. Num. xx. 19; Deut. ii. 28; Judg. iv. 15, 17; Prov. xix. 2, etc.). But every one feels that this sense here were superfluous. It might be urged in reference to taking בוא in the sense of redire, that then, too, ברגליו were superfluous. But the antithesis of עָבַר and בּוֹא is not so pregnant as that of יצא and בּוֹא, and hence the Prophet's intended meaning of this word is not so plainly recognizable, and indeed, so far as I know, no one has recognized it. Thus, to give a hint to the reader of the sense he would convey by יבוא, the Prophet adds ברגליו.

Ver. 4. When הוא stands emphatically for God, as it does here, it always refers backward, either to an unnamed and unnameable something in the preceding context, yet known as assumed, that involves the notion the One-All who upholds all things and comprehends everything. So it seems to me to be used Deut. xxxii. 39; Isa. xliii. 10; xlviii. 12. In such a case הוא is predicate. Or it so refers back to that great Unnamed, that is known to be taken for granted, that it appears as in apposition with the subject. Then it = talis. הוא is used thus of men, Jer. xlix. 12, and after מִי Isa. l. 9, etc. But it stands for God in this sense, 2 Sam. vii. 28; Isa. xxxvii. 16; Neh. ix. 6, 7. But it can also be predicate in this way, that it only introduces the predicate notion as one already known. Then it is = ille, is, and always has a participle after it (ego sum ille, qui, comp. li. 9, 10, אַתְּ־הִיא): xliii. 25; li. 12.——But further הוא appears also to be the simple connecting "it," which says that the preceding statement appertains as predicate to the subject represented by אַתָּה or אֲנִי: xliii. 13; Jer. xiv. 22; Ps. xliv. 5. But finally הוא serves the purpose of affirming the identity of the predicate clause with the predicate of a preceding clause that is expressed or implied. Then it acquires the meaning idem. So here and Ps. cii. 28 (comp. Job iii. 19; Heb. xiii. 8). In our passage הוא manifestly affirms that Jehovah is with those that are last that one that He was as the first. i. e., the same.

Ver. 5. איים see ver. 1; and on קצות הארץ see xl. 28.

Ver. 7. Drawing the accent back in הולם to avoid the collision of two tone syllables is normal, but the change of Tsere to Seghol is not normal (comp. xlix. 7; lxvi. 3; Num. xvii. 23; xxiv. 22; Ezek. xxii. 25). The latter is probably occasioned by the effort to better imitate the beat of the hammer strokes.——פַּעַם in the sense of "anvil" only here.——One need not construe אֹמֵר as a participle. It may stand in the sense of a finite verb (comp. ii. 6; xxiv. 2; xxix. 8; xxxii. 12).——דֶּבֶק adhaesio, agglutinatio signifies that whereby the work of the צרף is joined to that of the חרש; לְ = "in reference to" (v. 1; Gen. xx. 13, etc.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. God has a twofold object in view: 1) He would announce that He will raise up for His people a deliverer from the East; this is the chief contents of the first Ennead. 2) By this act of deliverance He would demonstrate His divinity in contrast with the nothingness of idols. This twofold object He attains by summoning the heathen nations to a trial in which He gives the proofs of His divinity (vers. 1–5); but they on their part do not respond, for the powerlessness of their idols is shown by a brief reference to the manner in which they originate (vers. 6, 7).

2. Keep silence——judgment.—Ver. 1. With reverential silence (comp. on 'נִשׁוּ') must the islands (comp. on xl. 15) come to the Lord. For that He is the speaker appears from vers. 1, 2, and especially from ver. 4. The expression יחליפו כח, "they shall renew their strength," stands here so near to xl. 31, that we must regard it as a link that binds the two chapters together. The Lord would intimate by these words that the task the nations will have to perform before the judgment, is a difficult one, that therefore they must "in respect to strength make change," i. e., renew strength, put on new strength. ["As if He had said: they that hope in Jehovah shall renew their strength; but those that refuse renew theirs as they can."—J. A. A.] The Lord demands politeness, reverence from the nations even before the controversy is decided, so certain is He that He will gain it. They must not come on with rude noise, but modestly and then speak. למשפט, "to judicial trial," is used here as in liv. 17; Num. xxxv. 12; Josh. xx. 6; Jud. iv. 5; 2 Sam. xv. 2, 6. If Jehovah is Himself a party, who is then the judge? To this question Rosenmueller (with whom Delitzsch agrees) well replies: "Vocantur gentes in judicium ad tribunal non Dei sed rationis."

3. Who raised——with his feet.—Vers. 2, 3. With these words the Lord deposeth before the judgment a proof of His divinity. It does not consist merely in the fact that the deeds of the hero announced here shall give their right to the people of God, i. e., deliverance from the unrighteous tyranny of the heathen, while He will destroy the latter; but above all it consists in the fact that the Lord prophesies the appearance of the hero, and thus stakes His honor on the fulfilment of it. For that this hero brings deliverance to the people may be accident, an effect of His fancy, of arbitrariness, of a ruler's caprice. In that would therefore lie no strict proof of the divinity of Jehovah. But if Jehovah prophesies the appearance and doing of that hero, and it happens accordingly, then it is proved that the Lord is a living, omniscient, and almighty God. One may not object that "what is future and unfulfilled would be without present power to prove" (Delitzsch). For the text has nothing to do with an historical, actual disputation with heathen, in which, of course, a prophecy would be no proof. But the supposed disputation is only a rhetorical form that the Prophet uses in order to make the Israelites sensible of their folly and wrong, who, though they knew the living divinity of Jehovah, and that idols were without life, turned to the latter notwithstanding. This meaning appears by a comparison with ver. 21 sqq. For there the idols are very expressly challenged to prophesy future events, and from their powerlessness to do so is inferred their nothingness. And hence it appears to me that the verses 1–7 stand first as theme. The redemption, that in them is only intimated, is more particularly described, vers. 8–20, while vers. 21–29 amplify in respect to the way in which the appearance of the deliverer will be a proof for Jehovah who had foretold it, and against the idols which were unable to foretell it. Thus I do not believe that the argumentation of the Prophet presupposes the victorious career of Cyrus as begun, either in an ideal or in a real sense. It is wholly a thing of the future, and must be so contemplated. For how otherwise could the Prophet prophesy it?

It is plain that Cyrus is the hero referred to, and not Abraham, or Christ, or even the Apostle Paul, as, until Vitringa, was the opinion of the ancient expositors. The way for naming this name, which is produced at last in xliv. 28, is prepared with much art. The hints of its coming may be compared to the gleams of light that, beginning feebly, and increasing in strength and extent, precede the sunrise. The first hint is that the East is to be the point whence the grand appearance shall issue. Persia in fact lies east of Babylonia. It accords also with the purpose of beginning small that the Prophet does not once name a definite, personal object of העיר. We must take צדק as that object (see Text. and Gram.) Regarding the meaning of צדק, I would repeat the remark already made, that the Old Testament righteousness is not the antithesis of grace, but of violént oppression, and hence that a צדיק, "righteous man," is one who, though he has the power to the contrary, still lets right reign, and thereby both uses gentleness and dispenses happiness, salvation, and blessing [see comm. on i. 21, 26, Tr.]. Israel in exile was oppressed by its enemies, and though in respect to Jehovah this was a deserved punishment, still their enemies had, ex propriis, aggravated it, and thereby done a wrong to Israel (comp. x. 5 sqq.). If now the hero from the East acts justly toward Israel, he shows himself to be a mild lord, and helps Israel to its rights against the oppression of the heathen, and thereby to happiness and salvation. Hence I believe that all these meanings are implied in צֶדֶק. But they can only become operative through a person, a צדיק, "righteous man." To this latent notion in צדק, of a righteous man, the following suffixes [pronouns] must be referred. It suits the purpose of the Prophet already noticed, to let the person of the deliverer appear by degrees and unfold itself. One may say that his personality develops itself here, as it were, out of an impersonal germ. This one awakened to do righteousness the Lord calls after Him (comp. xlii. 6, which passage the Masorets perhaps had in mind when they connected צדק with יקראהו), i. e., he leads him further and further [לרגלו, see Text. and Gramm.]. Is there thus in יקראהו לרי a formal definition of העיר, so in יתן there is a definition as to matter. The words last named say what the hero, by extending his power, will do. All these clauses stand under the influence of the interrogative מִי. Nations are properly not things that one gives away, and kings rule and are not themselves ruled. But here is an exception. Jehovah gives to this hero nations to do as he pleases with them, and subjects kings to him so that they must serve him. His sword made them as dust, etc., describes the degree to which they are given to him which was before said in יתן and ירד. His sword and bow, once set to work, will do such work that the result will be the likeness of dust and chaff (see Text. and Gram.) On קַשׁ see on xl. 24; נִדָּף, comp. xix. 7. But not merely a battle in one place shall occur, but also pursuit of the fugitives. He, the conquering hero, shall go on well-preserved (שלום), and always forwards, never backwards (see Text. and Gram. on ארח ברגליו, etc.). He will not go back in his own foot-prints (il ne reviendra pas sur ses pas). [J. A. A. agrees with Ewald, "the clause describes the swiftness of his motions, as flying rather than walking on foot," and cites in support Dan. viii. 5.—Tr.].

4. Who hath wrought——and came.—Vers. 4, 5. The Lord has announced a majestic appearance of world-wide significance. But, though it is something still future, He has let it appear as an image of the past before the eyes of those that were summoned. Hence, as ver. 2 He asked: "who has awakened?" so He now asks, using the past tense, who has prepared and made this? Of course the same that foreknew and predicted it, and who could do this because He is the One who from the beginning called the generations of men into existence, and hence can say of Himself: I Jehovah the first and I am still with the last (see Text. and Gram.). The Lord summoned the heathen to a controversy (ver. 1). He has laid down the proof of His divinity (vers. 2–4). Now it is the turn of the heathen to produce a similar performance on the part of their idols. Notice that the Prophet opposes the heathen nations to God, and not their idols. This is quite natural. For the idols have no actual existence. Hence it comes that the heathen must defend the cause of their idols; whereas Israel's God defends the cause of His people. Therefore, obedient to the summons of ver. 1, the heathen nations approach. They see the proof that the Lord has presented in His own favor, and with dismay, for they know at once that they cannot match the performance with any thing similar. And so they approach trembling, as it were, to look at this trial-sample of Jehovah's on all sides. That they would have said something is not declared. Speechless they keep silence before the majesty of the Lord.

5. They helped——be moved.—Vers. 6, 7. It is too incredible that the heathen, seized with fear, and in order to find help against the threatening appearance of the predicted hero, turn in haste to the fabrication of idol images (Delitz.), or that they nailed fast those threatened by Cyrus (Hitzig). No, these verses would show, by the manner in which idols originate, that they cannot possibly triumph in the controversy to which they are challenged (ver. 1). How can such productions of men's hands maintain themselves against Him who can speak of Himself as in ver. 4? I accordingly connect ver. 6 with what follows, and not with what precedes. For ver. 5 evidently corresponds to ver. 1. For there the nations are required to approach reverently and in silence; for this very reason they are unable to respond to the "they shall speak" (ver. 1): there the nations are called on to get strength, and ver. 5 we see them draw near, afraid and trembling; "they drew near" and "came" of ver. 5 corresponds to "they shall approach," "we will draw near" (נקרבה יגשו) of ver. 1. With this the cyle of thought beginning with ver. 1 is concluded. Thus ver. 5 looks backwards; ver. 6 forwards. The latter says in general the same that ver. 7 a says in reference to particular relations. Both verses have for their chief idea that idol-making is a fatiguing labor, costing not only much money (xl. 19), but also much sweat, in which one must encourage and aid the other in order to get it done. What a shameful difference then between idols and Jehovah.

The חָרָשׁ, "smith," prepares the body of the image; the צֹרֵף, "founder," makes ready the covering. The former strengthens the latter by good preparatory work and cheering words. "The smoother with the hammer" seems to me to be identical with the צרף, for the metal would surely be smoothed by him who moulded it. On the other hand, the הולם פָּעַם, "the smiter on the anvil," is identical with the חרש; for he that works at the anvil makes the iron body, makes the nails, and fastens the image with them. "The smoother with the hammer" is the subject of אֹמֵר, for he has made the soldering, and by the call "it is good" he cheers "the smith" to continue and complete the work that consists in fastening the image with nails to the place where it is to be set up. "It is good," comp. Exod. ii. 2; Gen. i. 4, 8, etc. מַסְמְרִים, "clavi," only here in Isaiah. Comp. Jer. x. 3–5, which passage is evidently copied after ours and xl. 19 sq.; xliv. 9–17; xlvi. 6 sq. לאימוט, comp. xl. 20.

2. THE SECOND CHIEF FIGURE: THE SERVANT OF JEHOVAH ISRAEL CHOSEN IN ABRAHAM AND CALLED IN GLORIOUS VICTORY.

CHAPTER XLI. 8–13.

8 BUT thou, Israel, [a]art my servant,
Jacob whom I have chosen,
The seed of Abraham my friend.
9 Thou whom I have [b]taken from the ends of the earth,
And called thee from the [c]chief men thereof,
And said unto thee, Thou art my servant;
I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away
10 Fear thou not; for I am with thee:
[d]Be not dismayed; for I am thy God:
I [e]will strengthen thee; yea, I [f]will help thee;
Yea, I [f]will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.
11 Behold, all they that were incensed against thee
Shall be ashamed and confounded·
[g]They shall be as nothing;
And [1]they that strive with thee shall perish.
12 Thou shalt seek them, and shalt not find them,
Even [2]them that contended with thee:
[3]They that war against thee
Shall be as nothing, and as a thing of nought.
13 For I the LORD thy God will hold thy right hand,
Saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. But thou Israel——away.—Vers. 8, 9. In the preceding section (vers. 1–7) the Prophet has introduced the principal figure of the prophetic cycle, chaps. xl.–xlviii. With this is immediately connected another: the SERVANT OF JEHOVAH in a national sense.

But thou Israel is evidently contrasted with "islands and people," ver. 1. The Prophet turns to Israel with well-founded and glorious consolation. The LORD calls His people Israel my servant. We encounter here for the first time this significant notion of the עֶבֶר יהוה. Yet not the subjective, but the objective side of the notion is made prominent. The nation is not so named because it has chosen the LORD for its God out of the great mass of gods that, according to heathen ideas, are in existence, therefore not because "Jehovah was its national god in contrast with other nations, the servants of Baal, Moloch," etc. (HITZIG). On the contrary, they are so named because the LORD has chosen Israel for His possession, His instrument, His servant. For a servant is the property of his lord, and Israel is the "peculiar people" (Exod. xix. 5; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; Ps. cxxxv. 4; Mal. iii. 17). But Israel is chosen in its ancestor Abraham, whom, already, the LORD calls "my servant" Gen. xxvi. 24, which passage easily comes to mind, since ver. 10 is evidently a citation from it. Thus Abraham was not only chosen for his person, though what he was personally by God's grace, fitted him to be for all times a pattern of the right sort of "servant of Jehovah," even in subjective respects. Hence he is called My friend. For love is the fulfilling of the law, and involves faith (Gen. xv. 6; Deut. vi. 5). In 2 Chr. xxii. 7 Abraham has the same title; also in Jas. ii. 23. In Arabic his regular surname is Chalil-Allah, i. e., "confidant of God." Abraham was chosen that by his seed all the nations of the earth might be blessed. And after Isaac and Jacob, this seed was to be the "great nation" that the LORD would make of Abraham (Gen. xii. 2), and to which He would give the land of his pilgrimage (ibid. ver. 7; xiii. 15; xv. 18, etc.). Accordingly Israel is the servant of Jehovah primarily as the seed of Abraham. This is purely an objective honor and dignity, belonging to the nation by reason of the election of their ancestor, but of which, of course, it must make itself worthy by worshipping Jehovah alone as its God, and serving Him with its entire being and possessions. On the parallelism of Israel and Jacob see xl. 27.

With great emphasis the Prophet repeats in various forms the thought that Israel is Jehovah's chosen servant. Whom I have taken, [or "grasped"] החזקתי (see vers. 6, 7) expresses that the LORD stretched out His hand after Israel to seize it (comp. ver. 13; xlii. 6; xlv. 1; li. 18) and bring it to Him; thus that He alone was active in this, while Israel was passive. By the ends of the earth the Prophet, whose view-point is Palestine, means the distant lands of the Euphrates. Concerning the situation of Ur Kasdim see SCHRADER, D. Keilinschr. u. d. A. T. p. 383. The monuments prove that the present ruin of Mugheir (on the right bank of the Euphrates south-east from Babylon) was UR. אציל is probably related both to אציל Exod. xxiv. 11, nobilis, princeps—properly the extremest, extremus, thus in some sense, also summus, comp. יַרְכְּתֵי הארץ, and also to אֵצֶל latus, juxta. It occurs only here. Yet twice again, ver. 9, it is affirmed that in choosing Israel Jehovah alone was active. Once by I have called thee, and then by I have chosen thee. Finally the thought is confirmed by the negative expression I have not cast thee away. Evidently underlying this last is the thought that the LORD might indeed have rejected Israel, in fact that He was near doing it (comp. Deut. vii. 7 sq.), but that He did not do it. Therefore, spite of considerations that existed, He has still on reflection and on purpose chosen Israel.

2. Fear thou not——I will help thee.—Vers. 10–13. Having set forth the election of Israel in Abraham as emphatically the basis of the relation between Himself and His people, the LORD now infers the consequences. These are positive and negative: Israel need not fear, the LORD helps them; their enemies must be destroyed. The words fear not for I am with thee are quoted from Gen. xxvi. 24 with only עִמְּךָ for אִתְּךָ. On "fear not" comp. xl. 9. The context shows that אמצתי is used here as in xliv. 14; Ps. lxxx. 18 with the meaning "to make firm, sure, viz., the choice of one object out of several." The idea is not an invigoration imparted to Israel, but the election made sure (comp. 2 Pet. i. 10, βεβαίαν ποιεῖσθαι τὴν ἐκλογήν). תָּמַךְ is also used in a similar sense. Comp. xlii. 1 and Matth. xii. 18, where תמך is rendered αἱρετίζειν. The expression ימין צדקי occurs only here. It can only mean the right hand that does right in the Old Testament sense, on which comp. ver. 2. The relation of the three verbs of the second clause of ver. 10 seems to me to be the following: אמץ signifies the sure election, from which follows, on the one hand, the helping, on the other, the not letting go again. The correlative of this promise is the threat (ver. 11) of destruction to their enemies. This thought is presented in various forms in what follows (vers. 11, 12). Ver. 11 a it appears as a theme, and vers. 11 b–12 b give it a three-fold amplification: first the opponents are called אנשי ריב (contestants, opponents in general), and it is said "they shall be nothing and shall perish;" then they are called אנשי מצות (rixatores, objurgatores) that one shall seek and not find; finally they are called אי׳ מלחמה (enemies in war, hostes), and it is said of them that, not only they are not to be found, but that they shall absolutely no more exist. In conclusion, ver. 13, the protecting and helping presence already promised ver. 10 is repeated to the nation as the ground of its expecting victory. That ver. 13 has the character of a confirmatory repetition appears from הָאֹמֵר וגו׳. For האמר expressly refers to the comforting words "fear not," "I have helped thee," as having been used by the LORD (ver. 10).

3. THE SERVANT OF GOD, WEAK AND LOWLY, YET IN GOD THE STRONG PEOPLE OF ISRAEL, RICHLY BLESSED WITH SALVATION AND DIVINE KNOWLEDGE.

CHAPTER XLI. 14–20.

14 FEAR not, thou worm Jacob, and ye [1]men of Israel;
I [a]will help thee, saith the LORD,
And thy redeemer, [b]the Holy One of Israel.
15 Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument
Having [2]teeth:
Thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small,
And shalt make the hills as chaff.

16 Thou shalt [e]fan them, and the wind shall carry them away,
And the whirlwind shall scatter them:
And thou shalt rejoice in the LORD,
And shalt glory in the Holy One of Israel.
17 [d]When the poor and needy [e]seek water, and there is none,
And their tongue faileth for thirst,
I the LORD will hear them,
I the God of Israel will not forsake them.
18 I will open rivers in [f]high places,
And fountains in the midst of the valleys:
I will make the wilderness a pool of water,
And the dry land springs of water.
19 I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the [g]shittah tree,
And the myrtle and [h]the oil tree;
I will set in the desert the [i]fir tree,
And the [j]pine, and the [k]box tree together:
20 That they may see, and know,
And consider, and understand together,
That the hand of the LORD hath done this,
And the Holy One of Israel hath created it.

[1] Or, few men. [2] Heb. mouths.

[a] omit will. [b] supply is. [c] scatter. [d] omit When. [e] seeking. [f] bare hills.
[g] acacia. [h] wild olive. [i] cypress. [j] plane-tree. [k] sherbin-cedar.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See the List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 14. קָדוֹשׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל—גֹּאֵל—נְאֻם י׳—מְתִים—תּוֹלַעַת. Ver. 16. הָלַל—סְעָרָה—זָרָה. Ver. 18. מוֹצָא—אֲגַם. Ver. 19. אֶרֶז—שִׁטָּה—הֲדַס—בְּרוֹשׁ. Ver. 20. שָׂכַל—בָּרָא.

Ver. 14. It is to be noted that the LORD addresses Israel as a weak woman, vers. 14, 15 a in the second pers. fem.; whereas vers. 15 b, 16, the one dashing down the enemies is right away addressed in the masculine as a man. [This seems over-refinement. The fem. form of the verb and suffixes are prompted by the principal noun תּוֹלַעַת; in the masculine forms following, the idea of the person addressed is resumed, according to common usage.—TR.].

Ver. 17. הָעֲנִיִּים וְהָאֶבְיוֹנִים put first shows that they are to be regarded as casus absoluti. It is still uncertain whether נָשַׁתָּה is derived from נָשָׁה, נָשַׁת or from שָׁתַת. The latter seems to me the least likely, since it means ponere, fundare, stabilire, from which the meaning defecit, exaruit can be got only by straining. We must comp. xix. 5; Jer. li. 30. I had rather, with OLSHAUSEN, assume a root נָשַׁת = exaruit, defecit, kindred to נָשָׁה. Then נָשַׁתָּה would be third person fem. Kal, in pausal form, with Dagesch affectuosum.——In the second clause of ver. 17, אֲנִי is the common subject of the two clauses, with both יְהוָֹה and אֱלֹהֵי י׳ in apposition, and it is to be noted that the latter stands in parallelism for the former, as indeed the God of Israel is actually called Jehovah.

Ver. 20. After יָשִׂימוּ is to be supplied, not only לֵב (comp. ver. 22), but עַל לֵב (xlii. 25; xlvii. 7; lvii. 1, 11; comp. xliv. 19). Thus the proper order of thought is restored: that they see, know, take to heart and gain an insight into. Moreover this form of expression occurs in Isaiah only in the places cited. The omission of לֵב occurs in various senses, Ps. l. 23; Job iv. 20; xxiii. 6; xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 15; Judg. xix. 30.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Servant of God is here still the people Israel; but what is properly characteristic of this notion is made prominent, viz.: the suffering and lowliness. But at the same time the Prophet does not omit to say very emphatically that this poor servant of God will be also a mighty and irresistible instrument of judgment in the hand of Jehovah. Thus Israel is addressed "worm Jacob," "little people Israel," and that with the use of a feminine verbal form, whom, however, the LORD will help to rid itself of its enemies (vers. 14-16), and will bless with abundance of good things (vers. 17-19), in order that all may know that He alone is God (ver. 20).

2. Fear not——of Israel.—Vers. 14-16. The expressions "little worm," "little people" are evidently intended to paint the wretchedness and weakness of Israel. The former recalls Ps. xxii. 6 "I am a worm, and no man;" and also the description of the suffering servant of God, Isa. liii. 2 sqq. Comp. too, Job xxv. 6. Yet one cannot but see in this "worm Jacob" the transition of the servant of God to the "form of a servant," and thus recognize an intimation that the suffering people of God is also a type of the suffering Saviour. The expression מְתֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל also, which recalls מְתֵי מִסְפָּר, i. e., a few people, that may be counted (Gen. xxxiv. 30; Deut. iv. 27; Ps. cv. 12; 1 Chr. xvi. 19, comp. שָׁוְא Job xi. 11: Ps. xxvi. 4), involves the meaning of weakness, inconsiderableness, lowliness. גֹּאֵל is the antithesis of מֹכֵר (comp. Lev. xxv. 25, 48). The word frequently occurs in a juristic sense; but frequently, too, of Jehovah, who as next of kindred, so to speak, redeems His people that has been sold into the hand of their enemies.

Yet what a contrast! The LORD makes this worm Jacob a mighty instrument of judgment against the nations. חרוץ, that occurs x. 22 in a figurative sense, and xxviii. 27 as designation of the threshing roller itself, signifies here a quality of the latter, viz.: the being sharp. Sharp, new, and double-edged (פיפיות only here in Isaiah, comp. Ps. cxlix. 6) shall the roller be. As such a roller lacerates the bundles of grain, and as the similarly formed harrow crushes the clods, so shall Israel rend and crush mountains and make hills like chaff, etc. This prophecy has not been fulfilled by the fleshly Israel, or at least only in a meager way, the best example being the Maccabees. But by the spiritual Israel it has had glorious fulfilment in spiritual victories.

3. The poor——created it.—Vers. 17-20. From the preceding vers. 14-16, which are parallel with these, it appears that these verses do not promise to the returning exiles merely the needful refreshment through the desert, thus connecting say with xl. 10, 11. Vers. 14-16 do not describe something that the exiles are to effect before they can betake themselves home; and just as little do ver. 17 sqq., speak of something relating only to the return. Vers. 14-20 describe the condition of salvation in general, which Israel shall experience after the exile. Ver. 17 sqq., can only refer to the return from exile so far as that belongs to that condition. Taking the wretched that seek water, etc., as parallel with "worm Jacob," etc., we understand vers. 17-20 to describe all the conditions that caused the existence of Israel before its redemption to appear like a life in the desert. As in ver. 14 sq. the "worm" is suddenly transformed into a mighty threshing sled, so here dry places are suddenly transformed into richly watered places, covered with glorious vegetation.

Vers. 18, 19 say how the LORD will hear the prayers of the languishing. He will open the earth (comp. Ps. cv. 41) (פָּתַח, by metonomy, the cause instead of the effect, as often, comp. xiv. 17; Jer. xl. 4) to let streams burst forth even on bald hills, and in valleys, etc. מוֹצָא "place of issue" lviii. 11, comp. Ps. cvii. 35 and Isa. xxxv. 1, 7.

In describing the vegetation seven trees in all are named, which perhaps is not accidental. אֶרֶז "cedar" is generic: שִׁטָּה (from שָׁנַט, "to be pointed, to prick" Arabic sant, Egyptian schonte, comp. HERZ. R.-Encycl. XV. p. 95, and JEROME on our passage) "the acacia;" only here in Isa. הֲדַס "the myrtle," that grows as a tree in Anterior-Asia, and in Greece (see VICTOR HEHN, Kulturplanzen u. Hausthiere, p. 143 sqq.: HERZ. R.-Encycl. X. 142). By עֵץ שֶׁמֶן, in contrast with זֵית שמן (Deut. viii. 8), is commonly understood the wild olive, oleaster, ἀγριέλαιος (Rom. xi. 17, 24). The LXX. translates κυπάρισσον; CELSUS supposes resinous trees in general. This last would be a good way of getting over the difficulty, seeing the expression is strange for the wild olive. For it gives no oil, being partly without fruit (see HEHN, l. c. p. 45) partly yields fruit that is applicable for making salve and not oil (HERZ. R.-Encycl. X. p. 547). But as in Neh. viii. 15 עֲלֵי זַיִת and עֲלֵי עֵץ שֶׁמֶן are mentioned together as needful for constructing the leafy booths, one must suppose the wild olive is meant. The expression occurs only 1 Kings vi. 23, 31, 32, 33, where the עצי שמן are mentioned as material for the cherub-figures, and the doors and posts of the Holiest. The following words "the fir," etc., occur verbatim lx. 13. ברוש "the cypress" (according to MOVERS Phoen. I. p. 575 sqq. Berot, Berut is the name of the divinity of nature that was supposed to dwell in trees). Comp. HEHN, l. c. p. 192 sqq. The words תדהר and תאשור remain to the present unexplained. They occur again only lx. 13, which is to be regarded as a repetition of the present passage. דָּהַר is a Hebrew word. We read סוס דהר "the galloping horse," Nah. iii. 2, and Judg. v. 22 paints מִדַּהֲרוֹת דַּהֲרוֹת אַבִּירָיו almost like quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum. But dahr in Arabic means "tempus, seculum." It is the Hebrew דור (comp. מול and כֹּהַל, כּוּר and מָחָר, נור and נָהָר, etc.). However one may mediate the notions "currere, cursus" and "tempus, seculum," whether by the notion of haste or that of circuit, still the meaning of lasting, continuance, longevity seems also to belong to the sphere of the root דָּהַר. And perhaps this is still more the case in the dialects than in Hebrew itself; comp. the Chaldee תְּדִירָא circuitus, perpetuitas = תָּמִיד, with which it would agree that תדהר, which does not elsewhere occur in Hebrew, is probably a cognate foreign word, i. e., belonging to a kindred dialect. The plane-tree appears not to be indigenous in Palestine, for it is no where mentioned among trees that grow there. If ערמון is really the plane-tree, it signifies a tree not growing in Palestine as appears from the context of the two places of its occurrence (Gen. xxx. 37; Ezek. xxxi. 8). תדהר might thus, in the Prophet's day, be a name for the plane-tree borrowed from some kindred dialect, and that was given to it because of its longevity. Descriptions of giant specimens of the plane-tree such as that of HEHN, l. c. p. 198 sqq., prove that it attains a great age, and prodigious size. HEHN says: "The praise of the plane-tree fills all antiquity." Again: "Greece received the plane-tree and the fashion of esteeming it from Asia, where the plane-tree like the cypress from ancient times was regarded with religious veneration by the tree-loving Iranians and the Iranian races of Asia-Minor." According to this, one might almost think it strange if the plane-tree were omitted from mention with the cypress in an enumeration of the glorious trees that were to adorn the desert road of Israel returning from the Iranian territory (for that we may include also the idea of the return was mentioned above). Hence I am inclined, until better instructed, to regard the תִּדְהָר, with SAADIA, GESENIUS, DELITZSCH and others, as the plane-tree. תְּאַשּׁוּר, from אָשַׁר "rectus, erectus fuit, is held by the ancients to be either "the box-tree" or "the sherbin cedar." HEHN, against the meaning box-tree, appeals to THEOPHRAST who ranks the πύξος among the φιλόψυχρα, i. e., among the vegetation that cannot endure a warm climate. A designation like "recta, erecta" suits the cedar admirably, and as the name sherbin undoubtedly stands for the cypressus oxycedrus (see GESEN. Comm.; NIEBUHR, Description of Arabia, p. 149; DELITZSCH in loc.), we may for the present be content with the meaning "Sherbin."

All these glorious acts will the LORD accomplish for the purpose of bringing His people to the full, deep and abiding knowledge that He has effected such things, and that thus He alone is to be revered as God. The LORD had often before wonderfully delivered His people, and they had often returned to Him then as their God. But this knowledge had never been right comprehensive and thorough. They had always in a little while turned again to idols. When the LORD terminates the great Babylonian captivity, then the nation will renounce idols forever and serve the LORD alone. This also came to pass. יַחְדָּו (comp. xl. 5) relates to the subject: all shall know it. But if the Prophet means by these "all" primarily the redeemed, those poor and wretched (ver. 17) that needed these wonders of God, still in this emphatic יחדו there seems to be also a reference to all in the widest sense to whom this knowledge would be proper. בראה comp. xlv. 8.

4. THE SECOND CONVERSION OF PROPHECY INTO A TEST OF DIVINITY.

CHAPTER XLI. 21–29.

21 [1]PRODUCE your cause, saith the LORD;
Bring forth your [a]strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob.
22 Let them bring them forth, and show us what shall happen:
Let them show the former things, what they be,
That we may [2]consider them, and know the latter end of them;
Or [b]declare us things for to come.
23 Show the things that are to come hereafter,
That we may know that ye are gods:
Yea, do good, or do evil,
[c]That we may be dismayed, and behold it together.
24 Behold, ye are [3]of nothing,
And your work [4]of [d]nought:
An abomination is he that chooseth you.
25 I have raised up one from the north, and he [e]shall come:
From the rising of the sun shall he call upon my name:
And he shall come upon [f]princes as upon mortar,
And as the potter treadeth clay.
26 Who hath declared from the beginning, that we may know?
And beforetime, that we may say, [g]He is righteous?
Yea, there is none that [h]showeth, yea, there is none that [h]declareth,
Yea, there is none that [h]heareth your words.
27 [i]The first shall say to Zion, Behold, behold them:
And I will give to Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings.
28 [j]For I beheld, and there was no man;
Even among them, and there was no counsellor,
That, when I asked of them, could [5]answer a word.
29 Behold they are all vanity;
Their works are nothing:
Their molten images are wind and confusion.

[1] Heb. Cause to come near. [2] Heb. set our heart upon them. [3] Or, worse than nothing.
[4] Or, worse than a viper. [5] Heb. return.

[a] bulwarks. [b] make us hear. [c] And we will confront one another, and inspect with one another.
[d] wind. [e] has. [f] satraps. [g] Right. [h] showed: declared: heard.
[i] A first-fruit to Zion—see, see it comes—a messenger of joy I will give to Jerusalem. [j] But.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurring of the words: Ver. 21. ריב—קרבו. Ver. 22. הבאות—אחרית. Ver. 23. אתיות—אחור. Ver. 25. טיט—רמס—יוצר—חמר. Ver 26. מראש. Ver. 28. יועץ. Ver. 29. תהו—רוח—אפס—און—נסך.

Ver. 21. עצמה is ἅπ. λεγ. The root meaning is robora, comp. עצום "strong," עצמים "strength, might," Ps. x. 10, תעצמות "vires," Ps. lxviii. 36.

Ver. 23. אף with ו in the second clause appears not merely to have the meaning sive—sive, but there lies in אף something intensive in relation to what precedes, that we may best express by "yea."——That ו acquires the meaning "or," appears from alternative questions "whether—or," "num—an" being regularly expressed in Hebrew by אם—ואם, and also that, exceptionally, simply ו connects the two clauses (Jer. xliv. 28; Ewald § 352 b).——The Kal נראה (so K'thibh is to be read, whereas K'ri is to be pronounced ונרא) occasions surprise. Perhaps we should read נרא (first pers. plur. imperf. Niph., comp. ירא Exod. xxxiv. 3; וירא Gen. xii. 7; xvii. 1, etc.). As this first pers. plur. imp. Niph. happens not to occur again in the Old Testament, perhaps the Masorets preferred to point the consonants like the first pers. plur. imperf. Kal., which often occurs in the full form, but which also fails to occur in the apocopated form.

Ver. 24. I translate מאין, מאפע here "out of the nothing," whereas xl. 17 I maintained the comparative meaning of מן. I think that we are justified in this by the difference of the verbs used in the two places. There נחשב was predicate, here it is the notion of being. There the rhetorical, exaggerated "more than nothing" was more suitable; here it suits better to take מן as indicative of origin.——There is no need of treating אפע as a copyist's error for מאפס as many recent commentators do. The serpent name אפעה (xxx. 6; lix. 5) i. e., "sibilans, the whistler," is proof enough that there is a verb פעה, kindred in sense to הבל, "breath, wind" (see on אפעה xlii. 14). From this may be derived אפעי from which אפע, like אמש from אמשי, אשך from אשכי.

Ver. 25. ויאת contracted from ויאתה, occurs only here, whereas the form ויתא (from יאתה Prov. i. 27; Job xxxvii. 22) occurs Deut. xxxiii. 21.——קרא בשם is undoubtedly used in the sense of calling on God in worship. In itself the expression means "to call with the name," not in the name; for ב is used here as instrumental. This appears from the fact that the expression elsewhere means a) "to call, name (one) with their name:" Exod. xxxv. 30; Num. xxxii. 42; Isa. xlv. 4 (I called to thee by means of thy name), or, with omission of the personal object, Isa. xliii. 1; xlv. 3, etc.——b) "to shout, proclamare, proclamationem facere, κηρύσσειν, to give an announcing, instructing call by means of the name." Thus, as I think, in those obscure passages, Exod. xxxiii. 19; xxxiv. 5, with which also Isa. xlv. 5 connects. Here God sends forth a call in Moses' ears, which is done by naming the Jehovah-name and giving its meaning, ibid ver. 6.——I do not think that סגנים is a specific Persian word. The word schihne, to which appeal is made, is modern Persian. The word is used Jer. li. 23, 28, 57; Ezek. xxiii. 6, 12, 23, and occurs in these passages as designation for Babylonian, Assyrian and Persian dignitaries. Thus the word appears to have been, I may say, international. Ezra uses it once ix. 2; Nehemiah oftener: ii. 16; iv. 8; v. 7, etc. Later it even passed over into the vocabulary of recent Hebrew. Since Ezekiel speaks of Assyrian סגנים, we may assume that there were such, and as Babylon and Persia obtained dominion after Assyria, we may conjecture that the name came to them from Assyria. Then it cannot seem strange that Isaiah uses the word. סגן is, however, really an Assyrian word. "The root sakan (שכן), connected with כון, is in Assyrian the usual word for 'to place, appoint.'" Sakan, accordingly, denotes properly the one appointed, commissioned, then the representative, vicegerent. Thus Schrader l. c. p. 270. Moreover, the word corresponds to the מצפון and ממזרח־שמש. For one sees also from סגנים, that the raised-up ruler will be one who issues from the region of the Iranian tongue.

Ver. 26. מלפנים only here.

Ver. 28. מאלה is constr. prægnans: for the preposition מן depends on a verb that is only ideally present. We must derive the notion "seeking out" from וארא.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. We showed above that with our Prophet the promise of deliverance out of exile, and the turning of this promise to account as proof of divinity, go hand in hand. Having now described in xli. 1–20 the redeemer (vers. 2, 3) and the redeemed (vers. 8–16) and the destined salvation (vers. 17–20), the Prophet goes on here to turn them to account in the way referred to. He had made a beginning of this in vers. 4–7 after the first mention of the saviour from the East, but did not carry out the thought there. It appears as if he would there content himself with a passing reference in contrast with the fright of the heathen at the alarming demands made on their faith in idols. But now, having presented all that related to the deliverance from exile, he proceeds in earnest. He pays no more regard to that reluctance proceeding from a bad conscience. He sets forth with all seriousness that the Lord regards His prediction of the deliverance as a proof of His divinity, and the inability of idols to predict anything, or in fact to do anything, as a proof of their nothingness. The more exact development consists in this, that here Jehovah challenges the idols themselves directly to a contest, and that, more plainly than in ver. 2 sq., He proffers His prediction as a proof of His divinity. Although the idols do not at all relish the contest, still they must come on and take up the gauntlet (vers. 21–23). On their failure to tell anything they are pronounced to be nothing (ver. 24). Then Jehovah repeats the prediction of a deliverer from the East (ver. 25), and again shows that not the idols have foretold this (ver. 26), but that He, Jehovah, would give this deliverer to His people for a saviour, and at the same time as a pledge of the fulfilment of further promises that reach into a still more remote future (ver. 27). Finally the Prophet himself resumes the discourse, in order to establish the nothingness of his idolatrous quasi colleagues. For if the idols are nothing, so, too, must their interpreters show that they are know-nothings.

2. Produce your cause——chooseth you.—Vers. 21-24. The Lord challenges the idols to come on and bring to a practical decision this cause, long pending in thesi, and produce the proofs that they have for their cause. One thinks involuntarily of Elijah's challenge to the priests of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 21 sqq. Jehovah is often called King of the chosen people (comp. on xliii. 15); but the expression King of Jacob occurs only here (comp אֲבִיר יַעֲקֹב Gen. xlix. 24; Isa. xlix. 26; lx. 16; Ps. cxxxii. 2, 5, and מֹשֵׁל בְּיַעֲקֹב Ps lix. 14). In ver. 22 the Lord addresses Israel, claiming them for His side, and identifying His and their cause. יַגִּישׁוּ connects as repetition with הַגִּישׁוּ ver. 21. What they shall produce is their עֲצֻמוֹת "bulwarks." In what this producing proof shall consist is further explained by the words ויגידו-תקרינה (see xlv. 21). By הראשנות commentators understand either prius praedicta (Gesenius: "say what ye have formerly prophesied"), or the immediate future in contrast with the more remote, which they say is expressed by הבאות and אתיות לאחור. But in my opinion the former conflicts with the article, and the latter with usus loq. which forbids the distinction between ראשנות and באות as near and remote future. I think that ראשנות in contrast with הבאות can mean nothing but the past contrasted with the future. The immediate and proper meaning of the word is undoubtedly "first, beginning, original things." Thus Gen. xli. 20 הַפָּרוֹת הָר׳ are "the cows that first appeared." Thus everywhere ראשנות are the first or beginning things or facts; whether prophecies or other things must be determined in each case by the context. Comp. xlii. 9; xliii. 9, 18; xlvi. 9; xlviii. 3. Here the Lord demands of the idols, that they shall either give correct information of the past, thus, as it were, of the roots or foundations of the course of the world, so that one may thereby infer what the future will be, or they shall foretell the future directly. The Prophet, as appears to me, assumes here that we may foretell the future directly and indirectly, as e. g., it is the same whether I say: the fruit of this tree will be apples; or the roots are those of an apple tree. For if the latter be true, then the fruit must be apples. The correct knowledge of the future depends on a correct knowledge of the past. Both have riddles revealed only to the omniscience of God, and hence both are tests of divinity. Such, I think, is the Lord's meaning when He calls on the idols to produce the fundamental things of the past, and that according to their inmost being (מָה הֵנָּה). If they do this correctly, then it will be possible for attentive reflection (נָשִׂימָה לִבֵּנוּ only here in Isaiah; comp. Exod. ix. 21; Job. i. 8; ii. 3; Ezek. xliv. 5) to know correctly the issue, thus the conclusion that falls in the future. Comp. especially xlvi. 10 sq., where the Lord names as a prerogative of His divinity the power to foretell from the beginning the final issue, from ancient time what has not yet come to pass. By אוֹ, "or else," the alternative is offered to the idols to foretell the future directly, if they will.

Ver. 23, the Prophet proceeds, summing up the idea of ראשנות and באות, both which relate to the future; Shew the things that are to be hereafter, i. e., whose realization is fixed for a more remote period. The concluding clause and we will know, etc., states ironically what must result if the idols meet the demand: they will then be recognized as gods. But the Lord proceeds, moderating His demand to the utmost, in order to strike his opponents only the harder: yea, do good or do evil (a proverbial expression, comp. Jer. x. 5; Zeph. i. 12). Let them anyway do something. It is not meant; let them prophesy good or bad. The idea of their prophesying at all is dismissed with נֵרְעָה—"that we may know," etc. The clause ונשתעה ו׳ ("to look eye in eye in conflict," like התראה 2 Kings xiv. 8, 11) presents the conclusion from what precedes. If the idols accept the challenge, then there may be a contest. If not, then eo ipso they are defeated. The idols neither accept nor decline; hence the Lord concludes with the contemptuous words of ver. 24. Are the idols nothings, then of course, those that choose them (comp. on ver. 8) are an abomination to the Lord. The expression תּוֹעֵבָה, especially combined with יהוה, is very frequent in Deut. (xii. 31; xvii. 1; xviii. 12; xxii. 5, etc.) especially in reference to idolatry.

3. I have raised up——confusion.—Vers. 25-29. Having proved the inability of idols to prophesy, the Lord produces a prophecy, that is a pledge of His divinity. Thus He risks all on this prophecy. His honor perishes if it is not fulfilled. As He does not fear the latter, but utters it with absolute confidence, He gives for the present, not indeed a judicial proof of His divinity, but still He raises a legal presumption in favor of it (præsumtio juris, which, as is known, is something very different from a presumption (conjecture) in the common sense). And that even is something great, for it suffices for those that are honestly willing to know the truth. In Isaiah's time still the people wavered between Jehovah and idols. Isaiah's endeavor was to bring them to a decision for the Lord. These prophecies (xl.-lxvi.), meant for future consolation, were intended to affect also the present, i. e., to move the nation to believe in the Lord. If, then, Isaiah in Hezekiah's time stood up so confidently for Jehovah, as he does here, every one at all susceptible of the truth must have said to himself: the Prophet would not dare so to speak were he not conscious of being warranted to do so. For he risks the utter ruin of his and his God's cause, if this prophecy turn out to be an imposture. The prophecy, ver. 25, is somewhat oracular in form. In contents it has that obscurity peculiar to all images of the future, which rise so distant from the beholder that one is unable to detect their connection with the present, and thus the successive, organic genesis of their forms. It is further worthy of notice that the prophecy, ver. 25, connects with vers. 2, 3. I have raised up, ver. 25, is like an answer to "who raised up," ver. 2; from the north and from the rising define more particularly the simple "from the rising," ver. 2; he shall call on my name corresponds to "called him to his foot," ver. 2; and the following words that begin with ויבא, as ver. 3 closes, describe the irresistibleness of him that is called essentially in the same way as ver. 2 b, 3, with only this difference, that ver. 2 speaks of nations and kings in general, whereas ver. 25 the word סגנים ("satraps") points even more plainly to the theatre where the one called performs. That העירותי, ver. 25, is without an object, corresponds to the terseness proper to the oracular style. The object is easily supplied, partly from ver. 2, partly from the following, ויאת וגו׳. That the one promised is called from the North, but comes from the East, is not to be pressed. The Prophet would only intimate that his point of departure is not merely the East, as might appear from ver. 2, but also from the North. We know how this occurred in the case of Cyrus. He arose as ruler of the (by him) united kingdoms of Media and Persia, the former of which lay north, the latter east of Babylon. יקרא בשמי, He shall call on my name (see Text. and Gram.) mentions another characteristic of the one called. That Cyrus actually did this appears from 2 Chr. xxxvi. 23; Ezr. i. 2 sqq. He must have received vivid impressions of the reality of the God of Israel. Comp. on this Pressel in Herz., R.-Enc. III., p. 232. We will not inquire whether Cyrus, in calling Jehovah "the God of heaven," identified Him with Ahuramazda or not (comp. Zoeckler on 2 Chr. xxxvi. 23). But it is historically attested in the most credible manner, and is in itself perfectly comprehensible, that God, who in general let the heathen go their own way (Acts xiv. 16), should in an exceptional way give them extraordinary revelations of His being. In the period preceding the Christian era He did this in two significant epochs through Israel, in consequence of its missionary vocation, viz., in the two exiles, the Egyptian and the Babylonian. In both instances the revelation came to the dominant world-power at the moment of its highest prosperity. In regard to Egypt comp., e. g., Lepsius (Chronol. d. Egypter, I., p. 359), who calls the period of Moses and of the departure of the Israelites "the most illustrious time of all Egyptian history." In regard to Babylon the same thing appears from the fact that Nebuchadnezzar is designated as the golden head (Dan. ii. 38). The Lord would not let Himself be without witness to those who knew no limits to their power, for their own sakes partly, partly for His own name's sake, partly for the sake of mankind in general, partly for the sake of Israel. The Lord would show His power to Pharaoh, that His name might be declared throughout all the earth, and to accomplish His judgments on all the gods of Egypt (Exod. ix. 16; comp. viii. 10, 19; xiv. 4, 17, 18, 25). And that this purpose was achieved appears from the confessions of Pharaoh himself, of his servants, and of his army (Exod. ix. 20, 27; x. 7, 16; xiv. 25). As regards the Babylonian Exile, the entire first half of the book of Daniel is meant to show how Jehovah so marvellously glorified Himself on those nations and their kings, that they cannot escape acknowledging Him as the true God (comp. my work: Jeremiah and Babylon, p. 2 sqq.), at least for the moment (for we know nothing of any outward, observable abiding effect—at most the adoration of the Magi, Matt. ii., might be appealed to here. What (according to Dan. ii. 47; iii. 28 sq.; iv. 34; v. 17 sqq.; vi. 25 sqq.), Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar and Darius the Mede knew, was any way preliminary to the knowledge on the basis of which Cyrus issued his edict, Ezr. i. 2 sqq. Certainly we cannot impute to Cyrus less knowledge than that ascribed to his predecessors in the passages cited. If we were right in saying that "he shall call on my name" corresponds to "has called him to his foot," ver. 2, then this is to be defined, that according to ver. 2 the Lord called Cyrus, and according to ver. 25 Cyrus called on the Lord. It is further said of Cyrus that he will come on satraps as on mortar, etc. בוא, in the sense of hostile coming like xxviii. 15; Ps. xxxv. 8; Job xv. 21; xx. 22; Prov. xxviii. 22. In all these passages בוא stands with the accusative (localis).

The Prophet, ver. 26, assumes the standpoint of the fulfilment. He represents to himself that then the inquiry will naturally arise: who hath declared this from the beginning, that we may know, i. e., that we might know beforehand the coming of these things (vers. 22, 23)? And who announced it from early time, so that now we might say: right? צדיק is what corresponds to a norm: not only a moral, or some special juridical norm, but also the norm of truth. Hence אֱמֶת, xliii. 9, stands in a precisely similar connection. Yet the last-named meaning is supported by no other example. Hence it seems to me likely that the Prophet joins with it the sense of moral rightness. A god whose prophecy fails is morally condemned. But if it comes to pass, he is morally justified; he is no liar, but truly what he gives himself out to be (comp. xlv. 21). But again there has never been any announcement and bringing to the ears on the part of the idols, nor hearing on the part of men (vers. 22, 23). אף (comp. xl. 24), recurring thrice, paints with a certain breadth the absence on every hand of what was requisite.

Ver. 27, the Prophet defines more particularly the salvation that the one called of God shall bring to the people of God. It was said, ver. 25, in general, that he would call on the name of the Lord, and destroy the hostile powers. Now he is defined to be the first-fruit of the salvation destined for Zion. The LXX. translate ἀρχὴν Σιὼν δώσω. Peschito: primordia Sionis haec sunt. As far as I can see, all expositors construe ראשון as nominative and relating to Jehovah; and either supply אָמַרְתִּי, or connect ראשון with אֶתֵּן. The words הנה הנם are by some put in the mouth of Jehovah, by others in Zion's mouth, by others in that of the מְבַשֵּׂר, and the suffixes (pronouns) are referred now to the exiles, now to the deliverer, now to facts of redemption, now to the idols.

I refer ראשון to Cyrus. In an eminent sense he was the beginner of the redemption. Israel's decline lasted till the close of the Exile. With difficulty (Dan. ix. 25), slowly, and with great alternations, it mounts up; but still it mounts up. The believers that looked for the restitution of Israel in all its promised glory directly after the seventy years, under the anointed son of David, struggle with many assaults of doubt, as they observe only very meagre beginnings of a redemption (comp. Dan. x. 1–3, and AUBERLEN, D. Proph. Daniel, p. 132 sq.) But the laws of prophetic perspective were hid from them, which sees the end already in the beginning, though long periods of vicissitude separate one from the other. Cyrus is called מְשִׁיחַ יהוה, xlv. 1. He was not the proper and true Messiah, but he was the first after the great period of judgment. He was the first-fruit—messiah, the beginner of the restoration of Israel. His edict, Ezr. i. 2 sqq., was the first step toward realizing for Israel that שׁוּב ("return"), that Isaiah, Jeremiah, and all their successors represent as the sum total of bodily and spiritual redemption for Israel. I construe הִנֵּה הִנָּם as an exclamation of the Prophet, by which he points to the consequences of that first-fruit—redemption. For the notion "first" includes that of "following" or "consequences." In spirit the Prophet sees these before him, and points to them with a brief הנה הנם. He calls Cyrus a מְבַשֵּׂר; for what more joyful news could the LORD propose for His people than that they may return home to rebuild Jerusalem? בִּשֵּׂר, comp. on xl. 9.

As ver. 26 is related to ver. 25, so vers. 28, 29 are related to ver. 27. Each of these prophetic lamps shines in strong contrast with the picture of the nothingness of idols that acts as a foil. Only it seems to me that so far there is a difference, in that ver. 26 the Prophet has in mind the idols themselves, whereas in vers. 28, 29 he has in mind their worshippers, especially their priests (see below). Ver. 28 has three gradations. The first clause is obscure; it speaks only of the looking around and the non-existence of something, but one knows not what one has looked about for. The second clause makes known those among whom the Prophet has looked, and what he was looking for. He seeks a יוֹעֵץ "counsellor, one, however, that can prophetically resolve the riddles of the future. This is made plain in the third clause: but there was no counsellor of whom I could inquire and who could give me answer. The reason of this is given ver. 29: the gods that should inspire the answer in their worshippers are no gods but the manufacture of those who worship them. Thus ver. 29 speaks of those that make the idols, and not of the idols themselves. And because "they all" (כֻּלָּם) are identical with the אֵלֶּה ("them) of ver. 28, among whom no counsellor is found, therefore ver. 28 speaks not of the idols, but of their servants, and especially of those who, on account of their office, should be qualified to give counsel and render a decision, thus the priests and prophets. And because it is not to be supposed that the LORD looks for a counsellor and giver of decrees, therefore the subject of וְאֵרֶא ("I looked about") ver. 28, is not Jehovah, but the Prophet. Thus the chapter concludes with an apostrophe of the true Prophet to the false ones, and אֵלֶּה is said δεικτικῶς. With this reference to the manufacture of idols, the Prophet returns to the thought with which he also closed the first strophe (vers. 6, 7).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The second part of Isaiah lays unusual stress on the inability of idols to prophesy. As this, on the one hand, is a proof of the nothingness of idols, so on the other, Jehovah's ability to foretell the future is made a proof of His divinity. Hence, when the LORD challenges the idols to a contest in prophesying, and then on His part stands forth with an imposing prophetic performance, that has for its subject the deliverance of Israel from the Exile, one sees that two objects are combined, viz.: He comforts His people, and He proves His divinity. Thus we see that the Prophet's view-point is partly at the end of the Exile and partly before the Exile. The former because he sees the deliverer quite clearly and distinctly before him; the latter because it is all important for him to display his LORD as knowing the remote future, and thus as true God. Thus he would win Israel by representing on the one hand the omniscence of their God, and on the other His faithful love and power. And this object was attained. Israel would assuredly not have buried their gross idolatry in the Exile, had they not verified both the threatenings and the promises of Jehovah's Prophet in the most signal manner. But this grand effect could only be produced by the promises being recognized on all sides as genuine, old prophecies. Prophecies that gave themselves out for old, but hitherto hidden must have raised doubts, and contradicted themselves. For it is expressly said xlv. 19; xlviii. 16 that these things were not spoken in secret.

2. [On ver. 1. "The same reasons will apply to all approaches which are made to God. When we are about to come before Him in prayer or praise; to confess our sins and to plead for pardon; when we engage in argument respecting His being, plans, or perfections; or when we draw near to Him in the closet, the family, or the sanctuary, the mind should be filled with awe and reverence. It is well, it is proper, to pause and think of what our emotions should be, and of what we should say before God. Comp. Gen. xxviii. 16, 17."—BARNES.

3. On vers. 6, 7. "Do sinners thus animate and quicken one another in the ways of sin? And shall not the servants of the living God both stir up one another to, and strengthen one another in, His service?"—M. HENRY.]

4. On ver. 8 sqq. The LORD here founds His comforting promise on the election in Abraham. Compare with this the saying of John Baptist: "Begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," etc., Luke iii. 8, 9. This sounds contradictory. But one must distinguish between the individual and the whole. Not every individual generation, in general no individual part, great or small, of the totality of Israel can insist on the election of Abraham, and regard itself as exempt and unimpeachable on that account. For history teaches that great judgments have come on individuals and on the nation almost to their annihilation. But, of course, a remnant will always remain, if only just large enough to afford seed for a new generation. The LORD says this expressly in the great inaugural vision, vi. 11–13, and such, too, is the meaning of that significant Shear-Jashub (x. 20 sqq.). The Apostle Paul has this meaning when he says: "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." Rom. xi. 29.

5. On vers. 9, 10. "A rich treasure of manifold comfort: 1) that God strengthens us; 2) that God calls us; 3) that He accepts us as servants; 4) that He chooses us; 5) that He does not reject us; 6) that He is with us; 7) that He is our God; 8) that He helps and preserves us. This ought to be turned to good account by everyone whatever may chance to be His need."—CRAMER.

6. On ver. 14 sqq. What a contrast! A poor little worm, and a new threshing instrument with double-edged points that rends mountains to pieces! When was the church of either the Old or New Testament ever such a threshing instrument? First of all, the Babylonian Empire was threshed to pieces that Israel might be free. Afterwards many kingdoms and nations were threshed in pieces and made subject to the Roman Empire that the church of the New Testament might grow and spread abroad. Afterwards the Roman Empire itself was threshed in pieces to gain for the church a new, fresh, healthy soil in the Germanic nations. But finally the Germanic nations will in turn be threshed in pieces that the church may become the free, pure kingdom of Christ ruling over all. So the church, the poor little worm Jacob, rends in pieces one form of the world-power after another, until it issues from the last as the glorious bride of the LORD.

7. On ver. 21 sqq. "It was customary to expect of seers and prophets such a deep look into the obscurity of the past and present, as Saul imputed to his Seer (1 Sam. ix.), as well as prevision into the future; which, in the Hellenic world, is illustrated in the Homeric Kalchas, as a knower of what exists, of what was, as well as of what will be (Hom. Ilias. I. 70)" ED. MUELLER. Parallelen zu den Weiss. u. Typen des A. T. aus dem hell. Alterth. in Jahrbücher d. Klass. Philol. VIII. Suppl. Band. I. Heft. p. 108.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On vers. 8–13. God chose Abraham, and in Abraham the Israel of the Old Testament, and in Israel of the Old Testament the Israel of the New Testament. This fact of the election certifies to the church the sure pledge of its final conquest, for 1) the LORD cannot forsake the congregation of the elect; 2) He must make an end of those that contend against them.

2. On vers. 14-16. The church as it seems, and as it is; 1) It seems to be a worm, a poor crowd; 2) It is really a. strong in the LORD (ver. 14 b—16 a); b, joyful in the LORD (ver. 16 b).

3. On vers. 17–20. He that is exposed to trials, who trusts in God, is not to be bewailed, since for Him; 1) life is indeed a desert; 2) but the desert becomes a paradise by the miraculous hand of God; 3) the miraculous hand of God summons him to grateful recognition.

4. On vers. 21–29. Against the modern heathenism, that in the place of the living, personal God would set abstractions that operate mechanically and unconsciously, one may prove the existence of the personal God by reference to the prophecies that were undoubtedly given and have been fulfilled. Only the living God can prophesy and fulfil. For 1) Divine omniscience is needed to foreknow the future; 2) Divine omnipotence and wisdom are needed to fulfil what has been foretold.

III.—THE THIRD DISCOURSE.

The third chief figure: The personal servant of God in the contrastive, principal features of his manifestation.

CHAPTER XLII.

1. THE MEEK SERVANT OF GOD.

CHAPTER XLII. 1–4.

1 Behold my servant, whom I uphold;
Mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth;
I have put my spirit upon him:
He shall [a]bring forth judgment to the Gentiles.
2 He shall not cry, nor lift up,
Nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.

3 A bruised reed shall he not break,
And the [1]smoking flax shall he not [2]quench:
He shall bring forth judgment [b]unto truth.
4 He shall not fail nor be [3]discouraged,
Till he have set [a]judgment in the earth:
And the isles shall wait for his law.

[1] Or, dimly burning. [2] Heb. quench it, [3] Heb. broken.
[a] reveal right. [b] according to truth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. הֵן—רָצְתָה—בָּחִיר—תָּמַךְ. Ver. 3. כֵּהָה—פִּשְׁתָּה. Ver. 4. יַחֵל—תּוֹרָה.

Ver. 1. With רצתה נפשׁי one looks for בּוֹ (comp. Mic. vi. 7, etc.). Evidently the preceding בּוֹ continues in force.

Ver. 4. לא יכהה corresponds to the second clause of ver. 3; לא ירוץ to the first clause. From this it appears that יָרוּץ is not from רוּץ, but from רָצַץ. The pronunciation of the imperf. Kal with u occurs also in other עָע verbs (יָרוֹן Prov. xxix. 6. יָשׁוּר Ps. xci. 6), and it is remarkable that the imperfect forms of רצץ occur only with the pronunciation u; Ps. xviii. 30; 2 Sam. xxii. 30; Eccl. xii. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As in chap. xli. the form of Cyrus, who is servant of Jehovah without being called so, and the form of Israel, who is servant of Jehovah and is so called, have their roots, so the form of Him who is servant of Jehovah in the highest sense, the form of the Messiah has its root in chap. xxiv. Thus the Prophet allows the types of his prophetic forms to appear in succession, and in a way that sketches them for us at first only in general outline. Here now he lets a servant of Jehovah appear, whom, after the first strokes that draw his form, we might regard as identical with the servant of Jehovah mentioned xli. 8. For all that is said in our ver. 1, applies well enough to the people of Israel. But can vers. 2, 3 be said of them? Here is mentioned One, who could, if He would, but He will not. He could cry, and break the bruised reed, and quench the glimmering wick, for He had the right and the might to do it. That is the LORD Himself, that comes to visit His people in meekness and lowliness. And yet He does appear as a Judge, loud and terrible, as appears from ver. 13. For this chapter is full of contrasts. Vers. 1–4 contrast with vers. 10–17; vers. 5–9 with vers. 18–21. Contrasts appear, too, within the individual strophes; e. g., ver. 4 a. contrasts with 4 b.

2. Behold my servant——for his law.—Vers. 1–4. תָּמַךְ in itself can mean "to seize, hold fast." Here, however, it is not an act of violence that is spoken of, but an act of love. The Servant of Jehovah supports Himself on Jehovah, and Jehovah supports, holds and bears His Servant (comp. ver. 6; Jno. viii. 29). The words "in whom I am well pleased," Matth. iii. 17; xvii. 5; 2 Pet. i. 17, heard at the baptism and the transfiguration of Christ, seem to connect with our רצתה וגו׳ and also with חָפֵץ ver 21. The idea of anointing seems to underly the expression I have put My Spirit upon Him. (The expression occurs only here in Isaiah; for xxxvii. 7 belongs in another category; still comp. xi. 2; lxi. 1). The use of the holy anointing oil (also of incense) is often signified by נתן על in Lev. ii. 1, 15; xiv. 17, 18, 28, 29. This construction is confirmed by lxi. 1. By the anointing with the Holy Spirit, the Servant of God is qualified to bring right to the nations. משׁפט here can mean neither judicial transaction, nor judicial sentence; it can only mean standard of right. But what sort appears partly from the nature of the thing itself, partly from the parallel passages. The heathen, too, had standards of right in general. But they lacked the true source of right, the knowledge of Him who alone is truth; they lacked the νόμος τῆς ἀληθείας. Not merely the juridical norm of right in the absolute sense, i. e., religion (HENGSTENBERG Christol. on our text, DELITZSCH, REINKE) is to be understood. This absolute standard of right, hitherto the prerogative of Jehovah and His people, the Servant of Jehovah will carry forth to all nations (comp. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2; Isa. li. iv.; Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20). Thus הוֹצִיא signifies the publishing of what has hitherto been hid, revelation (Hab. i. 4).

In vers. 2, 3 it is added in praise of the Servant of the LORD that He will not cry in the streets, nor break the bruised reed. If He is to be praised for this, then He must have been able to do what He abstained from doing. Evidently a contrast presents itself here. It is not that the Servant of the LORD cannot do what He would even like to do. But the contrary: He could, but He will not. He abstains from the use of His power; He divests Himself. By this even it is intimated that His power must be great. Otherwise there would not be so much made of His refraining from using it. Is it credible that such humble abstinence from the use of power that they enjoyed could ever be mentioned to the praise of Isaiah, or of the prophets generally, or of the people of Israel generally, or of the spiritual Israel, or of Cyrus, or of Uzziah, or Hezekiah or Josiah [the various persons supposed by different commentators to be meant by the Servant of Jehovah.—Tr.]? When did Israel ever have great power in reference to the heathen, and in humble love abstain from its use? Or when had ever a prophet or king of Israel the high position of a teacher of mankind, and filled it with humble self-denial? And of Cyrus it cannot be said that he was called to give to the heathen the νόμος τῆς ἀληθείας. There is only One, that stood as Teacher of all nations, and who, spite of His great dignity, could say of Himself: "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest for your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light" (Matth. xi. 28–30). It is as if the Lord had our passage in mind when He spoke these words. For not only do His words: "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth" (ibid. ver. 29) recall ver. 5 of our chapter, that describes God as the One "that created the heavens, and stretched them out." But, what is still more important, we find there the same contrast as the basis of Christ's words, that rules over also our passage. The almighty Lord of heaven and earth does not ask after the wise and prudent, He has revealed Himself to those under age. And Christ Himself! How significant that He introduces the words to the weary and heavy laden quoted above, with the words: "All things are delivered unto Me of My Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him" (ibid. ver. 27). Does He not say here in a most emphatic way, that He is a meek, lowly and patient teacher although the greatest power and the highest knowledge are delivered to Him? Besides the evident connection of our passage with Matth. xi. 25–30, that we have thus remarked, the evangelist Matthew himself declares expressly in what immediately follows (xii. 15–21) that he saw in the conduct of the Lord at that time the fulfilment of the words of our Prophet. That He healed the sick, and yet forbad to have it published, that He would only serve (comp. Matth. xx. 28), and sought not His honor and His advantage (Jno. viii. 50; v. 30), that seems to Matthew to correspond to the picture of the Servant of the Lord that Isaiah drew in our chapter.

The expression נָשָׂא meaning נשא קול occurs Num. xiv. 1; Job xxi. 12, and in Isa. in part first (iii. 7) and in part second (xlii. 2, 41). The omission being idiomatic, it need not be supplied from the following קוֹלוֹ. The statement that the Servant of Jehovah shall not cry nor lift up His voice is understood in various ways. It is said, on the contrary, vers. 13, 14, that He will cry. This belongs to the contrasts with which the chapter abounds. The meaning of vers. 2, 3 is, therefore, not that the Servant of the Lord will in general not cry, and will break nothing whatever. Rather, as His anointing with the Spirit implies, He will only not roar and rage as do the powers of this world, nor do violence to the weak and wretched. On the contrary He will show Himself gentle and kind to the poor and weak, which is precisely the Old Testament meaning of צַדִּיק. What is already bruised ("nicked," קָנֶה רָצוּץ comp. xxxvi. 6; lviii. 6; Deut. xxviii. 33) He will not finish by breaking, and the feebly glimmering wick He will not extinguish. פִּשְׁתָּה is the wick made from linen (פֵּשֶׁתֶה which however does not occur, comp. Gesen. Thes. p. 1136). The double statement of ver. 3 contains a λιτότης. For it is inconceivable that He, whose being is light and life, intends only the non-extinguishment of the wick or the non-fracture of the reed. Rather He intends both as the beginning of new life.

The clause לאמת יוציא מ׳ stands alone as a positive statement in antithesis to the foregoing negatives. The LXX. translates: εἰς ἀλήθειαν ἐξοίσει κρίσιν. Matth. xii. 20 reads: ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ εἰς νῖκος τὴν κρίσιν. The latter translation seems to come from a confusion with Hab. i. 4. For there it reads: וְלֹא יֵצֵא לָנֶצַח מִשְׁפָּט. But in Aramaic נְצַח means vicit; נִצְחָנָא, נִצְחָנָא is victoria; נַצִּיחָא victor. לֶאֱמֶת, which occurs no where else in the Old Testament, can only mean secundam veritatem (Vulg. in veritate), like the forms לְמִשְׁפָּט, לְצֶדֶק xi. 3; לְמִשְׁמַע, לְמַרְאֵה xxxii. 1. One might suppose that the expression meant the same as משפט יוציא לגוים ver. 1. But it is to be noticed that ver. 1 it is the nations to whom the Servant of Jehovah brings forth right, whereas ver. 3 it is to those compared to the bruised reed and glimmering wick. Moreover in ver. 1 the addition לאמת is wanting. Both considerations justify our assuming a modification of the sense in ver. 3. To the heathen, who do not know Him, God will reveal the standard of right, by the use of which they will find the right. But for the poor and wretched He will procure a right decree corresponding to the truth, He will help them to their rights; something that elsewhere also is made to be an essential part of the glory of the Messianic kingdom (i. 21, 26 sq.; ix. 6). But הוֹצִיא expresses here the proceeding, issuing of the decree of a judge, in which sense יָצָא occurs twice in Hab. i. 4. Perducere, to carry into effect, to conduct to the end, cannot be the meaning of הוֹצִיא.

By ver. 4, the Prophet would obviate a misunderstanding, by preparing a transition that makes prominent a contrastive side of the Servant of Jehovah, which appears even in the second, but still more decidedly in the third strophe. For instance, it might perhaps be inferred from vers. 2, 3 that the Servant of Jehovah were only meek and lowly, that thus He were made only of weak stuff, that His being would lack the firmness, the manly force, the ability to be angry and punish. To obviate this false inference the Prophet says, though the Servant of Jehovah will be such as described vers. 2, 3, still He will Himself be no bruised reed, [ירוץ from רָצַץ see Text. and Gram.]. Spite of his gentleness, He shall be firm as a rock (xvii. 10; xxvi. 4), on which all attacks of His enemies shall dash to pieces, and He shall carry out His counsel victoriously. The conjunction עַד signifies here, as often (Gen. xxviii. 15; Ps. cxii. 8), continuance until the object is attained; the meaning of this form of expression being always that a ceasing will not take place till the end in view is attained (against GESEN. Thes. p. 992, and HENGSTENBERG, Authentie d. Daniel, p. 67). What follows does not enter into the consideration. The standard of right that the Servant of Jehovah will establish on the earth is the same mentioned ver. 1. It is afterwards called תּוֹרָה "law," which is only nearer definition added on. That is, it is only made plainer that this standard of right will be a religious one, a counterpart of the law of Sinai. As DELITZSCH remarks, the Servant of Jehovah will add to the Sinaitic the Zionitic Torah (comp. ii. 3). The position of ייחלו at the end of the clause indicates that we are not to consider it as dependent on עַד. But the Prophet would say: when the standard of right is established by the Servant of Jehovah as Torah, as religious law, then will the isles (meaning here the remotest regions of the heathen world) turn themselves to it in hope and trust (comp. li. 4, 5).

2. THE SERVANT OF GOD AS THE BEARER OF A NEW COVENANT. THE THIRD APPLICATION OF PROPHECY AS PROOF OF DIVINITY.

CHAPTER XLII. 5–9.

5 Thus saith God the LORD,
He that created the heavens, and stretched them out;
He that spread forth the earth, and that which cometh out of it;
He that giveth breath unto the people upon it,
And spirit to them that walk therein:
6 I the LORD have called thee in righteousness,
And will hold thine hand,
And will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people,
For a light of the Gentiles;
7 To open the blind eyes,
To bring out the prisoners from the prison,
And them that sit in darkness out of the prison house.
8 [a]I am the LORD: that is my name:
And my glory will I not give to another,
Neither my praise to graven images.
9 Behold, the former things are come to pass,
And new things do I declare:
Before they spring forth I tell you of them.

[a] I the LORD.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 5. בורא—כה אמר. Ver. 6. נצר—אחזק. Ver. 7. כְּלֶא.

Ver. 5. On נטה שמים comp. xl. 22. The form נוטיהם with י is to be explained, not indeed according to liv. 5, but after the analogy of those forms of לה' in which the original י reappears. On רָקַע comp. on xl. 19; xliv. 24. As the word properly means to hammer out broad (comp. רָקִיעַ), צאצאיה (τὰ ἔκγονα, כֹּל אֲשֶׁר תּוֹצֵא הָאָרֶץ Gen. i. 12 sqq., a word that occurs only in Job and Isa.; comp. xxii. 24) taken strictly does not suit it. But in רקע there lies ideally the notion of spreading out and צאצאיה depends on that.

Ver. 6. אַחְזֵק, the abbreviated jussive form, here exceptionally in the first person [See GREEN'S Gr. § 97. 2 a]. In regard to its being joined with ב see iv. 1; xlv. 1; li. 18; lvi. 2, 4, 6; lxiv. 6; comp. xli. 13).——That עָם and גוים have not the article, accords with the prophetic style, and is not to be pressed.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This strophe consists of a preface, principal part, and conclusion. In respect to vers. 1–4 there is a climax. The introduction ver. 5 is a considerable leap. There the Prophet designates the LORD as the one that has created heaven and the earth, and all that is on it. This affords the basis for what follows. The same God that could do this, and He only, is able also to deliver them. He, too, can say of the redeemer His Servant: I have called Thee, will uphold, protect and make Thee the bearer of a new covenant, and a light to all nations (ver. 6). This new covenant and enlightening the nations shall consist in opening blind eyes, and delivering prisoners from prison (ver. 7), which is to be understood in both a spiritual and a physical sense. The strophe concluds (vers. 8, 9) by the emphatic statement that He, Jehovah announces this beforehand for the sake of His own honor, and especially to show (ver. 8) the difference between Himself and idols. As He has fulfilled earlier prophecies, so now He gives new ones in order, by their eventual fulfilment, to prove His divinity.

2. Thus saith God——therein.—Ver. 5. It seems to me that הָאֵל put first is, like Gen. xlvi. 3, meant to designate emphatically the true God, who alone has power, in contrast with the powerless false gods (ver. 8). האל placed before יהוה as here, does not occur elsewhere. Comp. v. 16. בורא see List: except in Isaiah only twice: Amos. iv. 13; Eccl. xii. 1. בורא שמים xlv. 18 (lxv. 17). עָם, which has הלכים בה for parallel, signifies accordingly the people of the earth generally. The order of thought here makes it evident that the chief features of the Mosaic account of the creation float before the Prophet's eye: creation of the heavens; spreading out the earth, the imparting of נְשָׁמָה (comp. Gen. ii. 7) and רוּח (Gen. vii. 22) to men.

3. I the LORD——prison house.—Vers. 6, 7. Having reminded his hearers who God is as in ver. 5, the Prophet lets the LORD announce Himself as the one who will give the world a redeemer in His Servant. He that can create, etc., can also do this. One is reminded of those passages where Jesus Christ proves His power to forgive sins by pointing to His miracles: Matt. ix. 2 sqq.; Mar. ii. 3 sqq.; Luke v. 18 sqq.). That the one called is the Servant of God, is evident from the context. קְרָאתִיךָ recalls xli. 2, 4, 9. But the LORD has called His Servant בְּצֶדֶק. If the Old Testament צדקה "righteousness" has for its antithesis חָמָס or עֹשֶׁק, i. e., violence, unrighteousness, then a righteous man, צַדִּיק, is one who in every respect wills only what is right and proper. He will neither do violence to the poor and weak, nor regard the person of the mighty and violent man; He will neither condemn the penitent and contrite, nor let the impenitent go unpunished. Thus His treatment of the penitent sinner is as just as it is of the impenitent. He could destroy the former if He would; for He has the power. Who would call Him to account? But is then grace, that dispenses pardon on the ground of a subjective or objective performance, not also just? That is, does not God in a higher sense exercise righteousness, when He forgives the contrite who implores grace on the ground of the atoning-sacrifice that even God Himself has made for him? Thus it is not at all partial favor, measuring with unequal measure, when God calls His Servant into the world as redeemer. Rather, in Him grace displays itself as combined in one with righteousness. Unrighteous grace there is not in God any way. Thus Isaiah can say of Cyrus that God has raised him up in righteousness (xlv. 13). By "I have called thee the appearance of the Servant is signified as something that has already taken place. The verbs that follow signify as future what the LORD purposes to do with His Servant. He will take Him by the hand and (which expresses the object of so doing) protect Him, and make Him for a covenant of the people, and for a light of the Gentiles.

When HERMANN SCHULTZ (Alttestamentl. Theol. II. p. 75) says, that there is here not the remotest mention of a future personality, I should like to know how he may reconcile that with ver. 9. One sees from the Futures אחזק, אצרך, אתנך, and still more plainly from ver. 9, that the Prophet points away to a remote future that has not even begun to bud. And the "covenant of the people," too, must be a new one, and not one in existence already. For were it an old, already existing one, how did the LORD come to say that He would make His Servant for this covenant? In fact it must be a very new covenant, vastly superior to the old one, since, according to ver. 7, it can "open blind eyes, and bring out the prisoners from prison," which the old covenant could not do. Neither the total of Israel, nor the ideal Israel, nor the order of prophets can set in operation what is promised in ver. 7; or if this were something that they could do, then it does not belong here. We justly expect something great here, a work of salvation, an act of redemption, in fact something greater than is promised vers. 2, 3, for the strophe vers. 5-9 forms the ladder to what follows, which presents to view the highest good. Either Isaiah does not speak of the Messiah at all, (which indeed KNOBEL maintains with entire consistency), or he speaks of Him already here. The opinion that Isaiah here does not yet understand the Messiah under "the Servant of Jehovah," that the Servant of Jehovah appears as an individual only later, say from lii. 14 on, comes from the failure to observe the character of xl.-xlii. which prepare the foundation for what follows. In Josh. iii. 14 even the ark of the covenant is called הארון הברית. When even such an inanimate vessel is called the covenant, why may that not be said of the Lord Himself, who, in fact, is the sole living and personal bond that unites divinity and humanity. As Christ calls Himself the way (Jno. xiv. 6), or the resurrection (Jno. xi. 25), so, too, He may be called the covenant. Thus, e. g., מַס "tributum" (Josh. xvi. 10, etc.), signifies Him that tributum affert, שָׁלוֹם (Ps. cxx. 7) Him that pacem agit. Thus ברית עָם is He that mediates the covenant to the people. But this is no other than the Messiah. I do not comprehend how V. FR. OEHLER (D. Knecht Jehova's, I. p. 50) can say: "Israel in the Messianic time needs no more an Abraham, a Moses as mediator of a covenant of the people with Jehovah, but the people as regenerated, as conscious of its destiny, as perfect servant of Jehovah is itself the covenant." Israel has, indeed, no need of an Abraham or Moses; but Christ it does need, and without Him, too, it could never be "the perfect servant of Jehovah."

By עָם is meant Israel, as appears both from the added ברית and from the antithetical גוים (comp. xlix. 6). Salvation comes from the Jews (Jno. iv. 22). The sunrise from on high (Luke i. 78) appears in Israel and proceeds thence to the heathen. For the recurrence of the phraseology here see xlix. 6, 8, comp. li. 4. The covenant, that the Servant of Jehovah is to mediate is called liv. 10 a covenant of peace, and lv. 3; lxi. 8, an everlasting covenant (comp. lix. 21; lvi. 4, 6).

In ver. 7, the Prophet specifies the contents of the general notions "covenant of the people," "light of the Gentiles." If פקח ע׳ ע׳ (comp. xxxv. 5; xxix. 18) connects primarily with אור גוים, and appears attracted by this thought, so הוציא ממסגר אסיר relates primarily to עָם, thus to Israel. Why may one not think first of Israel in reference to the deliverance from imprisonment, seeing the entire second part of Isaiah is primarily a book of consolation for Israel in captivity? But to prevent our thinking that the opening of eyes refers only to the heathen, and the leading out of prison only to Israel, the Prophet adds a third clause, that combines both factors, and thus intimates that also those sitting in darkness shall be freed, and those languishing in prison be enlightened. From this appears how unjust to the text a rough, outward construction like KNOBEL's is. For did the heathen, then, share Israel's captivity in Babylon? Certainly not. But there is a blindness and a captivity under which both Israel and the heathen labored (comp. Acts xxvi. 17, 18). At the same time it must not be denied, that also acts of physical deliverance are to be regarded as degrees of the fulfilment of our prophecy, e. g., from the chains of prison and darkness, like the deliverance from the Babylonish Exile, and those acts of healing that the personal Servant of Jehovah did during His life on earth (comp. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 14–16, with ibid. ver. 23). Light and freedom, therefore light and right (for freedom is his right whom the prison holds not or holds no longer) will the Servant of Jehovah bring to the world. Should not one think here of the Urim and Thummim of the High-Priest (Exod. xxviii. 30), and consequently construe this offering of light and right as the priestly activity of the Servant of Jehovah? The expression dwellers in darkness occurs only here and Ps. cvii. 10. Comp. Isa. ix. 1.

4. I am the Lord — of them.—Vers. 8, 9. The verses 6, 7 form the pith of the strophe; which is prefaced (ver. 5) by words that let us infer its significance, and is concluded by just such words (vers. 8, 9). The words אני יהוה, that directly follow the pith of the strophe, seem to correspond to the words of similar meaning with which (ver. 6) it immediately begins. They are therefore in apposition with אני יהוה at the beginning of ver. 6, and to be translated "I Jehovah" (not "I am Jehovah"). Verily it must be something great which the LORD twice announces with the words, "I, Jehovah, do it." It must be something that only Jehovah can do; thus something far beyond the power of a man or of any other creature. Jehovah, however, can do it because He is called יהוה, i. e., according to Exod. iii. 14, the eternally existent, the absolutely existent (in הוא שמי, appears even a reminiscence of זה שמי, Exod. iii. 15), who just thereby is distinguished from all other beings, that either have no real existence at all, as idols, or that have not the source of their existence in themselves. Did the LORD not do what He has promised, vers. 6, 7, His name would lie. He would not then be what He calls Himself; He were a liar and deceiver, like those that unjustly assume the name "god." Thus He pledges the honor of His name for the fulfilment of what is promised, vers. 6. 7. But the LORD must do this not only to be consistent with Himself; He does it also in order that His honor may not unlawfully be taken by another. Did He promise and not fulfil, He would not be distinguished from idols. Indeed, in a certain sense, He would be less than idols. For not to be able to prophesy at all (xli. 21) were better than to prophesy and not fulfil. In a quite similar sense xlviii. 11. But, moreover, the LORD may not risk the coming to pass of the great things spoken of, vers. 6, 7, without His having previously foretold them, lest Israel say as in xlviii. 5, "mine idol hath done them," etc. Thus, as in xli. 4, 22 sqq., by prophesying them, He vindicates the future things as His plan and His work, and proves His divinity. But as He does not now first begin to prophesy, but had done it already in the remote past, so He can now point, not only to the future fulfilment of what is now prophesied, but also to the actual fulfilment of what was formerly prophesied. Thus present fulfilment is security for that which is to be. Accordingly, by הראשנות, ver. 9, I cannot, with DELITZSCH and others, understand the immediate future, but only that foretold in the past. If the ראשנות were "the appearance of Cyrus and the movements of the nations connected therewith," then instead of בָּאוּ it must read בָּאוֹת (comp. xli. 22). How can fulfilments still future, any way, be the pledge of others also future? I understand, therefore, by the former things the totality of prophecies made from the days of the Patriarchs to the catastrophe of Assyria, and in part fulfilled, and by new things (comp. xlviii. 6) all that the Prophet has to say concerning the future salvation that begins with Cyrus. These are the things which the Prophet, with the actual or the ideal present in view, designates as not recognizable even in their buds (comp. xliii. 19).

3. THE SERVANT OF GOD AS A STRONG GOD.

CHAPTER XLII. 10–17.

10 Sing unto the LORD a new song,
And his praise from the end of the earth,
Ye that go down [a]to the sea, and [b]all that is therein;
The isles, and the inhabitants thereof.

11 Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice,
The villages that Kedar doth inhabit:
Let the inhabitants of the rock sing,
Let them shout from the top of the mountains.
12 Let them give glory unto the LORD,
And declare his praise in the islands.
13 The LORD shall go forth as a mighty man,
He shall stir up [b]jealousy like a man of war:
He shall cry, yea, roar;
He shall [2]prevail against his enemies.
14 I have long time holden my peace;
I have been still and refrained myself:
Now will I cry like a travailing woman;
I will [c]destroy and [3]devour at once.
15 I will make waste mountains and hills,
And dry up all their herbs;
And I will make the rivers islands,
And I will dry up the [d]pools.
16 And I will bring [e]the blind by a way that they knew not;
I will lead them in paths that they have not known:
I will make darkness light before them,
And [f]crooked things [4]straight.
These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them.
17 They shall be turned back, they shall be greatly ashamed,
That trust in graven images,
That say to molten images,
Ye are our gods.

[1] Heb. the fulness thereof.
[3] Heb. swallow, or, sup up.
[2] Or, behave himself mightily.
[4] Heb. into straightness.

[d] lakes.
[b] his zeal.
[e] blind ones.
[c] pant and gasp.
[f] crooked ways to a flat field.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 10. מלאו—מקצה הארץ. Ver. 11. צוח. Ver. 13. צרח, Hiph.—גבר Hithp. Ver. 14. חרש—חשה—מעולם—שאף—אפעה—אפק. Ver. 15. Almost all the words. Ver. 16. מישור—מעקשים.

Ver. 10. מקצה הארץ depends on שירו. But that Hebrew usage is to be noted which puts the terminus a quo where we put the terminus in quo. Comp. xvii. 13; Gen. i. 7. Thus our way of expressing it would be "at the end of the earth." But when even the furthest off praise the LORD, certainly those lying between are not excluded.——The words יורדי הים ומלאו strongly remind one of Ps. xcvi. 11, and xcviii. 7, where it reads ירעם הים ומלאו, which is the more remarkable seeing these Psalms belong to those that begin with שירו לי׳ שיר חדש LOWTH conjectures for this reason that we ought instead of יורדי to read here ירעם (or ירן, ירע or the like). But ירעם would not suit the following איים וישביהם.

Ver. 12. The expression שים כבוד, beside the present, occurs only Josh. vii. 19; comp. Ps. lxvi. 2.

Ver. 14. השה (comp. הסה) is more "to be quiet," while חרש, agreeably to the fundamental meaning incidere, insculpere, means primarily "to be deaf and dumb" (comp. κωφός from κόπτω, obtusus, the dull, dumb), hence "to be silent." The imperfects אחריש and אתאפק signify, (by reason of החשיתי that represents the silence generally as an accomplished fact), the single acts of keeping still that constantly followed each other in the past.——אפעה, ἅπ. λεγ. The root פעה occurs only in the serpent name אפעה (xxx. 6; lix. 5; Job xx. 16), in the substantive אפע (xli. 24 which see) and in the name of the midwife פועה (Exod. i. 15). Both that serpent-name and the kindred roots פאה, פוח involve the meaning "to breathe, blow." In Chald., however, פעה means directly "to cry," and is especially used of the bleating of sheep. Thence come the substantives פעיה "vociferatio," and פעיתא mulier clamosa. We will likely come nearest the truth if we take פעה to mean the loud groaning, joined with lamentation, of the travailing woman, which, too, offers an admirable explanation of the name פועה for a midwife. There is, moreover, an assonance in אפעה and אתאפק, that continues in אשם and אשאף. To derive אשם from שמם, vastatem esse, because in Ezek. xxxvi. 3 שמות ושאף are found conjoined, is forbidden both by grammar and the context. It is rather derived from נשם, an unused root, indeed, but one that occurs in the substantive נשמה.

Ver. 17. With בשת, instead of the inf. absol., we have a noun of the same stem as in xxii. 17, 18; xiv. 19, 22; xxix. 14; xxxiii. 4; lxvi. 10.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Chapter xlii. is evidently constructed as an ascending and descending climax. The present strophe forms the point of it; the two preceding ones lead up to it; the two that follow lead down from it. Why should vers. 10–17 not refer to the Servant of Jehovah, when both before and after (comp. ver. 19) He is the chief subject? True, He is not mentioned in the third strophe. But is not He that leads the blind the same as He that opens the eyes of the blind and liberates the prisoners (ver. 7)? And is there not a manifest contrast presented between Him that does not cry (ver. 2) and Him that cries and roars (ver. 13)? And does not the negative, ver. 4, form the transition to the positive statement that the Servant of Jehovah will be also the opposite of one that does not cry, and that does not let His voice be heard in the streets? It must indeed be an exceeding glorious fact, for whose praise the whole earth (ver. 12) is summoned. Yea, that is the wonder, that the one described in vers. 2, 3 as quiet and meek, is at the same time Jehovah Himself, who goes forth as an angry warrior against His enemies (ver. 13). He has long kept silence: did He not even suffer the whole heathen world to go its own way (Acts xiv. 16). At last, however, He rouses Himself. Like a travailing woman, amid mighty sorrows He brings about a new order of things (ver. 14). He makes heathendom wither; but the heathen that have preserved a susceptibility for the truth He leads, like blind men restored to sight, in new ways of salvation hitherto unknown (vers. 15, 16). He will certainly accomplish this to the confusion of those that continue to trust in false gods (ver. 17).

2. Sing unto——islands.—Vers. 10–12. A new song is becoming for the new matter; like new skin-bottles for new wine (Matth. ix. 17). The expression a new song occurs, Ps. xxxiii. 3; xl. 4; xcvi. 1; xcviii. 1; cxliv. 9; cxlix. 1: "sing unto the LORD a new song" occurs, Ps. xxxiii. 3; xcvi. 1; xcviii. 1; cxlix. 1. It is to be noted, too, that the more ancient of these Pss. (xxxiii., xcvi., xcviii.) have all of them, I may say, an ecumenical character, in that all treat of the mutual relation of Jehovah and of all creation, i. e., of the power of Jehovah over all that is created, and of the duty of the latter to worship and praise the LORD. Ps. xl. 4 and cxliv. 9 express only the author's purpose to sing a new song to the LORD. But Ps. cxlix., certainly a late song and an imitation, has a very particularistic character. One may say, therefore, that here, like in chapter xii., the author strikes up the psalm tone. He summons those to praise who are on the sea, and those that are in the sea, as immediately after he directs the same summons to the isles and their inhabitants, to the wilderness and its towns. The יורדי הים are not those that go down to the sea, but those that sail down the sea, as appears plainly from Ps. cvii. 23, the only other place where the expression occurs. For the sea, optically regarded, may be conceived as an elevation (comp. Luke v. 4); thus, as really seen, the sea presents itself as flowing. Flowing water, however, cannot mount up. It seems to me far fetched, when DELITZSCH supposes that Ezion-Geber is the Prophet's point of view in calling out. I rather think that by those sailing down the sea and isles, which he conceives as between his point of view and "the ends of the earth," the Prophet would signify the west. Behind him lie the desert and the villages of the Arabs (בְּנֵי קֶדֶם) on the east; on the left he has the rock city (סֶלַע), and on the right mountains, i. e., to the south the mountain of Edom, to the north Lebanon. Regarding יִשְׂאוּ, see on ver. 2. It is well known that in the desert, too, there were and are cities (fortified places). Comp., e. g., Josh. xv. 61, 62; xx. 8. The חצרים (comp. Lev. xxv. 31) are opposed on the one hand to cities, on the other to the mere tent encampments; like Hadartje (stationary Arabs) are distinguished from Wabartje (tent-Arabs) (DELITZSCH). On Kedar comp. at xxi. 16. There were hardly dwellers in the rocks numerous enough, in an appellative sense, to make it worth while naming them here, where only grand genera are mentioned. But the Prophet might very well, in order to signify the South, think of the great rock city of Edom (Petra, comp. on xvi. 1). But I do not think he intends by "mountains" only the mountains near Petra; for then the North would be entirely omitted. Hence I think we must understand the great mountains to the north of Palestine. As object of the crying out, ver. 12 again expressly mentions the honor and praise of Jehovah. The islands are named as representing the remotest regions.

3. The Lord shall go——forsake them.—Vers. 13–16. As in the preceding strophe we distinguished a kernel, and a preface and conclusion, forming, so to speak, a shell for it, so we must do here. From the extent of the preface and its elevated tone, we observe that the kernel must be something highly significant. Vers. 13–16 cease to speak of the Servant of Jehovah. But He reappears, ver. 22. Instead appears Jehovah Himself, ver. 13. And things are affirmed of Jehovah that partly agree, partly form a strange contrast with what before and after is imputed to the Servant of Jehovah. When it is said, ver. 7, that the Servant of Jehovah will open the eyes of the blind and free the prisoner, is that essentially different from what we read, ver. 16, of leading the blind, etc.? Do these blind remain blind? What, then, has the LORD to do with blind persons! Or are the ways that He leads them not ways of freedom and salvation? But if, vers. 2, 3, the Servant of Jehovah appears as one that does not cry, but is meek and gentle, how comes it that, vers. 13, 14, Jehovah is portrayed as an impetuous warrior, that cries and groans? And this appears in the climax-strophe of our chapter to which the preceding strophes lead up, and from which those following lead down! I cannot believe that the third of the five strophes of our chapter can treat of a foreign subject. It must be the same, though the form makes it difficult to detect the unity. And in fact it was difficult for the Prophet himself, a very riddle, to comprehend the unity of Jehovah and His Servant, just as it must assuredly have been also an inexplicable mystery that the Son of David should at the same time be Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace (ix. 5). I do not say, therefore, that Isaiah here produces a doctrine in an unhistorical way, that must remain hidden from himself. But I do say that the Spirit of God intimates here a relation of Jehovah to His Servant, which, of course, only presents itself to us in entire clearness in the New Testament history; but which, now we stand in this clear light, we can and ought thereby to detect in its Old Testament envelope. OEHLER begins the article Messias in HERZ., R.-Enc, with these words: "According to the view of Old Testament prophecy, the completion of salvation is brought about by the personal coming of Jehovah in His glory. He Himself appears amid the rejoicing of the whole creation for the restoration of His kingdom on earth. Ps. xcvi. 10 sqq.; xcviii. 7 sqq.," etc. It is remarkable that OEHLER, in support of his thought, cites precisely those Pss. which, as above shown, have such resemblance to our passage. It is admitted by expositors that these Pss. have generally a near relation to Isa. xl.—lxvi. (comp. MOLL on Ps. xcvi. sqq.). May we not have in Pss. xcvi., xcviii. the oldest commentary on our passage, a testimony that already in the time after the Exile our passage was referred to the Messiah, therefore that the unity of the Messiah and Jehovah was recognized?

The Prophet, then, here describes the Servant of Jehovah from another side. He, the quiet, and meek One, is at the same time El-Gibbor, and hence it may be said of Him: Jehovah goes forth like a mighty man.—But as being El-Gibbor he is no more called Servant of Jehovah; for the El-Gibbor has laid aside the form of a servant. Further on this see below under Doctrinal and Ethical, p. 461, § 9. An איש מלחמות is a man that carries on many wars (comp. 2 Sam. viii. 10; 1 Chr. xviii. 10). The expression He shall stir up jealousy (sc. in Himself) recalls passages like Ps. lxxviii. 38; Dan. xi. 25; Hag. i. 14; Isa. lix. 17. The intensive אף, comp. xliii. 7. The enemies against whom Jehovah goes forth are manifestly the same that as conquered, yet at the same time blessed, are to offer praise and thanks to the LORD (vers. 10–12). The entire heathen world is meant. This is confirmed by ver. 17 that speaks of the confusion of those that persist in serving idols in spite of their knowledge of God.

It is quite preposterous, with HAHN, to assume a dividing line between vers. 13 and 14. Ver. 14 sqq. first gives us light concerning what the LORD intends according to ver. 13. They contain the words that announce the object of the expedition of Him that goes forth. From everlasting the Lord had kept silence—Did the text treat only of the deliverance of Israel from exile, מעולם might then be referred to the beginning of it, and then the Exile would be represented as an immeasurable period during which the LORD had kept silence (comp. on lvii. 11). But the reference is not merely to Israel's deliverance, but to a deliverance in which all humanity, the heathen included, and even all nature, shall participate, as appears most plainly from the rejoicing of the same vers. 10–12. For the same reason the "for-ever" cannot begin with the elevation of Israel into a nation, i. e., the departure out of Egypt. If the LORD has in mind the heathen world, then it must be in reference to them that He has so long kept silence. How long was this? Without doubt since in Abraham He separated a tiny little part of mankind to be a special sphere for a preparatory revelation, while the great mass that was left He "suffered to walk in their own ways," Acts xiv. 16. He had not, indeed, omitted now and then to remind the heathen of Himself, and the double exile of His servant, the people Israel, especially served this purpose. But, in general, the heathen world is that part of mankind that was actually to experience what must become of human nature when God surrenders it, uninfluenced by revelation, wholly to the free unfolding of its natural powers. In reference to these, the LORD may well say: I kept silence from the remotest time. In contrast with this silence of milleniums will the LORD, i. e., the Servant of Jehovah identical with Jehovah, enter finally upon His conquest of the heathen world. By this He effects something quite new. He calls into being a new covenant with mankind. Hence He represents this new, hitherto unheard of deed as a birth that is accomplished only by means of great effort and acute pains. And may not, in fact, the spread of Christianity among the heathen, with all the pains, dangers and conflicts that attended it, be compared with the painful breaking forth of a fruit from the womb of a mother? This is one of the passages where to Jehovah is imputed action proper to women, and particularly a mother (comp. xlvi. 3 sq.; xlix. 15).

If the heathen are intended here, then by I will make waste mountains and hills, and dry up the rivers and pools, ver. 15, are meant heathen heights and heathen waters. Mountain heights are often enough representatives of the civilization of which they are the locality, and great waters representative of the populations that dwell about them. Therefore we must construe vers. 15, 16 figuratively, just as we did vers. 13, 14, and understand by mountains and rivers the heathen world. If by mountains and waters be understood the land of exile in a physical sense, would not that conflict with what was said xli. 18 sq.? Would not the people of God suffer by this drying up? But what is meant by the Servant of Jehovah drying up the heathen world? I think that by that the LORD means a spiritual drying-up. At the time the Servant of Jehovah goes forth into the heathen world, the latter will have survived itself. It will have become inwardly powerless and sapless. It will exist like a withered tree, like the bed of a stream having water only in its deepest places, whereas the shallower parts appear like islands—like a dried-up lake. Only call to mind utterances like Pilate's "what is truth" (John xviii. 38) for proof of this cheerless, dried-up state of heathendom. I will make the rivers islands reminds of Ps. cvii. 33.

Ver. 16. I cannot understand Israel to be intended by the blind here; for they are not such in either a physical or a spiritual sense. Nor would blindness alone be mentioned to describe a general condition of misery (comp. xli. 17; xxxv. 5; xxix. 18). I think, therefore, that those heathen are meant, whom the LORD leads out of the shrivelled-up heathendom into the light which His Servant brings into the world.

These are opposed to the ones (ver. 17) that persist in idolatry. It is, therefore, spiritual and not physical blindness that is meant (comp. xliii. 8). The same Servant of Jehovah whose office and calling are to open eyes in general, will do this for the heathen too, leading them ways they knew not: for the knowledge of the true God and of His salvation had been shut up from them. But those that are so led cease to be blind. Hence the Prophet continues: I will make darkness light before them, i. e., the previous darkness shall give place to light, consequently they will have gained powers of sight. To this corresponds what follows: and (I will make) crooked things (ways) (comp. lix. 8) to a flat field. When this is done, they will no more go astray in crooked roads, but will walk straight and right ways. What I may call the imposing introduction vers. 10–12 having prepared us for something great, the last clause of ver. 16 in turn testifies to the greatness and marvel of the things that have been held in prospect from ver. 13 on. Lest it be thought more has been promised than can be performed, the LORD gives an express assurance of the contrary. Notice the definite article. Not things in general: no, it is the things. It is His whole, great work in nuce, His entire plan of salvation that is drawn in its fundamental features from ver. 13 on. Both the Perfects and the positive affirmation followed by the negative (ולא עזבתים) are meant to confirm the certainty of the eventual fulfilment.

Ver. 17. But this salvation will not be the portion of all blind heathen. Therefore it reads, too, ver. 16, עִוְרִים, not הָעִוְרִים. Many will remain blind. Of these it is said: They shall be turned back, etc.

4. THE SERVANT OF THE LORD HIMSELF DEAF AND BLIND.

CHAPTER XLII. 18–21.

18 Hear, ye deaf;
And look, ye blind, that ye may see.
19 Who is blind, but my servant?
Or deaf, as my messenger that I [a]sent?
Who is blind as he that is [b]perfect,
And blind as the LORD's servant?
20 [c]Seeing many things, but thou observest not;
[d]Opening the ears, but he heareth not.
21 The LORD is well pleased for his righteousness' sake;
He will magnify the law, and make[1] it honorable.

[1] Or, him.

[a] send.
[b] endowed with salvation (Heilbegabte).
[c] Many eyes see.
[d] Ears he opens.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Is then the Servant of Jehovah ever reproached? And if Israel is deaf and blind toward the word of the LORD, can it as deaf and blind be called the servant of the LORD? Indeed, according to his very being, the latter cannot shut himself up against the spirit and word of Jehovah. It was said, ver. 3, that the Servant of Jehovah will reveal the right and law of God by a discipline of lowliness and gentleness; according to ver. 7 He will open blind eyes and deliver from the fetters of sin and error. And shall, ver. 18 sqq., by the same expression "Servant of Jehovah," be designated also Israel, that is even deaf and blind with respect to God's revelation? Moreover how utterly disconnected an earnest complaint against the nation must appear here, after the glorious promise of vers. 13-17! DELITZSCH supposes that the blind to whom, ver. 16, freedom is promised, provoked not only the compassion but also the displeasure of the LORD, because it was their own fault that they did not see. To them is the call to rid themselves of the ban that rests on them. But the blind of ver. 16 do not stay blind. According to 16 b the darkness becomes light before them. How does that accord with vers. 18-20?

In my opinion the two strophes vers. 18–21 and 22–25 present the reverse side or descending climax of the chapter, of which the other, or light side of the Servant of Jehovah, was given in vers. 1–17. It is a new contrast that we observe here. He that opens the eyes of others is Himself blind. The crying mighty-man, ver. 13, corresponds to the quiet Servant of Jehovah, ver. 2; so here the Servant that is Himself blind, ver. 19, corresponds to Him that opens eyes for others, ver. 7. The strophes correspond crosswise; the first to the third, the second to the fourth, and each time it is contrasts that correspond. How entirely one misconceives the unity of this chapter who fails to recognize in the Servant of Jehovah ver. 18 the same that was already observed in vers. 1–9! The deaf and blind of the People of Israel, or rather the People Israel as consisting of deaf and blind, i. e., as one generally sick and wretched, is summoned (ver. 18) to give heed for its salvation to a double wonder that happens with the Servant of Jehovah. He is Himself so blind and deaf that no one equals Him in blindness and deafness (ver. 19)! He that had healed many blind eyes, Himself observes nothing (ver. 20)! This is the first wonder. But in this one, apparently Himself so sick, the LORD has pleasure for His righteousness' sake. By virtue of the same, He will give the world a new, glorious law (ver. 21); and this is the second wonder.

2. Hear ye deaf——honorable.—Vers. 18–21. The deaf and blind here are, any way, such as hear and see if they will. Otherwise how can they be summoned to see and hear. And when (ver. 20) they are summoned to notice that He Himself does not hear, and yet opens ears, etc., and yet is an object of divine approval, and gives the world a new and more glorious law, then only those can be meant who should be witnesses of these marvellous contrasts in the life of the personal Servant of Jehovah. To these is intimated that in these contrasts is contained the mystery of their deliverance. But they are deaf and blind who will not see (vi. 9, 10; Matt. xiii. 13 sqq.). It is the hardened nation Israel which therefore fares as we read afterwards ver. 22.—לִרְאוֹת, ver. 18, is to be referred to both the foregoing verbs (zeugmatically) in the general sense of observing. As I find chapter xlii. draws the fundamental traits of the personal Servant of Jehovah in general, so here, as appears to me, those traits are especially sketched that are further developed in chapter liii. We remarked at ver. 16 a difference between blindness mentioned alone, and mentioned with other deficiencies. In the latter case the deficiencies named may be regarded as representing distress and wretchedness generally. Such is the case here. It is not meant that the Servant of Jehovah will be only blind and deaf, just as at ver. 7 it was not meant that He would only heal the blind and free the prisoner. It is natural that those deficiencies should be named as attaching to the Servant of Jehovah, from which He is said to free others. Accordingly, to correspond with ver. 7, He should be described as blind and languishing in prison. But the latter trait the Prophet does not observe in the image of the future presented to him. Indeed, he describes the Servant of Jehovah, as blind and deaf: thus as a man, as one on whom all heavy sorrows come down like a tempest, as a picture of grief, and beside as one who runs blindly into his destruction (comp. Matt. xvi. 22) and in the greatest danger remains dumb as a deaf man. He sees these defects attaching to the Servant of Jehovah in a degree unequalled by any other man. In a word: the Prophet beholds the Servant of Jehovah, not only as the one despised and forsaken of men, as the man of sorrows and acquainted with sickness (liii. 3), but at the same time as the physician that can heal others and not Himself (Luke iv. 23; xxiii. 39; Matt. xxvii. 40, 42). And the reason for this strange appearance? Isaiah indicates it liii. 4 sqq. SEB. SCHMIDT signifies it with the words: "coecus est atque surdus imputative." Only here is the Servant of Jehovah called messenger, "angel of the LORD." It calls to mind on the one hand "I will send my angel" Gen. xxiv. 7, 40, and on the other Mal. iii. 1. מְשֻׁלָּם, which occurs only here as participle (as nom. propr. it occurs often: 2 Kings xxii. 3; xxi. 19, etc.), must be construed according to the analogy of הָשְׁלַם (Job v. 23), as in pacem, amicitiam receptus.

The words of ver. 20 are difficult. Those that understand the People of Israel to be meant by the Servant of Jehovah must take פָּקֹחַ אָזְנַיִם in the sense of "to have open ears." Thus UMBREIT translates: "with open ears He hears not;" DELITZSCH: "opening the ears still He does not hear;" V. FR. ŒHLER: "open ears has He, and He hears not." But, in the first place, פָּקַח, which only here is used of ears, being everywhere else used of eyes, never means "to have eyes." But it must mean "to have" if taken in antithesis to וְלֹא יִשְׁמָע: for he that hears not, though he has ears, does not use his ears. But one who does not use the ears he has can never be called a פָּקֵחַ אזנים. פָּקַח elsewhere always means to open the eyes of others or one's own eyes for the purpose of actual and intensive use. Thus Gen. iii. 5: "And your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall know good and evil;" comp. Gen. iii. 7; 2 Kings vi. 17, 20 "LORD open His eyes that he may see." Comp. 2 Kings iv. 35; xix. 16 (Isa. xxxvii. 17); Isa. xxxv. 5; Jer. xxxii. 19; Zech. xii. 4; Dan. ix. 18; Ps. cxlvi. 8; "LORD open (make see) the blind;" Prov. xx. 13; Job xiv. 3; xxvii. 19. Finally, the adjective פִּקֵּחַ is one that opens his eyes well, a seeing person: Exod. iv. 11; xxiii. 8. From this it appears that פָּקֵחַ אזנים and ולא ישמע would involve a contradiction if by "ears" be understood his own ears who opens them. For to open his own ears and yet not hear is impossible. In the second place, it may not at all be accidental that פָּקֹחַ only in our passage is used of opening ears. Already in ver. 7 we had it in reference to opening eyes; and it is affirmed of the Servant of Jehovah. May not the Prophet, by using פָּקֹחַ and not פָּתֹחַ in ver. 20, have intended, perhaps, to give a hint that the subject of פקח אזנים is identical with that of פקח עינים? Moreover the feminine רַבּוֹת ver. 20 points back to עִוְרוֹת ver. 7, and strengthens the conjecture that the Prophet would warn against referring ver. 20 to any other person than the subject of ver. 7. If we have correctly understood the second clause of ver. 20, we have gained the foundation for the understanding of the first. K'thibh is to be read רָאִית, the K'ri רָאוֹת. The latter is inf. absol. Kal (like שָׁתוֹת xxii. 13; עָרוֹת Hab. iii. 13). Both of these forms only make sense when one takes פקח א׳ = "to have ears." For then the form ראית must also some way signify "to have eyes" or "to see," and both can be said of the servant of Jehovah only in the national sense. But if פקח א׳ means "to open ears," if it stands parallel with ver. 7, and if the personal Servant of Jehovah is the subject of both declarations, then also ראית cannot describe the seeing as the action of the Servant of Jehovah. It must refer to the seeing of others which the Servant of Jehovah brings about. But then one must doubt the correctness of both the text and the margin. Either ראות is to be pointed רְאוֹת (comp. xxx. 20; Jer. xx. 4; xlii. 2, etc.), or a ה has been dropped from before it. The latter could easily happen because of the foregoing verse closing with ה. The reading then would be הַרְאוֹת (infin. Hiph. "to make see," Deut. iii. 24; i. 33; Exod. ix. 16, etc.). [The Author's labored exposition seems to originate and find its sole justification in the contradiction developed above: "to open one's ears and not to hear is impossible;" and then, if this be the sense, that one must understand the Servant of Jehovah in a national and not a personal sense, and thus surrender the identity of subject in the chapter. But the logical contradiction cannot be greater than that presented in vi. 9, and in (the exaggeration even of) the same language as quoted by our Lord in Matt. xiii. 13. While adhering to the Author's general view of the whole chapter, and of this "strophe" in particular, we may adhere also to the rendering of ver. 20 in the Eng. Version, with which UMBREIT AND DELITZSCH (see above) agree. Why may not the contrasts of this chapter, that the Author points out (see e. g., under vers. 15, 16), be intensified into paradoxes and contradictions? If the Spirit of God in the Prophet has uttered the riddle of the identity of the Servant of Jehovah, and Jehovah Himself, the solution of which can only be seen in the clear light of the New Testament (see under ver. 12), why not also the riddle of ver. 20? Why (like the New Testament realizations to which the Author refers under vers. 19, 22) is not the verification of the paradoxes of ver. 20 to be found in, say, Acts i. 7, and Mar. xiii. 32. "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man—neither the Son, but the Father," and in the mystery of Christ going intelligently to meet death (Mar. viii. 31) and yet on the eve of its accomplishment praying to escape it like one that knows not (Luke xxii. 42; Heb. v. 7)?—TR.].

Like one blind the Servant of Jehovah runs to His destruction, who yet causes so many others to see. Although warned (Matt. xvi. 22), still He gives no heed to what may benefit or hurt His own person. שָׁמַר, has here, as often, the meaning "observavit, attendit" (comp. Hos. iv. 10; 1 Sam. xxvi. 15; 2 Sam. xviii. 12, etc., according to the fundamental meaning of the word, "rectis et intentis occulis intuitus est," "to gaze, stare at," comp. סָמַר, שָׂמַר, riguit, horruit. שָׁמִיר "thorn," see GESEN. Thes. p. 1442). The change of person is not unfrequent in Isa. i. 29; xiv. 30; xxxiii. 2, 6; xli. 1.

Ver. 22. Thus the Servant of Jehovah seems to pay the penalty of His folly by a fate that makes Him appear as one despised of men and esteemed as of no value. But different is His relation to Jehovah, who has pleasure in Him for His righteousness' sake. The pronominal object in the third person is omitted, as often happens. The prophetic discourse is brief and obscure. But it finds its echo, and at the same time its significance is cleared up in those passages of the New Testament, wherein the Father expressly points to the Son as the object of His approval (comp. ver. 1 and Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 5; Mark i. 11; Luke iii. 23; 2 Pet. i. 17). And why should not Jehovah take pleasure in Him whom no one could charge with sin, yet who, notwithstanding, surrendered His holy soul to death, in order to fulfil the Father's decree of salvation? When it is further said: He will magnify the law and make it honourable, it is self-evident that not that Torah is meant whose end the Servant of Jehovah will be, but that which shall proceed from Him (ver. 4; li. 4; ii. 3). We will therefore take the Servant of Jehovah as the subject of "magnify" and "make honorable," though the sense were not essentially different if Jehovah were regarded as subject. Great and glorious will the new, Zionitic Torah be; as much greater and more glorious than the old Sinaitic, as its Mediator, means and object will be infinitely greater (Gal. iii.).

5. THE SERVANT OF JEHOVAH A STONE OF STUMBLING TO UNBELIEVING ISRAEL. CHAPTER XLII. 22-25.

22 But this is a people robbed and spoiled;
[1] They [a]are all of them snared in holes,
And they are hid in prison houses:
They are for a prey, and none delivereth;
For a [2]spoil, and none saith, Restore.
23 Who among you will give ear to this?
Who will hearken and hear [a]for [b]the time to come?
24 Who gave Jacob for a spoil,
And Israel to the robbers?
Did not the LORD, he against whom we have sinned?
[c]For they would not walk in his ways,
Neither [d]were they obedient unto his law.

25 Therefore he hath poured upon him
The fury of his anger, and the strength of battle:
And it hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew not;
And it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart.

[1] Or, In snaring all the young men of them. [2] Heb. a treading. [3] Heb. for the after time.
[a] They all pant in the holes. [b] far away. [c] And. [d] did hearken.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the language generally; but particularly:

Ver. 22. הָיָה לָבַז—חָבָא—שְׁסוּי—בָּזוּז (Num. xiv. 3, 31, frequent in Jer. ii. 14; xv. 13; xvii. 3, etc.).——מְשִׁסָּה (comp. 2 Kings xxi. 14).——הָשַׁב, Pausal form occurs only here. Ver. 24. מְשׁוּסָּה (K'ri מְשִׁסָּה)—זוּ. Ver. 25. עֱזוּז—לָהַט Piel—בָּעַר.

Ver. 22. That הוּא refers to the people appears from עַם immediately following: it is singular by attraction.——That בחורים cannot mean young persons appears from the context. חוּרִים, corresponding to בָּתֵּי כלאים. must rather mean the "holes" (comp. חֻר xi. 8.—הָפֵחַ is any way inf. absol. that, in the animated discourse, stands for the verb fin. That כֻּלָּם must be acc. obj. (Delitzsch) is not correct. For the inf. absol. not unfrequently has a subject word along with it (comp. Prov. xii. 7; Job xi. 5; xl. 2; Ezek. i. 14). As there occurs no verb הָפַח, we must take הָפִיחַ as Hiph. of פּוּחַ, meaning "to blow, to pant" (comp. Hab. ii. 3; Prov. xxix. 8, etc.). [Fuerst, Lex. פָּחַח. Hiph. הֵפַח. inf. constr. הָפֵחַ "to fetter."—Tr.].——בֵּית כלא see ver. 7.

Ver. 24. זוּ for אֲשֶׁר (see Ewald, § 331, b). The Masorets hesitate to construe the word as relative; probably because of its seldom occurrence in Isaiah. Hence they put the Athnach under יהוה, by which זוּ is separated from what precedes, and receives a demonstrative force.——לֹא אָבוּ הָלוֹךְ is indeed not the usual construction (yet comp. xxx. 9); still not too unusual (comp. vii. 15; Jer. ix. 4; Mic. vi. 8, etc.). The object is emphatic prominence for the notion "going" which as infin. absol. appears more nearly a substantive.

Ver. 25. The singular suffix in עָלָיו relates to a notion singular, ideally present, i. e., the total of Israel, not previously named.——As the fundamental meaning of חֵמָה is "aestus, heat, glow," it may easily be taken for prepositive apposition. The assonance with מלחמה seems to have had some influence. To take it as apposition with אַפּוֹ receives confirmation from the image being prolonged in the second clause of the verse, where not only the feminine forms תלהטהו and תבער refer back to חֵמָה, but also this glow is conceived of as an actual kindling fire (not as a mere image of intense anger). Accordingly I cannot take מלחמה as the subject of תלהטהו. ועזוז מלחמה I regard as an intervening thought that points the meaning of the figurative expression חמה אפו. But חֵמָה still remains the chief notion, and as such the subject of the two positive clauses of the second half of the verse.——בָּעַר, "igne consumsit, combussit," is, as a rule, construed with בְּ (Job i. 16; Num. xi. 3; Ps. cvi. 18 where, too, both the verbs בער and להט are used, etc.; comp. Isa. xxx. 33; xliii. 2).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In this fifth and last strophe the Prophet descends from the heights of most glorious hope of salvation attained in the third, down to the depths of a most mournful perspective of judgment, which, however, he applies as an awakening cry to his unbelieving countrymen. The future reveals none of the effects that ought to have followed a believing regard for what was announced ver. 18 sqq. On the contrary, the Prophet sees a robbed people languishing in hard captivity (ver. 22). From this he knows that Israel has not accepted the Servant of Jehovah. He uses the mournful prospect to attempt to move Israel, by a wholesome alarm, to ward off that mournful future by a sincere repentance. With "among you" (ver. 23) he addresses the Israel of the ideal present, i. e., of the Exile. Who among you, he asks, gave heed to this impending visitation of the remote future? But there is little prospect of a cheering reply. For Jehovah has already given over Judah and Israel as a prey to their enemies for their sins (ver. 24). Yet even this they have not taken to heart (ver. 25).

1. But this——Restore.—Ver. 22. But this people is the antithesis of ver. 18. There the deaf and blind were summoned to give heed to what was to be said of the Servant of Jehovah. But—and now we learn why Israel was called deaf and blind (ver. 18), Israel heeds not, and so the Prophet sees a robbed, etc., people. Thus ver. 22 shows the condition that will ensue as punishment for Israel's not knowing the Servant of Jehovah and the day of its visitation (Luke xix. 41-44).

3. Who among you——not to heart.—Vers. 23-25. But the Prophet knows that the impending judgment may be averted by timely repentance. It is true there is little hope of such repentance; but he attempts it. He asks: who among you——time to come? With בָּכֶם the Prophet, in contrast with those standing far off, to which, e. g., v. 18 relates, must have in mind Israel of the Exile. He puts it to these that they should hear, heed and hearken far off. What they ought to hear is primarily his word. But they ought to heed it, by lending an ear to the remote times past (לאחור see on xli. 23) that as it were, speak to them by the mouth of the Prophet. Because the old time is conceived of as lying before the Prophet (comp. יְמֵי קֶדֶם xxiii.

7; xxxvii. 26; li. 9, etc.), so the future is what lies backward. Unhappily, there is little prospect of such heeding the future, because Israel does not even heed the chastisement of the immediate present. Vers. 24, 25, therefore, give the reply to the question ver. 23, which itself begins with a question: who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel, etc. The name Jacob here evidently signifies the tribe of Judah (comp. ix. 7 and List). This appears from the two members of the answer. For the first member: he against whom we have sinned, plainly relates to that part of all Israel to which the Prophet himself belongs —hence the first person—while the second member: and they would not walk in his ways, by the third person, signifies the part to which the Prophet did not belong. In vers. 24, 25 is proof that the Prophet has in mind Israel of the Exile as his ideal audience. For, first, chapters xl.–lxvi. are in general addressed to Israel dwelling in Exile, and second, it is seen from vers. 24 a and 25 that Judah and Israel are equally represented as visited by God's destructive judgments. Ver. 25. Therefore he hath poured upon him, etc., describes the consequences of disobedience. (See Text. and Gram.) Elsewhere, too, occurs the image of pouring out wrath as a fiery heat (Ezek. xiv. 19; xx. 33, 34; xxii. 22; Lam. ii. 4, etc.). Israel is represented as a dwelling or city, since it is said it shall be set on fire. But it has not hitherto learned (יָדַע Perf.) the meaning of these divine judgments, and even now does not lay them to heart (יָשִׂים Imperf.). Hence we were obliged to say, that the Prophet could only expect an unfavorable reply to his question, ver. 23.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. There is neither in heaven nor on earth any thing as rich in wondrous contrasts as the manifestation of the Son of God in the flesh. For there all the divine attributes are united to their corresponding antipodes of creature lowliness in the form of the Servant of Jehovah. The antitheses of power and weakness, wisdom and folly, glory and lowliness, love and anger, surround Him as a radiant crown. This Servant of Jehovah, in whom unite all contrasts, meets us in this chapter. The chosen of the LORD, in whom He is well pleased, on whom the Spirit of the LORD rests so that He may reveal to the heathen the divine law, is still at the same time a Servant, and that, too, a Servant in the completest and most proper sense of the word. He does not rule, He does not suffer Himself to be ministered unto, but He ministers, and with the utmost devotion He serves all. Mild and kind, meek and lowly He appears, though He has the might and power to do the loftiest deeds. He appears weak and yet almighty, He appears poor and yet rich above all. He has not where to lay His head, yet all eyes wait upon Him. He is full of love, yet woe unto those on whom His anger falls (ver. 13). He is wise above all, and yet, from the standpoint of worldly wisdom, how foolish He appears where care for His own human person is concerned.

2. On xlii. 2. "Clamavit non clamore contentionis, sed caritatis et devotionis. Clamavit dictis et factis, voce et vita, clamavit praedicando, clamavit orando, clamavit Lazarum resuscitando, tandem clamavit moriendo et adhuc quotidie in coelis existens clamat ad nos." AUGUSTIN.

3. On xlii. 2, 3. As the Servant of God, so ought the servants of God to do. It is a chief part of pastoral wisdom not to make a fleshly noise, not to break the bruised reed, and quench the glimmering wick by merciless judging, but rather to heal what has been wounded, and kindle up the faint spark. He that does so, will co-operate in producing the blessing that the Servant of the LORD (vers. 6, 7) was to bring into the world. "Christianus in conscientia debet esse medicus, foris autem in externis moribus asinus, qui ferat onera fratrum." "Necesse est in ecclesia sancta esse infirmos et tales, quorum factis offendamur, sicut in corpore humano non ossa tantum, sed etiam mollis et infirma caro est. Quare ecclesia Christi constat ex portantibus et portatis. Et vita nostra est compositum quoddam ex fortitudine et infirmitate." LUTHER.

4. On xlii. 4. Gentleness and meekness are not weakness; they are not inconsistent with energy and firmness, indeed with the greatest earnestness and righteous anger. Just for this reason the Servant of the LORD is fitted to be the Saviour of the world. He can be a comfort to the weak, a terror to the wicked, and all things to all. And such is the character of the new covenant established by Him. Comp. Luke i. 52, 53; ii. 34.—Therefore the islands hope in His law. The Christian church with its missions responds not only to the command of its Lord, but also to a longing of the heathen world, even though it be something more or less unconscious.

5. On xlii. 6. "Without Christ God can make no covenant with us. Therefore when God made a covenant with our first parents, the seed of the woman was the security of it. When God made a covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob the same seed was the ground of it. In fine: Christ is the chief reason and corner-stone both of the Old and of the New Testament covenant. It is important that, when we find ourselves covenant-breakers with God, we take refuge again in this covenant." CRAMER.

6. On xlii. 7. "As long as we are out of Christ we are blind and darkness (Eph. v. 8; Luke i. 79; Matth. vi. 23). For to be carnally minded is enmity against God (Rom. viii. 7). And the natural man understands not the things of the Spirit of God (1 Cor. ii. 14). And we cannot, as of ourselves, form one good thought of ourselves (2 Cor. iii. 5)." CRAMER.

7. On xlii. 8. On the words, "I Jehovah, that is My name," Rabbi SALOMON remarks as follows: "Illud nomen expositum est in significatione dominii, estque virtus ejus apud me ad ostendendum, me esse dominum." (הוּא מְפֹרָשׁ בִּלְשׁוֹן אֲדְנוּת וְכֹחוֹ עָלַי לְהַרְאוֹת שֶׁאֲדוֹן אָנִי.) Thus he finds in these words a reference to the שֵׁם הַמְּפֹרָשׁ and gives its meaning by אֲדֹנָי, which is always read by the Jews. On the various other meanings given of the Shem-ham'phorash see BUXTORF, Lex chald., p. 2432 sqq., and OEHLER in HERZ., R.-Enc., VI., p. 455. "יהוה is the essential name of the eternal and self-existent God, hence can be given to no one that is not God" (CRAMER). Hence many understand the expression Shem-ham'phorash in the sense that יהוה is the nomen Dei separatum, i. e., the incommunicable name of God, that gives instruction only concerning the being of God, and hence cannot be ascribed to others (see OEHLER, l. c.). But since the Messiah is Himself God, and there is no God but Jehovah; He, too, may be named with the name Jehovah, Deut. xxxiii. 29; Ps. cxviii. 27; Jer. xxiii. 6. See STARKE in loc.

8. On xlii. 9. "We adduce other proof of Christian doctrine than do the philosophers who take their grounds from reason. We take our grounds out of God's very mouth, who cannot lie, from His science and omnipotence. Therefore this word is so precious (1 Tim. i. 15; iv. 9)."—CRAMER. ["The sense is, that God predicted future events before there was any thing by which it might be inferred that such occurrences would take place. It was not done by mere sagacity, as men like Burke and Canning may sometimes predict future events with great probability by marking certain political indications or developments. God did this when there were no such indications, and when it must have been done by mere omniscience. In this respect all His predictions differ from the conjectures of man, and from all the reasonings which are founded on mere sagacity."—BARNES.]

9. On xlii. 10–17. In this section the Servant of Jehovah is no more named. Only Jehovah Himself is spoken of. But the actions, for whose sake heaven and earth shall proclaim the praise of the Lord, belong no more to what the Servant of Jehovah may do in His servant form, i. e., in His humiliation, but to what He does as one raised up to glory. In the condition of exaltation, however, He has laid aside the form of a servant: thus He is no more called Servant of Jehovah. When they crucified and buried Him, the humble Servant of Jehovah, suffering without a murmur, seemed to be quite done for. But on the day of Pentecost He broke loose again only the more mightily. Then the Jews who had not learned to know Him thus, and the heathen that had not learned to know Him at all, were panic-stricken. Then He began His victorious career of conquering (inwardly) the Jews and the heathen. Since that time both are inwardly dried up. As long as the gospel was not there, they had a relative right to live and to a corresponding life power. But after the revelation of absolute truth in Christ they have lost these. Their continued existence is only a vegetation, and if in these days they exhibit a certain revirescence, still it is only like the flaring up of the vital spark in a dying person, which would never happen either did Christianity only let its light shine purer and stronger. But continually the LORD leads the blind of all nations in the path of light. But those that, spite of all, cling to idols, must ever come to more shame.

10. On xlii. 18–21. "Physician heal thyself," is called to the great Physician, who healed all sicknesses of men, yea, made the very dead alive (Luke iv. 23). For this reason He was mocked on the cross, because He, who helped others, could not help Himself (Matth. xxvii. 42). The Prophet observes this trait in the life of the Servant of the LORD. He sees in it a symptom of the deepest suffering. But, notwithstanding, He recognizes that at the same time God's approval rests on this man of contradictions, and that He is to become the origin of a new, glorious law. Does not the Prophet see here the unrighteous Righteous one, the wicked Saint, the perishing Saviour, the blind eye-comfort, the dead Prince of life? Yea, he sees the Incomprehensible, who on the cross redeemed the world from hell, who, condemned as the most guilty laden, still was that righteousness for the world that alone avails with God.

11. On xlii. 22–25. As experienced salvation is the pledge of future salvation, yea, of final ἀπολύτρωσις, so, too, chastisements already endured are the pledges of future ones, and, under circumstances, of such as are still greater, yea, of utter destruction. Israel ought to have learned by its first exile, and by all that preceded and followed it, that God can bring a yet sorer visitation on His people, yea, destroy their outward existence. Had it regarded this and rightly received the Servant of the LORD accordingly, it might have escaped the second, final, and worst exile. But they were never willing to believe that the LORD could so jumble up, overthrow, and destroy His people, His city, and His house, that a restoration of its outward existence is impossible.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlii. 1–4. "The testimony of our heavenly Father Himself to His Son. He tells us: 1) Who He is and why He comes. 2) How He appears and discharges His office. 3) What He brings to pass, and by what means." Advent sermon, E. TAUBE, in "Gottes Brünnlein hat Wassers die Fülle. Hamburg, 1872.

On xlii. 2, 3. "Christ is the gracious hen that woos us under her wings (Matth. xxiii. 37); the good Shepherd that binds up the neglected (Ezek. xxxiv. 16); that can have compassion (Heb. iv. 15); and who does not cast out him who comes to Him (John vi. 37), as He has proved by examples, as Mary Magdalene (Luke vii. 37); the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 11); the father of the lunatic (Mark ix. 24); Peter (Luke xxii. 61); the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43); Thomas (John xx. 27), etc."—CRAMER.

2. On xlii. 1–4. "What a glorious Saviour God has given the world in His Son. For He comes to us: 1) As the anointed of the Lord; 2) as the meek and humble Friend of sinners; 3) as the strong and faithful perfecter of His work." Sermon in Advent, W. LEIPOLDT (Festpredigten), Leipzig, 1845.

3. On xlii. 5–9. The New Covenant. 1) The Founder of the covenant (God the Lord who has made the earth ver. 5, will also redeem it; hence He has foretold the new covenant ver. 9, and brought it into being ver. 6). 2) The Mediator of the covenant (Christ, the Son of God and Son of man, is the natural, personal link between God and men; He it is who represents men before God as a Lamb, bearing their sin, and God toward men as the One that brings them God's grace and the new, divine vital force). 3) The Object of the covenant (a. to bring light and freedom to men ver. 7 b. to preserve the honor of the Lord as the only God as opposed to all idols. ver. 8).

4. [On xlii. 10–12. The new song of the New Testament. The newness: whereas holy songs were before very much confined to the Temple, now they are to be sung all the world over. They were sung by one people and one tongue; they shall be sung by many of many tongues. They were sung by a pastoral people living in valleys among the hills; they are to be sung in all climes, by men of all callings and of every degree of culture. The substance of the song must be new to suit so many. The form in which that substance is reduced to song under these varied influences must be endlessly new. After M. HENRY.]

5. On xlii. 10–17. A missionary sermon. The revelation of salvation among the heathen. 1) Its intentional delay till the point when the time was fulfilled (ver. 14 a). 2) Its appearance at the right time: a. as powerful and accompanied with mighty effect (ver. 13); b. as a painful birth (ver. 14 b. a: resistance on the part of the old, and consequent laborious breaking forth of the new). 3) Its operation: a. on the old heathen existence itself: it dries up (ver. 14, b; β; ver. 15); b. on unbelieving men: they are brought to shame (ver. 17); c. on believing men: they are led to light and freedom (ver. 16); d. for God: the redeemed world sings Him a new song (it praises Him no more merely as Creator, but also as Redeemer, and New Creator, vers. 10–12).

6. On xlii. 13. "That ever kindly smiling God, that covers all suppurating sores, and that every where and every way shows favor and spares men, whom one so often hears preached from the pulpit, is not the God of the Bible. It is another of which the Old Testament writes: 'Thou art not a God that hast pleasure in the wicked; the wicked shall not abide in Thy presence:' and, 'The LORD thy God is a consuming fire and a jealous God:' and, 'The LORD shall go forth as a mighty man, He shall stir up jealousy like a man of war.'" THOLUCK.

7. On xlii. 18 sqq. When Peter said to the Lord: "Lord, pity Thyself; this shall not be unto Thee" (Matth. xvi. 22), the Lord was deaf and gave Peter an answer that quenched in him and others all disposition to warn Him again. And when He entered into Jerusalem and cleansed the Temple, and unsparingly scourged the high priests and scribes, was He not blind then? Did He not see what hate He was thereby conjuring up against Himself and what His fate would be? Thus the Lord was deaf and blind, but He was so to His own greatest honor. It is very different, however, with the blindness and deafness of those that would not see in Him the Lord of glory, and would not hear His word. The Lord indeed became a sacrifice to their hatred. But He is, notwithstanding, the One of whom Ps. cx. says: "Sit thou on My right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool." And from Him proceeds the covenant that is as much better than the old one as the blood of Christ speaks better than Abel's. They, however, have become a robbed and plundered people. They are scattered among all people, their Temple, their priesthood is destroyed, their entire old covenant is shivered like an earthen vessel. And the same fate will happen to all who do not take warning from God's judgment on stiffnecked and obdurate Israel. As the first exile ought to have been a warning to the readers for whom this chapter of Isaiah was destined, to prevent them from falling into a second and worse, so for us Christians, the first act of the world's judgment, the judgment on the house of God, should be a warning not to misuse and neglect the time till the second chief act of judgment, the time of the church among the heathen.

IV.—THE FOURTH DISCOURSE.

Redemption or Salvation in its Entire Compass.

CHAPTER XLIII. 1—XLIV. 5.

1. THE CHIEF INGREDIENTS OF REDEMPTION.

CHAPTER XLIII. 1–8.

1 BUT now thus saith the LORD that created thee, O Jacob,
And he that formed thee, O Israel,
Fear not: for I have redeemed thee,
I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine.
2 When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee;
And through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee:
When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned;
Neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.
3 For I am the LORD thy God,
The Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour:

I gave Egypt for thy ransom,
Ethiopia and Seba for thee.
4 Since thou wast precious in my sight,
Thou hast been honorable, and I have loved thee:
Therefore will I give men for thee,
And people for thy [1]life.
5 Fear not: for I am with thee;
I will bring thy seed from the east,
And gather thee from the west;
6 I will say to the north, Give up;
And to the south, Keep not back:
Bring my sons from far,
And my daughters from the ends of the earth;
7 Even every one that is called by my name:
[a]For I have created him for my glory, I have formed him;
Yea, I have made him.
8 [b]Bring forth the blind people that have eyes,
And the deaf that have ears.

[1] Or, person.
[a] And. [b] He bringeth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. וְעַתָּה—בָּרָא which occurs in reference to Israel again, vers. 7, 15; lxv. 18.—יֹצֵר—גאל see on xli. 14—קרא בשם see on xli. 25. Ver. 2. בָּעַר—כָּוָה—שטפ see xlii. 25. Ver. 3. כֹּפֶר. Ver. 4. כָּבַד—יָקַר Niph.

Ver. 1. On אל תירא see on xl. 9.——לי אתה occurs only here.

Ver. 3. In the causal clause, אני is subject, יהוה apposition with it, אלהיך predicate. קדוש ישראל is also in apposition with אני, and מושיעך is predicate. This construction is demanded partly for the sake of symmetry, partly the sense requires that in the first member אלהיך be predicate. For just in the notion of divinity lies the notion of capacity to give protection and help.

Ver. 4. מֵאֲשֶׁר, for which stands מִפְּנֵי אֲשֶׁר (Exod. xix. 18; Jer. xliv. 23), occurs in this causal sense, only here. When the apodosis is formed with the Vav. cons. and the imperf., it intimates that the notion of giving is conceived of as only eventual: because thou art dear to me, so I would (if need be) give men (generally and in indefinite number) in thy stead, and nations (undetermined which and how many, in antithesis with the definite, ver. 3 b), for thy soul. Comp. Ewald, § 136 sq.——Thus ver. 4 b in relation to ver. 3 b contains an intensification.

Vers. 6, 7. It corresponds to the close connection between these two verses to construe ver. 7 formally as in apposition with ver. 6, whence we must reject the exposition of Hitzig and Hahn, who take כל הנקרא as a statement put first absolutely.——בראתיו וגו׳, that the participle merges into the verb. fin. happens according to the well known Heb. usus loq.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Having spoken in chapters xli., xlii. of the Deliverer (in the first and second stage) and of those delivered, the Prophet now deals with the Deliverance in its entire extent. In this discourse he gives first (vers. 1–8) a general view by enumerating the chief ingredients of the deliverance: it rests on the divine redemptive-decree (ver. 1); nothing shall prevent it (ver. 2); no price is too great for it; for the sake of it nations even would be sacrificed, which shows the value of Israel in the Lord's eyes (vers. 3, 4); it is to embrace all Israel, all the scattered members to be called in from all parts of the earth (vers. 5–7); but finally it is attached to a subjective condition, viz., spiritual receptivity (ver. 8).

2. But now——thy life.—Vers. 1–4. With "and now" the Prophet turns from the troubled pictures of the future, presented at the close of the preceding chapter, to joyful and comforting outlooks. The Lord had created and formed (xliv. 2, 24; xlv. 11 (xlix. 5); lxiv. 7), Israel, in as much as he had caused them to grow up to a nation by means of their ancestors from Adam on successively. קרא בשם, as in xl. 26; xlv. 3, 4, signifies the more exact acquaintance. By reason of the fact that the Lord Himself made Israel and from the beginning prepared him as an instrument of His purposes, He calls to the nation living in exile, not to fear, for three things are determined: that Israel shall be delivered, be called to the Lord (comp. xlviii. 12) and belong to him alone. Thus the Perfects—I have redeemed thee—I have called thee—are praeterita prophetica, and the last three clauses contain an ascending climax. Israel must not suffer itself to be deceived about this promise. It is very possible that, even after receiving it, the nation may pass through great trials—that, as it were, it must pass through waters—even there will the Lord be with it; that it must even pass through rivers (allusion to the Red Sea, Exod. xiv., and the Jordan, Josh. iii.)—the streams will not overflow them. Fire itself will as little hurt them.

The ground for this security is the same that prompts the call fear not. Jehovah, Israel's God, is also Israel's protector.

In what sense does Jehovah give other nations as a ransom for Israel? Hahn understands it to mean that other nations are given to destruction as satisfaction for the injustice done Israel. But why does Jehovah give to destruction, not the nations themselves that carried Israel into exile, but other nations? According to Knobel's idea, Cyrus is conceived as having some claim on the Jews belonging to the Babylonish kingdom. For letting them go free, satisfaction is offered to him in new conquests in Egypt, Ethiopia, and Meroe. But the Persian kingdom did not lose the Jews as subjects. Palestine belonged to it, and those returning back to it belonged to it. The relation must be more exactly defined thus: the world-power, conceived of in a sense as a bird of prey, shall have offered to it Egypt, Ethiopia and Seba to devour, as indemnity for the mildness it has used to Israel contrary to its nature. It is true Cyrus did not himself make war on Egypt. What Xenophon says on this subject he characterizes as merely hearsay (μετὰ ταῦτα ἡ εἰς Αἴγυπτον στρατεία λέγεται γενέσθαι καὶ καταστρέψασθαι Αἴγυπτον, Cyrop. VIII. 6, 20 coll. I. 1, 4). Herodotus relates that Cyrus only had a purpose of making war on Egypt (ἐπεῖχε στρατηλατέειν ἐπὶ τοὺς Αἰγυπτίους, I. 153). The actual conquest of Egypt was made by Cambyses his son, who also at least attempted the conquest of Ethiopia (Herod. III. 25). It may be said of him, that in Egypt he made havoc in the brutal manner of a genuine world-power. Egypt's being subjected to this was probably a nemesis for much that it had practised on other nations before, and especially also on Israel. According to Gen. x. 6, 7, Cush was the older brother of Mizraim, and Seba the oldest son of Cush. It cannot be doubted that the Prophet understood by Cush and Seba the lands that bounded Egypt on the south. By Cush, therefore. must certainly be understood African Ethiopia (xi. 11; xviii. 1; xx. 3; xxxvii. 9). Seba is Meroe, the city lying between the White and Blue Nile, which Herodotus calls the μητρόπολις τῶν ἄλλων Αἰθιόπων (II. 29). Comp. Stade, De vatt. Is. aeth. p. 13. Isaiah mentions the Sabeans in only one other place (xlv. 14), and there as here after Egypt and Ethiopia. כֹּפֶר, properly "covering" then = כִּפּוּר "expiation, ransom, indemnity," occurs only here in Isaiah. This statement that other nations shall be offered up as satisfaction for Israel, expresses the high value that Israel has in God's eyes, and makes plain in what a glorious sense Jehovah calls Himself Israel's God and Redeemer. He discharges this office with such consistency and energy that, if need be, He will give such great nations as those named in ver. 3, as the price of their deliverance. If it be asked, why He undertakes such an office? He replies: because Israel is precious in my eyes, honorable, and I have loved thee. Love, then, is the ground that determines Jehovah to assume that protectorate. מֵאֲשֶׁר see Text. and Gram.

3. Fear not——have ears.—Vers. 5–8. The "fear not" connects what follows with the "fear not" ver. 1, as a new phase of the salvation-bringing future. The verses 1–4 speak of the deliverance in respect to its ground (ver. 1), under all circumstances (ver. 2), and at any price (vers. 3, 4). In this section the particular is made prominent, that all members of the holy nation, no matter how distant nor in what direction, shall be brought back home (comp. xi. 11 sq.). In vers. 5 b and 6 a the four points of the compass are severally enumerated. Give up, and keep not back manifestly involve a contrast with "none saith, Restore" xlii. 22. This latter expression is qualified by our passage. The condition it describes is not to be forever, but only to a certain period of time. קִבֵּץ, on the ground of its use Deut. xxx. 3, 4 is the conventional expression for the return of Israel from the Exile (xi. 12; liv. 7; Mic. ii. 12; Jer. xxix. 14; Ezek. xi. 17, etc.). In the second half of ver. 6 a subject is addressed that we must conceive of as the combination of the four quarters of the heavens. The entire earth, then, is meant. Hence, too, the feminine, which previously already was applied to the North and South, as parts of the entire earth. In הביאי, as related to אביא ver. 5, there is an intensifying of the thought: not only the Lord brings, the lands themselves must co-operate in this bringing Israel back (xiv. 2). Ver. 7 gives the reason for the foregoing thought. All the members of the nation must be gathered for this reason, because they all bear Jehovah's name, and were made for His honor (see Text. and Gram.). הנקרא בשמי is "He that is called by means of my name," i. e., who is called a belonging of Jehovah's (lxv. 1). For the Temple is not itself called "Jehovah" because Jehovah's name is named upon it (Jer. vii. 10); and just as little is one that is called by means of Jehovah's name, Himself called Jehovah. Comp. the remarks on iv. 2 and xli. 25. This bearing of Jehovah's name is, as it were, a stamp that denotes that the one so marked was called into being (ברא), formed (יצר) and finished (comp. vers. 1, 21) to the honor of Jehovah. How shall such an one be destroyed, in whose preparation the Lord has so greatly concerned Himself?

Ver. 8, is by many connected with what follows. But that would require us to construe הוציא as imperative, which would be utterly abnormal. Beside, (and that is the chief thing), neither "bring forth, nor the designation of the nation as being blind yet having eyes finds an adequate motive in the context.

Three things I think must be insisted on: 1) that our passage looks back to xlii. 7. There it was said of the Servant of Jehovah, that He was destined to open blind eyes, and to lead (להוציא) prisoners out of prison; 2) That where three predicates, "blind, deaf, imprisoned" are joined to one and the same subject, the sense is quite different from what it would be if only one of these predicates were joined to one subject. For the former case affirms only the accumulation of every sort of suffering upon one and the same subject; whereas the latter case really concerns in some sense or other the special condition of sickness named (see on xlii. 16). 3) It makes a great difference whether I say: "they have eyes and see not," or "they are blind and have eyes."

For the former signifies that although they have eyes they still do not see; the latter that their blindness does not hinder them from seeing, i. e., their blindness is only relative in respect to kind, degree or time. Accordingly, I construe ver. 8 as concluding the first strophe of this chapter. And this conclusion is in the words of the Prophet himself, by which he intimates that the LORD, by accomplishing what is promised vers. 1–7, realizes at the same time what is held out xlii. 7. The LORD delivers Israel out of its sufferings of all sorts in which it has languished like the blind in bonds of blindness, like the deaf in the prison of deafness, because this people, wretched as a blind or deaf person, still spiritually sees and hears, i. e., has turned its spiritual eye to the countenance of its God, and its spiritual ear to His word. If elsewhere Israel is reproached for not seeing with eyes that might see, and not hearing with ears that might hear (vi. 9, 10; Matt. xiii. 13 sq.), so here to its praise it is said that, spite of physical blindness, and deafness, or spite of all physical wretchedness figuratively represented by blindness and deafness, it will be still spiritually healthy and thereby ripe for and susceptible of deliverance. And with this is intimated also that spiritual redemption is to be an ingredient of the future, thus the redemption from sin, of which the last two strophes speak more extendedly (ver. 22—xliv. 5).

2. THE PROMISED AND ACCOMPLISHED PROPHECY A PROOF OF DIVINITY.

(Fourth application of prophecy in this sense.)

CHAPTER XLIII. 9–13.

9 [a]Let all the nations be gathered together,
And let the people be assembled:
Who among them can declare this, and [b]shew us former things?
Let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be justified:
Or let [c]them hear, and say, It is truth.
10 Ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD,
And my servant whom I have chosen:
That ye may know and believe me
And understand that I am he:
Before me there was [1]no God formed,
Neither shall there be after me.
11 I, even I, am the LORD;
And beside me there is no Saviour.
12 I have declared, and have saved,
And I [d]have shewed, when there was no strange god among you:
[e]Therefore ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD,
[e]That I am God.
13 Yea, [f]before the day was I am he;
And there is none that [g]can deliver out of my hand:
I will work, and who shall [2]let it?

[1] Or, nothing formed of God. [2] Heb. turn it back.

[a] All the nations gather together, and the peoples are to be assembled. [b] let us hear.
[c] one. [d] let hear, declared. [e] And. [f] thereafter I am he. [g] delivers.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 9. In the succession of the verbal forms נקבצו (perf.) and יאספו (imperf.), it seems to me the meaning is, that the former would express the fact of all nations being assembled, the latter, however, the hypothetical wish, that, if any nation be wanting, it also be summoned. That such is the sense appears from the fact that כל does not stand before לאמים. For it follows therefrom that to the assembled total shall be opposed only casual single individuals. Hence it seems to me unnecessary to construe נקבצו as imperative.

Ver. 12. The clauses here are simply connected paratactically by ו. But their more exact logical relation is as follows: הגדתי והושעתי is to be regarded as principal clause, to whose two members other two subordinate clauses correspond, each of which has likewise two members. והשמעתי ואין בכם זר corresponds to the first member of the principal clause as an explication of it; but ואתם עדי וגו' corresponds to the second member as assigning the ground for it.

Ver. 13. מִיּוֹם occurs again only Ezek. xlviii. 35 as marking a time that connects with an ideal beginning. Everywhere else it leans on a real terminus a quo. The construction מֵהְיוֹת יוֹם, "since days are," i. e., ever in the past, is justified neither by usage nor the context. For one looks for something new. But the thought that Jehovah is of old is already adequately expressed ver. 10. One may compare מִיָּמִים (Judg. xv. 1; Ezek. xxxviii. 8), which properly means "from days onward," i. e., from a point of time onwards, till the entrance of which an indefinite number of days elapse. Therefore מִיּוֹם is not "from to-day on." Else why should it not read: מִן הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה? Comp. Ezek. xxxix. 22; Hag. ii. 15, 18, 19. But it properly means, "from a period with which ends an ideally present יוֹם, onwards." This יוֹם is the period of deliverance indicated in what precedes.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1. In all the foregoing chapters Jehovah, as the only true God, is contrasted with the idols; and especially from chapter xli. on it is made prominent as proof of the divinity of Jehovah, that He is able to declare the remote past and the remote future and the connection of both. In the same way the Prophet here joins on to the comforting promise of vers. 1–8, an argument that uses the promise of redemption as a proof of the divinity of Jehovah.

2. Let all the nations——after me.—Vers. 9, 10. The Prophet institutes a grand and bold comparison. On the one side he sees all the great heathen world assembled and on the other only Israel. (See Text. and Gram.). And now he lets the LORD address to the former an inquiry, whether among their tremendous multitude there is even one prophetic spirit that can prophesy as He has prophesied in vers. 1–8. Who among them can (will) declare this. This "who" does not refer directly to some divinity conceived of as among the crowd of people, but to some prophet, rather, thought of as organ of a divinity. But "this" can only refer to what has just been foretold vers. 1–8. But how can such a prophecy be looked for out of the midst of the heathen world? Were a genuine prophetic spirit in the midst of it, then, spite of all antipathy to Israel, it must still be able to see the fact and announce it beforehand just as well as Jehovah Himself. For the genuine prophet must see the facts of the future simply as they will occur in reality. But the God of Israel will also let facts of an earlier date avail. If, then, the idol-prophets can cite in their favor earlier prophecies proceeding from them, they may be allowed to do so. Former things, comp. on xl. 22; xlii. 9. But in either case, he that designates an historical fact as the fulfilment of a prophecy of his, must prove that this prophecy actually proceeded from him. He must produce witnesses for this. These witnesses can, indeed, be chosen now, but may only be summoned to give their testimony at the time of the fulfilment. For only at the time named is their testimony possible and necessary. Possible, for only then can the prophecy and fulfilment be compared and the latter be seen to correspond with the former; necessary, for only at the time of the fulfilment does the necessity appear for inquiring who is the author of the prophecy in question. Let them bring forth their witnesses, therefore, refers to the time of the fulfilment; when this has followed, then they shall produce their witnesses, in order, by their declarations, to be recognized as just, i. e., as veracious and as representatives of a real divine power. יִצְדָּקוּ cannot possibly mean "to say the truth" (HITZIG), for at that moment, those that produce the witnesses, have no more to say. Rather it must then appear whether what they have said at an earlier time be the truth. Therefore צָדַק is here, as in ver. 26 and xlv. 25, simply "to be righteous." Hence, and because אֱמֶת (comp. xli. 26 צַדִּיק) is the declaration of the judge and not of the witness, the subject of let them hear and say must be those before whom the witnesses appear. For this reason we translate: "let one hear and say."

From the side of the heathen world comes no response to the challenge of ver. 9. It is in no condition to respond. The LORD then turns to Israel to declare that He will perform what the others are unable to perform. Ye are My witnesses, he says. By this He would say: I say it now to you in advance, in order that, when it once comes to pass, ye may testify that I foretold it. And My Servant, is taken by many as a second subject: ye and My Servant be My witnesses. But then the Servant must be a subject distinct from the people Israel. Would one understand by this the personal Servant of Jehovah, it were against this that the Servant cannot yet be present at the time of Cyrus, for Cyrus himself is in fact related to Him as prophetic type. Or would one understand by that other subject the believing nucleus of the nation, then that would need to be otherwise expressed. An expression must be chosen that would distinguish that Servant from the mass of the nation. But such a distinction is nowhere in the context, which deals primarily only with the antithesis of Israel and the heathen world. The latter is a mass of people without God, and hence without prophecy; but Israel is the people of Jehovah and the place of His revelation. For this reason precisely it is the instrument that the LORD has chosen in order also to reveal Himself to the heathen. In "and My servant," etc., there lies, therefore, the idea that Israel as the servant of Jehovah is at the same time according to the nature of things His witness in the sense indicated above. But Jehovah demands that Israel shall become witness, not for His interest, but for Israel's own interest. By the facts that they verify they are to draw for themselves the conclusion that Jehovah alone is the true God. The Prophet expresses this by the words: that ye may know and believe Me, etc. תֵּדְעוּ may either (zeugmatically) take the object of תַאֲמִינוּ, or it can have the absolute meaning "to acquire knowledge, sapere" (xliv. 18; xlv. 20; xxxii. 4). Even faith presumes a certain knowledge, for one cannot believe in that of which he knows absolutely nothing. But faith is equally the condition of a correct knowledge of divine things.

For without loving self-surrender to God, an understanding of His being is impossible. And then the Prophet may with equal right designate faith as the product and as the condition of knowledge. On I am He see on xli. 4. In there was no God formed there is of course no implied assumption that Jehovah was formed, but rather the contrary assumption underlies it, that Jehovah is the sole and only true God, a thought that is implied in I am He. If this be so, then besides Him there can only be fabricated gods, dei ficticii (comp. xliv. 10). Had there been a god before Him it could only have been a fictitious god. But as there was no sort of god before Him, so, too, none was made before Him. And since whatever is made must have a beginning, and necessarily, too, must have an end, so must all these fictitious gods cease to be. Therefore none can survive Jehovah.

3. I, even I——let it.—Vers. 11-13. These verses conclude the foregoing series of thoughts by recapitulating the chief particulars, and adding several important inferences. I, I am Jehovah: that such is the proper rendering appears from the fact that the Jehovah-name manifestly corresponds to the latter part of ver. 10, the sentiment of which is comprehended in that name. For if before the LORD there was no god, and there will be none after Him, then He is the One that was and shall be the eternally Existent, i. e., Jehovah (comp. Exod. iii. 14). And, because this entire part of Isaiah deals with the deliverance of Israel and the ground and consequences of it, it is added: and beside Me there is no Saviour (comp. ver. 3; xlv. 21, and the List). Therefore Israel must take care not to look for its salvation from any other. As מושיע, "Saviour," refers back to ver. 3, so הגדתי and השמעתי "I have declared——I have shewed" refer to ver. 9. According to the argument in ver. 9, prophecy and fulfilment are proof of divinity. This proof Jehovah gives. I announce, He says, and I save. The perfects present the thought apodictically as a fact accomplished. The salvation, indeed, is still future, and must be waited for. But the announcement is, in respect to time, in the past, and, as an actual deed of Jehovah's, can now already be proved. Hence this particular is not only repeated in השמעתי "I have declared," but also supported by an argumentum a non existente altero. Jehovah must have announced because no other, or strange god (זָר as in Deut. xxxii. 16; Ps. xliv. 21; lxxxi. 10), was in Israel. In this there is an assumption that there exist real, super-terrestrial powers beside Jehovah. But none of the kind have power in Israel. The idols that Israel worshipped are not reckoned, for they are to be regarded as nothing (xli. 23 sq.). On the logical connection of ver. 12 see Text. and Gram. We remarked before that הושעתי, I have saved refers to a future deed that is to be waited for. But there is a guaranty of its fulfilment. Israel is even set up as testimony, ver. 10, and the LORD will and can do that to which Israel testifies, for He is God, the Strong One (אֵל comp. xlvi. 9 and the List). Thus the sense of ver. 12 is as follows: that I am the proclaimer of salvation follows because beside Me there was no one that could proclaim it; and that I will carry out also what I have proclaimed is guaranteed by your being in evidence and by My strength.

Ver. 13 refers to the future following the period of the promised deliverance (see Text. and Gram.). Thus the LORD does not content Himself here with prophesying to the time of the deliverance. He goes further He gives assurance that after it has come also, He will remain the same. Therefore הוא in this place is idem (comp. xli. 4). Israel is redeemed. The words none delivereth from My hand cannot apply to it here, as the similar words do, indeed, xlii. 22. Rather, after Israel's deliverance, only the heathen are in the hand of God as objects of His judgment. Therefore these words concern them. But finally, as the end of all history, it will appear that all thoughts and counsels of God must inevitably find their accomplishment. "Sein Werk kann niemand hindern." Comp. xiv. 27.

3. THE REDEMPTION AND RETURN OF ISRAEL, ESPECIALLY FROM THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

CHAPTER XLIII. 14-21.

14 Thus saith the LORD,
Your redeemer, the Holy One of Israel;
For your sake I have sent to Babylon,
[a]And have brought down all their [1]nobles,
And the Chaldeans, whose cry is in the ships.
15 I am the LORD, your Holy One,
The Creator of Israel, your king.
16 Thus saith the LORD,
Which [b]maketh a way in the sea,
And a path in the mighty waters;
17 Which [c]bringeth forth the chariot and horse, the army and the power;
They shall lie down together, they shall not rise:

They are extinct, they are quenched as tow.
18 Remember ye not the former things,
Neither consider the things of old.
19 Behold, [d]I will do a new thing;
Now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it?
[e]I will even make a way in the wilderness,
And rivers in the desert.
20 The beast of the field shall honor me,
The [f]dragons and the [2][3]owls:
Because I give waters in the wilderness,
And rivers in the desert,
To give drink to my people, my chosen.
21 This people have I formed for myself;
They shall show forth my praise.

[1] Heb. bars. [2] Or, ostriches. [3] Heb. daughters of the owl.

[a] And lead them downwards as fugitives all, And "to Chaldea on the ships," is their cry.
[b] that made.
[c] brought. [d] I do. [e] Surely I will. [f] jackals.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 14. בָּרִיחַ—רִנָּה. Ver. 16. נְתִיבָה—עַז. Ver. 17. כָּבָה—דָּעַךְ. Ver. 18. קַדְמֹנִיּוֹת—הִתְבּוֹנֵן—רִאשֹׁנוֹת. Ver. 19. חֲדָשָׁה—בָּחִיר—יְשִׁימוֹן—נְהָרוֹת. Ver. 20. תַּנִּים. Comp. xiii. 22.—הַשְׁקָה—. Ver. 21. סִפֵּר—תְּהִלָּה.

Ver. 14. The context shows that שִׁלַּחְתִּי is the praeter. propheticum.——The following words are very difficult. The correct understanding of בריחים is of first importance. Most expositors render it "fugitives." But who are the fugitives? According to some they are the πάμμικτος ὄχλος of the world's emporium (Delitzsch), "the concurrent nations in the commercial city of Babylon" (Gesenius). This construction takes proper account of the וְ before כַּשְׂדִּים, by distinguishing the fugitives from the Chaldeans. But why call those foreigners precisely fugitives? Why not say then גֵּרִים or עֵרֶב (Jer. l. 37), or the like? And do not the Chaldeans flee, too? How then could the foreigners be distinguished from the Chaldeans just by the designation "fugitives?" This objection lies even more against Delitzsch's construction than against that of Gesenius. For according to Delitzsch כֻּלָּם is the chief notion, בריחים only an attribute joined on in the form of apposition. But then how in the world does the notion כֹּל come to designate the foreigners in distinction from the Chaldeans?——Since Jerome, many (Abenezra, Abarbanel, Castalio, Forerius, Seb. Schmidt, Umbreit, etc.) have read בְּרִיחִים = "bars," and understood that breaking down bars is meant. Then it would be declared that the prison of the Israelites would be opened. Gesenius testifies "that the departure from the points in such a case were a small matter." And, of course, it might easily happen, especially in the unpointed text, that barichim would be spoken instead of berichim. But in general the reading בָּרִיחִים has the evidences in its favor, and we cannot permit ourselves to depart from it needlessly. Others, as Hahn, understand the Chaldeans themselves to be meant by בריחים. But if this word and כשדים be object of הוֹרַדְתִּי, then וְ before the latter is inexplicable. I therefore (on the ground of Deut. xxviii. 68, see Comment below) construe כשדים as acc. loci, to the question, whither? The Prophet might have written, indeed, כַּשְׂדִּימָה, which occurs often enough. But, influenced by Deut. xxviii. 68, he writes here כשדים as מִצְרַיִם is written there. באניות is used in both places with a similar construction and meaning. וְ connects, not the word, but the entire clause, as e. g., Jer. l. 44.——רִנָּתָם is subject of the clause whose predicate consists in the words כשדים באניות. רִנָּה means "shout;" mostly in a joyful sense, but it occurs, too, in regard to lamentation, especially with suffixes: Jer. xiv. 12; Ps. cvi. 44. To this exposition of the last member of ver. 14, the foregoing וְהוֹרַדְתִּי forms a fitting introduction. For this הוֹרִיד takes place, according to our signification, both in the neuter and in the local sense: with the בריחים there is a going downwards not only down the Euphrates, but from their previous elevation.

Ver. 15 is to be construed as apposition with the subject of שִׁלַּחְתִּי and הורדתי ver. 14.

Ver. 16. It comes to substantially the same thing whether the participles נוֹתֵן and מוֹצִיא are rendered by the preterite or present. Still I prefer the former, because ver. 17 b and ver. 18 better agree with it.——מַיִם עַזִּים occurs again only Neh. ix. 11.

Ver. 17. מוֹצִיא, elsewhere the Hiph., is the standing expression for leading Israel out of Egypt (comp. Exod. xx. 2; Deut. v. 6; xiii. 6, etc.). Here it is used of the Egyptians. It is even the Lord, that occasioned also the marching out of the Egyptian army.——רֶכֶב־וָסוּס, which rhymes with חַיִל וְעִזּוּז, recalls Exod. xiv. 9; xv. 1, 19, 21. Elsewhere it generally reads סוּס וְרֶכֶב (Deut. xx. 1; Josh. xi. 4; 1 Kings xx. 1; 2 Kings vi. 15; Ezek. xxxix. 20). The transposition in our text, which is for the sake of the rhyme, occurs again only Ps. lxxvi. 7. חַיִל, too, occurs in the Song of Moses, Exod. xv. 4.——עִזּוּז "robustus, validus," beside here, occurs only Ps. xxiv. 8 where it is paired with גִּבּוֹר.——Imperf. יִשְׁכְּבוּ signifies the continuance, בַּל־יָקוּמוּ (comp. xxvi. 14; on the use of בַּל see on xxvi. 8) is future; the perfects דָּעֲכוּ and כָּבוּ signify the completed fact.

Ver. 19. חֲדָשָׁה only here in a neutral sense in the sing., beside Jer. xxxi. 22: חֲדָשׁוֹת xlii. 9; xlviii. 6. It is known that הֲלֹא is often used in the sense of an emphatic affirmative. Comp. e. g., 1 Sam. xx. 37; 1 Kings xi. 41, etc. It is used very often for הִנֵּה. Not only does the LXX. very often translate it by ἰδού (Deut. iii. 11; Josh. i. 9, etc.), but the parallel passages in Chronicles often have הִנֵּה where the Books of Kings have הֲלֹא. Comp. 1 Kings xv. 23 with 2 Chron. xvi. 11; 1 Kings xxii. 46 with 2 Chron. xx. 34, etc.

Ver. 20. Isaiah uses only here the expression חית השׂדה. Before him, on the ground of many passages in the Pentateuch (Gen. ii. 19 sq.; iii. 1, 14; Exod. xxxiii. 11; Lev. xxvi. 22; Deut. vii. 22, etc.), it appears in Hosea (ii. 14, 20; iv. 3; xiii. 8) and Job (v. 23; xxxix. 15; xl. 20). Isa. lvi. we read חַיְתוֹ שָׂדָי.—בנות יענה again xiii. 21; xxxiv. 13, and in Job xxx. 29; Mic. i. 5; Jer. l. 39.—כי נתתי is = "that," or "because I have given."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This third strophe corresponds to the first. As the first represents how the Lord will bring back His people into their land, from all quarters of the earth and through all possible dangers, so the present strophe represents how this restoration shall happen out of Babylon and through the wilderness lying between Chaldea and Palestine. Thus the first strophe is general in its contents; the third is specific.

2. Thus saith ——your king.—Vers. 14–15. As the first promissory strophe (ver. 1) began with thus saith, so this one in both its parts, the negative (ver. 14) and the positive (ver. 16). The Lord, Israel's Holy One, Creator and King, announces that He will send to Babylon and bring the Chaldeans down from the elevation they have scaled, and lead them back to the littleness of their original home on the lower Euphrates, to which they will set out with the cry "to Chaldea on the ships." This is the first negative act; the opening of the prison and putting aside the prison-keeper. Glorious act of deliverance! that at the same time proves the God of Israel to be the only Holy One. For your sake I have sent to Babylon, says the Lord, and indicates that the proper intent of the sending was the deliverance of Israel, though the messenger had no presentiment of performing a divine mission in the interest of Israel. Who this messenger was appears from xli. 2, 3, 25. It is Cyrus. We know that Isaiah foresaw a Babylonish exile of his people from xiii., xiv., xxi. 9 sq.; xxxix. 6, 7. Especially I have sent, reminds one strongly for substance of xiii. 2 sqq. See Text. and Gram. It appears to me that we are justified by Job xxvi. 13 and Isa. xxvii. 1 in giving בָּרִיחִים the meaning "fugitives" (see Text. and Gram.). Only in those passages and here does the word occur. As regards the clause, and the Chaldeans, etc., I think that here, too, the Prophet makes allusion to an older passage of Scripture, that sheds light on his meaning. That is Deut. xxviii. 68; where we read וֶהֱשִׁיבְךָ יְהוָה מִצְרַיִם בָּאֳנִיּוֹת. As is known, Deut. xxviii. contains that emphatic exhortation to obey the law of the Lord, based on promised blessings and threatened curses. It concludes with the threat that "Jehovah shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships," to be sold there into bondage. It is worthy of notice that מִצְרַיִם must be construed as acc. localis to the question, whither? It might have read מִצְרַיְמָה, which, if not the more correct, were still the more frequent mode of expression. Now it seems to me, that the Prophet in our text would intimate that, what the Lord threatened against Israel would be fulfilled on the Babylonians. We have showed above xxiii. 13 that the Chaldeans (in Babylonian Kaldi or Kaldaai, Schrader, p. 43) were a nation settled in very ancient time in South-Babylon and reaching to the Persian Gulf. In course of time they rose to a dominant position in Babylon itself: in fact for a considerable time the ruling dynasty belonged to their race. Moreover that lower Euphrates region abounded in swamps, and hence offered numerous hiding-places. We know this especially from the history of Merodach-Baladan, of which, at chap. xxxix. we gave a sketch from Francois Lenormant. [The Author's recapitulation of points of that sketch may be omitted. Tr.] From the particulars given there, it appears that when the Chaldeans could no longer maintain themselves in Babylon, their next step would be to take refuge in ships. For them, flight into the recesses of the lower Euphrates and of the Schatt-el-arab, was at the same time a return into their proper home. Under such circumstances there was certainly sufficient motive for their raising the cry: כשׂדים באניות = "into Chaldea on the ships." Such was the cry when Babylon, which had only become so strong by the colossal walls of Asarhaddon and Nebuchadnezzar, but had often enough before been taken by the Assyrian kings, was no longer tenable. On this construction see Text. and Gram.

As ver. 14 begins with a thought that gives the reason for what follows, so it is followed also by another and similar one in ver. 15 as a conclusion. As an independent statement, ver. 15 would be superfluous and clumsy. It has sense and significance only in closest connection with ver. 14. Jehovah is often called Israel's king: xli. 21; xliv. 6; xxxiii. 22; xliii. 15.

3. Thus saith——as tow.—Vers. 16, 17. Now the positive part of the promise is given. To the liberated Israelites is extended what they need for the long and difficult journey home. Already in the words "to Chaldea on ships" we found the Prophet's thoughts directed toward Egypt. This direction becomes now still more manifest. He presents the miraculous deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea as a guaranty of the promised deliverance from the Babylonish exile. The same God, he says, that prepared a way through the Red Sea, where there was too much water, will know how to make a way through the arid desert, where there is too little water. Comp. in general li. 10; lxiii. 11–13; xi. 16.

4. Remember ye——my praise. Vers. 18–21. Although the Lord fortifies the promise about to follow by recalling His performance at the Red Sea, still, by the demand no more to remember those old events, He lets the Israelites understand that what is promised and future will be infinitely more glorious than what is past (comp. Jer. xxiii. 7). Not that He would have those mighty deeds of old sink into absolute oblivion. He means only a relative forgetting. He would only give a standard by which may be measured the glory of what is new. From this, already, we may see that the LORD by no means intends only the corporeal return from the Exile. Already introduced in ver. 18 as Himself speaking, the LORD announces ver. 19 that He is about to create a new thing.—Already, he says, it is germinating (comp. xlii. 9); i. e., the causes that are to bring about that new thing exist already. And of course, as Isaiah must have lived to see Judah give itself into the hand of the world-power, so he saw therewith the bud of the Exile, and also of the deliverance out of it (vi. 11 sqq.; vii. 17; x. 5 sqq.). But the implicit reality will also realize itself explicitly. Hence is said: ye shall certainly know it. For such is the sense of the negative question: shall ye not know it (see Text. and Gram.). In naming this new thing, the LORD does not describe it completely. He only mentions one characteristic trait. Ex ungue leonem. But this one trait from many is chosen, not only because of its inherent significance, but also, on the one hand, with reference to what was mentioned, vers. 16, 17, by way of guaranty, and on the other, because there is present already here the thought that comes to expression, xliii. 3. On the brink of the Red-Sea, also, it was water that seemed to prevent Israel's deliverance. They could not walk through the deep sea. There the LORD helped Israel threatened by too much water, by making a way through the sea. In the day when "the new thing" shall come about Israel will be confronted by a dearth of water. Freed from Babylonian captivity, they will resolve to return home. But an arid desert must be traversed! Now there is too little water. But the LORD will help as before. He will make in the desert a way (xxxv. 1, 2, 7; xl. 3 sq.; xli. 18 sq.), by furnishing it with a bounding stream of water. Comp. xlviii. 21; xlix. 10. On אַף see on xxvi. 8. How glorious this help will be, that Israel is to enjoy by the watering of the desert, may be seen from the very beasts of the field rendering honor to God for it.—It weakens the force of this description to understand (with HAHN) the beasts to represent heathen nations. For it is something higher when the very beasts own and praise the hand of God. We must rather think of xi. 6 sqq., and how there, immediately after the description of the universal state of peace, the prospect of the home-return of Israel out of the Assyrian exile is presented as the antitype of the home-return out of Egypt (xi. 11–16, where note especially ver. 16). And xxxv. 8, 9 is also to be drawn into comparison here, where that way of return is called a holy way, and it is said that no lion shall be there, and that most ravenous of beasts shall not walk on it. This passage, compared with xi. 6 sqq. and our text, thus receives its complement and explanation, to the effect that wild beasts shall indeed be there, but will change their nature, and as regenerated, so to speak, will own and praise God. But by this we become aware that the LORD thinks not merely of physical water, but, as in xliv. 3, also of spiritual water and streams of the Spirit. For these necessarily belong to the condition of peace. The physical water of the desert is thus at the same time type of the spiritual streams of water of the last time. The beasts praise God for being permitted to participate in the blessings imparted to the people of Israel. But (ver. 21) especially this people themselves that the LORD formed for Himself (comp. vers. 1, 7; זוּ see on xlii. 24) shall recount His praise. This signifies the acme of the new time, the time of salvation that begins with the deliverance out of the Babylonian exile. But that that acme will not be attained without backsliding on the part of the nation, and even greater manifestations of grace on the part of God, appears from the following context. [This brings us back to the main proposition of the chapter, namely, that Jehovah had not only made them what they were, but had made them for the purpose of promoting His own glory, so that any claim of merit on their part, and any apprehension of entire destruction, must be equally unfounded."—J. A. A.].

4. ISRAEL'S REDEMPTION FROM SIN CANNOT BE ITS OWN WORK.

CHAPTER XLIII. 22–28.

22 But thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob;
[a]But thou hast been weary of me, O Israel.
23 Thou hast not brought me the [1]small cattle of thy burnt offerings;
Neither hast thou honoured me with thy sacrifices.
I have not caused thee to serve with an offering,
Nor wearied thee with incense.
24 Thou hast bought me no [b]sweet cane with money,
Neither hast thou [2]filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices:
But thou hast made me to serve with thy sins,
Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.
25 I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake,
And will not remember thy sins.

26 Put me in remembrance: let us plead together:
Declare thou, that thou mayest be justified.
27 Thy first father hath sinned,
And thy [2]teachers have transgressed against me.
28 [c]Therefore I have profaned the [4]princes of the sanctuary,
And [d]have given Jacob to the curse,
And Israel to reproaches.

[1] Heb. lambs, or, kids.
[2] Heb. interpreters.
[3] Heb. made me drunk, or, abundantly moistened.
[4] Or, holy princes.

[a] For. [b] calamus. [c] And I will profane. [d] will give.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 24. רוה—קָנֶה. Ver. 25. מָחָה comp. xliv. 22. Vers. 26, 27, 28. All the terms.

Ver. 22. וְ init. is adversative. קָרָא used of calling on God, occurs more frequently with prepositions. Still it is found elsewhere also with the accusative (Ps. xiv. 4; xvii. 6; lxxxviii. 10; xci. 15). Many (Maurer, Hitzig, Ewald, Hendewerk, Umbreit, Knobel, Delitzsch) construe the second clause כי יגעת וגו׳ as a conclusion: that thou shouldest have wearied thyself with me. But in that case 1) the foregoing clause should contain an inquiry; 2) the dependent clause with כִּי should relate to something future. Neither is the case.——יָגַע means "laborare, desudare, defatigatam esse." The last in passages like xl. 28; lvii. 10; Jer. xlv. 3; Ps. vi. 7. Hence Hiph. "defatigare, to make weary," (vers. 23, 24). Hence I agree decidedly with those that translate: "for thou art weary of me."

Ver. 23. שֶׂה, for which there is no plural form, is collective [meaning the young of both sheep and goats, hence exactly rendered in the English Version, "small cattle."—Tr.].——זבחיך is accus. of the means.——עָבַד is the technical term for service rendered to God in worship. Comp. Exod. x. 26, and the expression עֲבֹדָה.

Ver. 24. אַךְ cannot be referred exclusively to the notion "with;" otherwise it must read אַךְ אֹתִי הֶעֱבַדְתָּ. It must be referred to the entire following clause.

Ver. 25. The double אנכי makes emphatic that the wiping out of sin is solely in God's power. הוא stands emphatically after אנכי. But it is not predicate as in vers. 10, 13; xli. 4; xlvi. 4; xlviii. 12, but in apposition with the subject as in vii. 14. Thus the sense is: I—I such an one. In this lies a reference back to the emphatic use of הוא twice already in this chapter.——מָחָה is rendered by the LXX. by ἐξαλείφειν, as also in Ps. li. 3. 11; lxix. 29, etc.——למעני as in xxxvii. 35; xlviii. 9, 11.

Ver. 28. It seems to me presumptuous and needless to read וָאֲחַלֵּל and וָאֶתְּנָה. This were, indeed, the easier reading, but for that very reason suspicious. The more difficult reading necessitates a deeper penetration into the sense. I construe ואחלל and ואתנה as simply future, and both ו as simply copulative.——There are likely only rhetorical reasons for using the cohortative form אתנה instead of אֶתֵּן. At least this form is very usual precisely with נתן. It occurs thirty times in the Old Testament, including the forms with Vav. consec. I doubt if it occurs as often with any other verbs.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. But thou——sacrifices.—Vers. 22-24 a. In ver. 21 the Lord has expressed a glorious hope for the future. But he reflects here that the past history of Israel lets this hope appear unfounded. The outward return from the Exile is not sufficient to qualify Israel for that praise of God (ver. 21). As long as Israel is under the outward ceremonial law, it is also under the dominion of sin. The Lord Himself must first blot out the guilt of sin by an offering that only He can make, and break the power of sin by an outpouring of holy streams of the Spirit. Only a regenerated Israel will be able to do what is expected in ver. 21.

The following clauses do not mean that Israel has never fulfilled the duties of divine service therein mentioned, but only that they have not fulfilled them, i. e., not fully satisfied the requirements. The long period from the giving of the law to Isaiah's time, that ought to have been a period of uninterrupted fulfilment of the law, was in fact a period of prevalent transgression of the law. Hence the Prophet can well say, Israel has not brought the Lord the gifts of divine service that they ought to have brought.

In שֶׂה, small cattle, collective, there may be an allusion to the daily morning and evening sacrifice, in which a year-old lamb must be brought (Exod. xxix. 38 sqq.; Numb. xxviii. 3 sqq.). What a perverted world, when the Lord must Himself perform the work that Israel ought to have done by their divine service!

לבנה is the fragrant gum of a tree found in Arabia, Persia, India and the eastern coast of Africa, but not definitely identified by modern botanists (see Leyer, Herz. R.-Encycl. XVII. p. 602 sq.). The Israelites used it partly as an ingredient of incense (Exod. xxx. 34), partly as an accompaniment to the meat offering, and the shew-bread (Lev. ii. 1 sq., 15 sq.; xxiv. 7). The expression לא קנית ver. 24, when we compare the foregoing parallel enumerations, seems manifestly to be prompted by the assonance with קָנֶה. קָנֶה is mentioned Exod. xxx. 23 with the addition בֹּשֶׂם as an ingredient of the holy anointing oil (Leyrer, ibid. XIV. p. 663 sq.; XIII. p. 322); according to the Rabbins (ibid. XII. p.

507) it was also an ingredient of the holy incense. It is almost universally agreed that it is the calamus (ibid. XIV. p. 664). DELITZSCH says "the calamus forms no stalk, much less a reed;" but it is to be considered that it has a stem formed underneath by the leaves overlaying one another. And these leaves are, each for itself, reeds open at the sides. Hence the calamus is reckoned among reeds. Besides, not our common calamus is meant, but the Asiatic, indigenous to tropical Asia, and which is still used there in preparing fragrant oils and incense (LEYRER, ibid.). The expression: with the fat of thy sacrifices thou hast not intoxicated (xxxiv. 5) me is anthropopathic. The effect of the fumes of fat on men being imputed to God. [רָוָה in the Hiph means "to drench." In this case "to drench with fumes of fat," i. e., be-smoke.—TR.].

2. But thou——thy sins.—Vers. 24 b—25. Having said what Israel did not do, it is now said what they have only done: Only this hast thou done, thou hast laden me, etc. An antithesis is implied that we would better express by "but thou hast (see Text. and Gram.). These words declare how the LORD has hitherto borne Himself with reference to His people's burden of guilt. He patiently submitted to the painful service of bearing this burden. These "sins" and iniquities are the "sins that are past through the forbearance of God" (Rom. iii. 25; comp. ix. 22). In ver. 25, however, the LORD says what He will do in the future: He will blot out their transgressions. He will not eternally drag Himself along with this burden; He will take it out of the world. And He says He will do it for His own sake. There is that in Himself that impels Him to this: It is love. It does not rest till it has found the ways and means of gratifying itself without trenching on justice. The LORD must have in mind here that sacrifice which did what all sacrifices of the Old Testament were unable to do. Acts iii. 19, and Col. ii. 14 seem to be founded on our passage. In the latter it appears that Paul recognized as the basis of the expression the representation of a delible writing. On "blot out" and "will not remember" comp. Ps. li. 3, 11; xxv. 7; lxxix. 8; Jer. xxxi. 34, etc.

3. Put me——reproaches.—Vers. 26–28. The LORD's exceeding gracious language vers. 22–25 does not by any means suit the taste of Israel. The Prophet sees in spirit that Israel does not acknowledge its unrighteousness and will not accept the LORD's proposed sacrifice (ver. 25). Israel is self-righteous. The LORD does not peremptorily rebuke the assertion of it. He again gives the nation an opportunity to prove it, if possible. Hence He demands an enumeration of the facts calculated to confute the LORD and to prove their assertion. הַזְכִּירֵנִי is = "remind me," viz.: by naming the facts. On the ground of these facts there shall be justification; and if the enumeration holds good, Israel shall be just (justified). But Israel can produce nothing that will bear sifting. On the other hand (ver. 27) the LORD adduces facts. He confines Himself to naming capital facts, that warrant a conclusion a majori ad minus. Without doubt the first father of Israel means Abraham. For Adam is the father of the whole human race. Abraham's conduct in reference to Pharaoh and Abimelech (Gen. xii. 11 sqq.; xx. 1 sqq.), is of itself enough to prove that he sinned. מֵלִיץ is "the spokesman, interpreter, medium" (comp. Gen. xlii. 23; Job xxxiii. 23; 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). Theocratic office-bearers are meant, who were mediums between God and the people. For this reason they are called just after princes of the sanctuary. They were, indeed, the pillars and props of the Theocracy. It was just their sins (comp. Jer. xxii.–xxiii.), because of their commanding influence, that contributed most to their own and the nation's fall.

The debate, therefore, does not turn to the advantage of Israel. In conclusion, the LORD must pronounce the judgment: I will profane the princes of the sanctuary (comp. e. g., Jer. lii. 24), but Israel itself I must give up to the curse and reproaches by the heathen. (See Text. and Gram.). According to the foregoing exposition, the Prophet (ver. 21) points to a glorious last-time of salvation that begins with deliverance from the Exile, but in such a way that, from this beginning onwards to the completion of it, there occurs a long and changeful period. In reference to this period he distinguishes four particulars: 1) that the natural, fleshly Israel, as ever, is incapable of serving the LORD and of properly proclaiming His praise; 2) that the LORD Himself will blot out Israel's sin; 3) that Israel, in proud self-righteousness, does not accept this gracious gift of the LORD; 4) that, consequently, His worship will be profaned, i. e., done away, and the nation itself will be given up to the curse of destruction and outward reproach. When "the princes of the sanctuary" are profaned, then the sanctuary itself, the cultus of Jehovah, the Old Testament covenant in general, will be desecrated, i. e., done away and dissolved. For as GESENIUS justly remarks: "foedus res sacra est, idque qui profanat etiam violat et dissolvat." Israel rejected Christ. They accepted neither Himself, nor, after His death, the gospel of the cross. For this the old covenant was broken and the Temple destroyed, the nation dispersed into all lands. But this happened only to the fleshly Israel. There remains a remnant, an ἐκλογή, and these, according to xliv. 3, will obtain the baptism of the Spirit, and thereby the qualification to fulfil ver. 21.

5. THE COMPLETION OF THE REDEMPTION BY DELIVERING FROM SIN IS THE FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT.

Chapter XLIV. 1–5.

1 Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant;
And Israel, whom I have chosen:
2 Thus saith the Lord that made thee,
And formed thee from the womb, which will help thee;
Fear not, O Jacob, my servant;
And thou, Jesurun, whom I have chosen.
3 For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty,
And floods upon the dry ground:
I will pour my spirit upon thy seed,
And my blessing upon thine offspring:
4 And they shall spring up as among the grass
As [a]willows by the water courses.
5 One shall say, I am the Lord's;
And another [b]shall call himself by the name of Jacob;
And another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord,
And surname himself by the name of Israel.

[b] shall shout out the name of Jacob.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. ועתה. Ver. 2. עֹשְׂךָ—וְיֹצֶרְךָ—בֶּטֶן—אַל־תִּירָא. Ver. 4. בבין.

Ver. 2. מִבֶּטֶן is to be connected with יֹצֶרְךָ, as appears from ver. 24 and xlix. 5. יֹצֶרְךָ is an elliptical relative clause.—יְשֻׁרוּן. That this word springs from יִשְׂרָאֵל (Gr. Ven. Ἰσραελίσκος), or that it is identical with יָשָׁר the first part of ישׂראל (Jerome, who translates ישׂראל by rectus Dei and ישׁרון by rectissimus; Aqu., Symm., Theod., εὐθύς, εὐθύτατος) is an ungrammatical view. But it appears also to have been shared by those that have translated Jeshurun directly by Israel (Targ., Pesch., Ar.). This they seem to have done because they saw in it, not only an indirect equivalent for the name Israel, but also (because of the supposed identity of ישׂר and ישׁר), a direct equivalent. It is now admitted that ישׁרון has nothing to do directly with ישׂראל, but is derived from an essentially different root יָשַׁר. As the word is used only of Israel, and that not as an adjective but as a name for Israel, we must regard it as a cognomen, and as so-called Kunje (comp. on יְכַנֶּה ver. 5), consequently as a proper name. But, as is well known, there is greater freedom and variety used in all languages in the formation of proper names than in the formation of appellatives. This is because proper names have regard to individual peculiarities, which is not the case with appellative designations, which merely correspond to abstract modes that are always alike. Thus ישׁרון has originated from יָשָׁר by appending the nominal ending וּן, which, as the characteristic and at the same time the final syllable, has attracted the final syllable of the root. ישׁרון is therefore the notion יָשָׁר in that peculiar aspect which the ending וּן imparts to it. But what is this peculiar meaning of וּן? It occurs on the whole not often. It only appears in the appellatives צִיּוּן, statutum, statua, monumentum, in the five proper names, שַׁלּוּן, נוּן, ישׁרון, ידוּתוּן (יְדִיתוּן), זְבֻלוּן, and in the word כִּיּוּן (Amos v. 26) of which it is not known definitely whether it is a proper name or an appellative. But the ending וּן is manifestly derived from וֹן, by changing the vowel. The latter ending is exceeding common both in appellatives and in proper names. Several words have both endings: thus Nun, father of Joshua, is also named נוֹן 1 Chron. vii. 27. The tribal designation from זְבֻלוּן is זְבֻלוֹנִי (Num. xxvi. 27; Judg. xii. 11, 12), and in Greek the word is pronounced regularly Ζαβουλών. צִיּוּן has a near relation in צִיּוֹן. For not only is Mt. Zion called Zehjun in Syriac and Arabic, but also it is even not impossible that the original meaning of צִיּוֹן coincides with that of צִיּוּן. For Zion might very suitably be designated as something "firmly set up, firmly founded, a מוּסָד מוּסָּד, xxviii. 16." There is great variety in the meaning of words in וֹן. It ought not to have been so positively contradicted that the ending וֹן is also used to designate diminutives. What Ewald (Gram., § 167) adduces on that subject is still worthy of consideration. צַוְּרוֹן occurs only in Song of Sol. iv. 9, where it is manifestly a term of endearment, and where one may translate "thou hast taken away my heart by one of thine eyes, by a picture (as if formed by a turner) of thy little neck" (properly Halzpartiechen). שְׁפִיפוֹן (Gen. xlix. 18) from שָׁפַף serpsit, reptavit, is called a diminutive by Gesenius, meaning "little sneak." זֵרְעֹנִים which occurs Dan. i. 16 for זֵרֹעִים ibid. ver. 12, can hardly mean anything else than small vegetables, i. e., something inconsiderable as means of nourishment. It is universally admitted that אִישׁוֹן, "the pupil," means the little man in the eye; and also שַׂהֲרֹנִים (iii. 18; Judg. viii. 26) is generally taken to mean lunulae. If, finally, BEN-GORION, whom EWALD cites, is correct in stating that Josippon is diminutive of Joseph, I cannot see what one can object to the assumption that the Heb., among its diminutive forms, forms some in וֹן־. Moreover ver. 5 manifestly corresponds to ver. 2, and as the words ver. 5 זה יקרא בשם יעקב correspond to the words אל-תירא עבדי יעקב ver. 2, so the words ובשם ישראל יכנה ver. 5, refer to the words ישרון בחרתי בו ver. 2, (comp. the remarks on ver. 5). From this results that the Prophet regards ישרון as the כִּנּוּי for ישראל. Ver. 5. Piel כִּנָּה, besides here, occurs only xlv. 4 and Job xxxii. 21, 22. In Job the meaning is manifestly "to flatter." In xlv. 4 the word stands, as here, parallel with קרא, and can likewise mean only "to name honorably." In later Hebrew the word means "cognominare, titulo appellare" in general, and כִּנּוּי is "cognomen, agnomen," when even not exactly an honorable one. Thus אֲדֹנָי and אֱלֹהִים are the כִּנּוּיִם for יהוה. Among Hebrew grammarians the pronoun is called כנוי, because it is a word standing in place of a noun. Comp. BUXTORF, Lex. talm. et rabb, p. 1054. With this certainly connects the Arabic Kunje, which however has more the meaning of a familiar name of flattery or one given in jest (comp. EWALD'S Gr., pp. 662, 665).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This strophe connects closely with the foregoing one as its necessary conclusion. The prospect disclosed xliii. 21, that not merely the brute world, but also the people of God will proclaim the praise of the LORD, cannot be realized at once after the return from Exile. For the fleshly Israel still predominates. They cannot proclaim the praise of Jehovah; they will not, in their self-righteousness, acknowledge their sin, and will not accept the sacrifice that God, in His grace, offers to make for their sin. For this they are given up to the curse of destruction. But Israel is by no means done away as a whole by this. On the contrary, the moment has come when the LORD will fulfil to the people of His choice, i. e., the election, the ἐκλογή of His people (vers. 1, 2), the promise given xliii. 19–21. For then the LORD will send down, not earthly abundance of water, but streams of the Spirit, on the spiritual Israel, composed of those of Israel and of the heathen that are qualified to receive (ver. 3), and these streams will enable the spiritual Israel to cleave to the LORD in a fresh life of the Spirit, and thus to perform what was predicted xliii. 21.

2. Yet now hear——have chosen.—Vers. 1, 2. It is first of all to be remarked how the LORD no longer addresses His people merely by the name "Jacob" or "Israel," but with the tenderest expressions, and how He accumulates these expressions. We see that He is no longer dealing with the natural Israel, but with the remnant, the ἐκλογή. But now depends on xliii. 28. But now, i. e., after fleshly Israel has contemned the sacrifice for its sins, and has on that account been rejected, the moment has come when the LORD prepares the true Israel for the accomplishment of His will. This Israel He first addresses as Jacob My servant. Thus we see that here, not the total, but only the noble nucleus of the nation is designated as "Servant of the LORD." For He calls this nucleus Israel whom I have chosen (xli. 8, 9; xliii. 10; xlix. 7). This is the first address, and meant only to call the attention of the one addressed. Then follows the second address, which begins with naming the speaker, who is designated as Jehovah, the Creator and Former of Israel from the womb, and their Helper. From all the facts and names accumulated in the two verses, the conclusion is drawn that Israel ought not to be afraid. The words xliii. 28 seem to give the occasion for this. Jeshurun [Jesurun is an erroneous orthography. —TR.], which occurs first [and the only passages beside.—TR.] Deut. xxxii. 15; xxxiii. 5, 26, is undoubtedly a designation of the people of Israel (see Text. and Gram.). If we may take it as a term of endearment or flattery, we may then understand it to mean "pious little one, pious little nation, Frömmchen." It is to be noted that the second address (ver. 2), like the first (ver. 1) concludes with I have chosen him.—From this appears what emphasis the Prophet lays on the idea of the election.

3. For I will pour——of Israel.—Vers. 3–5. Here the LORD says to His beloved people why they need not be afraid. In the judgment that is to consume the fleshly Israel, the spiritual Israel is to remain unharmed. The latter is in fact called to perform what the other could not do: proclaim the praise of Jehovah (xliii. 21). It is enabled to do so by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The Prophet here returns to the sphere of thought of xliii. 20. There a rich blessing of water was promised to the nation returning home through the desert. We have seen that the Prophet here again contemplates together the whole period of salvation. We are aware of this from his seeing also the irrational brutes qualified and impelled to thanksgiving to God. But this elevated goal Israel does not attain at once. Rather in this period, beginning with the deliverance from the Exile and concluding with the reign of peace, the outward Israel descends deep down into the abyss of destruction. But the "election" will remain, and to it will be given that outpouring of streams of living water, of which the blessing of water during the journey in the desert was only a type. With ver. 3 a the Prophet makes the connection with that type. I may say, he places one foot in the physical and the other in the spiritual, and thus forms a bridge from one to the other. Not as if to the "elect" will be imparted first the physical and then the spiritual blessing. But only for the purpose of making us recognize the connection with xliii. 20, the Prophet speaks first physically. But, as the following intimation shows, he means already in ver. 3 a spiritual water. צָמֵא (not צְמֵאָה) seems, in antithesis to יַבָּשָׁה "the thirsty," to mean a living being, and יבשה (comp. Gen. i. 9,

10) "the dry ground" נוזלים "fluentes, fluenta" (comp. Exod. xv 3; Ps. lxxviii. 16, 44) only here in Isaiah. When the Prophet says on thy seed, thine offspring he addresses the ideal totality of the nation (comp. Joel iii. 1). The blessing, which we are primarily to understand as spiritual and belonging to eternal well-being, is the effect of the Spirit, and appears outwardly in joyous, fruitful prosperity. Hence צמחו וגו׳. The LXX. and TARG. appear to have read כְּבֵין. And at first sight one might prefer this reading to the בבין of the text (which occurs only here) were it better supported and not the easier. It seems to me that the Prophet, by the grass, does not mean the Israelites themselves, to whom "seed" and "offspring" do refer. He rather conceives of the Israelites as higher and nobler plants, say, flowers or trees, growing out of the midst of the grass, and by the grass means the converted heathen. He further compares them to Arab-trees (ערבים, xv. 7, according to WETZSTEIN in DELITZSCH, p. 459. Rem., not willows, but a poplar tree that grows like willows, and along with such, by flowing water) by the water-courses (comp. xxx. 25; Ps. i. 3), which, less common than the willow, rise conspicuous among the trees and bushes growing by the water.

Thus the Prophet prepares for what he would say ver. 5. He shows, namely, that to the spiritual Israel, whom he addresses vers. 1, 2, belong not only such as are Israelites by corporeal descent. Not all are Israel that are of Israel (Rom. ix. 6 sqq.); and just as little are the heathen on account of their descent excluded from Israel. Our Prophet, in fact, often enough utters the promise that the heathen shall come to Israel and be incorporated in Israel (ii. 2 sqq.; xi. 10; xlii. 6; xlix. 6, 18 sqq.; liv. 1 sqq.; lv. 5; lvi. 5 sqq.; lx. 3; lxv. 1, etc.). Thus I see in ver. 5 an exposition of the thought that the believing Israelites sprout up in the midst of the grass, and that they thus shall be distinguished from the grass, and yet stand upon one foundation of life with it. For ver. 5 does not speak of Israelites, but of such as turn to Jehovah and to His people. But the language concerning these would be wholly disconnected if ver. 4 did not in "among the grass" contain a transition to the thought in question.

Notice that ver. 5 has two chief parts, of which each has two subdivisions. The first subdivision of each part contains a declaration of surrender to Jehovah; the second subdivision contains each time a recognition of Israel as a people of prominent importance. The first subdivisions begin with זֶה, the fourth does not. As one cannot avoid inquiring why the Prophet should refrain from a fourth זה, it appears that he would say: not all will make prominent in their confessions either Jehovah or the nation, but many will do both. Thus among these heathen there shall be so far a difference, that some in their declaration of adhesion will mention more especially the God of the people, others the people of God, while still others will mention both in equal degree. Thus one will say I am the Lord's, another will let a loud call be heard by means of the name of Jacob, i. e., he will loudly praise Jacob (comp. on xli. 5). Finally a third will do both: he will sign away his hand, i. e., what he can do, effect, perform (compare the expression נָתַן יָד Jer. l. 15; 2 Chr. xxx. 8, etc.) to the LORD (כָּתַב literis consignare also with לְ of definition, e. g., in כָּתוּב לַחַיִּים iv. 3). This explanation appears simpler to me than the other two that translate either "to write, etch on the hand," or "to write with the hand." Thus one may say in Latin: literis manum suam Jovae consignabit, in order to signify surrender by means of a legal obligation. Of the same person it is said further, that "he will make an award of honor by means of the name of Israel," i. e., that he will honorably name the name of Israel. See Text. and Gram. The intimate relation between God and His people is assumed here. He that confesses the LORD must confess His people, and vice versa.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xliii. 1. "Here are presented to us for our comfort all three articles of the Christian faith concerning the Creation, Redemption, and Sanctification. For 1) if God created us He will not forsake the work of His hands (Ps. cxxxviii. 8). 2) If He has redeemed us, no one will seize His sheep out of His hand (John x. 28). 3) If He has called us and named us by our name, we are allowed to rejoice that our names are written in heaven (Luke x. 20.)"—CRAMER.

2. On xliii. 2. "God delivers out of perils of water. Examples: Noah (Gen. viii. 15). Moses who was cast into the water in a little ark covered with pitch (Exod. ii. 6). The children of Israel who were led through the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 16). Jonah in the whale's belly (Jonah ii. 11). The disciples with the LORD in the boat (Matth. viii. 26). Peter who walked on the water (Matth. xiv. 30). Paul shipwrecked, and along with whom were rescued two hundred and seventy-six souls (Acts xxvii. 37). God delivers also from perils of fire. Examples: Daniel's companions in the fiery furnace (Dan. iii. 24 sqq.). Lot, whom with his family the holy angel led out of Sodom (Gen. xix. 17)."—CRAMER.

3. [On xliii. 4. "He would cause other nations to be destroyed, if it were necessary, in order to effect their deliverance, and to restore them to their own land. We learn here, (1) That nations and armies are in the hand of God and at His disposal. (2) That His people are dear to His heart, and that it is His purpose to defend them. (3) That the revolutions among nations, the rise of one empire, and the fall of another, are often in order to promote the welfare of His church, to defend it in danger, and deliver it in time of calamity. (4) That His people should put the utmost confidence in God as being able to defend them, and as having formed a purpose to preserve and save them."—BARNES.——"The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead," Prov. xi. 8].

4. On xliii. 3, 4. "There are various views of this: a. Some suppose we are to understand it thus; the Egyptians imagined they would blot out the people of Israel, but they were punished themselves; b, others apply it to the times of Hezekiah, when the Egyptians and Ethiopians were chastised by Shalmaneser; c, others suppose it was fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar in the time of Zedekiah; d, others by the Romans, when the Jewish republic was spared and these nations encountered misfortune; e, still others regard it as yet future, and that it is to be fulfilled on antichristian nations, which they infer from vers. 5–7."

"Several examples of such a warding off of punishment from the Jewish nation, which on the other hand were suffered to fall on heathen nations, are to be noticed in the history of the Jews. Still this is not to be understood as if these nations suffered for the sins of Judah. The wrath of God that should have come upon Judah, came on the heathen because of their own sins, but Judah was then spared out of grace (Prov. xxi. 18). God forgave the penitent Jews their sin, but He punished the sin of the impenitent heathen."—STARKE.

5. On xliii. 5–8. What the Prophet says here primarily of the return of Israel from all the lands of its exile, applies also to that return that takes place when poor, straying heathen souls are led back from dead idols to the living God, their Saviour and Redeemer. Then they are the ones that the LORD has made and prepared for His glory (Acts xiii. 48; Rom. viii. 29 sq.) Such are the blind people that still have eyes, and the deaf that still have ears. For blind and deaf they are in as far as by nature and their birth they belong to the blind and deaf heathen world. But they have eyes and ears in as far as the LORD has opened their hearts and given them a penetration by which they see and hear better than those who, although surrounded by light through possession of the means of grace, still do not know what belongs to their peace (Matth. xiii. 13 sqq.; John ix. 39 sqq.).

6. On xliii. 9–13. The Prophet here gives a proof of the existence of God, which at the same time involves a proof of the non-existence of idols. It cannot be denied in thesi, that a knowledge of the future lies beyond the sphere of human ability, and that if it occurs, it can only happen by virtue of a superhuman penetration that overleaps the limits of time and space. Prediction is not an art. All depends on what is foretold being fulfilled at the right time and in the right way. The agreement of prophecy and fulfilment can only be verified after the fulfilment takes place. Hence it is necessary that at the moment named the prophecy be attested as genuine, not fortuitous, not fabricated post eventum. Hence the LORD says (ver. 10): "ye are my witnesses." And in fact, in all its notorious history, in its remarkable indestructibility, by virtue of which it moves through the entire universal history, while all other ancient nations have disappeared, Israel is a living witness for the existence of Him who calls Himself at once the God of Israel and the Creator of heaven and earth. For it is foretold that to this nation shall happen judgment, dispersion, continued existence in dispersion and a gathering together again out of dispersion. Over thousands of years ago it was foretold, and what to the present could be fulfilled has been fulfilled. What but divine knowledge and power can have so fitted the prophecy to the fulfilment and the fulfilment to the prophecy? Therefore the existence of a divine providence is proved by the history of Israel. But what other God should be the author of this providence than He that said not only, "ye are my witnesses" (ver. 10), but also, "I declared when there was no strange god among you?" (ver. 12). One is reminded of the anecdote of Frederick the Great, who, having demanded a striking proof of the truth of the religion revealed in the Bible, received from one of the guests at table the answer, "Your majesty, the Jews."

[7. On xliii. 10. "Neither shall there be after me." "This expression is equivalent to that which occurs, Rev. i. 11, "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last;" and it is remarkable that this language, which obviously implies eternity, and which in Isaiah is used expressly to prove the divinity of Jehovah, is, in Rev. i. 11, applied no less universally to the LORD Jesus Christ."—BARNES.

On ver. 13. "'Who can hinder it.' The doctrine taught here is, (1.) That God is from everlasting—for if He was before time, He must have been eternal. (2.) That He is unchangeably the same—a doctrine which is, as it is here designed to be used, the only sure foundation for the security of His people—for who can trust a being who is fickle, changing, vacillating? (3.) That He can deliver His people always, no matter what their circumstances. (4.) That He will accomplish all His plans; no matter whether to save His people, or to destroy His foes. (5.) That no one—man or devil—can hinder Him. How can the feeble arm of a creature resist God? (6.) That opposition to Him is as fruitless as it is wicked. If men wish for happiness they must fall in with His plans, and aid in the furtherance of His designs."—BARNES.]

8. On xliii. 19—xliv. 5. We have here again a brilliant illustration of the grandeur of the prophetic view of history. The Prophet sees in spirit that with the deliverance from the Babylonish captivity a new thing will begin, in comparison with which the deliverance from Egyptian bondage with all its miracles will only appear as something inferior. For with the beginning of that period of salvation, the Prophet sees, too, the end. The waters with which the LORD will refresh those returning from Babylon flow from the same source as the water of regeneration, of the παλιγγενεσία, of the renewal of nature. And yet! What a tremendous period separates both, and what must Israel not go through till, from the drink out of that earthly fountain in the desert, it has attained to the well of heavenly water of life! It must first slough off the entire "fleshly Israel." It has already performed the entire Old Testament ceremonial service in an unsatisfactory manner. Indeed, had it done this most perfectly, it could only have satisfied the needs of blotting out sin in an ideal, typical way. But Israel was far from performing even the outward letter of the law by that sort of service. The LORD must take all the guilt of His people on His own shoulders. What Israel did itself was as good as nothing. And the LORD, in His long-suffering, not only put up with this, He will even do more. He will undertake Himself the entire and complete blotting out of the guilt of His people. But the people are self-righteous and trust in their own work. They maintain that they have done what they ought, although the LORD can prove that not even their chiefs and prominent representatives have been righteous. Since then the nation, persisting, stiff-necked, in its self-righteousness, does not accept the sacrifice, that the LORD, in His infinite grace, brings for the purpose of making atonement,—this outward, fleshly Israel, with all its outward ceremonial service, which is used only to feed its self-righteousness, must be broken up and destroyed. Then, out of the ruins of the fleshly Israel, the spiritual Israel will issue as from a cast off shell, and it will be susceptible of the gracious gifts of its God. To it then will be imparted the streams of the Spirit which bring about the regeneration of all natural and personal life, and will enable Israel to sanctify the name of its God, as predicted in xliii. 21.

[On xliii. 25. "We may learn from this verse; (1.) That it is God only who can pardon sin. How vain then is it for man to attempt it! How wicked for man to claim the prerogative! And yet it is an essential part of the papal system that the Pope and his priests have the power of remitting the penalty of transgression. (2.) That this is done by God solely for His own sake. It is not (a) because we have any claim to it—for then it would not be pardon, but justice. It is not (b) because we have any power to compel God to forgive—for who can contend with Him, and how could mere power procure pardon? It is not (c) because we have any merit—for then also it would be justice—and we have no merit. Nor is it (d) primarily in order that we may be happy—for our happiness is a matter not worthy to be named compared with the honour of God. But it is solely for His own sake—to promote His own glory—to show His perfections—to evince the greatness of His mercy and compassion—and to show His boundless and eternal love. (3.) They who are pardoned should live to His glory, and not to themselves [ver. 21, xliv. 5]. (4.) If men are ever pardoned they must come to God—and to God alone. They must come not to justify themselves, but to confess their crimes."—BARNES.].

10. On xliv. 1, 2. "God has two arguments wherewith to comfort: 1) When He reminds His own what He did for them in the past; 2) what He will yet do for them in the future."—CRAMER.

11. On xliv. 3. Comparing here the bestowment of the Spirit to pouring water on dry land, happens primarily out of regard to the special connection of our passage, which treats of the return of Israel through the desert. As in xliii. 19, 20 abundance of water is promised for physical refreshment, so here streams of the Spirit for spiritual refreshment. Outpouring of the Spirit is promised elsewhere also for the purpose of cleansing, fructifying, refreshing (Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Jno. vii. 37 sqq.). When, however, the Holy Spirit appears elsewhere as a fiery energy (Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 8; Acts ii. 3) it is to designate it as the principle of divine light and life-heat. Whether by the baptism of fire is to be understood also the fire of judgment (Matth. iii. 12; 1 Cor. iii. 13–15) as ORIGEN AND AMBROSE think, we will leave uninvestigated here.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xliii. 1–4. A glorious word of comfort for the individual Christian and for Christian communions. All grounds of comfort are therein enumerated. We learn 1) what the LORD is to us (ver. 3 God, Saviour, ver. 4 He loves us). 2) What we are to the LORD (ver. 1 His creatures, redeemed ones, and not such as disappear in the great mass, but whom He knows by name, and whom as a precious possession He keeps ever in sight). 3) He delivers us out of manifold distresses (ver. 2 out of all). 4) The price He pays for our deliverance (vers. 3, 4; conscious enemies, or their unconscious instruments may go to destruction to save us, e. g., in ancient times the Egyptians in the Red Sea, in modern, the French against Germany, 1870–71. 5) To what He has destined us (ver. 4, because so dear, thou must be glorious). On xliii. 1, 2. "Thou art mine! saith the LORD. By that He signifies 1) a well-acquired; 2) an inviolable right of possession." KOEGEL in "Aus dem Vorhof ins Heiligthum," 1876, Vol. II. p. 196.

2. On xliii. 5–8. Missionary Sermon. The LORD here addresses the spiritual Israel, to whom we and all out of every nation belong, who are born of God. Missions are properly nothing else than a gathering of the hidden children of God, scattered here and there, to the communion of the visible church (Jno. xi. 52). Contemplate 1) The mission territory a, in its outward extent (all nations ver. 5 b, 6); b, in its inward limitation (vers. 7, 8; all are called, only those are chosen who are marked with the name of the LORD, are prepared for His glory, among the blind and deaf are such as see and hear). 2) Mission work: a, its difficulty (ver. 5, "fear not" implies that, humanly speaking, there is reason for fear); b, the guaranty of its success (ver. 5, "I am with thee").

3. On xliii. 22. [Proofs of weariness in religion. (1.) Casting off prayer: thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob. Jacob was a man famous for prayer (Hos. xii. 4); to boast the name of Jacob, and yet live without prayer, is to mock God and deceive ourselves. If Jacob does not call upon God, who will. (2.) They grudged the expense of devotion. They were for a cheap religion. They had not brought even the small cattle; much less the greater, pretending they could not spare them, they must have them for the maintenance of their families; still less would they pay for a foreign article like missions; bought no sweet cane. (3.) What sacrifices they did offer were not meant for God's honor, neither hast thou honored me, etc.; being offered carelessly, or hypocritically, or perfunctorily, or ostentatiously, or perhaps even to idols, these were dishonouring to God. (4.) The aggravation of this; as God appointed the service it was no burdensome thing, I have not caused thee to serve, etc. God's commands are not grievous. After M. HENRY].

4. On xliii. 24, 25. Passion sermon. The righteousness that avails with God. 1) Israel does not obtain it (it has not even fulfilled the ceremonial law; and not merely the nation in general left the law unfulfilled, but also its chiefs and teachers: and as with Israel so with mankind in general. 2) Christ procures it; for: a, He the guiltless, out of pure love takes on Himself the heavy burden of suffering, which beginning in Gethsemane ends on Golgotha; b, thereby He blots out our transgressions and reconciles us to the Father.

5. On xliv. 1–5. Pentecost (Whitsuntide) sermon. The Church of Christ can grow, flourish, and bear fruit only by the Spirit of Christ. Hence is necessary the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. This is 1) to be hoped for with certainty, because promised by the LORD (in proportion to the need and to the receptivity the Holy Spirit will ever be imparted to the church); 2) infallibly efficient in producing all the good fruits that must adorn the vineyard of the LORD (vers. 4, 5).

6. On xliv. 1–5. "The period of confirmation an Advent of Jesus to the children." "Praise and thanks to God. there is much new life born in the period while those that are to be confirmed are under instruction, and much grows up in later time out of the seed scattered then. This time ought also to open the children's mouths for them to confess their salvation and their Saviour. That poor "yes" that the children speak at their confirmation at the altar is not enough. Nor does it suffice for us to confess our being Christians by attending church and partaking of the LORD's Supper. The congregation that has become dumb must learn to speak again. We must boast again the unspeakable benefit of free grace. We must have a confessing church again. The confession must go with us into our life." AHLFELD, Das Leben im Lichte des Wortes Gottes, Halle, 1867, p. 150.

V.—THE FIFTH DISCOURSE.

Prophecy as proof of divinity comes to the front and culminates in the name Kores.

CHAPTER XLIV. 6–28.

1. JEHOVAH GUARANTEES ISRAEL'S SALVATION BY HIS PROPHECY. IDOLATERS WHOSE MADE-GODS CANNOT PROPHESY COME TO SHAME.

CHAPTER XLIV. 6–11.

6 Thus saith the LORD the King of Israel,
And his redeemer the LORD of hosts;
I am the first, and I am the last;
And beside me there is no God.
7 [a]And who, as I, shall call,
And shall declare it, and set it in order for me,
Since I appointed the ancient people?
[b]And the things that are coming, and shall come,
Let them shew unto them.
8 Fear ye not, neither be afraid:
Have not I told thee from that time, and have declared it?
Ye are even my witnesses.
Is there a God beside me?
Yea, there is no [1]God; I know not any.
9 They that make a graven image are all of them vanity;
And their [2]delectable things shall not profit;
And they are their own witnesses;
They see not, nor know;
That they may be ashamed.
10 Who hath formed a God,
Or molten a graven image that is profitable for nothing?
11 Behold, all his fellows shall be ashamed:
And the workmen, they are of men;
Let them all be gathered together, let them stand up;
Yet they shall fear, and they shall be ashamed together.

[1] Heb. Rock. [2] Heb. desirable.

[a] And who is as I, who proclaims aloud—so he shall tell it and do it like me—since I set an everlasting people.
[b] And future things even what shall come to pass.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 8. רָהָה—פַּחַד. Ver. 9. יָעַל—חָמַד—תֹּהוּ Hiph.

Ver. 6, 7. Ver. 7 is related to ver. 6 b as the conclusion to the reason. But ver 7 is to be construed so that the words ומי כמני יקרא משומי עם־עולם shall be taken together, and the words יגידה ויערכה לי construed as a parenthesis. קרא, agreeably to the context, and since it has nothing to do with teaching or with announcing past things, is = "to proclaim, announce, call out aloud, publicly." As appears to me, קָרָא is used partly for the sake of variety, the synonymous expressions having been used הִגִּיד thrice in vers. 7, 8, הִשְׁמִיעַ (comp. xliii 12) once at least, but partly and chiefly, because קרא involves in a greater degree the notion of sounding. It is related to those other expressions named like our "calling" to "giving notice, letting hear." The latter may take place by a very light voice or even without any use of the voice.——יגיד׳ ויע׳ לי׳, as we have said, is a parenthesis; but ו introduces the demonstrative conclusion after the relative premise מי יקרא (comp. e. g. Num. xxiii. 3). The premise is only interrupted for rhetorical reasons, being the result of the pathos with which the Prophet speaks. עָרַךְ certainly has here, not merely the meaning "to lay before, to lay down," but it involves also the notion of "doing similarly." The Vav. before אֲשֶׁר has as often, the meaning "and indeed." לָמוֹ after יַגִּידוּ is dat. ethicus, with strong approximation to the dativ. commodi.

Ver. 8. The question הֲיֵשׁ וגו׳ is equivalent to a denial (comp. questions with מָה or מִי Job xvi. 6; xxxi. 1; Song of Sol. viii. 4, etc.).——The expression אֱלוֹהַּ does not occur again in Isaiah.

Ver. 9. חמוד is "exoptatum, deliciae" (part. pass.; only here in Isaiah; comp. Job xx. 20; Ps. xxxix. 12). But I construe "the wished-for, desired," in the sense of "jewel, valuable."——בל־יועילו recalls בְּלִיַּעַל, thus it has hardly the merely negative meaning of inability, but also the positive meaning of something destructive, hurtful.——The words ועדיהם המה are variously explained. The Masoretic points over המה denote that it is critically suspicious. But it suits the context very well, if only the idols themselves be not regarded the witnesses: they, the idols, are their own witnesses, i. e., they testify against themselves (DELITZSCH). For the notion against themselves would need to be more clearly expressed. Rather the idol-makers are the witnesses for their idols as Israel is for Jehovah. Therefore הֵמָּה is subject to the predicate עדיהם, and not merely a resumption of עדיהם construed as the subject of יראו וגו׳.

Ver. 10. מי is here, as often, at the point of passing from the interrogative to the relative sense, and hence acquires an iterative meaning. For the question "who is there, who?" which, as it were, challenges in every direction, has the sense of "whosoever, quicunque." Comp. e. g. Exod. xxiv. 14; Jer. xlix. 19.——I construe לבלתי ה׳ as a conclusion, whose predicate is self-evident from the foregoing clause: "whosoever forms a god (he does, forms or moulds it) for nothing." If מי be construed as a direct interrogative, it has the appearance as if the Prophet doubted whether there were such people. For if one understands the inquiry in the sense of "reluctant wonder" (KNOBEL), and makes the answer to be that no rational person would do this, then the question would not be "who forms?" but "what rational person forms?"

Ver. 11. According to the context the clause וחרשים ו׳ must, it seems to me, be construed as causal. For המה מאדם is not the parallel of יבשו; it does not express the notion of destruction, but of what is the explanation of the destruction. Therefore I translate: "for they are (properly: they are in fact, comp. xxiv. 5; xxxviii. 17: xxxix. 1, etc.), smiths of men," i. e., of human origin.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet has announced (chap. xli.), the first deliverer for the first time, and then along with him the one to be delivered, viz., the servant of God in the national sense. In contrast with both of these he has presented the second and greatest deliverer, the Servant of God in a personal sense (xlii.). In chap. xliii. he has portrayed the deliverance in its chief characteristics. Now in chap. xliv. he gives the fullest effect to that element of his discourse, viz., the proof of divinity by means of prophecy, which so far he has produced already four times like a refrain, yet only as a prelude.

In three strophes Jehovah announces Himself in contrast with the dead idols as the true, living, omniscient, almighty God, who has predetermined Israel's deliverance, and now foretells it so that Israel can no more doubt His divinity. For, at the close of this chapter the Prophet names with the greatest distinctness even the name of the prince who is called to be the deliverer of Israel. The first three strophes are but the substructure for this culmination that is to crown the building, that is, for the great prophetic act that is accomplished in naming the name "Kores." In the first half of the present strophe (vers. 6–8) the Prophet makes prominent the difference between Jehovah and idols, by contrasting the omniscience and omnipotence of Jehovah with the nescience and impotence of idols. In the second half, also consisting of three verses (8–11), the Prophet exposes the folly of idolatry.

2. Thus saith——know not any.—Vers. 6–8. The LORD justifies the consoling language "fear ye not," etc., ver. 8, by first presenting Himself as the One that will help Israel, and can help. He is willing to help as being Israel's King, He can help as being the eternal God who has proved this His eternal divinity. Note how the LORD encloses the predicates of His existence relative to Israel in the predicates of His divine existence. He first calls Himself Jehovah, the absolutely existent. For this is the foundation. Then He calls Himself Israel's King and Redeemer. This is His historical revelation relative to time and salvation, which is enclosed by His eternal divine existence as by a ring. The latter is completed by the notion "Jehovah of hosts." For by this is intimated that the Lord is not only God per se, but has revealed this divinity already in a super-terrestrial sphere of dominion. How consoling for Israel that He, who is God per se, but has shown already that He can be such also for others by a super-terrestrial kingdom of glory, calls Himself Israel's King and Redeemer! The Lord was King of Israel while Israel existed as a nation (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 5; Ps. lxxiv. 12). The nation's demand for a human king is expressly called an insult to Jehovah as heavenly King (1 Sam. viii. 7; xii. 12). And also after Israel had received an earthly royalty, Jehovah still remains forever its proper, true and eternal King, from whom all earthly power of ruling emanates (xxxiii. 22). But the king is the natural deliverer of his people. His own interest and honor demand that his people shall not be ruined (see e. g. Ps. lxxix. 9; cvi. 8). This King has at His disposal for protecting Israel invisible powers, great in strength and numbers, viz., the heavenly hosts (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 3, and Schroeder in loc.; 2 Kings vi. 16 sqq.; Heb. i. 14). After this preface the Lord proceeds with what He has in mind. He calls Himself the first and the last (xli. 4; xlviii. 12) beside whom there is no God (xliii. 11; xliv. 8; xlv. 6, 21). For only He can be God who is before all and after all. But the Lord assuredly does not call Himself the first and the last in the sense of temporal succession, as if He were only the first to come into existence and the last to remain; for that would only establish a difference as to degree between Him and creatures. No, the Lord is at the same time beginning and end, Alpha and Omega. He encircles not only Israel (comp. on ver. 6 a), but all the world's history as a ring. To Him everything, beginning and end, is absolutely present.

Therefore, too, He can prophesy, and therefore prophesying by means of a decree is proof of His eternity, i. e., of His divinity. (On the relation of ver. 7 to 6 b see Text. and Gram.). עַם־עוֹלָם "everlasting people;" [English Version ancient people.] I do not believe that this means the human race. The Lord describes Himself in the whole context as the God of Israel; He will comfort Israel. It may be said that God prophesied from the beginning of the world, and that humanity in a certain sense may be described as עַם־עוֹלָם. Yet it is very doubtful whether in that case עַם would not require a nearer definition as in xlii. 5. Chap. xl. 7, to which appeal is made, refers decidedly to Israel, as we have shown. The dead may be called עַם־עוֹלָם (Ezek. xxvi. 20) because they are a special part of mankind, in respect to space dwelling in a land of their own, and in respect to time of immeasurable duration. But Israel, too, may be called an everlasting people, for to it alone, of all nations, is promised an everlasting covenant (Exod. xxxi. 16; Lev. xxiv. 8; Isa. xxiv. 5; lv. 3; lxi. 8, etc.), an everlasting sanctuary (Ezek. xxxvii. 26), an everlasting priesthood (Exod. xl. 15; Num. xxv. 13, etc.), and kingdom (2 Sam. vii. 13, 16; Ps. lxxxix. 4 sqq.); indeed it is expressly said "thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel to be a people unto thee forever" (לְעָם עַד־עוֹלָם) 2. Sam. vii. 24; comp. 1 Chr. xvii. 22. And in fact Israel is, in a good sense, the everlasting [wandering] Jew, the only nation that does not lose itself in the sea of nations, like a river, that does not mingle its waters with the lake through which it flows. And in the end the spiritual Israel will absorb all nations, and its sanctuary and priesthood and kingdom every other sanctuary, priesthood and kingdom, to the end that the throne and sanctuary of Israel's King and High-priest may exist alone through eternity.

The Lord has challenged the idols in ver. 7 a to produce their ancient prophecies, if they had any to show; in the second half of the verse he challenges them to produce any new ones they have. These new ones are designated as אֹתִיּוֹת and as such אֲשֶׁר תָּבֹאנָה. I do not believe that by this immediate future and remoter future things are distinguished (see on xli. 22, 23). But which will come is the nearer definition of אתיות. They are not to name any sort of so-called future thing, but such as shall also come, i. e., actually come to pass (see Text. and Gram.). They shall foretell for their own advantage (למו see Text. and Gram.); for it were for the interest of those addressed to be able to perform what is asked of them.

Ver. 8. If Jehovah, who calls Himself King and Redeemer of Israel, and who has founded this people for an everlasting existence, has furnished the proof of His divinity by a demonstration of His omniscience, then Israel need not fear. Jehovah has long in advance (מֵאָז as in xvi. 13; xlv. 21; xlviii. 3 sqq., comp. מֵרֹאשׁ xli. 26) foretold their distress and the deliverance from it, and Israel must testify that such is the fact (xliii. 10). Therefore the Lord can prophesy, and the fact (only affirmed ver. 6 b) is demonstrated, viz., His sole divinity. In the second clause of ver. 8 the Prophet seems to have in mind Ps. xviii. 32.

2. They that make——ashamed together.—Vers. 9-11. The lash is now laid on the folly of those that make idols, and then themselves appear as their witnesses, whereas in fact they see nothing of the future, from which appears the powerlessness of the idols, and the inevitable result that their worshippers must come to shame. The words are throughout in contrast with what (vers. 6-8) the Lord affirms of Himself. The idols themselves are guiltless. How can the poor blocks help men making idols of them? But the makers of idols are guilty, hence the Lord addresses them (יֹצְרֵי־פֶסֶל, the expression only here). See Text. and Gram. Jehovah is the Maker (יֹצֵר) of Israel (ver. 2); the idol-makers are the makers (יֹצְרִים) of their gods. These idol-makers are vanity (תֹּהוּ), they sink back into chaos, or rather they produce nothing better than chaos; while Israel is the everlasting people (עַם־עוֹלָם). The idol-makers are witnesses of their idols, i. e., they testify in their own case. Israel is the impartial witness of Jehovah; the idols are powerless, useless images; Jehovah is the Rock and Redeemer of His people. The idols themselves see and know nothing, consequently their worshippers and witnesses know nothing (יָדַע in the absolute sense = "to have knowledge," as xlv. 20; lvi. 10); to Jehovah, as the first and last, all is present, the beginning and the end, and what lies between. Therefore Israel must not fear, for it knows with the greatest certainty that it has in prospect a glorious deliverance. Vers. 10, 11 form the transition to ver. 12 sqq. wherein idol-manufacture is described; ver. 10 already presenting the fundamental thought that a shaped and moulded god is a contradictio in adjecto, hence a useless thing. Ver. 11 describes the proper fate of idol-makers, already intimated by profitable for nothing. By חברים many understand the companions, helpers of the idol-makers. But are not they identical then; and why make them specially prominent? It is better to understand that the companions or followers of the idols are intended (comp. חֲבוּר עֲצַבִּים אֶפְרָיִם Hos. iv. 17). Yet I would restrict the meaning to those servants of idols that are at the same time their manufacturers. These are the actual allies of the idols. For by the quantity and quality of their productions idolatrous worship is made to flourish (e. g., Demetrius in Ephesus, Acts xix. 24). Against this sentence the idol-makers might fancy they could oppose successful resistance by harmoniously standing up together en masse. But they mistake. They will still lose heart, and, instead of one by one, will only come to shame together.

2. THE POWERLESSNESS OF IDOLS AND THE FOLLY OF THEIR WORSHIPPERS PROVED BY THE WAY THEY ARE PRODUCED.

Chapter XLIV. 12–17.

12 [a]The smith[1] with the tongs
Both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers,
And worketh it with the strength of his arms:
Yea, he is hungry, and his strength faileth:
He drinketh no water, and is faint.
13 The carpenter stretcheth out his [b]rule; he marketh it out with a [c]line;
He fitteth it with planes,
And he marketh it out with the compass,
And maketh it after the figure of a man,
According to the beauty of a man;
That it may remain in the house.
14 [d]He heweth him down cedars,
And taketh the cypress and the oak,
[e]Which he [2]strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest:
He planteth an [f]ash, and the rain doth nourish it.
15 Then shall it be for a man to burn:
For he will take thereof, and warm himself;
Yea, he kindleth it, and baketh bread;
Yea, he maketh a god, and worshippeth it;
He maketh it a graven image, and falleth down thereto.
16 He burneth part thereof in the fire;
With part thereof he eateth flesh;
He roasteth roast, and is satisfied:
Yea, he warmeth himself, and saith,
Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire:
17 And the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image:
He falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it,
And prayeth unto it, and saith,
Deliver me; for thou art my god.

[1] Or, with an axe. [2] Or, taketh courage.
[a] The artist in iron sharpens his tool and worketh, etc. [b] line. [c] red-chalk. [d] To hew, etc., he took.
[e] And made choice. [f] a cedar.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12. The words חרש ברזל מעצד as they now stand mock every effort at exposition. For if we take חָרַשׁ as a verb [so J. A. A.], which conflicts with the parallel חרש עצים ver. 13, and translate "ex ferro bipennim facit" (Targ.), or if we take connectedly חרש ברזל as faber ferrarius, and let מעצד depend on a latent verb חָרַשׁ ("the smith prepares an axe," Gesen.), or on the following פעל ("the smith—a hatchet he works up in the glowing coals, viz., into an idol," HITZIG), or let it be subject with לוֹ supplied ("the iron smith has a great chisel," DELITZSCH), or if we connect the three words and translate: "the master, in iron of the axe he works in the glowing coals." HAHN; "the forger of edge-tools—he works with coals," KNOBEL,—in any case we encounter grammatical difficulties, or we obtain an unsatisfactory sense. The LXX. translates: ὅτι ὤξυνε τέκτων σίδηρον, σκεπάρνῳ εἰργάσατο αὐτό. Now this ὤξυνε is nothing else than the foregoing יַחַד. For חָדַד means "to be pointed;" Hiph. הֵחַד "to point, sharpen." Now CHEYNE thinks that a word such as הֵחַד has been lost from the beginning of ver. 12; DELITZSCH believes that חִדֵּד has dropped out. But nothing at all has fallen out. Only the Masoretic point Soph-pasuk is to be put after יֵבֹשׁוּ. Then יַחַד is quite simply the imperf. Hiph. of חָדַד, which imperf. occurs in only one other place, viz., Prov. xxvii. 17, where it reads:

בַּרְזֶל בְּבַרְזֶל יָחַד וְאִישׁ יַחַד פְּנֵי־רֵעֵהוּ, i. e., "iron on iron sharpens, and a man sharpens the countenance of his neighbor." Of course, according to rule the consonants must be pointed יָחֵד. And it is quite possible that this, or יָחַד (ad f. יָתֵם GREEN, § 140, 5) is the original reading of our text. As the imperf. Hiph. of הֵחַד is a very rare form, while יַחַד "una," is a very frequent word, confounding of the former with the latter is easily explained; and as יַחַד does not suit in ver. 12, but does suit in ver. 11, it was natural to place the Soph-pasuk after it. In Prov. xxvii. 17, also, the Masorets have both times taken יַחַד in the sense of una, (comp. EWALD, Lehrb., p. 559). But this construction is very harsh, because יַחַד must then not only be taken as a preposition, but is, moreover, in a strange manner joined with the prefix בְּ (instead of עִם or עַל). Most probably, therefore, we are to read יָחֵד in this place, or (less correctly as apocopated Hiph. from חָדָה = חָדַד, see ZOECKLER on Prov. xxvii. 17) יַחַד.

The חָרַשׁ בַּרְזֶל, as remarked, is in parallelism with the חָרַשׁ עֵצִים ver. 13 (comp. חָרַשׁ אֶבֶן Exod. xxviii. 11). Therefore חָרַשׁ is stat. constr. from חָרָשׁ (see List).—מַעֲצָד (from the rad. inus. עָצַד, which like חצד in the dialects, קָצַץ, חצה, חצב, חצץ, has the sense of cutting) is an edge-tool; not necessarily a hatchet.—פָּעַל is used here absolutely = "to do work;" a use, indeed, that is rare, but comp. xliii. 13 = "I effect." Moreover the word is mainly poetic, and hence a freer use of it is possible.—פֶּחָם (again only liv. 16; Prov. xxvi. 21) is the fire-coal.—מַקָּבוֹת only here in Isaiah; comp. li. 1.

Ver. 13. שֶׂרֶד ἅπ. λεγ. "red chalk."—מַקְצֻעוֹת, ἅπ. λεγ. from קָצַע "abscindere," therefore also an edge-tool; TARG. אִזְמְלָא, σμίλη, scalprum, tool of the sculptor.—מְחוּגָה from חוּג "circulare, ἅπ. λεγ. "the circle."—תָּאַר is originally = תּוּר "circuire" (hence of the course of the boundaries of the land, Josh. xv. 9, 11; xviii. 14, 17). Piel is then "circuitum facere," "to make outlines, to outline." It occurs only here.—If the reading יְתָאֲרֵהוּ at the end of the first clause, is correct, and there is therefore a difference between it and the same word following, then it seems to me very much to correspond with the context to take the latter as denominativum from תֹּאַר in the sense of "to make beautiful." Thus, e. g., שֹׁרֵשׁ "to make roots" (xl. 24) stands along with שֵׁרֵשׁ "to eradicate," סֵעַר "to make a storm (סַעַר), to storm forth," along with סֵעֵר "to drive forth." In that case our form were decidedly to be pronounced j'thōōrehu.

Ver. 14. I cannot believe that לִכְרֹת here is to be taken in the sense of the conjugatio periphrastica. Ver. 14 describes how a forest is planted out and grown large. Thus also HAHN. This statement of the aim is simply put first, and וְ in וַיִּקַּח refers backwards.—לִכְרָת אֲרָזִים is said, not as if only cedars were planted. That would conflict with what follows where other sorts of trees are named. But only the noblest sort stands for all, as if one were to say: to have apples to eat I set out an orchard. The meaning there is not that the orchard consisted only of apple-trees. תִּרְזָה, ἅπ. λεγ., commonly supposed to mean "the ilex, rock-oak" (the evergreen oak of the south"). אַלּוֹן the oak generally. אִמֵּץ "to make firm," "fix," in the sense of "choosing," comp. xli. 10; Ps. lxxx. 16, 18. אֹרֶן (with נ minusc.) also ἅπ. λεγ. It is strange that the planting of trees is said to be for the purpose of "felling cedars," and that then no cedars are named among the planted trees Hence one is tempted to conjecture that a ז was mistaken for ן finale minusc., and that it ought to read אֶרֶז. But in Assyrian "irini Labnâna" is the common designation for the Cedars of Lebanon. Along with that is found also for cedars irsi (SCHRADER, Keilinschr. u. d. A. T., p. 271 sq.), so that in both languages אֶרֶז and אֹרֶן have kindred meaning, and the conjecture of SCHRADER seems well-founded, that both expressions signify only different species of the genus Pinus (the cedar resembles our larch). Hence those are right who, following the LXX. and the VULG., prefer the meaning "pinus" to that of "ornus."

Ver. 15. According to what precedes, the notion "tree" in general is the subject of וְהָיָה.—נָשַׁק again only Ps. lxxviii. 21; Ezek. xxxix. 9.—סָגַד see List. לָמוֹ is used here as singular, as probably liii. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 2. Comp. EWALD, § 247, d.

Ver. 16. רָאִיתִי אוּר as videre mortem, Ps. lxxxix. 49; vitam, Eccl. ix. 9; somnum, Eccl. viii. 16; famem, Jer. v. 12, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The truth, already uttered in the foregoing strophe, that making a god is a senseless performance, is here put in the strongest light. The Prophet describes in a drastic manner what a monstrous contrast there is between the honor that men put upon the idol and the elements from which its originates. He first describes briefly the origin of a metal idol. It is the product of the combined labor of edge-tools, hot-coals, hammering and human sweat. Hard work that, and such as makes one hungry and thirsty. What sort of a god is that which must be fashioned with bitter sweat and from such difficult, coarse and hard material! What a contrast with the God who is spirit (ver. 12). More particularly he describes how a wooden idol comes into existence. The artist in wood has easier work. He stretches the line so as to have a stick of the desired size. Next, with red chalk, he draws the outline of the figure, which he then executes with his tool, giving it, with the aid of the circle, beauty of form. Thus the block, by the art of the master, takes an outward human form, as is proper in order to live in human society. But the block cannot be elevated beyond this. Inwardly it remains still a block. תִּפְאֶרֶת in parallelism with תַּבְנִית seems to me to involve a progress in thought: not merely according to the human copy generally, but he makes it according to what is splendor, glory of mankind, i. e., the work of art may even represent the human form quite in its lofty ideal, still it gives only the external outline. Evidently the Prophet, by חָרַשׁ עֵצִים meant, not a bungler, but a real artist (ver. 13).

But now the Prophet goes back to the origin of the stuff itself of which the wood-idol is made.

He describes how trees are planted so as to make a forest, how the rain gives them increase (ver. 14); then how such a tree is felled, in order to make a fire with part of it, for heating and cooking, and with another to make an idol (ver. 15). Thus, recapitulating, of the tree, one half of which is used for heating, and the other half for preparing food, what remains is made into an idol that is worshipped and is summoned for aid as the only refuge. One would suppose that if one half were used for warming and the other for cooking, there would be nothing left. But ver. 17 speaks of a remnant (שְׁאֵרִית). By this the Prophet would manifestly intimate that not even one of the two chief halves of the trunk is applied to making the idol, but only spare wood, say, the stump in the ground. [“This incongruity has no existence in the original: because, as all the other modern writers are agreed, the first and second חֶצְיוֹ of ver. 16 are one and the same half, and the other is not introduced till the next verse.”—J. A. A.] Earth-born block, watered by rain, essentially destined for heating and cooking, only formed into an idol image by the way—such things gods!

All the interpreters since Calvin quote the striking parallel from Horace (Sat. I. 8.):

Olim truncus eram ficulnus, inutile lignum,
Cum faber, incertus scamnum faceretne Priapum,
Maluit esse Deum.

2. CAUSE AND EFFECT OF IDOLATROUS NONSENSE.

Chapter XLIV. 18–20.

18 They have not known nor understood:
For he hath [1]shut their eyes, that they cannot see;
And their hearts, that they cannot understand.
19 And none [2]considereth in his heart,
Neither is there knowledge nor understanding to say,
I have burned part of it in the fire;
Yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof;
I [a]have roasted flesh, and eaten it:
And shall I make the residue thereof an abomination?
Shall I fall down to [3]the stock of a tree?
20 [b]He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside,
That he cannot deliver his soul, [c]nor say,
Is there not a lie in my right hand?

[1] Heb. daubed. [2] Heb. setteth to his heart. [3] Heb. that which comes of a tree.
[a] I will roast. [b] He who feeds. [c] as he says not.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18. It seems strange that טַח is pointed with Pattahh instead of Kamets. For no root טָחַח from which טַח might come is used; but from טוּחַ, which occurs often especially in Ezekiel, the third pers. perf. must sound טָח (comp. Lev. xiv. 42). The context gives no intimation of Jehovah being the author of the Πώρωσις (comp. Rom. ix.). Hence it seems to me that we may take טַח as a nominal form, which owing to the relation of the ע״ע and ע״ו, would then be pointed according to the type of derivatives from ע״ע, to distinguish it from the verbal form טָח. This might occur the more easily since the word does not stand in pause, but in the closest connection with the following word. The singular is to be explained from the neutral construction of the preceding predicate word.

Ver. 19. The expression הֵשִׁיב אֶל לֵב (retrovertere in pectus, viz., the thing objectively noticed, occurs on the ground of Deut. iv. 39; xxx. 1; 1 Kings viii. 47; Lam. iii. 21. It occurs again in Isa. xlvi. 8, where עַל for אֶל makes no difference in the meaning.——The substan-tives דַּעַת and תְּבוּנָה repeat in another form the verbs of the same root in ver. 18.——It need not occasion surprise that with אצלה the discourse suddenly makes a transition to the imperfect. For the saying of the idol-worshipper, which is introduced by לאמר falls in the moment where he warms himself and has baked bread. Now, he says, I will also roast meat and eat, and make the remnant of the wood into an idol.

Ver. 20. רָעָה "to pasture," then vesci, nutriri, with accusative of the thing, is used here as in the expressions רעה רוּחַ Hos. xii. 2; אֱמוּנָה Ps. xxxvii. 3; אִוֶּלֶת Prov. xv. 14, etc.——הוּתַל, relative clause; the word from תָּלַל, "vilem esse." Hiph. "ludificare, to mock."—The general meaning of the Vav. in ולא יאמר is specialised by the context in the sense of assigning a reason. So I feel obliged to explain it, because יַצִּיל can neither be taken de conatu (DELITZSCH), nor, (with HAHN) in the sense of "the soul-saving knowledge."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these verses the Prophet shows what is the cause and operation of that senseless idolatry. The cause is blindness and perversity of heart. The insane folly of what they do is not perceived by these men (ידע, בִּין="to have knowledge, penetration;" comp. ver. 9; xxxii. 4; xlv. 20; lvi. 10: moreover, the entire expression is from Ps. lxxxii. 4), for because their inward sense, the heart, is as if stuck together, as though smeared over with mortar and whitewash, so, too, the outward eye is stuck together, so that they cannot see. The stupidity is aggravated; hence the Prophet cannot find words severe enough for reproof. Hence in ver. 19 he begins anew to enumerate the bad products, after having, ver. 18, named the source of them.—תּוֹעֵבָה, abomination, is an expression that the Prophet takes out of his own heart and ascribes to the idolater. This happens also elsewhere in another fashion (comp. Exod. viii. 22; Deut. xxvii. 15, which perhaps was in the mind of the Prophet; Jer. xvi. 18; 2 Kings xxiii. 13, etc.).—בּוּל (only here in Isa.) according to its fundamental meaning is "manare, fluere, profluere," and according to the meanings that occur elsewhere (Job xl. 20, בּוּל הָרִים="products of the mountains;" 1 Kings vi. 38, "the rain-month Bul;" comp. מַבּוּל), is not a piece of a tree, but a product of a tree.—The conclusion is couched in an utterance that sounds like a judicial sentence. Ashes are the emblem of something that deceives; one thinks he is to eat and see something good, and behold it is ashes, Job xiii. 12. Therefore he that nourishes himself with ashes, a heart that is blind itself, has wrought misleadingly on his outward conduct. The second half of ver. 20 I regard with HITZIG as a conclusion, which names the effect of this insane idolatry. It is this: the man does not deliver his soul. He would save it did he awake in season to the conviction that a lie (so everything is called that belongs to idolatry) is in his hand (as a would-be staff).

4. JEHOVAH, THE CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH, CAN PROPHESY, AND HE PROPHESIES THE DELIVERANCE OF HIS PEOPLE BY KORES.

CHAPTER XLIV. 21–28.

21 Remember these, O Jacob and Israel;
[a]For thou art my servant:
I have formed thee; thou art my servant:
O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me.
22 I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions,
And, as a cloud, thy sins:
Return unto me; for I have redeemed thee.
23 Sing, O ye heavens; for the LORD hath done it:
Shout, ye lower parts of the earth:
Break forth into singing, ye mountains,
O forest, and every tree therein:
For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob,
And glorified himself in Israel.
24 Thus saith the LORD, thy redeemer,
And he that formed thee from the womb,
I am the LORD that maketh all things;
That stretcheth forth the heavens alone;
That spreadeth abroad the earth by myself;
25 That frustrateth the tokens of the liars,
And maketh diviners mad;

That turneth wise men backward,
And maketh their knowledge foolish;
26 That confirmeth the word of his servant,
And performeth the counsel of his messengers;
That saith to Jerusalem, [b]Thou shalt be inhabited;
And to the cities of Judah, [c]Ye shall be built,
And I will raise up[d] the [1]decayed places thereof:
27 That saith to the deep, Be dry,
And I will dry up thy rivers:
28 That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd,
And shall perform all my pleasure:
Even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built;
And to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid.

[1] Heb. waste places.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words used, especially: Ver. 23. פאר—גאל. Ver. 25. סכל comp. 2 Sam. xv. 21. Ver. 26. מְקִים. Ver. 27. צוּלָה; and also verse 21, Jacob and Israel. Ver. 26. Jerusalem and Judah in parallelism. Ver. 28. חֵפֶץ.

Ver. 21. After "Israel" supply, not זכר־אלה, but simply זְכֹר. The other would make flat tautology. Of course the thing to be remembered is as little different as are Jacob and Israel. But parallelism requires the object to be named each time in different words. And this condition is met when we supply זְכֹר after "Israel," and take כִּי as denoting the object, and not as causal.——לִי, instead of עַבְדִּי simply repeated, would doubtless indicate the servant-relation of Israel to be not a mere outward relation of possession, but one of ethical ownership.——I think that in תנשׁני the suffix has the meaning of לִי, as in עֲשִׂיתִנִי Ezek. xxix. 3, and as the suffix of the 2d per. in קְדַשְׁתִּיךָ lxv. 5 stands for לְךָ. It is true that Niphal in its reflexive meaning often implies an ideal transitive notion on which an object may depend (comp. the verbs נִבָּא, נִשְׁבַּע, נָסַב Judg. xix. 22, נִבְקַע Isa. lix. 5, נִלְחַם Ps. cix. 3, etc.) But with נָשָׁה this fundamental meaning is very doubtful, and moreover, whether it be removere or exarescere (comp. xli. 17; Jer. li. 30), one does not see how the Niphal may be taken in a reflexive sense so as to acquire a meaning analogous to the transitive Kal (comp. Jer. xxiii. 39; Lam. iii. 17). And it seems to me, too, that would the Prophet express a "forget-me-not," he would surely have used אַל rather than the strict, legal לֹא.

Ver. 24. K'thibh מִי אִתִּי is to be read מִי אִתִּי; and the LXX. and Vulg. have so read. K'ri has מֵאִתִּי, which is for sense about the same as מִמֶּנִּי—"out from me," "mea vi" (Targ. בְּגְבוּרְתִּי). מֵאֵת (comp. e. g, Ezek. xxxiii. 30; Josh. xi. 20) means the same as מֵעִם (e. g., viii. 18; Ps. cxxi. 2), but neither of these occur again in exactly the sense demanded here. Consider, moreover, that the abruptness of מִי אִתִּי were strange, and that an original מִי אִתִּי were much easier changed into מֵאִתִּי than vice versa, because the former is the more difficult reading, and it results that we must give the K'thibh the preference. It manifestly corresponds to the passage xl. 13: "Who hath directed (comprehended) the Spirit of the Lord, etc., with whom took he counsel, etc.?"

Vers. 26, 27. In this long sentence, אקומם and אוביש are the only verbs in which the Prophet returns from the participle to the principal form. As far as I know there is not another example of such an extended participial construction. The great animation of the Prophet renders this long-continued tension possible.

Ver. 28. As היכל is always construed elsewhere as masc., תוסד must be taken as 2d pers., unless one prefers to assume that the form תוסד is, as it were, attracted by תבנה, and that accordingly היכל as a quarter of the city is conceived of as fem. The latter is grammatically not impossible.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The cycle of prophecy which embraces chapters xl.–xlviii. has its culmination in this strophe, which represents about the middle. All that precedes points to this crowning summit which is concentrated in the mention of the name of "Kores" or Cyrus.* The strophe consists of a general and of a particular part. In the first we have a recapitulation in general of the foundations of Israel's deliverance, and heaven and earth are summoned to manifest their joy at that deliverance (vers. 21–23). In the second particular these foundations and guaranties of the deliverance are specified more exactly. At the same time it is to be remarked that this part forms a single period, which as by steps leads up to the crowning point, the name of Cyrus (vers. 24–28).

2. Remember these——in Israel—Vers. 21–23. These verses are closely connected with vers. 24–28. They are, so to speak, a prelude to them, an introduction that presents in nuce the fundamental thoughts. That the short section, vers. 24–28, should be so prefaced ought to occasion no surprise in view of its immense importance. For in it is to be accomplished the great transaction of the LORD by which He would show and demonstrate how He differs from idols, and that He alone has the power to deliver Israel out of the Exile, and thereby to stablish also the principle of the "everlasting deliverance" (תשועת עולמים), xlv. 17. That is nothing else than the mention of the name of Cyrus (see below). Remember these cannot possibly relate merely to what immediately precedes, in view of the contents of vers. 21–28. The Prophet, in what follows, recapitulates all the primary ideas of chapters xl.–xliv., therefore Israel is to remember just that, and, in fact, all that the Prophet now endeavors to call to mind. The servant of Jehovah is one of the chief notions in our section (xli. 8, 9; xlii. 1, 19; xliii. 10; xliv. 1, 2). Let Israel remember that it is the servant of God, and it will remember the pith and central point of all of which chapters xl. and xliv. discourse, and, in so far "for thou art my servant" is essentially identical with "these" (אֵלֶּה). The words I have formed thee, thou art my servant, are not only an emphatic repetition meant for confirmation, but also a proof of that fundamental idea. For Israel did not become the servant of Jehovah by accident, but by reason of a well-considered decree carried out in the most methodical manner. Comp. xliii. 1, 7, 10, 21; xliv. 2, and see Text. and Gram. Therefore Israel shall not be forgotten (xlix. 14 sq.) תנשני, "thou shalt be unforgotten to me," at the end of the verse, stands in intentional and artistic contrast with "Remember," with which the verse begins. At the same time it forms a fitting transition to what follows. See Text. and Gram.

Ver. 22 a. I have blotted out, etc., calls to mind a second foundation of Israel's promised salvation. It looks back to xliii. 25. While the cloud of Israel's guilt is still between them and the countenance of the LORD, Israel must still fear His wrath. But let it disappear and nothing remains to restrain the LORD's display of grace. Then he says: return unto me. This cannot mean the inward, moral return. For that is presupposed by the blotting out of sin. What the Prophet means is the return from the Exile to the place where the LORD has His fire and hearth (xxxi. 9). Thus Jeremiah also uses the word שׁוּב in a variety of senses. See remarks on Jer. xxxi. 21. For I have redeemed thee involves the idea: the purchase price for thee (comp. on xliii. 4), is paid, therefore thou art free and canst return home. Sing, O ye heavens, etc., ver. 23. The deliverance of Israel must interest the whole world, not only because all that the LORD does is important to all, but also because all must see in that the guaranty of their own salvation. Hence the heights and depths should burst forth in praise. The heavens represent the heights above the earth, the תחתיות (only here in Isa., comp. Ps. lxiii. 10; cxxxix. 15, etc.), are the depths of the earth in the broadest sense. Thus what is highest above man and lowest beneath him shall rejoice, and that in union with what is highest on the earth itself. These last are the mountains (xlix. 13); to which in the parallelism there is no antithesis because "the deeps of the earth" have for antithesis, not only the heavens, but also the mountains. Yet, in order to preserve the pairs of clauses, that is named that gives animation to the mountains and serves them instead of hands to clap with, viz., the trees (lv. 12). עָשָׂה (comp. x. 13; xli. 4) has as its ideal object what is held up to view in vers. 21, 22, or what is intimated by "I have redeemed thee." This appears additionally from: for the LORD hath redeemed Jacob: for these words stand parallel with: "for the LORD hath done," repeating and explaining the latter expression only in a different form. We had a similar declaration of praise, xlii. 10 sqq. (comp. xlix. 13), which, however, appealed to a more limited sphere. This call on heaven and earth (as i. 2) shows that we stand at a very important turning point. And glorified himself in Israel.—By redeeming Israel the LORD glorifies Himself. But whereas the redemption is set forth as an accomplished fact, the glorifying of Jehovah is something that lasts forever. Hence the perf. גאל, and the imperf. יתפאר.

3. Thus saith —— be laid.—Vers. 24–28. In reference to this verse DELITZSCH says: "the prophecy takes a new flight, becoming ever more distinctive." This is true, indeed; especially in relation to vers. 21–23. And yet also it only recapitulates the chief thoughts of chaps. xl.–liv. These it builds up step on step, which lead up to the apex on which the name of Cyrus shines out to us. The discourse begins with Jehovah's being Israel's Redeemer and Former (ver. 24), (comp. vers. 21, 22). For it treats of Israel's salvation, and what follows is to demonstrate that none but Israel's God can effect this, and that He will effect it. The first stone of this proof is laid by the LORD's declaring Himself to be the One who makes all, who spreads out the heavens alone, that extends the north without any one being there as a helper (מיאתי see Text. and Gram.). That stretcheth forth the heavens is a repetition from xl. 22; that spreadeth abroad the earth, is from xlii. 5. Thus the Prophet comprehends in brief what he had said in the course of the preceding chapters about God's creative omnipotence (xl. 12-14, 21–26; xli. 4; xlii. 5). In those representations he had brought out the nothingness of idols, in the strongest light of contrast (xl. 15–20; xli. 6, 7; xlii. 8, 17; xliv. 8–20). He had also represented Jehovah's omnipresence and omniscience and eternity, and in xli. 1–4 we have, as the first test of Jehovah's power to foretell the (relative) future, an obscure announcement of Cyrus, the name concealed, and of Israel's destined deliverance by him (xli. 8–20). The heathen idols were challenged to produce their prophecy, but are put to shame (xli. 21–29; xliii. 9–13; xliv. 6 sqq.). Opposed to this pitiable inability of the idols, the LORD prepares to announce something far more glorious, viz., a far more glorious Redeemer and Saviour in a yet more remote future. To all this, therefore, that the LORD from xl. on had said, especially of the ignorance of idols and their followers in regard to the future, our ver. 25 refers in brief recapitulation: "Who frustrateth the lying-signs, and makes the diviners fools," etc. Comp. xl. 17; xli. 21-24, 29; xlii. 17; xliv. 11. Our text serves to complete in one respect the passages cited. That the servers of idols, or heathen diviners had even made attempts to prophesy is not said in these passages, nor is it denied. Only their incapacity and coming to shame are spoken of. But in our passage it is presupposed that they have actually attempted to prophesy. Hence it reads מֵפֵר אֹתוֹת ׳. Heathen divination was in great part the interpretation of signs. These signs (auguria) are the אתות. But as אֹתוֹת בַּדִּים they are lying signs (comp. xvi. 6), which, therefore, as idle counsel (2 Sam. xv. 34), or as a broken covenant (such is the most frequent use of הֵפֵר, xxxiii. 8; Gen. xvii. 14; Exod. xxvi. 25, 44, etc.) come to nothing. The wizards (קֹסְמִים iii. 2) He makes appear fools (properly delusive glitter, Job xii. 17; Eccl. vii. 7); He repels the wise so that their counsel and work make no progress but go backwards (xlii. 17), and their prudence must prove to be folly (סִכֵּל comp. 2 Sam. xv. 31).

But how totally different is it with the prophecy proceeding from the omnipotent and omniscient God by His servants and messengers! "Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth (germinate) I tell you of them," xlii. 9. To these words and also xliii. 12 our passage corresponds. Yea, the LORD causes the word of his servant to receive continuance and reality (מֵקִים in this sense, only this once in Isa.; comp. Dt. ix. 5; 1 Sam. i. 23, etc.), and fulfills the counsel of his messengers, i. e., the counsel that He took and has announced by His messengers. According to the context a prophetic word is meant. Hence "servant" and "messengers" must be prophets. And it is, to me, quite probable that "servant" designates that prophet who first and chiefly, as the foundation and corner-stone of his successors, prophesied these things of the Exile; and that is Isaiah. עבד and מלאך are conjoined here as in chap. xlii. 19, though in another sense. That saith to Jerusalem, etc., ver. 26. Now is declared wherein this fulfilment of the word announced by the prophets shall consist. The LORD shall say to Jerusalem thou shalt be inhabited (v. 8), and to the cities of Judah ye shall be built, and her ruins I will raise. In reference to ver. 27 DELITZSCH says that primarily it points to the drying up of the Euphrates to the advantage of Cyrus (HEROD. I. 189), and only secondarily, "in the complex view of the Prophet, to the way in which the exit of the exiles was made possible out of the prison of the metropolis which was surrounded by a natural and artificial rampart of water." This relation I would reverse. As has been remarked, the Prophet has the contents of the preceding chapters in mind. Of these he makes prominent the main points to serve as the foundation of a prophetic transaction. Now heretofore there has been no mention of the conquest of Babylon. But the thought has been repeatedly uttered (xlii. 15; xliii. 2, 16) that water-deeps shall be no obstacle to the returning people, in saying which the Prophet has in mind the example of the Red Sea (xliii. 17). For this reason I believe that צוּלָה is not just alone "the deep" of the Euphrates, but any deep through which returning Israel will have to pass. But I will not deny that, in the complex way intimated, the word may be referred also to the Euphrates which Cyrus was to pass.

At ver. 28 we stand on the apex of the pyramid. The God who created the world, and who is first and last, therefore eternal, can prophesy also. What is nearest as well as what is most remote is equally present to Him. By this He is distinguished from idols that can create nothing and know nothing. Now let us consider that the Prophet on this account, from chap. xl. on, points unceasingly to this distinction between Jehovah and idols. What representation can one make to himself of the morality of a man who continually affirms: Jehovah alone is God because He alone foreknows the future, which He evinces by naming the name Cyrus,—but who by fraudulent conversion of a res acta as a res agenda abstracts the very ground under his feet in reference to his argumentation, in fact transforms it into a proof of the contrary. What a hypocrite he must have been, who, knowing well that no divine communication had been imparted to him, still gives out that he is a prophet, who therefore rests his proof for the existence of God on a fact which he well knows does not exist! Does the author of our chapter make the impression of such a hypocrite? No! what he says of the distinction between Jehovah and idols in regard to power and knowledge, is his full and inward convictions and what he says is just in order to establish this prophecy concerning Cyrus. In the name and by commission of his God he foretells this name, first in order that afterwards one may not give the honor to idols but to Jehovah (xlviii. 5), but furthermore in order that, when Cyrus comes, Israel may know that now the day of its deliverance dawns, and that Cyrus may be conscious of his divine destiny and willing to obey it.

"The native pronunciation of the name of Cyrus is K'ur'us" (SCHRADER, l. c. p. 214). According to SPIEGEL (Cyrus u. Kuru; Cambyses u. Kamboja, in KUHN u. SCHLEICHER'S Beitr z. vergl. Sprachforschung. I. 1858, p. 32 sqq.) the name was in ancient Persian pronounced Kuru. The same author with others says, the ancient opinion, that Κῦρος meant in Persian the sun (PLUT. Artax. 1), is incorrect. But the name Kuru coincides exactly with the river-name Cyrus, that is still called Kur, and with the ancient Indian royal name Kuru. STRABO'S remark (XV. 6), Cyrus was first called Agradates, and changed his name into that of the river, SPIEGEL regards as "a mere addition" of the geographer. On the other hand he is not disinclined to admit the change of name, but would refer it to a mythical Kuru of the Persians cognate with that of the Indians. The Hebrew pronunciation כּוֹרֶשׁ, Koresh, favors the inference that Kurus was pronounced as a paroxyton with a very short final syllable. This explains the Hebrew pronunciation as a Segholate form, and the consequent change of the vowel u into o in the first syllable (comp. EWALD, § 89 g). According to all historical witnesses Cyrus was an extraordinary appearance. He was solitary in his way (comp. Doctri- nal and Ethical on xlv. 1). Only once beside the present is there found in the Old Testament the special prediction of a name, viz., 1 Kings xiii. 2 comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 16. But 1 Kings xiii. is critically suspicious, partly because of its peculiar contents, partly because of the mention of the name "Samaria" v. 32 at a period when there was no Samaria (comp. BAEHR in loc.). And we do not need any parallel for the name of Cyrus. For the name stands solitary in history, and the previous announcement of it is not paltry prediction of something unimportant, but a prophetic act which for an extraordinary object makes use of extraordinary means. For it concerned transforming the head of the world-power into a friend of the Theocracy, and thus bringing about the great winter-solstice of the history of salvation. That the surest means of attaining this great object was the direct appeal to Cyrus with mention of his name, it seems to me, calls for no proof. Would Cyrus otherwise have begun his decree (Ezra i. 2) with the words: "The LORD God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and he hath charged me to build Him an house," etc.?

It is seen, from the foregoing, that I attach no value to the exegetical expedients, such as that "Kores" was a title of dignity like "Pharaoh" (HAEVERNICK, HENGSTENBERG), or that, in the appellative meaning "sun," it was a figurative designation (KEIL, Introd.), or that it is a gloss (HENNEBERG, SCHEGG.).

Jehovah calls Cyrus my shepherd, because Israel is His flock (Jer. xxiii. 1), and Cyrus for that time when no national ruler existed, is destined to pasture them.

The incomparableness of Jehovah is declared in opposition to all that beside Him is called god, whether the idols that are falsely co-ordinated with Him, or whether the angels which are indeed related to Him, but properly subordinated (בני אלהים Job. i. 6; בני אלים Ps. xxix. 1), or, finally, men also, who by unusual wisdom soar above their fellow-men and seem to approach the gods (Jer. x. 7). Even in forming and executing plans to oppose and resist Him, they can do nothing without His aid. He preserves them, clothes them; and the instruments which they use against Him are those which He has nurtured. On the rain of heaven; on the sunbeams and the dew; on the turning earth and on the elements which He has made, and which He controls, they are dependent; and they can do nothing in their wicked plans without abusing the bounties of His Providence, and the expressions of His tender mercies."—BARNES].

5. On xliv. 20. "The Holy Ghost says of idolatrous people who make an idol of wood which they worship, they feed themselves on ashes, because they trust and build on that which is as easily made ashes of as the chips that fall from wood. The case is not different with the wicked in general: they feed themselves with ashes, they comfort themselves with that which some heat or unforeseen fire speedily reduces to ashes, which are afterwards scattered by the wind." SCRIVER, Seelenschatz, IV. Th. 18, Predigt. § 35.

6. On xliv. 21. He, whose creature Israel is, and who therefore might order and demand, tenderly, begs like a lover: forget me not! "That ought to be the right forget me not, that we consider that we are in God's commission and His servants. And that in many ways: 1) for we are bought by Him; 2) He obtained us by a struggle in battle; 3) we have surrendered and covenanted ourselves to Him for service."—CRAMER.

7. On xliv. 22. "Israel has sins and great sins, which He likens to the clouds and the fog. How shall Israel be quit of them? As little as thou canst take captive a cloud in a bag, or spread out a cloth and take it away when it stands before the sun, so little canst thou lay off thy sin or do away with it. For all thou canst do, it remains and cleaves everlastingly to thee, so that thou canst not see life and the sun Christ. If the clouds and fog are to be removed, the glorious, beautiful sun must come. It devours fog and clouds that have taken possession of the heavens, so that no one knows where they have gone. Therefore, the LORD says, He alone it is who blots out our sins, and transgressions as the sun devours the clouds and fog."—VEIT DIETRICH.

8. On xliv. 28. JOSEPHUS (Antiqq. XI. 1, 1 and 2) writes that Cyrus made proclamation through all Asia. "'Επεί με ὁ θεὸσ ὁ μέγιστος τῆς οἰκουμένης ἀπέδειξε βασιλέα, πείθομαι τοῦτον εἶναι, ὃν τὸ τῶν 'Ισραηλιτῶν ἔθνος προσκυνεῖ. Καὶ γὰρ τοὐμόν προεῖπεν ὄνομα διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, καὶ ὅτι τὸν ναὸν αὐτοῦ οἰκοδομήσω ἐν 'Ιεροσολύμοις ἐν τῇ 'Ιουδαίᾳ χώρᾳ." What JOSEPHUS adds, that Cyrus knew this ἀναγιγνώσκων τὸ βιβλίον, ὃ τῆς αὐτοῦ προφητείας ὁ 'Ησαΐας κατέλιπε, and that then ταῦτ' ἀναγνόντα τὸν Κῦρον καὶ θαυμάσαντα τὸ θεῖον ὁρμή τις ἔλαβε καὶ φιλοτιμία ποιῆσαι τὰ γεγραμμένα,—has nothing at all improbable in it. Either the book of Isaiah existed in both parts already in the first year of Cyrus' reign; then it is altogether credible that he got a sight of it. The Jews had not only the strongest interest in bringing it to the king's notice, but it must also have been easy for them to find ways and means of doing so. Or the book of Isaiah at that time did not exist in its second part; then let it be explained how it came about, that Cyrus, immediately after the conquest of Babylon, had nothing that he was more in haste to do than to summon the Jews to return into their land, and to take measure for the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xliv. 6-8. This text may be used for a sermon on the being of God, directed against the modern heathenism. 1) God is a person (here as everywhere else in Scripture He speaks with "I" to our "I"). 2) God is alone and incomparable (ver. 6 b, and 7 a). 3) God is the omnipotent and omniscient (He sets up the nations of the world and announces what shall come). 4) God is therefore our only safe refuge (ver. 8).

2. On xliv. 21. "The call of Jesus from off His cross to His Christian people: Forget me not. This call we ought 1) to answer by sincerely humbling ourselves before the Lord on account of our forgetfulness; 2) to let serve as a summons to most intimate remembrance." CARL. FR. HARTMANUS, Passionspredigten, Heilbronn, 1872, p. 372.

3. [On xliv. 22. RETURNING TO GOD. I. The obstacle to return is sin and guilt. 1) "a thick cloud" between us and the sun; they interpose between God and us, and "suspend and intercept the correspondence between the upper and the lower world (sin separates, etc., lix. 2). They threaten a storm, a deluge of wrath, as thick clouds do, Ps. xi. 6." 2) "As a cloud" or fog they cause darkness all around us, and, worse still, within us (Matt. vi. 23), so that the benighted effort at return ends in bewilderment. II. God removes the obstacle. 1) Only He can do it, as only He can reach the high clouds. It must be done by influences from above the fog and the clouds, as the sun dispels both. 2) He removes it effectually: "blots them out;" not a speck of cloud in the sky, not a vapor even in the valley of death. Again "God looks down upon the soul with favor; the soul looks up to Him with pleasure, Jer. l. 20; 2 Sam. xxiii. 4." III. "For I have redeemed thee." The obstacle is not removed by a fiat, but by a redeeming work. The comparison of the cloud has one point, viz.: the utter disappearance. Redemption costs a Redeemer, Jno. iii. 16; Rom. viii. 32. See M. HENRY, GILL, J. A. A.—TR.].

4. On xliv. 23-28. The LORD His church's secure retreat. 1) As He prepares heaven and earth, so He does past, present and future; 2) He promises His church a future full of salvation (vers. 26, 28); 3) He will fulfil this promise and so confirm the word of His messengers, but the wisdom of the wise of this world He will put to shame (vers. 25, 26).

VI.—THE SIXTH DISCOURSE.

The Crowning Point of the Prophecy. Cyrus and the Effects of his Appearance.

CHAPTER XLV.

1. THE DEEDS OF CYRUS. THEIR REASON AND AIM.

CHAPTER XLV. 1-7.

1 THUS saith the LORD to his anointed,
To Cyrus, whose right hand I have [1]holden,
To subdue nations before him;
And I will loose the loins of kings,
To open before him the two leaved gates;
And the gates shall not be shut;
2 I will go before thee,
And make the [2]crooked places straight:
I will break in pieces the gates of brass,
And cut in sunder the bars of iron:
3 And I will give thee the treasures of darkness,
And hidden riches of secret places,
That thou mayest know that I, the LORD,
Which call thee by thy name,
Am the God of Israel.
4 For Jacob my servant's sake,
And Israel mine elect,
I have even called thee by thy name:
I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.
5 I am the LORD, and there is none else,
There is no God beside me:
I girded thee, though thou hast not known me:

6 That they may know from the rising of the sun,
And from the west, that there is none beside me.
I am the LORD, and there is none else.
7 [b]I form the light, and create darkness:
I make peace, and create evil:
I the LORD do all these things.

[1] Or, strengthened.

[a] uneven.

[b] Forming—creating—making peace—creating—making.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. רַד infin. for רֵד; only here in Isaiah; comp. Ps. cxliv. 2.——Regarding the structure of the sentence, notice that first the Prophet speaks, but immediately surrenders the word to the LORD; then both infinitive clauses לְרַד וגו׳ and לִפְתֹּחַ וגו׳ according to common usage change to the finite verb.

Ver. 2. אושר, Piel as xl. 3; xlv. 13; Prov. iii. 6; xi. 5; xxv. 21; the reading of K'thibh אוֹשֵׁר is suspected here, as in Ps. v. 9, because the Jod in all other forms of this verb, (comp. Prov. iv. 25 and the foregoing citations) is treated, not as quiescent, but as a strong consonant.

Ver. 3. אוצרות חשך and מטמני מסתרים are expressions that occur only here; see List.——In the last clause אני is subject, יהוה in apposition with it, הקורא בשמך is predicate and אלהי י׳ supplemental apposition with the subject. All emphasis here rests on הקורא בשמך.

Vers. 4, 5. The imperfects אֲכַנְּךָ and אֲאַזֶּרְךָ stand with a past sense, because the whole context, dominated by ואקרא, translates the reader into the past, or because the Vav. consec. in ואקרא also dominates the subordinate verbs.

Ver. 6. ממזרח וגו׳ is subject; the ה at the end of מערבה is suffix, comp. xxiii. 17, 18; xxxiv. 17, since occidens elsewhere is always מַעֲרָב.

Ver. 7. The participles יוצר, בורא, עשה, בורא stand in apposition with the subject of the foregoing clause.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. We are here pretty near the middle of the prophetic cycle, chapters xl.–xlviii. All that precedes was a gradual ascent to the culmination point, to which the name of Cyrus, xliv. 28, immediately leads over. On this elevated point the Prophet pauses in chap. xlv., in order to represent the deeds of Cyrus, the reason and aim of his calling, and in a comprehensive view to exhibit the effects of his appearance. He calls Cyrus the anointed of the LORD whom the LORD has grasped by the hand, and to whom He will bring in subjection nations and kings, Himself going before and removing all obstacles, and handing over to him all hidden treasures (vers. 1, 2). This the LORD prophesies and fulfils for a threefold reason: 1) That Cyrus himself may know Jehovah, that the God of Israel, who centuries before called him to be His instrument, mentioning his name, is the true God (ver. 3); 2) that Israel might be delivered by him (vers. 4, 5); 3) that all nations also might acknowledge Jehovah as the only God, Creator of light and darkness, good and evil (vers. 6, 7).

2. Thus saith——secret places.—Vers. 1–3 a. All that the Prophet from chap. xl. on has said concerning the infinite power, wisdom, and glory of Jehovah, and in contrast concerning the nothingness of idols, was intended to prepare for the great act that is accomplished by the mention of the name of Cyrus. And, when we recall the things there declared of Jehovah, shall not such an one be able to call Cyrus, as a particularly important and chosen instrument, centuries in advance, with the mention of his name? No one will deny that He can do this if He can do the other things the Prophet has affirmed of Him from chap. xl. on. Those who controvert the former because they also regard the other things affirmed as impossible, in other words: those who deny a personal, omniscient, and almighty God, must at least admit that the author of these discourses, whoever he may have been, believed in such a God. Therefore he represents his God as prophesying something great and quite extraordinary. Did he then write something not divinely prophesied, but something already happened ex eventu, would that not be a wicked sporting with the holy name of God? Is it not blasphemy? But does what we read in chapters xl.–lxvi. give the impression of having been the work of an impostor and blasphemer? If now the living, personal God could know the name of Cyrus centuries beforehand and put it on record, the only question is whether He can have willed to do this? Of this we will speak below in considering the three reasons the Prophet himself assigns for God's so willing (comp. the לְמַעַן thrice, vers. 3, 4, 6).

Cyrus is not called "Servant of Jehovah," although in a certain sense he was such. On the other hand Israel, both the nation in general and the spiritual Israel, is never called "Messiah," "anointed," whereas the Saviour of Israel is called both. From this I must infer that in "Servant of the LORD" there lies as much the idea of lowliness as there lies the idea of royal dignity and elevation in "anointed" or Messiah. Hence Israel is called only "servant of the LORD," Cyrus only "anointed," but the Redeemer bears both names, inasmuch as He was both the lowly servant and the anointed king. Moreover Cyrus is the sole heathen king whom the Scripture calls "anointed." We learn from this that the work of the Holy Spirit who gives the anointing, must in him have been, not merely indirect, but direct and especially intensive. The word משיח in fact occurs only here in Isaiah, and therefore only in reference to Cyrus. החזיק is used here as in xli. 9, 13; xlii. 6. Jehovah streugthens Cyrus by holding him by the right hand, and thereby he subdues the nations to him and thereby he looses the loins of kings. The latter expression is figurative. The girdle binds and holds the strength of the man (xi. 5; Prov. xxxi. 17). By removing the girdle the strength is weakened, and also the sword that hangs at the girdle is taken from the warrior. Moreover the expression "to open the loins" (comp. v. 27) is metonymic like פָּתַח אֲסִירִים (xiv. 17). If the strength of men is broken, they can neither hold the doors of their houses, nor hold the gates of their cities closed against the hero, although it is not to be denied that the unclosed gates may have also other reasons. [Are not gates closed and barred the girdles that bind the loins of kings?—TR.] J. DAV. MICHAELIS (Anmerk. f. Ungel, p. 235) calls attention to the fact that Cyrus actually found the gates leading out to the river from the shore unclosed, and HERODOTUS remarks that had not this been the case, the Babylonians could have caught the Persians as in a weir-basket (I., 191). Notice that the words from לרד to מלכים אפתח recall the first half of xli. 2 b. I will go before thee, so the LORD begins his direct address to Cyrus, that of ver. 1 being in the 3d pers. This is probably an allusion to that promise that Moses gives Joshua (Deut. xxxi. 8), "the LORD He it is that doth go before thee," and to Deborah's word to Barak, Judg. iv. 14. Certainly it is a great word that the LORD here speaks to Cyrus. By this He makes the cause of the latter His own. He will make level the loca tumida (הֲדוּר again only lxiii. 1, "the swelled up, proud, self-inflated"), i. e., the obstacles that pile up like mountains, and will break down all resistance, even of brazen doors and bars of iron. Here too J. D. MICH. calls attention to the fact that Babylon had a hundred brazen doors, but not in Isaiah's time. For Nebuchadnezzar was the first to fortify the city in this way (according to MEGASTHENES in EUSEBIUS, Praep. ev. IX., 41, comp. HEROD. I., 179). The second half of ver. 2 is reproduced in Ps. cvii. 16.

Ver. 3 a. The ancients give great accounts of the prodigious treasure that Cyrus obtained in Sardis and Babylon (HEROD. I. 84, 88 sq., 183; Cyrop. VII. 2, 5 sqq., 4, 12 sq., 5, 57; VIII. 2, 15; PLINY, Hist. nat., 33, 2 sq., 15). GESENIUS cites the Englishman BREREWOOD (in his book De ponderebus et mensuris, Cap. X.) as computing the sum of this gold and silver [taken from Crœsus of Sardis alone—TR.] at £126,224,000. And Babylon was celebrated above all cities in point of riches (comp. Jer. l. 37; li. 13; Βαβυλὼν ἡ πολύχρυσος (AESCH. Pers. 2), but Sardis as the πλουσιωτάτη τῶν ἐν τῇ 'Ασίᾳ μετὰ Βαβυλῶνα (Cyrop. VII. 2, 11).

3. That thou mayest know —— these things. Vers. 3 b–7. What we have read vers. 1–3 a is prophecy. The prophecy alone without fulfilment were empty talk. The fulfilment without the prophecy were a fact whose author could not be recognized. Only when the fact is previously announced by its author does it prove the author of the prophecy and fulfilment to be an omniscient and omnipotent being, and, accordingly, the true God. This chief aim is realized in a three-fold respect: 1) in reference to Cyrus, 2) to Israel, 3) to all nations. Hence למען follows thrice, introducing each time the statement of a purpose. First. We read ver. 3 b, that thou mayest know that I (am) the Lord which called thee by thy name, the God of Israel (see T. and Gr.). Therefore Jehovah had regard to Cyrus directly and personally. This man is so important to him that he makes a special arrangement for bringing him to the knowledge that the God of Israel is the true God. All the emphasis here is on "which call thee by thy name." Precisely this fact, that he found his name in such a remarkable connection with grand events, must have made the deepest impression on Cyrus. But the book containing this wonderful call to him must of necessity prove its antiquity. Cyrus would easily suspect deception, and would be aware of this being possibly a flattering imposture meant to purchase his favor for the Jews. The proofs of genuineness that he might demand could easily be presented, e. g. witnesses (comp. xliii. 9, 10; xliv. 8, 9), old men, not Jews, who fifty years and more before had read these prophecies in the books of the Jews. Cyrus then must regard it as a fact that the God of the Jews had him personally in view, and destined him to greatness, and had called him by name. Why may not divinity that knows all things, know also the names of all His creatures? Was that less possible than that Cyrus knew the names of all his soldiers (see RAMBACH in loc)? If the latter was a fact, then Cyrus knew by experience how valuable it is to a man, who fancies he is lost in the great mass, to be known by the one highest in authority, and to be called by name.

Second. Jehovah must be recognized by Cyrus as the true God in the interest of the people of Israel. For this distinction put on Cyrus of being named by God by all his names, name and surname, and that before he, Cyrus, could know anything of the LORD, this was to be for the special advantage of that people whom Jehovah here calls His servant and His elect (see on xlii. 1). The construction וָאֶקְרָא is like וַיִּקַּח, xliv. 14, which see. קרא בשם and כנה are conjoined as in xliv. 5. If שֵׁם is the principal name, and כנה denotes an attributive, additional name, then may likely be meant the honorable predicates רֹעֶה and מָשִׁיחַ that are given to Cyrus, xliv. 28; xlv. 1.—לא ידעתני, which recurs vers. 4, 5, like a refrain, stands, in a certain sense, in antithesis with למען תדע, ver. 3. The LORD knew and named Cyrus before Cyrus knew the LORD (or even could know, Jer. i. 5) in order that Cyrus might learn to know the LORD. The chief object, which dominates the subordinate aims, appears in ver. 5. He who called Cyrus is with emphasis called Jehovah, the only true God. This is so done that אני יהוה is put as in apposition with the subject of ואקרא and אכנך of ver. 4. This אני יהוה stands parallel with the same words vers. 3, 6, so that thus the assignment of the chief object recurs with each assignment of the subordinate object. In ver. 5 יהוה and אלהים correspond in the parallelism; the former manifestly making prominent its appellative meaning: I the absolutely Existent (in the sense of Exod. iii. 14).—I girded thee is in antithesis with the ungirding of kings, ver. 1. Moreover, the Prophet had evidently in mind the passage, Hos. xiii. 4. The third subordinate aim is (vers. 6 and 7) that all nations may know Jehovah as the only true God. Here, too, as already remarked, the chief object is made prominent in I am the LORD in both verses. East and west, i. e. all nations of the entire earth shall know the LORD. From this we see that Cyrus is conceived of as the medium of a world-historical progress of the true knowledge of God that shall be coincident with the rehabilitation of the Theocracy. The book of Daniel gives evidence of revelations of God that had the same object. As the appearance of Christ did not effect the entire disappearance of heathenism, just as little and even much less could those manifestations of the true God in the centres of heathenism produce any enduring effect. But they could operate inwardly and secretly, and prepare for the appearance of the Saviour of the world. The appearance of the Magi (Matth. ii.) is a proof of this.

Most expositors admit that this strong emphasizing of monotheism has relation to the Persian dualism. Would the LORD bring Cyrus to a correct knowledge of him as the only true God, it could not be without pointing to the fundamental error of the Persian view of the world. If hence one would admit that Cyrus regarded the God of Israel as identical with his own chief divinity, and recognized in the name Jehovah only another word, and that a kindred one in sense, for Ahura-masda (comp. FR. W. SCHULTZ on Ezra i. 2), and generally looked on the worship of the Israelites, with its absence of images, as being like that of the Persians, still one must beware of supposing that the Prophet of Jehovah would awake in the mind of Cyrus the view that Jehovah was the same as Ahura-masda. Our passage shows plainly that to Cyrus it would be said, Jehovah stands high above Ahura-masda. The latter was only creator of light. But Jehovah says of Himself here: I form the light, and create darkness. That primarily light and darkness in a physical sense are meant, appears from what follows. For it is more natural to think that peace and evil say something additional, than that they merely explain "light" and "darkness" (ix. 1). The latter moreover would not suit because "light" and "darkness" as designations of light-substance, are per se much more comprehensive notions than "peace" and "evil," and it cannot be meant that the LORD creates light and darkness only in the sense of salvation and evil. On the other hand, from the fact that He does not say טוב and רַע, but שלום and רָע, it is seen that nothing is meant to be affirmed concerning the origin of moral evil. The LORD would evidently present Himself, not as the absolute author of evil and good, but as the Judge of them, who prepares salvation for the pious, and destruction for the bad. To conclude, the Prophet once more emphasizes the fundamental thought of his discourse, with the words: I the LORD do all these things.

2. THE FUTURE SALVATION FOUNDED THROUGH CYRUS IN CONTRAST WITH THE FAINT-HEARTEDNESS OF ISRAEL.

CHAPTER XLV. 8–13.

8 Drop down, ye heavens, from above,
And let the skies pour down righteousness:
Let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation,
And let righteousness spring up together;
I the LORD have created it.
9 Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker!
[a]Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth.
Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou?
Or thy work, He hath no hands?
10 Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou?
Or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?
11 Thus saith the LORD,
The Holy One of Israel, and his Maker,
Ask me of things to come [b]concerning my sons,
And concerning the work of my hands command ye me.
12 I have made the earth,
And created man upon it:
I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens,

And all their host have I commanded.
13 I have raised him up in righteousness,
And I will [1] [c]direct all his ways:
He shall build my city, and he shall let go my captives,
Not for price nor reward,
Saith the Lord of hosts.

[1] Or, make straight.

[a] A potsherd among the. [b] put; after come. [c] level.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 8. ישע—פרה. Ver. 11. יוצר—קדוש ישראל.

Ver. 8. The subject of יפרו is neither the ישע taken collectively (Gesen., Ewald, Knobel, et al.), nor ישע, together with the following צדקה (Hitzig, Delitzsch), but the before-named heaven and earth. The heaven is treated as the masculine fructifying potency and the earth as the one conceiving and bearing.——פרה does not mean provenire, but proferre (comp. φέρω, fero, baren, baeren, to bear).——הצמיח, it is true, is elsewhere used either of God (Gen. ii. 9; Ps. civ. 14, etc.), or of the earth (Gen. iii. 18, etc.). But it is grammatically possible to use it in the sense of "to make צמח, to germinate, to sprout," and therefore to apply it to the sprouting plant itself (in a causative sense). The ancient versions, too, understood it so, if perhaps תצמח did not actually stand in the original text; thus the LXX. ἀνατειλάτω δικαιοσύνη (or δικαιοσύνην); Vulg. justitia oriatur; Syr. egerminet; Targ. revdetur; Ar. crescat. The meaning is similar to that in Ps. lxxxv. 12. אמת מארץ תצמח וצדק משמים נשקף.

Ver. 9. Repeat היאמר before פעלך.

Ver. 10. תחילין the sole example in Isaiah of the archaic feminine ending ין: comp. Olshausen, § 262, e, Anm.; § 244, e.

Ver. 11. שאלוני is imperative; comp. Ps. cxxxvii. 3, where the perfect form שאלונו is used. The context altogether demands this.——Just so תצוני must be taken as imperative.——צוה with accusative of the person and על of the object occurs x. 6; 2 Sam. vii. 11; 1 Chron. xxii. 12; Neh. vii. 2, etc. Comp. the somewhat extended construction 1 Sam. xiii. 14; xxv. 30; 2 Sam. vi. 21.

Ver. 12. In אני ידי the personal pronoun is to be regarded as strengthening the suffix. For according to Ezek. xxxiii. 17 it is possible for the pron. separatum that intensifies the suffix to be put before.——צוה stands partly with double accusative, partly with the accusative of the person and a preposition or an infinitive following (Gen. l. 2) or לאמר. But when it stands with the simple accusative, with no mention of what is commanded, it means "to appoint, to order, to commission," and is used both of persons and of things. Thus it could be said here כל צבאם צויתי, whether one thinks of the צבא of heaven personally (comp. xxiv. 21) or impersonally (xlviii. 5).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. With the mention of the name of Cyrus and the description of his doings the Prophet has attained the culmination of his prophetic cycle. He pauses now a while on this elevation, first to sum up the future that is to follow the appearance of Cyrus in a word of prophecy that presents a glorious Messianic prospect (ver. 8); but he contrasts with this Israel's faint-hearted unbelief, that despairingly wrangles with the Creator (vers. 9, 10). Opposed to this unbelief the Lord admonishes them to inquire of Him respecting the future, and to commend to Him the care of His people (ver. 11), urging this not with new grounds of comfort, but only repeating emphatically the old, viz.: that He who can make heaven and earth (ver. 12) has also raised up Cyrus to build His city and release His prisoners without receiving an outward reward (ver. 13).

2. Drop down —— created it.—Ver. 8. These words characterize in general the consequences that will follow the appearance of Cyrus on the theatre of the world's history. It is Messianic salvation that he will bring. It was not in vain that ver. 1 He was called Messiah. He is such really, though only in a lower, typical degree. If the Exile is the (relatively) lowest point of Israel's humiliation, then deliverance out of Exile is the beginning of their salvation. And even if later the way of salvation still sinks down low, even below the level of the Babylonian exile, still on the whole it ascends. By the will and power of God, Cyrus is the pole on which this turning to salvation rests, and is accomplished. With one look the Prophet (ver. 8) surveys the entire future and observes, as the pith of it, an all-comprehending salvation, that involves also the regeneration of nature. For blessing is not to bloom only in single places of the earth, but all heaven is to influence fruitfully the whole earth, so that, therefore, all nature will, as it were, become a single field bearing the fruit of salvation. Under the figure of rain is represented, in oriental fashion, the fructifying influence of the heaven on the earth (comp. Deut. xxxii. 2). According to the laws of parallelism, that which operates from above is expressed by two notions—heaven and clouds. These two notions are not co-ordinated, but subordinated. For precisely by the clouds does heaven pour out its fructifying moisture. In the second clause, as often, there is a change in the person. Although in consequence of this, each of the two clauses stands independent, thus the construction does not point to a common object, still right eousness must be regarded as that which drops or drizzles down from above, especially as clouds is but a nearer definition of "heavens." But by "righteousness" is not at all to be understood the fruits of blessing that appear on earth, but much rather the pure, spiritual, heavenly life-potencies that have their foundation in the holy being of God, and hence may be called "righteousness." The earth, moistened and fecundated shall open up (causative Kal = to make an opening, viz.: for the germs awakened by fecundation, comp. Ps. cvi. 17). Therefore heaven and earth are in common to bring forth salvation, i. e., good in the objective sense, and "righteousness," i. e., subjective being good, moral salvation (compare the relationship of Heil and heilig) shall germinate. (See Text. and Gram.). The prospects opened up by the Prophet are as sure and reliable as they are glorious, as is intimated by I the LORD have created it.

3. Woe unto him——brought forth.—Vers. 9, 10.—The Prophet knows that this great salvation must develop slowly and with great alternations, and that hence many, in the moments of apparent standing still or even of retrogression, will become faint-hearted. Elsewhere also he reproves this despondency: xl. 27; li. 12 sq. The whole book of the chapters xl.–lxvi. is a book of consolation. Hence it begins xl. 1 with the double "comfort ye." But the Prophet knows the human heart too well not to know, that among those for whom this book of consolation is written, there are many who will be content neither with the quality nor quantity of the comfort that is offered, and who strive with their Maker as if no comfort were there. Against these he justly utters a woe, for nothing offends God so much as unbelief. Thus there is an incisive contrast between ver. 8 and ver. 9 sqq. In ver. 8 we see the future beaming in clear light. But this clear light exists not for those who, when things are not as they wish, immediately despair, because they see no human help, and will not see the divine help. Yet what is man in comparison with God? Nothing more than an image of clay in comparison with the potter (יֹצֵר comp. Jer. xviii. 1–5; xix. 1 sqq.). This comparison is all the more fitting in view of Gen. ii. 7, where man has just this resemblance. He is a חֶרֶשׂ אֲדָמָה "potsherd of earth," and in fact this is the original and foundation stuff common to all men, and not of some specially weak one. In the weakness of others, each should become thoroughly conscious of his own weakness. Thus it is an aggravating circumstance in him who would strive with God that he is a potsherd among potsherds (comp. כָּאָדָם xliv. 11), and not an isolated sherd. An isolated case might more easily be excused for self-deception. And if man is a potsherd and God his Maker, then he may as little strive with God as the clay, could it speak, may say to the potter what makest thou (i. e., thou makest not the right thing; thou misshapest me), or as any work which thou, O man, formest, may say: he hath no hands, i. e., no power or capacity to form. This clause generalizes the thought by extending it to any human work. The suffix ךָ assumes that God would involve him who would strive with Him in an absurdity by a demonstratio ad hominem: will then thy work, whatever it may be, say to thee whoever thou mayest be: he can do nothing? ידים "hands" by metonymy for that to which the hand is applied, viz., the exercise of power and skill (comp. xxviii. 2: Ps. lxxvi. 6; also the analogous use in passages like Josh. viii. 20, and of זְרוֹעַ comp. xlviii. 14). The expression seems to be of a proverbial nature. Delitzsch cites the Arabian lâ jadai lahu, it is not in his power. Paul makes a well known use of this passage Rom. ix. 20 sq. Comp. Wisd. xv. 7 sq.

Ver. 10. The Prophet, by another comparison, expresses the disconsolate murmuring of the desponding creature, which, like ver. 9, also consists of two members. It happens (comp. Job iii. 1 sqq.; x. 18 sq.; Jer. xx. 14 sqq.) that one oppressed by sufferings wishes he had never been born. This is also the idea of ver. 10, only modified so that to the despairing one is imputed a complaint against his parents that they have begotten him.

4. Thus saith the Lord——of hosts.—Vers. 11–13. To this sinful, blasphemous conduct the Prophet now opposes what the true Israelite ought to do in times of the Theocracy's apparent ruin: he ought to inquire of the Lord and commend to the Lord the destiny of his people. Yet the Lord will and cannot help this unbelief by new and would-be better grounds of comfort. He can only repeat the old, viz., that he who made the world has now in the person of Cyrus irrevocably appointed the instrument of the deliverance. The Holy One of Israel and his Maker.—So the Lord is named ver. 11 in a way well befitting the context. For it becomes His holiness to keep His word, and His character as Maker to remain consistent and not suffer His work to come to disgrace. Beside the expression יוצר, "former," "Maker" is occasioned by the comparison of ver. 9. This holy God and Almighty Creator therefore commands the Israelite who is in deepest distress to turn to him in respect to the dark future, and to inquire of him.—For such was of old His will (Exod. xxxiii. 7; Num. xxvii. 21; 2 Kings i. 6, 16), and also the custom and practice in Israel (Josh. ix. 14; Judg. i. 1; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 15, etc.). Even this may be done in a very improper way, lviii. 2.—אתיות, comp. xli. 23; xliv. 7. Concerning my children and the work of my hands (allusion to יוצרו) command ME (see Text. and Gram.). The commission, the office of caring for Israel they should give to the Lord.

Ver. 12. That in these hands Israel will be well secured must appear from the fact that these same hands prepared heaven and earth. Thus here also, as constantly before and after (xl. 12. 21, 28; xlii. 5; xliv. 24; xlv. 18; xlviii. 13; li. 13) the Lord proves His ability to accomplish deliverance by a reference to His character as Creator. Doubtless in My hands there is an allusion to ver. 9 b (see Text. and Gram.). There it is assumed that no human workmanship can say of him that formed it: he has no hands. In allusion to this, the Lord calls Israel here (ver.

11) the work of His hands. It is impossible that it can mean: I, i. e., not My feet, mouth or other organ, but My hands have spread out the heavens; but He would say: not the hands of another, but My hands have done this (אני ידי and צִוֵּיתִי, see Text. and Gram.).

The almighty Creator is also the almighty Redeemer. And He is such through Cyrus, the raising up of whom (xli. 2, 25) even now to Him stands as an accomplished fact. All faint-heartedness that comes from, any sinking of Israel in the world-power, whether apprehended or experienced, the Prophet represses by the announcement that the LORD has raised up a deliverer in righteousness (comp. on xlii. 6). Because this one shall realize all God's intentions, the LORD, too, will make level all his ways (ver. 2). And so he will rebuild the holy city (xliv. 26, 28) and let the prisoners go (lii. 3). He will do so not for price or any outward advantage. In fact one cannot see what motive of policy, or of national economy or worldly motive of any kind could have determined Cyrus to restore the Israelitish nation and its religious worship. It has been said that he would make room for other exiles. But then why did he not send the latter to Judea? And why did he make the return of the Jews optional? This last consideration shows that he had no interest to promote by it. Indeed this restoration may be pronounced a political mistake. There was some truth in the reproach that Jerusalem was "a rebellious city and hurtful unto kings and provinces—of old time" (Ezra. iv. 15). For the world-power must ever feel that the kingdom of God in the midst of it is a disturbing and hurtful element. Add to this the surrender of the holy vessels (Ezra i. 7 sqq.), and the requisition to help the Jews "with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts" (Ezra i. 4), and one must confess that the conduct of Cyrus was very surprising and inexplicable by natural causes. This sort of sending away reminds one very much of that from Egypt (Exod. xii. 31 sqq.). In both cases the letting go free was not man's work, but God's work.

3. THE SOUTHERN WORLD-POWER IS ALSO CONVERTED TO JEHOVAH.

CHAPTER XLV. 14–17.

14 Thus saith the LORD,
The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia
And of the Sabeans, men of stature,
Shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine:
They shall come after thee; in chains they shall come over,
And they shall fall down unto thee, they shall make supplication unto thee,
Saying, Surely God is in thee; and there is none else,
There is no God.
15 Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself,
O God of Israel, the Saviour,
16 They [a]shall be ashamed, and also confounded, all of them:
[b]They shall go to confusion together
That are makers of idols.
17 But Israel shall be saved in the LORD with an everlasting salvation:
Ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end.

[a] are. [b] They go.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet having discharged the painful duty of reproving Israel's pusillanimity (vers. 8, 13), now turns to the pleasant task of showing what will be the effect of the salvation instituted in the northern world-power on the world-power lying south of Palestine. The holy nation lay in the middle between these two world-powers. Again and again it had suffered from the friendship and the enmity of both. It had oscillated back and forth between them both, seeking support against the enmity of the one in the friendship of the other. Both, too, had contended with each other for Palestine, and more or less made Palestine their battle-field. Recall Tirhaka and Sennacherib, Pharaoh Necho and Nebuchadnezzar. Now Israel is in bondage to Babylon as it was in its youth to Egypt. But it is to be delivered from the Babylonian bondage by Cyrus. Will it also thereby be delivered from the assaults of the sinful world-power? Already in xliii. 3 the Prophet presented the prospect of the northern world-power being in a certain sense indemnified by the surrender of the southern for mildness displayed towards Israel. And in reality Egypt became a prey to Cambyses. But the Prophet sees still more. He sees Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba not merely in chains, but turning in their chains to Israel to worship the God of Israel (ver. 14). They [but see below, TR.] recognize Him as the true God, who had hitherto remained hidden (ver. 15). They recognize that idolatry was a false way, and that all idol-makers have come to shame (ver. 16), whereas Israel may confidently expect through Jehovah everlasting salvation and honor (ver. 17). From this it appears that the Prophet makes the southern world-power join together with Israel in honoring Jehovah, and hence also with the northern world-power, just as happens in xix. 23 sqq. If the South and the North, united by Israel, have become brothers, then the chains fall of themselves.

2. Thus saith——in chains shall they come over.—Ver. 14 a. To understand this passage we must take Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, not as representing the heathen world in general [Barnes, J. A. Alex., Delitzsch and others, Tr.], but as representing specially the southern world-power that was the rival of the northern. For why should just the nations about the Nile represent the heathen world? The general heathen world has its turn, ver. 22. The present text deals with an eminently important centre of the heathen world, viz., with that which corresponds to what in the south is now friendly to Israel. In xliii. 3 the subjection of those nations of the Nile to Cyrus is announced. Hence they appear here as bearing chains. But the dominion of the messiah Cyrus is to be one of universal peace and blessing (ver. 8). In a prophetic sense, i. e., potentially it shall be such, in consequence of the influence that the world-power itself will experience from the spirit of the kingdom of God in the person of Cyrus. Hence the Prophet sees here in the subjugation of those nations of the Nile also the bridge to their conversion. They are the same thoughts that we find above, chap. xix., from ver. 19 on. There it is said, ver. 23, that Egypt shall serve Assyria. But Assyria denotes the northern world-power, which was then represented by Assyria, was later represented by Babylon, and then by Cyrus. But Egypt will also worship Jehovah. The Prophet only indicates in general how this will come about. We see in both passages that Israel is the medium. From our passage, in connection with xliii. 3, we learn that, proceeding from Israel, first Cyrus comes to the knowledge of Jehovah, then from Cyrus (whether directly or indirectly does not appear) Egypt, so that these three, Israel in the middle, on the left the north (Assyria), on the right the south (Egypt), shall be as a glorious tritone and a blessing to the whole earth (xix. 24, 25). As in general, taking spoil and receiving tribute are signs and fruits of victory, so in many places the Messiah or His types are represented as those to whom nations, hitherto hostile but now converted, bring their treasures or tribute (comp. Ps. xlv. 13; lxviii. 30, 32; lxxii. 10, 15; Isa. lx. 6; Matth. ii. 11). Thus it is said here that Egypt's acquisitions of labor (יְגִיעַ, "labor," metonym. for what is acquired; again only lv. 2), and Ethiopia's and Seba's acquisitions of commerce (סָחָר, "mercatura," also metonym., comp. xxiii. 3), shall come to Israel. The Egyptians were originally strictly exclusive, hence from the first not a commercial people, but they had branches of industry, xix. 9. Ethiopia was of old famed for great riches, comp. Herod. III., 17 sqq., and Gesen. in loc. On Seba see xliii. 3. There is no ground for separating Ethiopia and the Sabeans, and connecting "merchandize" only with the former. For 1) it is grammatically allowable to subordinate one word in the construct state to several words (Gen. xiv. 19; Ps. cxv. 15; 2 Chron. ii. 7, etc.); 2) Ethiopia and Seba are the same people, both may equally be called "men of stature;" 3) the plural יַעֲבֹרוּ does not conflict, because in compound subjects the predicate is very often ruled, not by the grammatical subject, but by the primary logical idea (comp. ii. 11 with v. 15; Gen. iv. 10; Jer. ii. 34, etc.). Thus here, as undoubtedly appears from what follows, the chief matter with the Prophet is the passing over of the men, not of their treasures. Hence he says יַעֲבֹרוּ and hence he expresses still this thought by three verbs following. Concerning men of stature, comp. on xviii. 2. Herod. III. 20: "The Ethiopians are said to be the tallest and finest-looking of all men." Solin., cap. 30: Aethiopes duodecim pedes longi (Gesen.). The Egyptians and Ethiopians will, indeed, still come in chains. They are conquered, but precisely by their defeat they have learned to know the nothingness of their idols (ver. 16), and the divinity of Jehovah. But by their confession (vers. 14 b–17) they acquire a claim to release from the chains.

3. And they shall fall——without end. Vers. 14 b—17. "And they shall fall," etc., does not say that they shall worship Israel, but that they shall worship in the direction of the land of Israel, for they know the Temple and the throne of the true God to be there (comp. Dan. vi. 10). In what follows we learn the contents of their prayer. The three brief but weighty words אַךְ בָּךְ אֵל, "surely God is in thee, form the fundamental thought. It is understood of course that "in thee" refers to the same person as the feminine suffixes in עָלַיִךְ and אֵלַיִךְ, viz.: to Israel or Zion. The knowledge that the right God is in Zion (Ps. lxxxiv. 8) is herewith expressed positively. 1 Cor. xiv. 25, is a quotation of our text. The same is expressed negatively and there is none else, there is no God. But this last thought must be made very emphatic. Hence אֶפֶס is added to strengthen וְאֵין עוֹד, of which the present is the only instance. If אפס (comp. אָפֵס xvi. 4; xxix. 20 and אַפְסֵי אָרֶץ ver. 22, etc.), means cessatio, finis, then, beside other modifications of this meaning, it can be construed, as acc. localis, and may also have the sense of in fine. But then it says (comp. on xlvii. 8, 10): "That not at that (unthinkable) point where God ceases, does another appear." In other words: אֶפֶס involves, indeed, the sense of praeter, praeterea. Therefore one does not need to take אפס אלהים as a genitive relation; but construe: "and there is not still in fine or in loco cessandi (viz.: of the before mentioned אֵל) a God."

In ver. 15 the heathen address the God of Israel directly. ["It is far more natural to take the verse as an apostrophe, expressive of the Prophet's own strong feelings in contrasting what God had done and would yet do, the darkness of the present and the brightness of the future. If these things are to be hereafter, then O Thou Saviour of Thy people, Thou art indeed a God that hides Himself, that is to say, conceals His purposes of mercy under the darkness of His present dispensations."—J. A. Alex. So, too, Barnes, and Delitzsch. The latter says "The exclamation in Rom. xi. 33, 'O the depth of the riches,' etc., is a similar one."—Tr.]. They now pray to Him themselves as was intimated by ישתחוו and יתפללו. First of all they utter the conviction that Jehovah is a God who hides Himself (comp. xxix. 14; 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1), i. e., a God who has hitherto been hidden from them. [The LXX. favors this interpretation. It reads: "for thou art God, though we did not know it, O God of Israel the Saviour."—Tr.]. In that lies a trace of the knowledge never quite extinguished among the heathen, that beyond and above the multitude of gods representing the forces of nature, there is a highest Being ruling over all. The language recalls, at least as to sense, the ϑεὸς ἄγνωστος of the Athenians, Acts xvii. 23. It seems to me, therefore, that the designation of God as מסתתר suits much better in the mouth of the heathen than of Israel. אָכֵן see List. This hitherto concealed God is identical with the God of Israel (thus for the latter no concealed God), and also a "saving" God, i. e., that is willing to help and can help and actually does help. In verse 15 אַתָּה is subject, אל מסתתר predicate, אלהי ישׂראל apposition with the subject, and מושיע as second predicate put after in the form of an apposition. In מושיע (see List) there lies also an antithesis to the heathen idols and in so far a transition to ver. 16.

The necessary reverse side of the correct knowledge of God is to know the false gods as such. Ver. 16 expresses this knowledge by emphasizing that they come to confusion. The gods of Egypt could not help Egypt; for Egypt succumbed to that power that opposed it by the commission and power of the God of Israel. They are ashamed and also confounded, see ver. 17; xli. 11 and the borrowed passages Jer. xxxi. 19; Ezra ix. 6. The expression they go to confusion (which equally affirms their going into disgrace, and going about in disgrace) occurs only here. צִיר (from צָר = יָצַר), "the image," occurs in this sense only here, and Ps. xlix. 15. The Lord having been called "Saviour" in ver. 15, and ver. 16 having said that idols are not this, it is now said, ver. 17, of Israel that Jehovah has showed Himself such a Saviour and how He has done so. For Israel is saved in the LORD with an everlasting salvation (acc. modalis; Heb. ix. 12). Finally the speakers turn their discourse to Israel as in the beginning of it ("surely God is in thee"). These shall not experience what the others have with their idols: Ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end. The plural עולמים occurs xxvi. 4; li. 9, and excepting Ps. lxxvii. 6, only in later writings. The expression עד עולמי עד occurs only here. Shall those who have learned so to speak be still kept in chains by Israel?

4. AFTER THE WORLD-POWERS, ISRAEL, TOO, FINALLY RENOUNCES IDOLS AND GIVES ITSELF WHOLLY TO ITS GOD, SO THAT NOW ALL HUMANKIND HAS BECOME A SPIRITUAL ISRAEL.

Chapter XLV. 18–25.

18 For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens;
[a]God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it,
He created it not [b]in vain, he formed it to be inhabited;
I am the Lord; and there is none else.
19 I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth:
I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain:
I the Lord speak righteousness, I declare things that are right.
20 Assemble yourselves and come;
Draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations:
They have no knowledge that [c]set up the wood of their graven image,
And pray unto a god that cannot save.
21 Tell ye, and bring them near;
Yea, let them take counsel together:
Who hath declared this from ancient time?
Who hath told it from that time?
Have not I the Lord? and there is no God else beside me;
A just God and a Saviour; there is none beside me.
22 [d]Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth:
For I am God, and there is none else.

23 I have sworn by myself,
The word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness,
And shall not return,
That unto me every knee shall bow,
Every tongue shall swear.
24 [1] [e]Surely, shall one say,
In the LORD have I [2]righteousness and strength:
Even to him shall men come;
And all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed.
25 In the LORD shall all the seed of Israel be justified,
And shall glory

[1] Or, Surely he shall say of me, In the LORD is all righteouness and strength [2] Heb. righteousnesses.

[a] He is God—who formed the earth and made it—he ordered it. [b] to be empty. [c] carry.
[d] Turn. [e] Only.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for recurrence of the words used, particularly: Ver. 20. נָגַשׁ Hithp.—פֶּסֶל—פָּלַל Hithp. see ver. 14.

Ver. 23. צדקה דבר may not be construed as one notion ("word of truth"), for then it must read דְּבַר צ׳. Nor may one take צדקה as nominative in an attributive sense ("as righteousness, a word") connecting it with דָּבָר, for that would be a contorted, unnatural expression. "Out of the mouth of righteousness" [J. A. ALEX., DEL.], is indeed grammatically correct, but this personifying of righteousness and this distinction of it as a speaking person from Jehovah Himself were something very peculiar. For are not the one swearing and the one speaking this word that cannot be frustrated one and the same? We must construe פִּי parallel with בִּי and נִשְׁבַּעְתִּי as a noun with the suffix of the first person. But then צדקה must be taken as accusative. It is the accusat. adverbialis, that stands for the substantive with a preposition and expresses the modality, of whatever sort it may be. Thus, as is well known, substantives often stand, as אֱמֶת (Jer. xxiii. 28), שֶׁקֶר (Ps. cxix. 78), חֵטְא (Isa. xxxi. 7), הֶבֶל (Job xxi. 34), מֵישָׁרִים (Ps. lxxv. 3), etc.——יצא and ישׁוּב stand in pointed antithesis. וְ before ישׁוּב stands according to the peculiar Hebrew paratactic mode of expression. In our idiom we would say: which will not go back,—or, less exactly: that will not go back.

Ver. 24. לִי = "in regard to me," comp. v. 1; xli. 7; Gen. xx. 13.——אָמַר = "they say," comp. xxv. 9; lxv. 8, etc.——יָבוֹא = "let one come." It is the same impersonal construction as in אָמַר comp. vi. 10; x. 4; xiv. 32; xviii. 5; xxxiii. 20, etc. It is indeed not impossible that a וְ before יבוא has fallen out because of the following וְ before יבשׁו; but grammatical reasons by no means compel such an assumption.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. With these words the Prophet concludes his contemplation of the future salvation that is connected with Cyrus. It is assuredly not an accident that only after Cyrus and the northern world-power represented by him and after the southern world-power are noticed, does he turn to Israel in order to announce also to it what shall be its part in that future salvation. Here, too, the chief point is again the knowledge of Jehovah as the only true God. Jehovah, who made the heavens, even that suffices to prove Him to be the God; Jehovah, who also formed the earth, of which He is also the orderer and disposer, but who according to His goodness prepared the earth as a friendly dwelling for men, justly says of Himself: I am the absolute Being, and another beside Me there is not (ver. 18). But this same Jehovah has chosen a people out of mankind for His particular inheritance and property, and from the first He has clearly and publicly proclaimed what He purposes to do with this people. And He has in that plainly expressed that, as with the creation He had in mind the salvation of mankind, so, too, He had in mind the salvation of this people, as the reward that a just and right thinking lord gives his servants, when He made those arrangements in which this people were to serve as means and instrument (ver. 19). This people is to receive salvation through Cyrus. This having happened, Israel delivered from the heathen may be summoned to acknowledge idolatry to be a foolish and ruinous error (ver. 20). After being summoned, too, to give information and to settle by consultation what they have lived through and experienced, they must confess: Jehovah foretold all that would come about; as He foretold so it has turned out. Jehovah alone is the true God (ver. 21). The world-powers and Israel having so acknowledged Jehovah, He can now call to all mankind: turn to Me as to Him who blesses you (ver. 22). Thus will be fulfilled what the LORD hath sworn and announced as not to be frustrated, that to Him every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear (ver. 23). All will then acknowledge that only in Jehovah is salvation, and that hostility to Him brings only ruin (ver. 24). All mankind, become one in the glory and praise of the LORD, will then have become "seed of Israel."

2. For thus saith the Lord——none beside Me.—Vers. 18–21. "For," beginning ver. 18, connects with ver. 17. There it is said "Israel is saved in the LORD with an everlasting salvation." This, spoken by the heathen, is here confirmed by the LORD as correct, by saying that of course He did not call Israel to a fruitless service (לא תהו בקשוני ver. 19), but promised him a just reward. For now the LORD turns to Israel to say to him wherein the blessing promised to them in Cyrus will culminate. The Prophet knows that Israel still inclines to idolatry, that fundamental evil of the natural man. But he also knows that Israel, utterly broken by the Exile, and wholly convinced, by the way of prophecy and fulfilment, of Jehovah's being the only God, will, from the time of their deliverance by Cyrus, renounce idolatry. We know that the Exile made a decisive turning-point in the religious life of the Israelites. Coarse idolatry they renounced from that time on. Yet the inward as well as the outward deliverance by Cyrus was only a beginning. But in this beginning the Prophet sees already the completion, according to his complex way of regarding history. Thus in ver. 18 he tells how that "everlasting salvation" will come about. A fundamental condition is for Israel to attain to the lively knowledge expressed by the words: I am the Lord, and there is none else. The foundation of this is double; what pertains to the history of the world and what to the history of salvation. The former consists in this, that Jehovah before all made the heavens, which is proof enough that He alone is God. For He who made the world to come, the abode of spirits, of elohim, must He not Himself be Elohim? yea, as the Creator of the elohim world, he is exalted above all elohim, therefore the Elohim κατ' ἐξοχὴν (comp. e. g., Ps. xcvii. 9). Such is the sense of the parenthesis: "He is God," ver. 18. In the second place the LORD proves His sole divinity by the fact that He formed the earth, and made it (ready), comp. xliii. 7. As to "that created the heavens" there is added in parenthesis a nearer definition, so there is to "that formed the earth and made it." In both cases the parenthesis begins with הוּא. The first consists of two words; the second of two words הוּא כוננה, "He established it," and a nearer explanation. For at first sight this כוננה seems redundant after יצר and עָשָׂה. But we learn from the following words to יְצָרָהּ that כּוֹנֵן is not used in the sense of fundare, which is its common meaning elsewhere, but in the sense of ἑτοιμάζειν (LXX.) "to equip, prepare" (comp. Deut. xxxii. 6, where, too, כּוֹנֵן follows עָשָׂה; and especially the Hiphil of like meaning, xiv. 21; Gen. xliii. 16; 1 Kings v. 32; vi. 19, etc.). By this is expressed the final equipment or adaptation to an object, in contrast with the original making. That such is the sense is expressly said by the words לא תהו וגו׳, "not empty did He create it." For these words affirm that the object of "creating" and "forming" was not that the earth might remain תהו "empty," but that it might become fit for dwelling, and the Prophet designates by כּוֹנֵן the activity that prepares, sets in order the product of the "creating," "forming," "making." Thus men prepare a friendly dwelling for their children, friends, dear guests. Therefore this "preparation" is a proof of the goodness and kindness of our God.

But for this I am Jehovah and there is none beside there is also a foundation in what pertains to the history of salvation. God had sought out Israel as a peculiar treasure to be the medium of His thoughts of salvation, and lifted them high up and then cast them down. He did not choose them that they might end in wild chaos, any more than He made the earth to be empty. He had never required this people to seek Him in vain, for nothing, as it were in the emptiness (so to speak, to trace out, find out the hidden, ver. 15). But He had said: "what is right and proper, shall be to you." צֶדֶק here is not the abstract, subjective righteousness, but the concrete, objective right, as in the expressions פֹּעֵל צדק (Ps. xv. 2, etc.) עֹשֵׂה צדק (Isa. lxiv. 4, etc). דבר comp. xxxiii. 15. Also מישרים is to be taken in the concrete and objective sense (comp. xxxiii. 15). This promise: "what is right shall be yours," God did not make in secret (בַּסֵּתֶר xlviii. 16; Ps. cxxxix. 15) so that it can come under no investigation, and cannot be proved to have actually happened. For He did not speak in, say, caves and hiding-places, such as the heathen oracles let themselves be heard from, but He spoke before all the world. If now the LORD has given His people the promise of a good time and happy dwelling after the chaos, and the promise is fulfilled exactly as it runs, there is the proof that Jehovah is omniscient. As by the creation He has shown Himself the Almighty and the All-good to all mankind, so, by the promise given to Israel and by its fulfilment He showed Himself to the people whose history is that of redemption to be the Omniscient and All-good. But as the All-good, Almighty and All-knowing He is the God, Jehovah, the Absolute.

According to ver. 19 the Prophet assumes that all will come to pass as promised so publicly, and that by means of Cyrus. For ver. 20 sqq. we find ourselves translated into the time after the emancipation. Hence the Israelites are called escaped of the nations, and he that helped them to this title can be no other than Cyrus. Therefore in the time of the deliverance effected by Cyrus the redeemed are to assemble, and come and draw near in order to elicit the facts resultant from the preceding course of history. The resultant is negative and positive. The negative is stated ver. 20 b, viz. They know nothing those carrying the wood of their graven image, and praying to a god that will not save.—יָדְעוּ, comp. xliv. 9, 18; lvi. 10, a kind of causative Kal, comp. on תפתח ver. 8, therefore properly: not to exercise knowledge. נָשָׂא, comp. xlvi. 1, 7. יוֹשִׁיעַ, comp. Lam. iv. 17.——By this is expressed, that after the deliverance by Cyrus Israel will at last definitely come to the knowledge of the folly and nothingness of idolatry.——We learn in ver. 21 the positive result of that counseling. But the announcement of it is again introduced by a solemn summons to use the needful deliberation (comp. xli. 22, 23). Tell ye, and bring near means as much as bring on information. The thought is completed by adding another verb. The necessary facts must first be produced; then counsel may be taken about them (change of person as in ver. 8; xli. 1, etc.). The Lord himself announces the result. In the consultation he made his right felt, and what he said must be accepted, for it was the truth. It was as follows: Who has caused this (viz. what is intimated ver. 19, and whose fulfilment, after ver. 19, is assumed) to be heard of old, and long ago declared it? Not I, Jehovah? etc., ver. 21. Therefore, here again the Lord proves His divinity from His omniscience. One might say, that this is that divine attribute that can be most easily inspected even by those not eye-witnesses. For let the prophecy as such and the fulfilment be verified, and the necessary conclusion for every one is a superhuman knowing, willing and ability, even for such as are ever so remote in respect to time and place. When the Lord designates Himself here especially as a just God, it is with reference to vers. 13 and 19. He calls Himself Saviour in contrast with a god that cannot save, ver. 20.

3. Look unto me——shall glory, vers. 22–25. In this concluding word the Lord, by the expression all ye ends of the earth, comprehends all previously named, viz. the nations of the northern (ver. 6) and of the southern (vers. 14 sqq.) world-power, along with Israel. One might be tempted to take vers. 22–25 as an independent section, parallel with vers. 14–17 and 18–21. But then it would doubtless have begun, like the others mentioned, with "thus saith the Lord." Moreover we see from all the seed of Israel, ver. 26, that after Israel has been entirely converted to the Lord, the Prophet sees in all mankind still only a seed of Israel. It is perhaps highly significant that only after the northern and southern world-power, or after the fulness of the Gentiles represented by them, does he let the escaped of the nations become partakers of the salvation inaugurated by Cyrus. Is that not an intimation of the fact so emphatically confirmed by Paul (Rom. xi.)? Thus by all the ends of the earth we are not to understand those nations that remained beside those mentioned in vers. 6, 14 sqq. and 18 sqq. For those thus mentioned by the Prophet represented already all mankind. Therefore the same are meant, only here they are mentioned comprehensively instead of singly as before. All together they constitute the entire (all the) seed of Israel in a spiritual sense. To all of these, after salvation is prepared for them and they for salvation, the Lord addresses the final, decisive word of calling: turn unto me and be saved. Of the Imperatives the first is commanding, the second promissory. The inviting call reminds of Matth. xxii. 4: "I have prepared my dinner, etc.,——all things are ready, come unto the marriage."——הוָשְׁעוּ (comp. xxx. 15) is = be saved, become partakers of the perfect and everlasting salvation (ver. 17).—The causative clause: for I am God, etc., ver. 22 b, proves the possibility, yea the necessity of the salvation, by reference to the irrefragable truth, doubted since the fall, but now acknowledged on all hands (vers. 6, 14 sqq., 21) that Jehovah alone is God. Only God can warrant everlasting salvation. Jehovah alone is God. Ergo!——When all turn to Jehovah and find in Him salvation, then, too, the eternal decree of God is fulfilled that all shall bow to him and serve him.—This decree has great importance as appears from: I have sworn by myself, and he could swear by no greater (Heb. vi. 13 sqq.). The oath thus acquires an abstract right, so that under no circumstances can it go back, be revoked or declared null. בִּי נִשְׁבַּעְתִּי as in Gen. xxii. 16; Jer. xxii. 5; xlix. 13; comp. xliv. 26.——I had rather translate צְדָקָה (see Text. and Gram.): "for the sake of righteousness," or "of right." This word, being an emanation of the divine righteousness, bears in itself the guaranty of its realization, and therefore cannot go back (comp. the very similar passage, lv. 11). The contents of the oath is that every knee shall bow to the Lord, and to Him (לִי belongs also to the second clause; comp. xix. 18) every tongue shall swear. Therefore the προσκύνησις, as outward expression of homage (Ps. xcv. 6), and the ἐξομολόγησις (Rom. xiv. 11; Phil. ii. 10, 11), as expression of the confession that God is the All-wise, All-righteous and Almighty, shall be accorded to Him as His divine right, that He does not suffer to be wrested from him. But every oath by God involves the confession, not only that there is a God, but also that this God knows the truth, and has the will and the power to avenge the untruth. An oath is, indeed, a divine worship (Goeschel).——The Prophet, moreover, is very far from believing that (to say it with one word) the conversion of the heathen and of Israel will be sudden and universal. Rather this conversion will progress by successive stages, and many — will make decided resistance. To this ver. 24 refers.

Ver. 24. In this verse we perceive the cheering call of the converted to their still hesitating or even decidedly resisting brethren (see Text. and Gram.). First, they point to their own experience: Only in Jehovah are righteous deeds and strength. צְדָקוֹת (comp. xxxiii. 15; lxiv. 5 and Ps. xi. 7; ciii. 6; Judg. v. 11, etc.), are juste facta. The speaker would say, therefore: displays of righteousness (i. e., of a disposition conformed to the will of God) and strength (i. e., the power to do great things and bear hard things) are only in Jehovah, i. e., are only possible where God gives ability. Second, there is joined to this the exhortation to come to Jehovah as the only source of right inward life. Regarding the expressions עָדָיו and אֵלָיו, the Prophet would evidently intimate by עַד that Jehovah represents the loftiest goal of human effort, and that it concerns us to penetrate as far as to Him. The notion of "progredi ad fastigium quoddam" (Gesen.), is expressed in many modifications by עַד. Comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 19; Job xi. 7; Nah. i. 10; 1 Chr. iv. 27, etc. Finally, those converted do not fail to add a threat for those that oppose themselves: and all that are incensed against Him shall be ashamed. The same expression again only xli. 11; Song of Solomon i. 6. It seems to me that the expression "those inflamed with anger" points to the psychological fact, that in the hearts of those filled with hatred the display of love provokes anger and not love. Compare Judas, John xiii. 27.

Ver. 25 is not to be regarded as either the word of Jehovah or of the converted ver. 23. In the former case we would have בִּי; in the latter ביהוה יצדקו would say only what had been already said in ביהוה צדקות. Hence I regard this verse as the word of the Prophet, added in conclusion by way of confirming, explaining and also of praise. By shall be justified he verifies that men are not able to find the grounds of their justification in themselves, but only in God. This is a New Testament evangelical thought, that well befits "the Evangelist of the Old Testament." And shall glory contains a doxology as an ingredient. It is as a finger board to the praising choir of which John speaks in Rev. iv. 8 sqq.; v. 9 sqq.; vii. 9 sqq.; xi. 16; xii. 10 sqq, etc. Finally, all the seed of Israel is an explanation, showing us that we are to construe verses 22-25, not as a new co-ordinate member of the discourse, but as the sum of the whole discourse, so that the "ends of the earth" are not new nations hitherto unmentioned, but the totality of those previously named. All those who according to vers. 6 and 14 have been converted to Jehovah are become Israel, i. e., spiritual Israel. All "they which are of faith the same are the children of Abraham." Gal. iii. 7.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlv. The Egyptian and the Babylonian captivities correspond to one another. Both times the holy nation were outside of the Holy land and in the service of a heathen world-power. In each case, too, this happened in the resplendent period of the world-power concerned. Egypt, at the time it was compelled to let Israel go, stood foremost among all nations in respect to culture and political power. "Those were the most glorious times of all Egyptian history" (LEPSIUS, Chronology of the Egyptians, I. p. 359). Cyrus was the conqueror of the Babylonian kingdom, which itself had conquered the old Assyria, and he had appropriated its power so that he represented the northern world-power in, as it were, its third power or degree. In both instances the inconsiderable, despised Jews were slaves without power or rights in the territory and service of the world-power. Yet how superior the powerless appears in contrast with the mighty! God declared it to be His express purpose, in leading His people miraculously out of Egypt, "to show His power to Pharaoh, and that His name might be declared throughout all the earth; and to execute judgment against all the gods of Egypt" (Exod. ix. 16; xii. 12, comp. viii. 10, 19; xiv. 4, 17, 18, 25). The entire first half of Daniel informs us of those miraculous measures of God whose common object and effect was that confession of Nebuchadnezzar: "Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings" (Dan. ii. 47; comp. iii. 28 sqq.; iv. 31 sqq.; vi. 25 sqq.). Therefore, twice in that period between the apostacy from the true God (Gen. xi. 8) and the appearance of Christ, there took place grand testimonies from the LORD to the heathen world. And in both instances the medium of testimony was an exile of Israel, and it was received by the world-power that at the time was dominant: first Egypt the southern world-power, and then the northern, the Babylonian-Persian kingdom of which Cyrus must be regarded as the head. The object of this revelation to the heathen world was in general, not the extermination of idolatry (for then the object were not attained), but the preservation and revival of the remembrance of the highest Creator, Ruler and Judge, of the One ruling over all that is visible and invisible, a remembrance ever present in the most secret part of the human breast. This remembrance may not be extinguished, for it is the connecting point for the final and highest revelation that is accomplished by the Son of God becoming man for the purpose of redemption. But especially the testimony imparted to Cyrus was intended to free, from the Exile, the nation that was to be the medium of salvation and thereby to make shine the first beams of Messianic salvation to Israel and the world.

2. On xlv. PRESSEL (in HERZ. R.-Enc. III. p. 231) gives a list of the data of the Old Testament in regard to Cyrus, which, with some modification, is as follows: 1) He was a Persian (Dan. vi. 29); 2) he was king in Persia (2 Chr. xxxvi. 22; Ezra i. 1 sq.; iv. 5; Dan. xx. 1); 3) he was king of Media and Babylon (Ezra v. 13, 17; vi. 2, 3); 4) he was a conqueror and founder of a world-monarchy (Isa. xlv. 1-3, 14); 5) he was the fourth ruler before Xerxes (Dan. xi. 2); 6) he was the destroyer of the Babylonian dynasty and of the Chaldean idolatry (Isa. xlvi. 1; xlviii. 14; Dan. ii. 39; viii. 3, 4, 20); 7) he was a worshipper of the true God (2 Chron. xxxvi. 23; Ezra i. 2); 8) he was the liberator of the Jews, and promoted the building of the city and Temple (Isa. xliv. 28; xlv. 13; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 23; Ez. i. 2 sqq.; v. 13; vi. 3 sqq.); 9) he was a shepherd of God who was to fulfil God's will concerning Israel, yea, an anointed of the LORD (Isa. xliv. 28; xlv. 1), whose spirit the LORD raised up (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22 sq.; Ezra i. 1; Isa. xlv. 13).

What was it that made so deep an impression on Cyrus, and one so favorable for the knowledge of the truth? PRESSEL (l. c.) in answer to this question mentions in substance the following: 1) The part that Daniel played in the downfall of the Babylonian kingdom, by foretelling the event the very night of its taking place (Dan. v. 28, 30); 2) the high position that Daniel occupied, with miraculous divine support, at the court of Darius the Mede, whose general Cyrus was still at that time (Dan. vi.); 3) the experience Cyrus might have of the nothingness of idolatry in contrast with the faith of Daniel, in respect to which less account must be made of the history of Bel and the Dragon than of the inability of the heathen idols to protect their nations against Cyrus, who acted under commission from Jehovah (Isa. xlv. 1-3); 4) the reading of Isaiah's prophecies in respect to himself, according to the testimony of Josephus cited above; see Doct. and Eth. on xliv. 24-28.

But if it be further asked: how does it come that the descriptions of profane authors are far from coming up to the picture of Cyrus that we get from Daniel and Isaiah? I would reply, by a modification of PRESSEL's views: 1) the fact that Cyrus, as soon as he began to reign, extended to the captive Jews special favor, and exhibited a lively interest in the restoration of the worship of Jehovah in Jerusalem is a notorious proof that he must have received a strong impulse in this direction (comp. OEHLER, in HERZ., R.-Enc. XII., p. 230 sq.). For how otherwise may it be explained, that this mighty ruler, whose sway was so extended, and who was busied with great plans for war and peace, gave his attention to this matter long since settled, and took measures that from his stand-point were inconsistent and a mistake? 2) That profane history says nothing about those mysterious transactions between Cyrus and his God (we may surely be allowed, in an objective sense, to call the LORD so), is to be explained partly from the nature of the subject in itself, partly from these extraordinary manifestations of divinity—apart from the restoration of the Jews—not being intended for outward effects that could have been the subject of historical writing, but only for such inward effects as spin out their mysterious threads in the depths of human consciousness, and withdraw themselves from outward observation and representation. Notwithstanding what has been remarked, profane history still gives us so far an indirect testimony, that it draws a remarkably grand, and even unique picture of Cyrus. Thus HERODOTUS relates (III., 89) that the Persians called "Darius a merchant, Cambyses a despot, but Cyrus a parent. Darius seemed to have no other object than the acquisition of gain; Cambyses was negligent and severe; whilst Cyrus was of a mild and gentle temper, ever studious of the good of his subjects." He further mentions in the account of the taking of Babylon by the cunning of Zopyrus: "With respect to the merit of Zopyrus, in the opinion of Darius, it was exceeded by no Persian of any period, unless by Cyrus; to him, indeed, he thought no one of his countrymen could possibly be compared" (III., 160). Notwithstanding HERODOTUS speaks so highly of Cyrus, he is still sharply called to account for making it appear that Cyrus was "tutored and corrected" (παιδαγωγεῖσθαι και νουθετεῖσθαι) by Croesus, which latter he had yet previously described as an "uncultivated, boastful, absurd" man, as Cyrus "φρονήσει καὶ ἀρετῇ καὶ μεγαλονοίᾳ πολὺ πάντων δοκεῖ πεπρωτευκέναι τῶν βασιλέων." DIODOR. SICULUS (Hist. XIII., p. 342) relates that the Syracusan Nikolaos recommended his countrymen to use gentleness toward the captive Athenians, citing for example the εὐγνωμοσύνη of Cyrus, of whom he proceeds to say: "τοιγαροῦν διαδοθείσης εἰς πάντα τόπον τῆς ἡμερότητος ἅπαντες οἱ κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν ἀλλήλους φθάνοντες εἰς τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως συμμαχίαν παρεγίνοντο."—JUSTINUS (I., 8) calls Cyrus "admirabiliter insignis." AMMIANUS (XXIII., 6) says: "Antiquior Cyrus rex amabilis." See VITRINGA on Isa. xlii. 2 and xlv. 1. But especially it is to be emphasized here, that XENOPHON did not write his Cyropaedia in order to present his ethico-political ideals in the form of a romance, choosing Cyrus for the hero, because his historical reality most agrees with those ideals, and needed only a little idealizing embellishment. On the contrary he was astounded by the fact that Cyrus found it so easy to rule over so many nations differing so extraordinarily from one another, easier than any other ruler had ever found it, whereas ruling over men, even a few and those of the same kind, had else been proved to be harder than ruling over beasts. And he notices as an especially important circumstance, that even the most remote nations would willingly and voluntarily have obeyed Cyrus. It was this wonder at such extraordinary facts that determined him to investigate the circumstances of parentage, nature, and education, that made it possible for Cyrus to distinguish himself so as a ruler of men. Such is the occasion and object of his writing, that XENOPHON himself gives in the introduction to it. Does not this remarkable fact that XENOPHON thus singles out find its proper explanation in the words of our Prophet: "whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him," xlv. 1?

3. On xlv. 1 sqq. Unbelieving Israel is judged by the LORD, and it appears to be given up by the Exile to ruin forever. But the Exile is only momentary, and must itself serve to bring it about that Israel shall lastingly penetrate to the light of true knowledge of God. It shall not only do so itself, but also, as servant of Jehovah, it shall become the means of the heathen receiving this light. But the latter shall chiefly happen by a heathen prince of eminent power and importance being brought to the knowledge of the true God and to the consciousness of having received from Him a grand religious mission. As this prince on the one hand terminates the deepest humiliation of Israel and prepares the way for its being lifted up again, and on the other hand introduces into the heathen world, at least as to principle, the first rays of the true knowledge of salvation, he is a forerunner and type of the Messiah, and stands under quite a peculiar guidance of God, who equips him and makes the way even before him. So far Cyrus is no disconnected, unnecessary and hence incredible miracle, but he is an appearance organically connected with the development of salvation. It was he that was to restore Israel from physical and spiritual estrangement to its centre of salvation, and prepare the heathen for faith in God and his Saviour. For this double purpose the nothingness of idolatry must be made patent and brought to the consciousness of Jew and Gentile. As regards Israel, it is of special importance here for it to see this prince announced beforehand, indeed named beforehand, and to hear from his mouth and that of his predecessor the confession that the idols are nothing, and that Jehovah alone is God. How far the effect on the heathen was real and lasting, we can, of course, not determine, on account of the inwardness of the effect and the want of witnesses concerning it. Yet we will not err if we assume that the later readiness of the heathen to accept the apostolic preaching, indeed the precedence of the heathen world in this respect to the Jews rested on that preparatory influence. It is especially to be noted in this respect that the Magi that came from the East openly inquired in Jerusalem for the stopping place of the new-born King, whose birth they took for granted, whereas in Israel itself this birth appears to have been treated as a secret in the narrow circle of the initiated. Else why had Herod heard nothing of it?

4. On xlv. 7. "Fanatici homines hanc mali vocem detorquent, acsi Deus mali. i. e, peccati auctor esset. Sed facile apparet, quam praepostere hoc prophetae testimonio abutantur. Antithesis enim id satis explicat, cujus membra inter se referri debent. Nam opponit pacem malo i. e. aerumnis, bellis, rebusque omnibus adversis. Quod si justitiam malo opponeret, aliquid haberent coloris; verum haec contrarium inter se rerum oppositio aperta est. Ideo vulgaris distinctio non improbanda est, Deum mali esse auctorem, non culpae sed poenae." CALVIN. "Αἰτία τοῦ ἑλομένου θεὸς δὲ ἀναίτιος." PLATO. "Is all in the world well-ordered and sure, then not a single thing can be taken away without all collapsing or losing its harmony, just as little as in a well-ordered building. Therefore the Scripture has often declared that misfortune as well as fortune, evil as well as good is under the government of God. 'I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace and create evil; I the LORD do all these things.' Says another Prophet: "Shall there be evil in a city, and the LORD hath not done it?' Amos iii. 6. Comp. also Lam. iii. 37, 38. So, too, in the New Testament the Lord and His disciples declare in the case of the blackest iniquity, that all happens according to the will of God. 'For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done,' Acts iv. 27, 28." THOLUCK.

5. On xlv. 8. "Celeber hic locus est in ecclesia Papistarum et illustre argumentum ignorantiae, quod ad beatam virginem eum accomodarunt. Nos autem scimus, agi in hoc capite de promissa liberatione per Cyrum. Hic igitur locus mimeticus est. . . . Quasi dicant Israelitae: Ecce sumus privati sacerdotio et regno, templo et omni cultu Dei, translati sumus. in gentes. Ibi respondent nobis peccata nostra. . . . Quare O coeli rorate et depluite justitiam, quae nisi desuper in nos effundatur, actum est." LUTHER. The Roman Catholic church, on the 18th of December (the Festival of "the expectation of the lying-in of Mary") celebrates the so-called Rorate-mass, named thus from the introductory words: Rorate Coeli desuper, etc. Comp. HERZ. R.-Enc. I. p. 134.

6. On xlv. 11. "The peculiar and greatest gift that parents can bestow on their children is the discipline of the inner man and a bringing up to God's word. It is written: 'And the LORD said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? For I know him that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the LORD, to do justice and judgment,' Gen. xviii. 17-19. So highly did God esteem in His servant Abraham the nurture of his children in piety! Thus parents may deserve heaven or hell merely by the education of their children. And when the apostle says of the woman: 'Notwithstanding she shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety' (1 Tim. ii. 15), he means not merely that she bear, but also, as essentially a part of it, that she educate, if she therefore herself continue in the faith, and thus also may understand how to bring her children up to faith." THOLUCK.

7. [On xlv. 14. "The idea indicated by this is, that there would be a condition of anxious solicitude among heathen nations on the subject of true religion, and that they would seek counsel and direction from those who were in possession of it. Such a state has already existed to some extent among the heathen; and the Scriptures, I think, lead us to suppose that the final spread and triumph of the gospel will be preceded by such an inquiry prevailing extensively in the heathen world. God will show them the folly of idolatry; He will raise up reformers among themselves; the extension of commercial intercourse will acquaint them with the comparative happiness and prosperity of Christian nations; and the growing consciousness of their own inferiority will lead them to desire that which has conferred so extensive benefits on other lands, and lead them to come as suppliants and ask that teachers and the ministers of religion may be sent to them. One of the most remarkable characteristics of the present time is, that heathen nations are becoming increasingly sensible of their ignorance and comparative degradation; that they welcome the ministers and teachers sent out from Christian lands; the increased commerce of the world is thus preparing the world for the final spread of the Gospel." BARNES. Some of the most wonderful illustrations of the foregoing remarks have occurred since they were penned, e. g., Japan.—TR.]

8. On xlv. 15. "As God the LORD is Himself a hidden God, and said He will dwell in darkness, it has therefore seemed good to Him to hide His children in this world under so much affliction, contumely, contempt, poverty, sickness, simplicity, weakness, sin, etc., that often not only the world, but believers themselves cannot reconcile themselves to it." SCRIVER, Seelenschatz, Theil II. 10, Pred. § 26.

9. On xlv. 17. "Even the ancient Jews explained this to refer to the Messiah. But what is said here of Israel applies, according to the quality of the New Testament, to the whole human race (xliii. 24). The grace on Israel shall be everlasting, and as it has been from everlasting, so through the Messiah it shall be continued to everlasting. For the religion of the Messiah leads everything out of time into the blessed eternity. Hence He is called the Rock of Ages (xxvi. 4) that gives to the redeemed everlasting joy (xxxv. 10), an everlasting name that shall not be cut off (lvi. 5), everlasting glory (lx. 15), the ground of which is the everlasting righteousness (Dan. ix. 24)." STARKE.

10. On xlv. 19. "The heavenly wisdom would have itself proclaimed in clear light, and not in the darkness. Hence Christ also said that what his disciples heard in the ear they should proclaim from the house-top (Matth. x. 27). As, on the contrary, all false teachers are sneaks, they do not go straight forward, but cloak their doing and doctrine with a false appearance and sheep-clothing (Matth. vii. 15)." CRAMER.—["In the language here, there is a remarkable resemblance to what the Saviour said of Himself, and it is not improbable that he had this passage in His mind: 'I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing.' Jno. xviii. 20." BARNES.]

11. On xlv. 22–25. "This text is one of the most important in Isaiah. The person that speaks in it is the Messiah, the Son of God, because He calls Himself in the context (ver. 15) the Saviour and attributes to Himself the everlasting redemption (ver. 17); because through Him all the ends of the earth shall be blessed (John iii. 16; Acts iv. 12); because what is said here in ver. 23 of the oath, the Son of God certifies of Himself (Gen. xxii. 16); because in Christ we have righteousness and strength (ver. 24; 1 Cor. i. 30); because that every knee shall bow to Him is declared to refer to Christ (Phil. ii. 9 sqq.). HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlv. 1–7. THE MISSIONARY WORK OF CYRUS A TYPE OF OUR OWN. 1) The task of Cyrus is also our own. For Cyrus was a. to lead back Israel inwardly to its God, and also to restore outwardly the service of the LORD among the people that returned home. So, too, must we convert Israel inwardly to its Saviour (the testimony of the heathen must provoke Israel to zeal, Rom. xi. 11), and contribute to the restoration of the true worship of Jehovah (Jno. iv. 23 sq.) and of the spiritual kingdom of David. b. Cyrus was to bring also the heathen, East and West, to the knowledge of the true God (vers. 6, 7). We should do the same by bringing to them the knowledge of the Triune God and of salvation, that is come to all men by the Son becoming man.—2) The promise given to Cyrus in regard to the execution of his task. All opponents will bow before him, all gates open, etc., vers. 1–3. So, too, our work, as the cause of God, will conquer in spite of all resistance; the doors of hearts will open, and we shall gain those hearts that are born of God and made susceptible of the truth as precious spoil.

["Now that which God here promised to do for Cyrus, He could have done for Zerubbabel or some of the Jews themselves; but the wealth and power of this world God has seldom seen fit to entrust His own people with much of, so many are the snares and temptations that attend them. But if there has been occasion, for the good of the Church, to make use of them, God has been pleased rather to put them into the hands of others, to be employed for them, than to venture them in their own hands." M. HENRY.]

2. On xlv. 8. A great favorite in the Roman Catholic Church as an Advent text (on account of their reference of the Rorate to the Virgin Mary), but which has been much and variously used by Protestant preachers. Comp. e. g. the Rorate propheticum of JOH. FORTUMANNUS (in Wernigerode) three Advent sermons on Isa. xlv. 8, Wittenberg, 1625.—The salvation of men depends on heaven and earth continuing in right relation to one another. They must not be separated, but must co-operate. The heaven must incline to the earth, fructifying it; the earth must open up receptively. As fruits of the field are conditioned on the ground being fruitful and well plowed, while the heaven gives rain and sunshine; so the salvation of souls depends on hearts rightly opening themselves to the fructifying influences from above. This thought is especially brought home to us by the Advent. The Lord's Advent is heavenly dew for a thirsty land. 1) The Lord came once with His holy person as Lamb of God and Second Adam. 2) He comes continually with His Spirit and gifts, a. by the daily bread of His grace in the word and sacrament; b. by the annual bread of the Church's feasts, especially now of the feast of the Advent, by which He quite especially extends to us the blessing of His personal coming. 3) We only become truly partakers of this blessing if we are "a thirsty land," i. e. if we hunger and thirst after righteousness. Conclusion: Therefore where heaven above drops down and the clouds rain righteousness, and the earth on the other hand opens itself up, there righteousness grows and salvation will be brought forth.

3. On xlv. 9–13. In great distress and conflict one is often tempted to strive with his Maker and to say: Ah, why was I born? This is wrong. We ought never, even in the greatest distress, to forget that we have a God that can help and will help. 1) God can help, for a. He made heaven and earth (ver. 12); b. He especially made known His power to the people of Israel in their greatest distress by raising up the heathen prince himself, in whose land they were captives, to be their friend and deliverer (ver. 13). 2) He will help, for we are His children and the work of His hands (ver. 11). Therefore in every distress we ought believingly to let ourselves be pointed to Him.

4. [On xlv. 15. "1) God hid Himself when He brought them into the trouble, hid Himself and was wroth, lvii. 17. Note: Though God be His people's God and Saviour, yet sometimes, when they provoke Him, He hides Himself from them in displeasure, suspends His favors, and lays them under His frowns: but let them wait upon the Lord that hides His face, viii. 17. 2) He hid Himself when He was bringing them out of the trouble. Note: When God is acting as Israel's God and Saviour commonly His way is in the sea, Ps. lxxvii. 19. The salvation of the Church is carried on in a mysterious way, by the Spirit of the LORD of hosts working on men's spirits (Zech. iv. 6), by weak and unlikely instruments, small and accidental occurrences, and not wrought till the last extremity; but this is our comfort, though God hide Himself, we are sure He is the God of Israel, the Saviour. See Job xxxv. 14. M. HENRY.]

5. [On xlv. 18, 19. That the Lord we serve and trust in is God alone appears by the two great lights, that of nature and that of revelation. I. By the light of nature: for He made the world, and therefore may justly demand its homage. 1) He formed it. It is not a rude and indigested chaos, but cast into the most proper shape and size by Infinite Wisdom. 2) He fixed it, Ps. xxiv. 2; Job xxvi. 7. 3) He fitted it for use and for the service of man. He did not create it to be empty. Ps. viii. II. It appears by the light of revelation. His oracles far exceed those of Pagan deities, as well as His operations (ver. 19). The preference is here placed in three things: All that God has said is plain, satisfactory and just. 1) In the manner of its delivery it is plain and open. Not in mutterings and ambiguities issuing from dens and caverns (viii. 19), but like the law was given from the top of Mt. Sinai. Prov. i. 20; viii. 1-3; Hab. ii. 2; Jno. xviii. 20. 2) In the use and benefit of it it was highly satisfactory. I said not: Seek ye me in vain. 3) In the matter of it it was incontestably just, consonant to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil. The heathen deities dictated those things to their worshippers which were the reproach of human nature and extirpated virtue. See Comm. above on ver. 19, last clause. Comp. Rom. iii. 26. After M. HENRY.—TR.]

6. On xlv. 22-25. MISSIONARY SERMON. "Whither must every missionary anniversary turn our eyes? 1) To the interior of Christendom for proper examination; 2) to the heathen world for urgent warning; 3) to Israel for cheering comfort." VII.—THE SEVENTH DISCOURSE.

The overthrow of the Babylonian idols, and the gain that Israel shall derive from it for its knowledge of God.

CHAPTER XLVI.

1. ISRAEL SHALL KNOW ITS GOD FROM THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN HIM WHO BEARS AND THE IDOLS THAT ARE BORNE.

CHAPTER XLVI. 1-4.

1 BEL boweth down, Nebo stoopeth,
Their idols [a]were upon the beasts, and upon the cattle:
[b]Your carriages were heavy loaden;
They are a burden to the weary beast.
2 They stoop, they bow down together;
They could not deliver the burden,
But [1]themselves are gone into captivity.
3 Hearken unto me, O house of Jacob,
And all the remnant of the house of Israel,
Which are borne by me from the belly,
Which are carried from the womb:
4 And even to your old age I am he;
And even to hoar hairs will I carry you:
I have made, and I will bear;
Even I will carry, and I will deliver you.

[1] Heb. their soul.

[a] are to the beast and to the cattle.

[b] Your carried images are loaded up.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. נְשֻׂאֹת—קָרַס—כָּרַע. Ver. 3. שִׁמְעוּ.

Ver. 1. כרע and קרס mean "to bow, bend one's-self, to fall down." קָרַס is kindred to the unused root כָּרַשׂ from which comes כְּרֵשׂ "belly," (Bauch, comp. beugen) Jer. li. 34.—It is likely no accident that after כָּרַע בֵל the discourse does not continue with קָרַס נְבוֹ, but we have instead the particip. קֹרֵס. It seems to me nearly accordant with Isaiah's way, to assume that he intends by this participle an allusion to כְּרֵשׂ, an allusion whose justification is still more strengthened by the addition of כָּרַע and כָּרַשׂ. Then the sense becomes, that to כֹּרֵשׁ who attacks, there will be a corresponding קֹרֵס (כֹּרֵשׁ) and a כָּרַע on the part of the attacked.—מַשָּׂא לְעֲיֵפָה an appositional added clause; the fem. is likely occasioned by the preceding חַיָּה and בְּהֵמָה; unless one takes the fem. in a neuter sense.

Ver. 2. מִלֵּט originally signifies "to be smooth, slippery" (comp. כָּרַם and פָּלַט), the Piel then means "to make smooth, slippery," and thus to make fit for slipping away, falling out. Hence the meaning "to let slip away," of eggs (xxxiv. 15) and of the foetus (in the Hiph. lxvi. 7).—נַפְשָׁם means here the life-centre in antithesis to the periphery: the person, the proper I or self. Thus נֶפֶשׁ is not unfrequently used to strengthen the pronoun, in order to express the notion "self," or to emphasize it (comp. e. g., Hos ix. 4; Jer. xxvi. 19; xxxvii. 9).

Ver. 3. הָעֲמֻסִים and הַנְּשֻׂאִים are in apposition with בֵּית יַעֲקֹב and שְׁאֵרִית בֵּית י׳.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The reverse of the foregoing picture is now presented. There we have the victor; now we see the fate of the vanquished. But first it is the central point and refuge of the vanquished whose disgraceful end is set before us. The idols of Babylon, of which Bel and Nebo are named as the chief representatives, must come down from the places of honor where they were enthroned. Their images are loaded on beasts of burden to go into captivity (vers. 1, 2). From the contrast Israel may learn the lofty nature of its God. No one bears Him forth. On the contrary He has borne Israel with maternal love from the time of its birth, and will continue to carry it when no longer a child, but an old man (vers. 3, 4).

2. Bel boweth——into captivity.—Vers. 1, 2. There have been found in the library of king Asurbanipal two tablets of terra cotta, which contain two lists, one of the Assyrian, the other of the Babylonian superior gods (see Schrader, Assyrisch-Biblisches in Stud. u. Kr., 1874, p. 324 sqq.). From these it appears that the Assyrians and Babylonians had a system of gods ranged in four grades. At the summit was the highest, transcendent god, by the Assyrians called Asur, by the Babylonians Ilu, El (with the female deity Istar, Astarte). Following these, in the second grade, are three gods, also belonging it would seem to the unseen world: Anu, Bel or Bil and I—o (Ao). In Babylonian and Assyrian these three bear the same names. Then in a third grade, follow three gods of heaven belonging to the visible world, which again are named alike in both languages: Sin, the moon-god, Samas, the sun-god and Bin, the air-god. Finally, in the fourth degree appear the planet-gods, of which the Assyrian list names five (Marduk, Merodach, i. e., Jupiter; Istar, i. e., Astarte, Venus; Adar = Saturn; Nirgal = Mars; Nabu, Nebo = Mercury), the Babylonian however names only two male and two corresponding female divinities: Marduk (Merodach) with Zarpanituv (Zirbanit) and Nabiuv (Nebo) with Tasmituv (Tasmit). From this it appears that Bel has the second place in the second degree, and Nebo the last place in the lowest degree. Bel (comp. further on it Schrader, Die Keilinschrift. etc., p. 80 sq.), belongs to the divinities of the transcendent, invisible world, whereas Nebo as a planet-god corresponds to Mercury. He is the נָבִיא, the "revealing" god, and was, in the period of the later Chaldean kingdom along with Merodach, the chief god of the Babylonians, so that most of the kings named themselves after him (Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonned). Comp. Schrader, l. c. p. 272.

The highly honored images of the gods, else only served by human hands, are now distributed among the beasts and the cattle, i. e., partly the tamed wild beasts, as elephants and partly the tame domestic beasts, as the camel and the ass. חַיָּה as designation of the animalia agrestia and בְּהֵמָה as designation of animalia domestica recur often conjoined: Gen. i. 24, 25; iii. 14; vii. 14, 21; viii. 1; Lev. xxv. 7, etc. The cattle have therefore the chief work to do with them, which consists in toilsome bearing. What a shame for a god to be so heavy! A god ought to be spirit and light, and therefore imponderable! There is frequent mention of carrying forth the gods of a conquered nation, partly as spoil, partly out of religious policy: x. 10 sq.; Jer. xlviii. 7; xlix. 3 (comp. 1 Sam. v. 1 sqq.). Comp. also the inscription of Sargon quoted under xx. 1. נְשֻׂאוֹת, "gestata, gestamina, carried images," comp. ver. 7; xlv. 20; Amos v. 26; Jer. x. 5. נָשָׂא means carrying in general. עָמַס only "to carry, load up a heavy burden (freight);" comp. Gen. xliv. 13; Ps. lxviii. 20; Zech. xii. 3. Thus the Prophet says, "your נְשֻׂאוֹת are become עֲמֻסוֹת," and designates thereby a progress in deterius. How this is so he says by the appositional clause a burden to the weary, viz.: beast.

What is said ver. 1 of Bel and Nebo is generalized in ver. 2. All the gods together must bow and fall down. They are not able to slip off, let go the load. (See Text. and Gram.). In these words and in the following their soul (person) is gone into captivity (see Text. and Gram.), the Prophet proceeds on the distinction between the idols themselves, the (relatively) transcendent numinibus and the simulacris representing these; a distinction that heathen belief made in thesi at least originally, but gradually in praxi carried out with as little consistency as does the Romish church with its images of the saints (comp. Friedr. Naegelsbach, Nachhomer, Theol. des griech. Volksglaubens, I. § 3, and V. § 11). Thus the meaning of our passage is they are not able to bring it about that the burden of the images shall slip away (viz.: from the hands of the enemy) as some smooth, slippery object. Were the gods of the heathen really gods, the Prophet would say, then they would be able to effect this, massive as they are. In that case the distinction between the god and his image would be justified. But as the gods do not deliver their images, it results that there is no distinction between them, and the gods are not something better and higher. They are in fact אֱלִילִים.

nothings. If the image goes into captivity, then in fact the idol himself is dragged forth, all that belongs to his substance, for out of the image he does not exist. Babylon was especially rich in extraordinarily costly images of the gods. Read e. g., in HERODOTUS (I. 183) the description of the colossal, golden images in the temple of Bel, which moreover neither Cyrus nor Darius Hystaspis touched, notwithstanding the Persian religion recognized no worship of images. It was Xerxes that first took away the massive golden image twelve yards high (HEROD. l. c.).

3. Hearken unto me——deliver you.—Vers. 3, 4. These verses form an admirable contrast with vers. 1, 2. The gods are carried to their disgrace; Jehovah carries His people. And He, the strong One, carries them as tenderly and lovingly as a mother her child. Because He would say something earnest and important, He summons the people to give special heed: hearken unto me. It is little probable, in my opinion, that "house of Jacob" means Judah, while all the remnant of the house of Israel means Israel that in the Assyrian Exile was already for the most part denationalized. First, כֹּל seems to me to conflict with that, and then the Prophet no where else designates the Israel exiled in Assyria as שְׁאֵרִית. This expression ("remnant") is an honorable title designating the quintessence of the whole nation, without distinction of tribe, that remains after all siftings (comp. vi. 13; x. 20 sqq.). This quintessence belongs to the last time, the old age of the nation. I find, therefore, a reference in the expression to ver. 4 a, and that by כֹּל the thought is expressed that we find e. g., Jer. iii. 14, viz.: that no one belonging to the "remnant," even though he may dwell most concealed and solitary, will be forgotten. In what follows, the motherly love of God is described. For God is Father and Mother in one person, and His love bears not only a masculine but also a feminine character (comp. xlii. 14; xlix. 15; lxvi. 9, 13). All Israel, at once after its birth, "from the belly" or "womb," thus immediately after its entrance on history as a nation (Jer. ii. 2), has been born in the arms by the LORD, as a mother carries her little child (comp. lxiii. 9). The form: מִנִּי (only here in Isaiah comp. מִנֶּנִּי xxx. 11) is meant likely to impart an emphasis to the notion involved in the preposition: as if from the mother's womb. But Jehovah was not a mother only to the youthful Israel; He continues so when it has become old; and even to old age (Israel's of course) I am the same, ver. 4 (comp. xli. 4). This is something that does not otherwise happen. Only small children are carried, not men and the old. But Jehovah devotes to Israel this maternal care, mutatis mutandis, to the very last. Did He not make Israel, as He repeatedly assures them (xliii. 7, comp. xliii. 1, 21; xliv. 2, 21, 24; xlv. 11)? The LORD, says the Prophet, will not forsake His own work. As a mother at one moment lifts her child over an obstacle, at another even carries it a stretch in her arms, until every difficulty and danger is overcome, so the LORD will do to His people even to their old age, i. e., till they have reached the end of their course. Therefore what a difference between Jehovah and idols! The latter let themselves be borne by their worshippers, and then they are borne on beasts of burden to go into captivity. But Jehovah carries His people with maternal tenderness from the beginning to the end. Now who is God? Whom shall one fear and love? Whom trust?

2. ISRAEL SHALL LEARN TO KNOW ITS GOD BY THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN HIM AND THE IMAGES THAT REPRESENT HIM, WHICH ALSO MUST BE CARRIED.

CHAPTER XLVI. 5–7.

5 To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal,
And compare me, that we may be like?
6 They lavish gold out of the bag,
And weigh silver in the balance,
And hire a goldsmith; and he maketh it a god:
They fall down, yea, they worship.
7 They bear him upon the shoulder, they carry him,
And set him in his place, and he standeth;
From his place shall he not remove:
Yea, one shall cry unto him, yet can he not answer,
Nor save him out of his trouble.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 5. מָשַׁל. Ver. 6. זוּלִים.

Ver. 5. The suffix of תדמיוני is to be supplied for תשוו; also למי relates to ותמשלני. ונדמה has for common subject the LORD and the image that represents Him.

Ver. 6. The entire first half of the verse is subject, only that with ישקלו there is a return from the participle to the finite verb זָלִים is derived from זול, "to pour out, pour away, throw away," from which there comes only a Hiphil form (Lam. i. 8), and the substantive זוּלָה "remotio" (hence זוּלַת praeter).

Ver. 7. תחתיו (comp. xxv. 10) is conceived of substantively — inferiora ejus, the place lying under it. The accusative is the acc. loci, denoting whither.—— יִצְעַק has an ideal, indefinite subject ("one" or "they") to which the suffixes in צרתו and יושיענו relate.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Now the Prophet shows up the folly of that idolatry, which would make images of Jehovah Himself. The prohibition of this was impliedly contained in the general prohibition of images (Exodus xx. 4; comp. Deut. iv. 12, 15; v. 8). Even Aaron trangressed this by setting up the golden calf, which pretended to be a symbol of Jehovah Himself (Exod. xxxii. 5). The image of Gideon (Judg. viii. 27) and of Micah (Judg. xvii. 4, 13) and the two golden calves of Jeroboam at Bethel and Dan (1 Kings xii. 26 sqq.) were trangressions of the same sort. Comp. MICHAELIS, Laws of Moses, V., § 245. HENGSTENBERG, Introduc. to O. Test. II. All these symbolical figures of beasts were of gold or silver. It was only exceptional where, according to xl. 20, poorer people contented themselves with wooden images. But all were in conflict with the eternal truth that it is impossible to make a likeness of the incomparable, invisible God.

It is worthy of note that the Prophet began in xl. 17 sqq. his polemic against idolatry by an attack on this finer form of it, and here concludes with just such an attack. For in the Ennead xl. —xlviii., after our passage, there does not occur again any actual polemic against idolatry. The words of ver. 5 recall xl. 18, 25. The words hire a goldsmith and he maketh, etc., ver. 6, recall Judg. xvii. 4.

In ver. 7 the idea of carrying is emphasized, not without reason: that image, too, made in the likeness of Jehovah is nothing but heavy, vulgar matter, that needs as much to be carried as those Babylonian images of imaginary gods. Manifestly the Prophet would here obviate the objection that images of Jehovah were not to be regarded like other idol images. He answers: Since they must be borne, they are no better than the others.

3. ISRAEL SHALL LEARN TO KNOW THE TRUE GOD FROM HIS PROPHESYING AND FULFILLING. CHAPTER XLVI. 8–11.

8 Remember this, and [a]show yourselves men:
Bring it again to mind, O ye [b]transgressors.
9 Remember the former things of old:
[c]For I am God, and there is none else
I am God, and there is none like me,
10 Declaring the end from the beginning,
And from ancient times the things that are not yet done,
Saying, My counsel shall stand,
And I will do all my pleasure:
11 Calling a ravenous bird from the east,
[1]The man that executeth my counsel from a far country:
Yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass;
I have purposed it, I will also do it.

[1] Heb. The man of my counsel.

[a] be firm. [b] apostates. [c] That.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 8. פשעים—זָכַר. Ver. 10. רֵאשִׁית—and comp. מֵרֹאשׁ. Ver. 11. עַיִט.

Ver. 8. התאששו is any way ἅπ. λεγ. It is certain that it does not come from אֵשׁ, as Jos. KIMCHI maintains, and after him VITRINGA, ROSENMUELLER (ed. II.), etc. For what can "inflammamini, incendimini" mean? The meanings "confundamini" "be ashamed" (JEROME), or "be full of zeal" (VITRINGA) are certainly much forced.

The derivation from אִישׁ (ἀνδρίζεσθε, comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 13) is, grammatically and as to sense, not impossible. For if התאשש be taken as a denominativum, it does not matter that no trace remains in it of the original נ (אֱנֹשׁ—אִישׁ, comp. אִשָּׁה). In the case of weak roots Hithpalel (הִתְקַוֹּמֵם, becomes הִתְקוֹמֵם) is the usual formation. And the Prophet might fittingly say, that Israel ought at last to be a man, to press on to ἡλικία, and no longer waver between Jehovah and idols (1 Kings xviii. 21).

But הִתְאֹשָׁשׁ cannot be made out of אִישׁ just as well הִתְבּוֹנֵן may be made from בִּין, because in the latter there was actually at first a ו, whereas there was not in אִישׁ. I agree, therefore, with those (D. KIMCHI, HITZIG, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH, comp. OLSH., § 272, a, and 274) who derive התאשש from אָשַׁשׁ (Arabic assa) "fundavit, stabilivit." Of this אָשַׁשׁ Isaiah uses also the substantive אֲשִׁישִׁים xvi. 7—fundamenta, i. e., the foundations lying bare as ruins.

Ver. 9. כָּמוֹנִי stands after אֶפֶס only here. Comp. xlv. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

We have had what I may call two negative arguments for the divinity of Jehovah from the case of the Babylonian idols (vers. 1–4), and from the symbolic images of Jehovah, that are no better (vers. 5–7). Here that positive argument is pressed very emphatically, which, by its being five times repeated, prepared for the mention of the name of Cyrus, and is now finally mentioned as the chief result gained by that naming. This argument is based on the assumption that only God can prophesy and fulfil (vers. 8–10), and He will certainly bring into existence that bird of prey that He has called out of the East to be the executor of His counsel. Because the Prophet passes to another kind of argument, he makes here a (relative) conclusion by exhorting the people to impress well on their memory what they have just heard (xliii. 18; xliv. 21), and to lay it to heart. This they were to do in order to be fixed. (See Text. and Gram.). For Israel in the Exile it was assuredly the chief task, to whose accomplishment our chaps. xl.–lxvi. were greatly to contribute, to be at last firmly grounded in the knowledge of Jehovah and in His exclusive worship. On bring it again to mind see on xliv. 19. By a second Remember, ver. 9, the Prophet requires one to recall the old prophecies in the sense of the argumentation often used by him (comp. xli. 21 sqq.; xlii. 9; xliii. 8–13, 19–21; xliv. 6–10, 24–28), by which as here, he infers the divinity of Jehovah from His ability to foretell the future, and that idols are nothing because of their inability in this respect. By ראשׁנות and מעולם, therefore, I understand things that occurred in the period of the ראשׁית (comp. ver. 10) which look over hither from an immeasurably distant past (מעולם). But by these old things the Prophet understands ancient prophecies (comp. on xli. 22), as clearly appears from ver. 10. The clause with כִּי contains what will be verified by looking back to those old prophecies, viz., that Jehovah alone is God. כִּי is thus no causal particle, but = that. The participial clauses vers. 10, 11, declaring from the beginning the issue, etc., contain the proofs: remember what is old, viz., that I am God, as He that announces from the beginning and fulfils in its time. If then the clause with כִּי ver. 9 b is explanatory of "remember," etc., and if this explanation consists in this, that the divinity of Jehovah should be known from His prophesying and fulfilling, then it is manifest that one must actually tear the words "remember the former things of old" from the context if he would have them mean an exhortation to "earnestly search out history" in general. ואין עוד see xlv. 5, 6, 14, 18, 21. אל and אלהים correspond here in parallelism as they do often not in parallelism (Exod. xx. 5; Num. xvi. 22; Josh. xxii. 22; Ps. l. 1, etc.). Apart from the meaning of the word in itself, the plural has more an abstract meaning = divinity, highest being (comp. אֲדֹנִים קָשֶׁה xix. 4). Ver. 10. The participles מגיד, אמר, קרא depend on the chief notion to be proved, thus on אל and אלהים, not on the secondary notion כָּמוֹנִי. For Jehovah is God as He who from the beginning (before it germinated xlii. 9; xliii. 19) announced the issue.

The second part of ver. 10 enhances what precedes by declaring the firm purpose of carrying out what has been announced. Finally ver. 11 presents to view this execution. He that is called from the East (xli. 2, 25) is Cyrus. He is compared to a bird of prey that swoops on its quarry. Doubtless the noblest of the kind, the eagle is meant. It is possible that עַיִט is radically kindred to ἀετός, but it is not proved. The eagle was a sacred bird to the Persians. According to XENOPHON (Cyrop. VII. 1, 4) the standard of Cyrus and also of his successors was an "ἀετὸς χρυσοῦς ἐπὶ δόρατος μακροῦ ἀνατεταμένος." Still in the time of the younger Cyrus the royal standard of the Persians was an ἀετὸς χρυσοῦς ἐπὶ πέλτης (ἐπὶ ξύλου) ἀνατεταμένος (XENOPH. Anab. I. 10, 12). AESCHYLUS also (Pers. 205–210), into a portentous sign that Atossa sees, introduces the Persians under the image of an eagle, the Greeks under the image of a falcon. Comp. DUNCKER Gesch. d. Alterth. II. p. 368 sq. איש עצתו is not here as in xl. 13 the fellow-counsellor, but the one called by God Himself to execute His counsel. In conclusion, by a double disjunctive clause, the assurance is emphatically given, that what the LORD has said and projected (יצר xxxvii. 26; xxii. 11) in spirit He will surely bring to pass. Here again, also, the LORD pledges His honor that His prophecy, long before announced, shall be fulfilled by Cyrus, and that thereby His, Jehovah's divinity will be proved.

4. GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS AND SALVATION MUST COME SPITE OF ISRAEL'S HARDNESS OF HEART. Chapter XLVI. 12, 13.

12 Hearken unto me, ye stout hearted,
That are far from righteousness:
13 I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off,
And my salvation shall not tarry:
And I will [a]place salvation in Zion
[b]For Israel my glory.

[a] give. [b] To.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These two verses respond briefly but plainly to an objection or doubt that might be raised against the representations of vers. 1–11. Will Israel suffer itself to be led to the right knowledge of God by the positive and negative proofs just presented (vers. 1–4, 5–7), or even by the positive demonstration, when the prophecy about Cyrus is fulfilled (vers. 8–11)? The Lord knows that Israel is stout-hearted. This is meant in a bad sense, like that described xlviii. 4, "because I knew that thou art obstinate, and thy neck is an iron sinew, and thy brow brass;" comp. lvi. 11. The obstinate, haughty, self-righteous heart is naturally far from the righteousness of God, for it has, for the purpose of being right, not the objective, divine norm, but only a subjective, self-made norm. There were many such hard, proud hearts in Israel. Proud self-righteousness characterizes the nation (Rom. x. 3). Still the Lord, whose gifts and calling are without repentance (Rom. xi. 29), will fulfil His promises. Note that ver. 12 begins with hearken unto me, as does ver. 3. Thus it appears that the two verses are co-ordinated. With ver. 3 begins the proof of the threefold gain that shall come to Israel by the destruction of Babylon. Ver. 12 mentions the doubt that may be raised against it. This close relation to ver. 3 is indicated by their beginning in the same way. Ver. 13 resolves the doubt briefly and effectively. The almighty, gracious will of God toward Israel as a whole is not to be frustrated by the unworthiness of individuals. Spite of the evil condition referred to, ver. 12, He will bring in his righteousness. As the Prophet here expressly distinguishes between righteousness and salvation, we must take "righteousness" here in the sense of the "quality of righteous," conformity to the divine will. ["One denotes the cause and the other the effect, one relates to God, and the other to man. The sense in which salvation can be referred to the righteousness of God is clear from chap. i. 27. (See Vol. I., p. 93.) The exhibition of God's righteousness consists in the salvation of His people and the simultaneous destruction of His enemies. To these two classes it was therefore at the same time an object of desire and dread.—J. A. Alex.] The Lord will yet, spite of the natural unrighteousness of Israel, raise up in Israel the righteousness that avails with Him. But this is the precedent condition of salvation.—Both will come at the right time; if perhaps late, still not too late. Then the city of Zion will be full of salvation, and the people full of the glory of Jehovah. Thus God's gracious will toward Israel will be fulfilled under all circumstances. Even Israel's sins will not be able to prevent its salvation.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlvi. 3, 4. "It is something that God will be with us, will strengthen us, help and preserve us by the right hand of His righteousness (xli. 10); it is something that He calls us by our name, and is with us in water and fire (xliii. 1); it is something that He holds us as a seal and signet ring (Hag. ii. 23); it is something that He holds us as the apple of His eye (Ps. xvii. 8), that He carries us on His wings (Deut. xxxii. 11), yea, that He gathers us under His wings (Matth. xxiii. 37),—but this exceeds all, that God is willing to be so nearly related to us, that He will carry us under His heart, like a mother does the fruit of her body, and that not only like a mother, who carries the fruit no longer than nine months, but to the greatest and grayest age. Thus the love, fidelity, and services of God far exceed all motherly love, fidelity and services, great as these may be (xlix. 15)."—Cramer.

2. On xlvi. 5–8. It is remarkable how deep-seated in the natural man is the desire to comprehend the divinity visibly, in a corporeal form. But God forbids it. First, because it is impossible to represent divinity under any adequate and worthy image; second, because the danger is so great that the image will be taken for the divinity itself. God would be worshipped as a spirit in spirit (Jno. iv. 24). The Son of God appeared in the flesh, and if there ever was a corporeal form that was worthy and able to be to divinity the medium of its visible manifestation, then it was the corporality of Christ. But this was only visible to His contemporaries. Were it necessary to the church ever to have before its eyes the bodily figure of the Lord, the Lord would surely have provided for that, as He has indeed provided that His Spirit and word shall continue preserved to us. But men would certainly have made an idol of the image of the Lord. The Roman Catholic Church has succeeded in heathenizing what is most Christian of all, by making the host in the LORD's Supper to be a transmutation into the visible body of the LORD. There that deep-seated heathen tendency finds then its gratification. There we have a visible image, that would however represent the LORD as an object of worship. There God Himself is made an idol!

3. On xlvi. 12 sq. Were it necessary for us men to deserve the coming of the Redeemer He would never come. Can the physician only come when the sick man has disposed himself to recovery (Luke v. 31)? No, it is just sinners that attract the LORD. They need Him. He calls them to repentance, with them His righteousness finds a place. But a distinction is to be made here between the heard-hearted sinners that will not hear of the righteousness of God, and those sinners that would willingly be quit of it. Were we men only of the former sort, the door would be closed here on earth against all God's purposes of salvation.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlvi. 3, 4. "Every Christian ought to believe that God will do this for Him. For His mercies, promised to us in Christ, are neither small nor few. Far as the heaven is from the earth, and the east from the west, such is the mercy of God, if we only abide therein and do not tear ourselves away from it by wanton sinning. For we were not baptized that we might have a gracious God for ten or twenty years. He would be our God in eternity, and forever and ever, most of all when we are in distress and need a God and Helper, as in the straits of death and other danger. Therefore we should be afraid of nothing, but have the certain hope: the greater the distress we encounter, the more will God be near us with His help." VEIT DIETRICH.

2. On xlvi. 3, 4. THE MATERNAL LOVE OF GOD. 1) It provides for all (great and small). 2) It ever provides (even to old age).

3. On xlvi. 5. "What we are and what we are not we ever best learn when we men contrast ourselves with God. Who can measure how small our time is compared with His eternity. He can and will challenge us in everything and say: 'to whom will ye compare me, that we may be like?' Yet the Psalm attempts it: 'A thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past,' and what to Him is the succession of generations of men?" THOLUCK.

4. [On xlvi. 10. My counsel shall stand. This proves, (1.) That God has a purpose or plan in regard to human affairs. If He had not, He could not predict future events; (2). That God's plan will not be frustrated. He has power enough to secure the execution of His designs, and He will exert that power in order that all His plans may be accomplished. We may observe, also, that it is a matter of unspeakable joy that God has a plan, and that it will be executed. For (1) if there were no plan in relation to human things, the mind could find no rest. If there was no evidence that One Mind presided over human affairs; that an infinitely wise plan had been formed, and that all things had been adjusted so as best to secure the ultimate accomplishment of that plan, everything would have the appearance of chaos, and the mind must be filled with doubts and distractions. But our anxieties vanish in regard to the apparent irregularities and disorders of the universe, when we feel that all things are under the direction of an Infinite Mind. (2) If His plans were not accomplished there would be occasion of equal doubt and dismay. If there was any power that could defeat the purposes of God; if there was any stubbornness of matter, or any inflexible perverseness in the nature of mind; if there were any unexpected and unforeseen extraneous causes that could interpose to thwart His plans, then the mind must be full of agitation and distress. But the moment it can fasten on the conviction that God has formed a plan that embraces all things, and that all things which occur will be in some way made tributary to that plan, that moment the mind can be calm in resignation to His holy will." BARNES].

5. On xlvi. 12, 13. THE RIGHTEOUSNESS THAT AVAILS WITH GOD. 1) Who brings it about (ver. 13 a); 2) who lays hold on it (not the proud and self-righteous ver. 12, but the believing); 3) what are its effects (ver. 13 b, salvation and glory).

VIII.—THE EIGHTH DISCOURSE.

The Fall of Babylon, the Causes of it, and the Uselessness of the Means to prevent it.

CHAPTER XLVII.

1. THE FALL OF BABYLON AND THE CAUSES OF IT.

CHAPTER XLVII. 1-7.

1 COME down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon,
Sit on the ground:
[a]There is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans:
For thou shalt no more be called tender and [b]delicate.
2 Take the millstones, and grind meal:
Uncover thy [c]locks, [d]make bare the leg,

Uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers.
3 Thy nakedness shall be uncovered,
Yea, thy shame shall be seen:
I will take vengeance,
[e]And I will not meet thee as a man.
4 [f]As for our redeemer, the LORD of hosts is his name,
The Holy One of Israel.
5 Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans:
For thou shalt no more be called, The lady of kingdoms.
6 I was wroth with my people,
I [g]have polluted mine inheritance,
And [g]given them into thine hand:
Thou didst shew them no mercy;
Upon the [h]ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.
7 And thou saidst, I shall be a lady forever:
So that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart,
Neither didst remember the latter end of it.

[a] without a throne. [b] voluptuous. [c] veil.
[d] lift up thy train. [e] And appeal to no man about it.
[f] omit As for. [g] polluted—gave. [h] aged.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Babylon, hitherto shining in splendor and luxury, is threatened with extreme degradation and exposure (vers. 1–3). Israel confesses with joy that it recognizes its Redeemer in Him that does this (ver. 4). The cause of this deep downfall is two-fold: 1) the severity against Israel that has exceeded the purpose of the LORD; 2) Babylon's secure defiance and haughtiness (vers. 5–7).

2. Come down——Holy One of Israel.—Vers. 1–4. The curt, monosyllabic imperatives רדי ושבי are the expression of a decided, relentless purpose. Babylon must come down, hard as it will be for it. In the dust, on the bare ground, without a throne it must sit, that hitherto was used to be high enthroned. For from an empress it has become a slave. But the slave, as the wretched and lowly generally, sits in the dust (comp. iii. 26, and the contrary description lii. 2). Hence the expressions "to lay, cast in the dust" (xxvi. 5 sq.; Job xvi. 15; xxx. 19; Ps. vii. 6), "to lie in the dust" (Ps. xxii. 30; cxix. 25), "to raise from the dust" (Ps. xliii. 7; 1 Sam. ii. 8; 1 Kings xvi. 2); "to lick the dust before one" (xlix. 23; Ps. lxxii. 9). In the same way it is said that the mourner does not sit on an elevated seat, but on the earth (Job ii. 13; Lam. ii. 10). The expressions tender and delicate ("abounding in voluptuousness") are taken from Deut. xxviii. 56, 54. Babylon is described as a city very greatly given up to luxury and voluptuousness, not only in the Bible (Jer. li. 39; Dan. v. 1 sqq.; comp. xxi. 5) but more still by profane writers. For instance CURTIUS, (V. I.) says: "Nihil urbis ejus corruptius moribus, nihil ad irritandas illiciendasque immodicas voluptates instructius." Comp. HEROD. I. 195, 199. Grinding grain with a hand-mill was chiefly the labor of female slaves, and it was even regarded as the hardest labor (Exod. xi. 5; Matt. xxiv. 41; Luke xvii. 35). Comp. HERZ. R.-Encycl. X. p. 82 sq. צַמָּה (from unused root צָמַם, Chald. צְמַם, "operuit, velavit") is the veil (comp. Song of Solomon iv. 1, 3; vi. 7). As is well-known, the women in parts of the Orient consider it a greater disgrace to let their face be seen than other parts of their bodies. שֹׁבֶל (from שָׁבַל unused = fluxit, defluxit, comp. שִׁבֹּלֶת xxvii. 12; Judg. xii. 6) is the flowing garment, "border, train." When the female slave comes to a stream in the way that can be forded, she is not carried over, as are ladies. She must wade through; no regard is paid to her womanly modesty. עֶרְוָה and חֶרְפָּה correspond in the parallelism; hence the latter must be taken in essentially the same sense as the former. That the ערוה is seen is a חרפה. Comp. iii. 17; Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Ezek. xvi. 37; Nah. iii. 5. Thus the LORD threatens the Babylonians. What He intends by these judgments He says ver. 3 b: I will take vengeance. The negative clause ולא אפגע את is understood in a great variety of ways. פגע means "irruere, incidere, obviam ire, pertinere," then also, in a friendly sense "precibus insistere, to apply to one." It does not suit here to take the word in a hostile sense: "I will run on none" (STIER), which only makes sense by arbitrarily supplying: "out of whose way I must get." ["The true sense is that expressed by ROSENMUELLER, I shall encounter no man, i. e., no man will be able to resist me. This simple explanation is at the same time one of the most ancient, as we find it distinctly expressed by SYMMACHUS (οὐκ ἀντιτήσεταί μοι ἄνθρωπος) and in the VULGATE (non resistet mihi homo.—J. A. ALEX.]. I do not think it right to take the word in the sense of "to protect, pardon" for the reason that there ever lies in פגע the meaning obvenire, thus the notion of "going against, getting in the way of." I cannot see why the well-approved meaning "to apply to one with petition or intercession" (Job xxi. 15; Ruth ii. 22; Jer. vii. 16; xxvii. 18) may not suit our context. Jehovah, as the only true God, neither desires nor uses human help. The taking of Babylon must appear as God's doing, not as a fact accomplished by human power. And if it be asked, what God has showed Himself stronger than the gods of Babylon, thus who is the accomplisher of the said divine doing, Israel alone has the correct reply when it cries out: Our Redeemer, Jehovah of hosts is His name (comp. xlviii. 2; liv. 5), the Holy One of Israel (see List). These words do not fit to what follows, and as little are they suited to be an antiphonal-like conclusion of the preceding strophe. They give the impression of a joyful welcome greeting, which meets one approaching, and who is recognized as a friend.

3. Sit thou silent——end of it.—Vers. 5-7. The Prophet, ver. 5, declares once again in general the downfall of Babylon, as in ver. 1, but makes prominent another contrast. There the contrast was between the loftiest height and the lowest humiliation; here it is between shining and darkness. Babylon shall now sit down in a still, dark place, she that before was the brilliant, far shining empress of kingdoms (xiii. 19). This repeated announcement of punishment finds its reason in vers. 6, 7. The Prophet assigns a double reason. First, Babylon abused the right of discipline deputed to it. The LORD was wroth with His people, and polluted His inheritance, by permitting profane heathen nations to trample land, city and Temple, and to carry away the holy people into captivity (comp. Lam. ii. 2; Ps. lxxiv. 7, etc.). But He would only discipline His people, not destroy them; whereas Babylon sought to do the latter by every means (comp. Jer. l. 11, 24, 28, 29, 31 sq.; li. 6, 11, 24, 34 sqq. 56; Zech. i. 15). For it shewed them no mercy (the expression שׂוּם רַחֲמִים only here). Even old age was not spared (comp. Lam. iv. 16; v. 12). I am, with DELITZSCH, of the opinion that by זָקֵן we are not to understand the nation as one grown old. The Prophet that wrote xl. 28 sqq., could hardly represent Israel, even in the Exile, as a worn-out old man. The second reason for the humiliation that threatens Babylon is its haughtiness. This mirrors to it the illusion of its dominion lasting forever. And by reason of this illusion (עַד = "so that," comp. 1 Sam. xx. 41; Job viii. 21; xiv. 6) Babylon does not lay to heart the guilt with which it is loaded because of its treatment of Israel, therefore it does not in the least think (comp. xlvi. 8) on the consequences of that treatment, viz: the vengeance (comp. l. c., and Jer. l. li.), it must provoke.—ישׂים על לב xlii. 25; lvii. 1, 11. הֵשִׁיב עַל לֵב xliv. 19; xlvi. 8. יָשִׂים לִבּוֹ xli. 22. עָלָה עַל לֵב lxv. 17.

☞ 2. THE FRUITLESSNESS OF THE MEANS EMPLOYED TO SAVE BABYLON.

CHAPTER XLVII. 8-15.

8 [a]Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures,
That dwellest carelessly,
That [b]sayest in thine heart,
I am, and none else beside me;
I shall not sit as a widow,
Neither shall I know the loss of children:
9 But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day,
The loss of children, and widowhood:
They shall come upon thee in their perfection
[c]For the multitude of thy sorceries,
And [c]for the great abundance of thine enchantments.
10 [d]For thou hast trusted in thy wickedness:
Thou hast said, None seeth me.
Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath [1]perverted thee;
And thou hast said in thine, heart, I am, and none else beside me.
11 [e]Therefore shall evil come upon thee;
[f]Thou shalt not know [2]from whence it riseth:
And mischief shall fall upon thee;
Thou shalt not be able to [3]put it off:
And desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know.
12 Stand now with thine enchantments,
And with the multitude of thy sorceries,
Wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth;
[g]If so be thou shalt be able to profit,

[g]If so be thou mayest [h]prevail.
13 Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels.
Let now the [4]astrologers, the stargazers,
[5][i]The monthly prognosticators,
Stand up, and save thee
From these things that shall come upon thee.
14 Behold, they shall be as stubble;
The fire [k]shall burn them;
They shall not deliver [6]themselves from the power of the flame:
[l]There shall not be a coal to warm at.
Nor fire to sit before it.
15 Thus shall they be unto thee with whom thou hast laboured,
Even thy merchants, from thy youth:
They shall wander every one to his quarter;
None shall save thee.

[1] Or, caused thee to turn away.
[3] Heb. expiate.
[5] Heb. that give knowledge concerning the months.
[2] Heb. the morning thereof.
[4] Heb. viewers of the heavens.
[6] Heb. their souls.

[a] And now hear this, thou delicious.
[d] And thou wast secure in.
[f] Which they shall not know how to exorcise.
[i] Who every month give report from them what shall come on thee.
[l] Which is no glow of coals for their bread.
[b] says in her heart.
[e] but evil comes.
[g] Perhaps.
[k] has burned.
[c] Spite of.
[h] terrify.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 8. אֶפֶס—עֲדִינָה—וְעַתָּה, which occurs forty-three times in the Old Testament. Especially the turn of expression אפס בלעדי or ואפס עוד is encountered relatively so often in these chapters (xlv. 6, 14; xlvi. 9; xlvii. 8, 10), that it may be regarded as a peculiarity of them. Only 2 Sam. ix. 3 does the expression again occur. Hence we are justified in regarding it as an Isaianic expression, and thus a proof of our passage being genuine Isaianic. Ver. 9. חֲבָרִים—כְּשָׁף—רֶגַע. Ver. 11. הוֹה. Ver. 12. חֶבֶר. Ver. 15. לְעֶבְרוֹ.

Ver. 9. עֲדִינָה from עֶדֶן, only Neh. ix. 25, an adjective corresponding to the substantive עֵדֶן.—יֹשֵׁב לָבֶטַח occurs only here in Isaiah; but comp. xiv. 30. The expression is in the Pentateuch: Lev. xxv. 18, 19; xxvi. 5; comp. Judg. xviii. 7. It is more common in the later prophets: Jer. xxxii. 37; xlix. 31; Ezek. xxviii. 26; xxxiv. 25, etc. Especially Zeph. ii. 15 is to be noted, where the expression עִיר עַלִּיזָה is borrowed from Isa. xxii. 2; xxxii. 13, and the remainder of the verse from our passage. Even זֹאת הָעִיר in Zeph. shows that what follows is a citation. עַלִּיזָה is undoubtedly taken from the undisputed Isaianic passages xxii. 2; xxxii. 13; for beside Zeph. ii. 15; iii. 11, the expression occurs only in Isaiah.——The ִי in אפסי is very difficult to explain. Most expositors take it as י compaginis (thus = אֶפֶס עוֹד). But this י is superfluous, and at the same time incorrect where there is no genitive relation. Hahn takes it as a feminine י, as in אַתְּי, קָטַלְתִּי, ־ִכִי; but the Hebrew knows no distinction of gender in the first person. De Dieu and Coccejus take the clause as a question; Vitringa and Nolde regard אַפְסִי as representing a doubled אפס אפס (et non est praeter me alia). But the question is not self-evident and must be indicated, and the absence of אֶפֶס or אַיִן is unexampled. It is best, with Delitzsch, to take אפסי in the sense of אֵינִי (אֵינֶנִּי): ego utique non sum amplius; therefore: I am not, as it were, found again in another sample. The sense would then be the same as אפס כמוני xlvi. 9.

Ver. 9. כְּשָׁפַיִךְ, from כֶּשֶׁף, of uncertain meaning. Piel, "to bewitch, conjure," (Exod. vii. 11; xxii. 17; Deut. xviii. 10, etc.), occurs only in the plural, and in Isaiah only here and ver. 12 (comp. Mic. v. 11; Nah. iii. 4; 2 Kings ix. 22). Also חֲבָרִים from חָבַר "ligare, fascinare, to bind," especially to bind by enchantment, thus "to exorcise" (Deut. xviii. 11; Ps. lviii. 6) occurs only here and ver. 12.——עָצְמַת מְאֹד is explained 1) from the verbal construction, and 2) from the qualitative meaning of עָצְמָה (xl. 29).

Ver. 10. רֹאָנִי stands in pause for רֹאֶנִי and this for רֹאֵנִי (1 Chron. xii. 17).

Ver. 12. בְּ, with which עִמְדִי is here conjoined, is that of accompaniment: in the midst of her witchcrafts, etc., therefore, according to our idiom with her witchcraft, etc., shall Babylon stand up (comp. vii. 24; xxiv. 9; xxx. 29, etc.).——בַּאֲשֶׁר stands here oddly instead of the normal אֲשֶׁר יָגַעַתְּ בָּם. This is one of the rare instances in which the adverbial אֲשֶׁר appears in transition to an actual pronoun (Gen. xxxi. 32; Gesen., § 123, 2; Comm. in loc.).——יָגַע with בְּ as in xliii. 22, 23, 24; lxii. 8.

Ver. 13. עֲצָתָיִךְ is an abnormal formation, the plural suffix being attached to the nom. singular. Analogous examples occur Ps. ix. 15; Ezek. xxxv. 11; Ezra ix. 15. If it is not an error of writing, the abnormal suffix form is to be explained by the plural meaning of the collective in connection with the ת of the connecting form, as also other feminine endings in ת that are not plurals (as ות in אַחְוֹת, בְּנוֹת infin., ־ִית, ־ֻת, in שְׁבִית, זְנוּת, etc.), occur with plural suffixes.——הֹבְרֵי שָׁמַיִם, so K'ri; K'thibh reads הָבְרוּ—אֲשֶׁר הָבְרוּ.——הָבַר. ἅπ. λεγ., means, according to the dialects, "to divide, distribute." Still this meaning is not quite assured. Hence KNOBEL would take the word, according to the Arab. chabara, in the sense of "gnari, those acquainted with the heavens;" but HAHN, following HITZ. on Dan. ii. 26, would read הֹבְרֵי (בָּרַר "to investigate," Eccl. iii. 18; ix. 1).

Ver. 14. To take לַחְמָם for לְחַמָּם ("for warming") seems to me forced. Moreover, what follows would then be tautology. I side with those who explain גַּחֶלֶת לַחְמָם according to xliv. 19: the coals of their bread, i. e., the glow of the coals, on which they bake their bread.——אֲשֶׁר accusative of nearer definition.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Therefore hear——beside Me.—Vers. 8–10. The whole section vers. 8–15 is mainly intended to show how ill-founded is that confidence of Babylon expressed in ver. 7, "I shall be a lady forever." First, the Prophet makes Babylon repeat the assertion in an amplified form (ver. 8). With the contrastive "now however (comp. xliii. 1; xliv. 1) hear this" he introduces an address to Babylon, whom he here designates as a delicious one, as in ver. 1 he calls it "delicate and voluptuous." Then he calls it "the one dwelling in security" because it knows no superior power, and thus no possibility of molestation (see Text. and Gram.). I, and none else; by this Babylon affirms that it is solitary of its kind, its like will no more be found. This is justly regarded as blasphemous pride. For the expression employed here recalls xlv. 5, 6, 18, 22; xlvi. 9, where God, who alone has the right to do it, affirms His incomparableness. Babylon affirms that it shall be neither a widow nor childless. Most expositors understand by widowhood the ἀβασίλεια. But KNOBEL and DELITZSCH justly object, that in ancient times kings were by no means regarded as the husbands of their cities or nations. Hence the widowhood is rather the being forsaken of the nations with which it had hitherto had active commerce (according to the Biblical view πορνεία xxiii. 16 sq.; Rev. xviii. 9), thus sad loneliness, exclusion from intercourse with the world (Lam. i. 1). HAHN understands the widowhood to mean, forsaken of God, or the gods (comp. liv. 4 sqq.). But one must guard against transferring theocratic representations to heathen relations. It is agreed by all that being childless means depopulation (comp. liv. 1 sqq.). Yet these strokes, so undreaded, will still come; and that not slowly, by degrees, but suddenly and in one day (ix. 13; x. 17; lxvi. 8), i. e., not in intervening periods one after another, but all at once. כְּתֻמָּם, "according to the measure of its completion," i. e., completely and totally (comp. לְתֻמּוֹ 1 Kings xxii. 34) they are come upon thee (perf. prophet.) spite of thine arts of sorcery and the great abundance of thine enchantments. Almost all expositors agree that בְּ signifies, with a certain irony, the useless presence, the unsuccessful connection and application, and thus corresponds to our "spite of, for all your." Comp. v. 25; ix. 11, 16. 20; x. 4; Num. xiv. 11; Deut. i. 32; Ps. lxxviii. 32. There lies in this the characteristic ingredient of this strophe: spite of all the means resorted to, Babylon must fall.

Babylon is celebrated as the home of astronomy, astrology and magic (comp. IDELER, Sternkunde der Chald. in den Abhandl. d. Berl. Akad. d. Wissensch., 1814, 1815, Berlin, 1818; GESEN. im Komm. zu Jes. Beilage II.). Just these secret sciences and arts were relied upon as important means of protection against misfortunes of all kinds. Ver. 10 may not be translated: "and thou reliest on thy wickedness," as is done by most exegetes. For if by wickedness be understood tyranny and craft, that will not comport with: none seeth me. In fact this latter expresses just the ground of confidence. The same objection holds against our understanding by "wickedness" the false wisdom. But if רָעָה be understood to mean godlessness itself, i. e., the belief that there is no God, all-wise, all-holy, and all-mighty, then again it could not be said: thou reliest on thy godlessness; just as little as it may be said: the pious man relies on his faith. As one must say: the pious man is confident in or by his faith, so, too, the Prophet's meaning here must be: and thou wast secure in thy godlessness, thou saidst, There is none that sees me. Of course, there is here the underlying assumption, that the idols are no proper gods, all-wise, just and almighty avengers of the wicked. For the Prophet seems not to think at all of Babylon's idols being present. According to his view, they do not disturb the wicked. But Babylon was secure in all its wickedness and godlessness because it believed it dared say: no one is present that sees me. By this can only be meant a seeing higher than that of idols. I construe בָּטַח absolutely: securum esse, which is undoubtedly its meaning (Judg. xviii. 7, 10, 27; Jer. xii. 5; Job xl. 23; Prov. xi. 15). Therefore, we learn from these words that Babylon trusted, not only in outward things, as intimated in ver. 8, but that its proud confidence had also the inward ground, that it believed it might hold the conviction of there being no all-seeing God. So partly HAHN. The words: "there is none that seeth me," express the result of a reflection on things religious. There were also in Babylon theologians and philosophers whose wisdom and knowledge amounted to that אֵין רֹאֵנִי, whence the Prophet says to Babylon: thy wisdom and thy knowledge it hath perverted thee. Hence, when here a second time the words "I and none else" are ascribed to Babylon, it is to intimate that it so speaks, not only with reference to men, but even with reference to divinity. Babylon deifies itself, by exalting itself, not only above all men, but also above the gods.

2. Therefore shall evil——come upon thee.—Vers. 11-13. Babylon's overthrow is described as something that could neither be foreseen nor prevented. שַׁחְרָהּ rhymes with כַּפְּרָהּ, and hence is likely the same grammatical form, viz., inf. Piel. The meaning "dawn," though at first sight the most likely, does not commend itself, because the dawn of a misfortune cannot be the first moment of its appearance, for that would be a contradiction; nor can it be the first moment of its disappearance, for the end of a thing cannot be its dawn. HAHN's proposed rendering: "unblacken," is far-fetched. The rendering proposed, first by J. D. MICHAELIS, and accepted by most, best suits the context. This identifies שַׁחֲרָ with the Arabic Sachara, incantavit, and gives the translation: and evil will come upon thee which thou wilt not know how to exorcise. Thus ver. 11 says in three clauses that Babylon will have no means of warding off the misfortune. The first declares the inadequacy of magic, the second of idol-sacrifices, the third exposes the disgrace of astrology, which will not even be able to know of the evil in advance.

The vers. 12, 13 explain what is said in ver. 11. For the words: "thou shalt not know how to exorcise it" are evidently elucidated by ver. 12: try now the שַׁחֲר (exorcism) by חברים (enchantments) and כשפים (charms); may-be something will come of it! At the same time it seems to me that the כַּפֵּר is elucidated in ver. 12. For conjuring demons, as in general all sorts of sorcery were often joined with the offer of sacrifices, sometimes of pleasure, sometimes atrocious. "The relation of all idolatry with sorcery lies in this that in the names of the gods the name of God is abused for egoistic, sinful ends, with the application of self-elected, senseless and mercenary forms of religion," says LANGE in the article on witchcraft in HERZ. R. Enc. XVIII. p. 395. The second half of ver. 11 is elucidated by ver. 13. We will need to take עִמְדִי נא ונו׳ ver. 12 in the same sense as יעמדו־נא ver. 13. The latter can hardly be taken in the sense of "to remain standing." Hence we must also take עִמְד ver. 12 in the sense of "to stand forth, come on, stand up" (comp. GESEN. Thes. p. 1038), in which sense it is undeniably often used: 1 Sam. xvii. 51; 1 Kings xx. 38; Hab. iii. 11; Ezek. xxii. 30. From thy youth, thus from its first beginning Babylon had been busied with astrology, divination and magic. (Comp. DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. I. p. 124, 127 sq.). The Prophet ironically concludes his challenge to try what help they can find in their secret arts with a double "perhaps, if so be:" perhaps thou mayest be able to profit (positive), perhaps thou wilt terrify, viz. the enemy (negative). Ver. 13 relates to knowing future evil in advance, with reference to which the Prophet says ver. 11 b it shall not be. This is, of course, strange. For Babylon, from the earliest antiquity, practised divination, and especially astrological divination. The challenge of ver. 12 was attended with ill-success. Babylon worried itself in vain with its sorceries and enchantments. Thou art wearied by the multitude of thy counsels (see Text. and Gram.) i. e., by thy methodically arranged attempts (viz. in the sphere of enchantment); so the Prophet calls mockingly to the totality of the Babylonians. Therefore let some one help thee (ויושיען ver. 13), he continues. Let the astrologers appear now. This exposition results necessarily from the antithesis of נלאית and ויושיען. הֹבְרֵי שָׁמַיִם are those that divide the heavens, i. e., who mark off the heavens into fields (the so-called "houses") for the purpose of their observations (see Text. and Gram.). In any case astrologers, "masters of the course of heaven" are meant. They are also called חזים בכוכבים. I doubt very much whether חזה with בְּ has here the meaning "to contemplate, look with pleasure." חָזָה is used of prophetic seeing generally (i. 1; ii. 1; Amos i. 1; Mic. i. 1), and חֹזֶה is "a seer." Therefore חֹזִים בכ׳ may very well mean: those that look (viz. at the future) in the stars, or by means of the stars. In the words מודיעים וגו׳ the Prophet seems to intimate an arrangement whereby the astrologers monthly (לחדשים comp. xxvii. 3; xxxiii. 2) made communication to the people out of that which they had read in the stars (hence מאשר יבאו). We have here perhaps the first trace of the calendar of later times (παραπήγματα, ἀλμενιχιακά).

3. Behold they shall be——shall save thee, vers. 14, 15. In these verses is announced the final destiny of all those in whom Babylon trusted, and also its own destiny. The wise masters of Babylon are compared to stubble. Fire consumes them. Not precisely actual fire is meant. He only compares generally the power that overthrows Babylon to a fire that devours stubble. They will not be able to save even themselves, much less others. For the fire will be no moderate glow like that used for baking bread, or for a genial hearth-fire, before which one sits to get warm (see Text. and Gram.). Such are they become (continues ver. 15), respecting whom thou hast taken pains. This is said in reference to ver. 12. The home resources of power and deliverance so carefully cultivated in Babylon are meant. But the allies from abroad also, its business friends, the numerous admirers and worshippers, that of old (כנעריך to be referred to סחריך) came to Babylon to carry on trade and delight themselves, wander (involuntary departure from the way, being dispersed) off each to his vis-a-vis (לעברו only here; עֵבֶר is what lies directly before one), i. e. straight out. The word, therefore, does not mean: each to his home; but, as dispersed, they wander each his way in front of him (comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 1, 4, 40; Ezek. i. 9, 12; x. 22, etc.). That one may help Babylon is not to be thought of.—Therefore in the section vers. 8–15 it is proved in every direction that all props for Babylon give way, that all means of deliverance in which it hoped are refused.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlvii. 1 sqq. "Fortune is round and unstable in the world, and all transitory things must have an end, and they that go about them pass away with them (Ecclus. xiv. 19). For if the great Assyro-Babylonian empire could not last, but from a virgin and lady was made a serving maid, what must happen to other worldly things that can by no means be compared with it?" CRAMER.—["Let those that have power use it with temper and moderation, considering that the spoke which is uppermost will be under." M. HENRY.]

2. On xlvii. 6 sq. The minister of righteousness may himself become a transgressor if he does not execute the punishment according to the will of righteousness, but abuses his power of punishment for the gratification of his own love of violence. Thus there arises a chain-like connection of right and wrong that passes through all human history, till God, the only just One, solves all the discords of worldly judgments in the harmony of the world's judgment.

3. On xlvii. 9 sqq. Sorcery is devil-service. For he that uses any sort of enchantment seeks to attain some object by means of supernatural powers that are not the powers of God. For we, too, by God's power may do miracles and signs, as the holy men of God of the Old and New Testament show. But the power of God puts itself at the disposal of the office borne in God's name and by His commission, or of believing prayer (Matt. xvii. 20). But whoever would do miracles by hocus pocus of any kind, lets it be understood that he would make powers of the invisible world subservient to him, that are not the powers of God. But in the invisible world there are beside God's powers only the powers of the devil. That is the great peril of witchcraft. For the devil never works for nothing. He exacts the soul for it.

4. On xlvii. 10. The omnipresence and omniscience of God are quite extraordinarily onerous to the natural man. He can never enjoy his life for it. If he lives along, as he pleases, genio indulgens, there still comes to him ever and anon the secret voice that whispers: God sees it. Hence, to-day, as the Babylonians did, he employs all his knowledge and wisdom to make himself white, so that he may say: אֵין רֹאָנִי, no one sees me. He would rather let the laws of nature grind him to pieces, than acknowledge a personal God that sees and judges all things. This endeavor to get the personal God out of the world, that has its source equally in fear and hatred, has not, however, its roots in human nature as such. For then it must be found in all men. It is rather the hatred and fear of the devil that reflect themselves in those men who, according to Jno. viii. 41-48, have the devil for their father.

["Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness, as Doeg, Ps. iii. 7. Many have so debauched their own consciences, and have got to such a pitch of daring wickedness, that they stick at nothing; and this they trust to carry them through those difficulties which embarrass men who make conscience of what they say and do. They doubt not but they shall be too hard for all their enemies, because they dare lie, and kill, and foreswear themselves, and do anything for their interest. Thus they trust in their wickedness to secure them, which is the only thing that will ruin them." M. Henry.]

5. [On xlvii. 13. "I confess I see not how the judicial astrology which some now pretend to, by rules of which they undertake to prophesy concerning things to come, can be distinguished from that of the Chaldeans, nor therefore how it can escape the censure and contempt which this text lays that under. Yet I fear that there are some who study their almanacs, and regard them and their prognostications more than their Bibles and the prophecies there." M. Henry.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlvii. 1-7. The mighty in this world should guard well against two H's: 1) against Hardness toward the weak (ver. 6), for He avenges them (ver. 3); 2) against Haughtiness, for He humbles it (vers. 1-5, 7).

2. On xlvii. 12 sqq. Warning against superstition.—1) The essence of superstition: it is brother to unbelief (the unbeliever and superstitious) because it has lost what is truly transcendent, and hence, by reason of the ineffaceable drawing of men to what is super-terrestrial, falls into the hands of that which is false; the believer, on the other hand, is never superstitious, because as a child of God he knows that he is under the protection of the true, highest, super-terrestrial power. 2. The effects of superstition: a. it fosters coarse and refined idolatry; b. it robs men of the right comfort and the right help.

IX.—THE NINTH DISCOURSE.

Recapitulation and Conclusion. Chapter XLVIII.

This chapter reproduces the chief ingredients of the foregoing discourses from chap. xl. on. By this brief recapitulation, it aims at a mighty effect on the spirits of the hearers by means of a total impression. A glorious redemption, analogous to that wrought by Moses, is presented to the view of the people of the Exile, from whose blessings, of course, the wicked are excluded. The last-named thought recurs like a refrain after nine more chapters, at the close of chap. lvii. All this shows that in chap. xlviii. we have before us the concluding discourse of the first third.

1. THE ADDRESS GIVING THE MOTIVE.

Chapter XLVIII. 1, 2.

1 Hear ye this, O house of Jacob,
Which are called by the name of Israel,
And are come forth out of the waters of Judah,

Which swear by the name of the Lord,
And make mention of the God of Israel,
But not in truth, nor in righteousness.
2 For they call themselves of the holy city,
And stay themselves upon the God of Israel;
The Lord of hosts is his name.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet begins his recapitulation by designating the object of his address which he describes as that nation which descended from Jacob-Israel, more nearly from Judah, but in respect to religion officially confessed Jehovah as its God (ver. 1), for it is the nation that has the holy city of Jehovah for its central point, and all whose permanence is objectively founded on Jehovah (ver. 2). With this the Prophet has designated all the particulars that explain the unique interest of Jehovah in precisely this people.

2. Hear ye this——his name.—Vers. 1, 2. שִׁמְעוּ זֹאת comp. ver. 16; xlvii. 8; li. 21. Jacob was the natural name of the second son of Isaac, Israel was his spiritual name, according to Gen. xxxii. 2 sq.; xxxv. 10. In the same manner, too, house of Jacob will designate the nation according to its natural descent, whereas the same nation bears the name Israel as heir of the spiritual significance of its ancestor. But when the Prophet so addressed the nation it was no longer entire. The Ten Tribes were become the prey of an exile of immeasurable duration, with no hope of immediate deliverance. The promise of deliverance by Cyrus relates only to the people of the kingdom of Judah, thus chiefly only to those who are come forth out of the waters of Judah. The expression is a designation of the semen virile as in מוֹאָב (Gen. xix. 37 comp. on xv. 2 and xxv. 10). In the same sense מַיִם is used Num. xxiv. 7; מָקוֹר Ps. lxviii. 27; Prov. v. 16, 18. This people, descended from Jacob and Judah, and thus dear to the Lord "for the fathers' sakes" (Rom. xi. 28) was bound to Him by still another tie: Israel swore by the name of Jehovah (Deut. vi. 13; x. 20). That was continually a confession to Jehovah and an acknowledgment of His godhead (xlv. 23), but it was not necessarily an act of true living faith. Knowledge and approval sufficed for that, to speak dogmatically. The case was similar with making mention of God, i. e., making זָכַר by means of God (comp. קָרָא בְשֵׁם). Whoever performs an act of remembrance (in praise and acknowledgment), by naming Jehovah (comp. Josh. xxiii. 7; Ps. xx. 8; Amos vi. 10), lays down, indeed, a praiseworthy confession to Jehovah, but this may happen in a very outward and lifeless way. Israel ought not to take the names of idols in its mouth even (Exod. xxiii. 13). In contrast with this, every honorable mention of Jehovah, indeed every naming of His name that was joined with suitable reverence was a confession to Him, hence it is not necessary to understand by הִזְכִּיר בְּ' a solemn ascription of praise, though such is not to be excluded. Just because this swearing and mention could and did happen without living faith, the Prophet adds: "not in truth and not in righteousness." But how could the people of Judah, though inwardly fallen away, still outwardly confess the name of Jehovah, except they were in a manner stamped with the name of the city in which is the sanctuary of Jehovah? As long as Jerusalem is accounted the worthy dwelling of Jehovah—and it is so accounted even in the worst times, as that "הֵיכַל" Jer. vii. 4 proves—so long He is still recognized as God. Hence the Prophet can say, that Israel swears by Jehovah because it calls itself by the name of the city of its sanctuary. It seems to me that the expression common in Jeremiah אִישׁ יְהוּדָה וְיֹשְׁבֵי יְרוּשָׁלִַם has its roots in this view. Moreover the expression עִיר הַקֹּדֶשׁ occurs here for the first time. It occurs beside only lii. 1; Neh. xi. 1, 18; Dan. ix. 24. The Prophet assigns as a second reason for what is said ver. 1 b, that those there named are stayed or grounded upon the God of Israel. For נִסְמָכוּ may not be taken subjectively = "to stay oneself, niti, confidere," for "not in truth and not in righteousness" directly denies that Israel has the proper confidence. It is Jehovah that objectively raises and bears Israel by His election, and continued protection and support.

2. THE FORMER THINGS AS FOUNDATIONS OF THE NEW.

Chapter XLVIII. 3–11.

3 I have declared the former things [a]from the beginning;
And they went forth out of my mouth, and I [b]shewed them;
I did them suddenly, and they came to pass.
4 Because I knew that thou art [c]obstinate,
And thy neck is an iron sinew,
And thy brow brass;

5 I have even from the beginning declared it to thee;
Before it came to pass I [b]shewed it thee:
Lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done them,
And my graven image, and my molten image, hath commanded them.
6 Thou hast heard, see all this;
And will not ye declare it?
I have [c]shewed thee new things from this time,
Even hidden things, and thou didst not know them.
7 They are created now, and not [a]from the beginning;
Even before the day [d]when thou heardest them not;
Lest thou shouldest say, Behold, I knew them.
8 Yea, thou heardest not; yea, thou knewest not;
Yea, [a]from that time [e]that thine ear was not opened:
For I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously,
And wast called a transgressor from the womb.
9 For my name's sake will I defer mine anger,
And for my praise will I refrain for thee,
That I cut thee not off.
10 Behold, I have refined thee, but not [2]with silver;
I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction.
11 For mine own sake, even for mine own sake, will I do it:
For how should my name be polluted?
And I will not give my glory unto another.

[1] Heb. hard.
[2] Or, for silver.

[a] from then.
[b] caused them to be heard.
[c] caused them to hear.
[d] and.
[e] omit that.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 3. כֵּאָז—ראשׁנות. Ver. 5. פֶּסֶל. Ver. 9. חָטַם. Ver. 10. צָרַף.

Ver. 1. כֵּאָז is properly = "from that time hitherto." But כְּ stands here, according to Hebrew usage, as designation of the term. a quo. We may therefore boldly translate כאז by "then, at that time," as a reference to time long past.

Ver. 7. לִפְנֵי יוֹם is = ante hunc diem, comp. xliii. 13. וְ before לֹא is demonstrative.

Ver. 8. פִּתְּחָה is causative Piel = "to make an opening," i. e., to open one's-self to the report, to hear the report, comp. for the causative use lx. 11; Ps. cxvi. 6.——The expression קרא לך as in lviii. 12; lxi. 8; lxii. 2.

Ver. 9. האריך אף only Prov. xix. 11; comp. Job vi. 11 and the expression in the Pentateuch אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם Exod. xxxiv. 6; Num. xiv. 18, etc.——לְמַעַן is to be supplied before תהלתי, xliv. 28; xlvi. 5.——חָטַם, Arab. chatama, Aram. חֲטַם, coercere, חָטָם frenum, nose-ring.—לָךְ dat. commodi; xl. 10.

Ver. 10. It is plain that the בְּ can neither be ב pretii, nor that of accompaniment. It is (HITZIG, DELITZSCH) the ב essentiae = in qualitate argenti, in the quality of silver, i. e., as silver. The only peculiarity here is the placing of the בְּ with the object (comp. Ezek. xx. 41; Ps. lxxviii. 55, DEL.).——בָּחַר properly means "to choose." But as to choose presupposes a testing and confirmation, so in the Aram. בְּחַר stands directly for בָּחַן (Syr. bochuro = בָּחוֹן explorator). In Latin, too, probare means not only to hold something to be good, but also to investigate whether it is good. So also here בחר is used in the sense of בָּחַן (comp. Job xxxiv. 4).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. I have declared——commanded them. Vers. 3-5. These three verses express the thought, that from ancient times on, and before He gave this new prophecy that culminates in the name of Cyrus, the LORD had by prophecy and fulfilment proved Himself to be the true God. This is the seventh time the Prophet presents this argument. By ראשׁנות, therefore, I understand priora, ante facta. The Prophet, as it were, divides history into two parts: the old and the new. The new begins with the first prophetic announcements of events relative to Cyrus. The matter is important to the LORD: hence he divides הגדתי, "I have announced," into two natural component parts: 1) the prophecy went out of His mouth, 2) it entered into Israel's ear. Thus the fact of the prophecy is proved. And also the fulfilment. For suddenly (פתאם is wont to stand for the initiation of the fulfilment, because the inward connection is hid from the eyes of men, comp. xxix. 5; xlvii. 11) the LORD performed what was announced and the thing prophesied came about (comp. xliv. 7; xlvii. 9). This course was necessary from the very first. It had always an eminently practical object. Because I know, says the LORD, that thou art hard, i. e., stiff-necked, hard to convince, and that thy neck is an iron sinew (גִּיד, nervus, tendo, spring, ressort), therefore hard to bend, and thy brow brass, thus impenetrable, obstinate,—for this reason I announced to thee at that time, long ago, so that thou mightest not say my idol (עֹצֶב, general word, deus fictitius in general, Ps. cxxxix. 24) did it, my graven image and my molten image (נֶסֶךְ, xli. 29) commanded it here (made it come, xlv. 11). Therefore the LORD here declares that in the past even, thus in what has been indicated as the first period of history, by reason of Israel's hardness of heart, and its being unimpressible by purely inward, spiritual proofs, and because of its desire for arguments that may be seized outwardly, He had found Himself obliged to establish His claim to be the only true God, by prophesying the future, and bringing to pass what was prophesied. In this the Prophet says nothing new. He only repeats what he has before set forth in various places (xli. 4, 21 sqq., 26; xliii. 9 sqq.; xliv. 7 sqq.; xlvi. 9 sq.).

2. Thou hast heard——from the womb. Vers. 6–8. With these words, too, the Prophet repeats essentially only something said before, viz., what he had announced in reference to the new period of salvation to be inaugurated by Cyrus. The words שָׁמַעְתָּ to תַגִּידוּ, ver. 6, form the transition. שָׁמַעְתָּ manifestly refers to אַשְׁמִיעֵם, ver. 3, and הִשְׁמַעְתִּיךָ, ver. 5. It must be established that not only did the LORD bring those old prophecies to a hearing, but that they were actually heard. And כֻּלָּהּ would express that all relating to that, therefore the fulfilment also, has been heard. The emphatic חֲזֵה (comp. xxxiii. 20; xxx. 10) would warn Israel not to treat the matter lightly. Only let it look narrowly, and it must confess that all in the previous period of history relative to prophecy and fulfilment was fully known. Will they not on their part feel impelled to declare and proclaim aloud what they have undoubtedly heard? In the entire section, vers. 3–11, the Prophet steadily addresses Israel in the second pers. masc. sing. Suddenly in the single clause, ואתם הלא תגידו, he passes to the second pers. masc. plur. The reason for this seems to me to be, that he has in mind here, no longer the ideal total Israel, but the concrete persons of his contemporaries and immediate hearers or first readers.

This appears to me to be one of the passages where the Prophet, who else lives wholly in the Exile, cannot help casting a glance at the actual present. If we might assume that chapters xl.–lxvi. were to remain a sealed-up prophecy until the time of the Exile, then we would be warranted in saying that the words and will ye not declare it applied only to the exiles. But the numerous citations from chapters xl.–lxvi., that occur in prophets after Isaiah but before the Exile, show that our prophecy even before the Exile must have been publici juris. Hence I can only see in these words an exhortation that Isaiah gives to his actual contemporaries, viz., to confess openly that the history of Israel hitherto is a proof that Jehovah can prophesy and fulfil. ["And ye (idolaters or idols), will not ye declare, the same word used above for the prediction of events, and therefore no doubt meaning here, will not ye predict something? This is HITZIG's explanation of the words. In favor of this view is its taking הִגִּיד in the sense which it has in the preceding verse, and also the analogy of xli. 22, 23, where the very same challenge is given in nearly the same form; to which may be added the sudden change to the plural form, and the emphatic introduction of the pronoun, implying a new object of address, and not a mere enallage, because he immediately resumes the address to the people in the singular" J. A. ALEX.]. As Israel itself must confess that it has learned to know its God as a prophesier and fulfiller, the LORD bases on that the further demand that they believe also the present new prophecy, and infer from it the proper consequences. Manifestly the חֲדָשׁוֹת, new things, are the prophecy relating to Cyrus and the period of salvation initiated by him. The Prophet refers to xlii. 9 sqq.; xliii. 19 sqq.; xliv. 24 sqq.; xlv. 1 sqq., 11 sqq., 19 sqq.; xlvi. 11. He particularly emphasizes that this prophecy as such is also quite a new thing. Had Israel obtained report of those future events in any other way, natural or supernatural, then, of course, their proclamation by the Prophet would have been met by the reply: "Nothing new, we know it already." That would have been ruinous for the reputation of Jehovah and His prophet. But there is no mention of that. The prophecy relates to hidden things (i. 8; xlix. 6; lxv. 4), to things that have just been created. The expression, are created (comp. xli. 20; xliii. 7; xlv. 8) is to be judged of by the measure of what is divinely real. The word of prophecy has changed the divine decree from being a λόγος ἐνδιάθετος to being a λόγος προφορικός. The divine idea is thereby, as it were, born into the world. Even though it only exists as a mere word, still a word so uttered is a creative word. If God has spoken it, it also comes to pass. So far what God has spoken, announced, prophesied, is as good as created. It is real even if for the time being it is only a divine decree (comp. under Doctr. and Eth. on ver. 7). But its reality rests only on this act of the divine will, and the knowledge of it only on the revelation of it by means of the prophet of Jehovah. No one in the world would have thought of it, and no one in the world would have received intelligence of the divine thought without the revelation through the Prophet. God thinks it, God says it, God does it. It is only and altogether a fruit of God, and hence a proof that God is, and what He is. God revealed it to Israel, and He did it with the intention of curing Israel of its deep-rooted tendency to faithlessness (comp. Jer. iii. 7, 10), from its native tendency to apostacy.

3. For my name's sake——unto another, vers. 9–11. These verses are related to what precedes as giving a reason. The new things (ver. 6), previously concealed, but now entered on existence as to principle by the word of prophecy, involve salvation and deliverance for Israel on the assumption that Israel will let itself be cured of its deep-rooted tendency to apostacy. For this continued rebelliousness it had properly merited extinction. But the LORD desires not the death of the sinner, but that he should repent and live. For the sake of His own honor, also, He desires not the death of the sinner. For the rejection of Israel after its election would even compromise the LORD Himself. It would make Him appear as one who would, but could not. Hence the LORD will make His anger long, i. e. He will postpone the destructive blow that His anger properly demands (see Text. and Gram.). In fact He postponed it until the rejection of His Son (Matth. xxi. 39 sqq.). Therefore, for His name's sake He will defer His anger, and for the sake of His honor He will restrain it, for Israel's advantage (see Text. and Gram.), so that it will not be destroyed. He will only purify, refine Israel, yet not as silver; but He will confirm it in the furnace of affliction. The Prophet makes a difference between the refining furnace and the furnace of affliction. The difference cannot relate to the effect, since that is the same in both. For I do not think that the Prophet assumes an unfavorable result in the smelting process, viz. that dross will come of it. According to the context the honor of God demands that Israel be purified and saved. But the smelting furnace is for the silver no misfortune, no disgrace; it is the natural and necessary means for restoring the silver. Properly Israel ought not to need this smelting process. So far the furnace of affliction is for Israel a punishment and disgrace, which the smelting furnace is not for silver.—Finally the Prophet repeats the thought with emphasis, that the preservation of Israel was in the proper interest of Jehovah. Did He forsake Israel, He would then surrender them to the idols, and thereby permit the honor belonging to Him alone to be given to them. The words: and I will not give my honor to another, ver. 11 b, in which manifestly the thought of vers. 9-11 culminates, is a literal repetition of xlii. 8. By this the Prophet intimates that in these words, too (vers. 9-11), he only repeats what he had said before. DELITZSCH very fittingly at ver. 11 refers to Ezek. xxxvi. 19-23.

3. THE CONTENTS OF THE NEW THINGS IS REPEATED.

CHAPTER XLVIII. 12-15.

12 Hearken unto me, O Jacob
And Israel, my called;
I am he; I am the first, I also am the last.
13 Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth,
And [1]my right hand hath spanned the heavens:
When I call unto them, they stand up together.
14 All ye, assemble yourselves, and hear;
Which among them hath declared these things?
The LORD hath loved him: he will do his pleasure on Babylon,
And his arm shall be on the Chaldeans.
15 I, even I, have spoken; yea, I have called him:
I have brought him, and he shall make his way prosperous.

[1] Or, the palm of my right hand hath spread out.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 14. Expositors have made difficulty about construing זְרֹעוֹ as accusative, because "to perform Jehovah's or His own arm" is an incomprehensible mode of speech even taken as zeugmatic (DELITZSCH), KLOSTERMANN, too, (l. c., pp. 7, 19) is of the opinion that to translate "He will accomplish his will on Babylon and his punitive work on the Chaldeans" needs a dispensation from Hebrew usus loquendi. זְרוֹעַ does, indeed, not mean "punitive work," and this is not an instance of mere zeugma, but zeugma and metonymy. It is surely one of the most usual metonymical forms of expression in the Old Testament to put the arm for what is manifested by the arm, i. e., for the power or the might. Comp. xxxiii. 2; Jer. xvii. 5; Ezek. xxxi. 17; Ps. lxxxiii. 9, etc. Moreover xliv. 12 proves that the Prophet conceives of the arm, as also in xlv. 9 of the hand, as the seat of power. Might not our passage read: יַעֲשֶׂה חֶפְצוֹ (כֹּחוֹ, חֵילוֹ or) בְּבָבֶל וּגְבוּרָתוֹ כַּשְׂדִּים? For one may very well say עָשָׂה גְבוּרָה for "to display strength, power" (1 Kings xvi. 27). Accordingly, if taken strictly, one need not even assume a zeugma, if the slight difference be not urged that exists between עָשָׂה in עָשָׂה חֵפֶץ and עָשָׂה in עָשָׂה גְבוּרָה.—There can be no doubt that the prefix בְּ should be repeated before בַּשְׂדִּים.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Hearken unto me——up together, vers. 12, 13. The verses of this section are almost wholly a compilation of the chief elements of chapts. xl.-xlvii. The words שמע as far as מקראי are only a solemn introductory formula, containing an emphatic summons to give attention, in order to intimate the importance of the subject. Comp. ver. 1; xliv. 1; xlvi. 3.—מְקֹרָא, "the called," as regards the word, occurs only here; but as regards the sense it is essentially one with what we read xli. 9; xliii. 1. A double calling is spoken of here: Of the ancient and original one which Israel received in the person of its ancestor (xli. 9), and of the future one when the LORD calls back His people from the Exile (xliii. 1; comp. ver. 5 sqq.; xliv. 22). Thus Israel is named מְקֹרָא as the doubly called people. In what follows the Prophet calls to mind first those fundamental facts that are a guaranty that Jehovah can foretell and fulfil the deliverance by Cyrus. They are 1) His absoluteness and uniqueness. As such He is הוּא, the He par excellence, the absolute subject. As such the Prophet has already named Him, xliii. 10, 13, 25; xli. 4; xlvi. 4. 2) His eternity, by virtue of which He is the first and the last. He has already been so called xli. 4; xliv. 6; comp. xliii. 13. 3) The creation of heaven and earth, which also has been spoken of in what precedes, in the same sense, viz. that He who created the world can also foretell and fulfil Israel's deliverance: xl. 12 sqq., 22, 26, 28; xlii. 5; xliv. 24; xlv. 12, 18.

2. All ye, assemble——his way prosperous, vers. 14, 15. The words הקבצו as far as אֵלֶּה ("All ye assemble——these things") represent here all those passages in which the Prophet has variously uttered the thought, that Jehovah, the Creator of heaven and earth, has challenged all idols to a contest in prophesying in order, by exposing their impotency, to prove their nothingness and His divinity. The passages are xli. 1 sqq., 21 sqq., 26 sqq.; xliii. 9; xliv. 7 sqq., 24 sqq.; xlv. 20 sqq.; xlvi. 9 sqq. Especially our passage recalls xliii. 9 and xlv. 20. In xliii. 9 the interrogatory clause occurs almost verbatim, except the Niph. of קבץ. For there it reads מִי בָהֶם יַגִּיד זֹאת. In xlv. 20, as here, the first word is הִקָּבְצוּ. It is self-evident that בָּהֶם in our passage, as in xliii. 9, is to be referred to the idols, as that אֵלֶּה refers to the things concerning Cyrus. This appears from what immediately follows. For there again we have a collective citation, if I may so express myself. For there all that has been previously said of Cyrus is recalled by the brief words, ver. 14 b, 15, that emphasize the chief particulars. Jehovah hath loved him is said first. It is true this statement has not occurred literally before; but it has as to sense. For that the LORD loves Cyrus underlies all those passages that speak of him; xli. 2 sq., 25; xliv. 28; xlv. 1-7, 13 sq.; xlvi. 11. Moreover the words: He will do His pleasure on Babylon, and His arm on the Chaldeans, though not literally, occur as to sense in what precedes (comp. xli. 25; xliii. 14; xliv. 28, where, moreover, the words כָּל חֲפָצִי יַשְׁלִים occur; xlv. 1 sqq.; xlvi. 1 sq., 10; xlvii. entire).—In ver. 15 the LORD Himself speaks, confirming the word of His Prophet. HE, the LORD, has foretold that which concerns Cyrus (xlv. 21); He called him (xlv. 4), He brings him on, taking him by the hand (xlv. 1), and sees to it that he completes his way (xli. 3).

4. TWO INSERTIONS. CHAPTER XLVIII. 16, 17–19.

Verses 20, 21 connect naturally with vers. 14, 15. For ver. 14 foretells the victory of Cyrus over Babylon; ver. 20 summons Israel to flee out of vanquished Babylon as a prison opened by Cyrus. Verse 16, however, contains a personal remark of the Prophet; and though vers. 17–19 are a revealed word of God (com. כֹּה אָמַר ה׳ ver. 17), they are yet of so general a nature, that they would be perfectly in place, indeed, after ver. 21, as expressive of a regret that Israel did not follow the direct way to salvation, but had made necessary the detour through the Exile; but coming between vers. 15 and 20, they can only be regarded as a break of the connection. How vers. 16 and 17–19 came where they are will hardly be made out by any one. Their proper place would be between vers. 21 and 22. Perhaps they first stood in the margin (occasioned by the personal nature of ver. 16 and the retrospective nature of vers. 17–19 in the midst of the current of prospective prophecy), and then they were, through misunderstanding, inserted before instead of after ver. 21. [The Author's difficulty as to the order of the verses will not be felt by many, any more than they are, e. g., by LOWTH, MAURER, BARNES, J. A. ALEX., who comment right on without being aware of anything to stumble at. Yet J. A. A. pauses to say, that the objection as presented by others is entirely unfounded; vide. his comm. on ver. 18. Those that fail to see the difficulty with the Author, will equally discard the caption he adopts, by which he stamps these verses 16–19 as interpolations.—TR.).

a) FIRST INSERTION. CHAPTER XLVIII. 16.

A personal remark of the Prophet.

16 Come ye near unto me, hear ye this;
I have not spoken in secret from the beginning;
From the time that it was, there am I:
And now the LORD God, [a]and his Spirit, hath sent me.

[a] hath sent me and his Spirit.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These words are enigmatical, and I despair of explaining them in a convincing way. I do not believe that "come ye near unto me, hear ye this" are in parallelism with "all ye assemble yourselves and hear" ver. 14, and that therefore they are to be construed also as words of Jehovah. ["As certainly now as הִקָּבְצוּ ver. 14 is the word of Jehovah, so certain is it that קִרְבוּ אֵלַי is the same. He summons to Himself the members of His nation, that they may hear still further His own testimony concerning Himself." DELITZSCH]. For, as has been shown, the initial words of ver. 14 are references to something said before. But ver. 16 begins a thought of another sort. It makes on me the impression of a separate remark, which the Prophet had directed to a narrower circle of immediate hearers, such as, say, the narrower circle of his disciples may have been (comp. on viii. 16 sqq.). Some might be surprised regarding the prophecies beginning with chap. xl., that the Prophet foretells so positively a Babylonian Exile, and the deliverance by a prince by the name of Cyrus. The Prophet explains this ver. 16. By "come ye near unto me" he intimates that he would make a particularly confidential communication. It consists in the statement that he must not be supposed to have known of these things already, say from the beginning of (מֵרֹאשׁ) his prophetic activity, and to have announced or may-be made a written record of them, as esoteric secrets, only in the narrowest circle. Rather he did not himself know of these things from the beginning. Only מֵעֵת הֱיוֹתָהּ, "from the time that it was," was he there. That is, only since these things "were created" (נִבְרְאוּ ver. 7) in the sense that we have explained ver. 7, did he become familiar with them and they stand visible before his prophetic eye. הֱיוֹתָהּ seems to me to remind one of אָמַר וַיֶּהִי and of הַדָּבָר הָיָה. The Prophet regards as created, as come to pass, what has been announced to him. Hence he says here, he for his person was present, as an inward, spiritual witness and spectator, when these things, in a prophetic sense, came to pass. But now the LORD Jehovah (see List) has sent him, i. e., has sent him with the commission of announcing, and His Spirit. Therefore he distinguishes between the moment of prophetic seeing and that of prophetic announcement. I cannot construe וְרוּחוֹ as accusative. For then he would make himself like the Spirit, or put himself on a level with the Spirit. He can only make the Spirit equal with the LORD. But he distinguishes the LORD and His Spirit, by recognizing the first as the one from whom the Spirit proceeds (1 Kings xxii. 22) or is sent.

This is an attempt at exposition, which however I by no means set forth as an assured assertion. As I cannot hold it to be satisfying, I cannot pretend to have solved the enigma by it. For a Prophet to interrupt his official prophecy by a private remark is, of course, against the rule. Still it is not unexampled. I regard Jer. xxxi. 26 as such, where see my comment. In Jeremiah, the occasion of that personal remark was the circumstance, that that moment of awaking out of sleep was for him the brightest point in all his trying prophetic career. For Isaiah the occasion was, that he regarded it as necessary to give his immediate hearers an explanation why he now announced things the like of which no one had ever before heard from him. It might seem as if hitherto he had preserved silence about what he had long known. But he says: The new thing that ye have heard, I myself did not know earlier. It has only now come to pass (in a prophetic sense), and only after it came to pass did I receive commission to reveal it. Of course, this exposition is only possible if the Prophet that speaks is Isaiah himself, and if Isaiah here for once speaks out of the historical moment in which he prophesied. But does not the whole weight of his discoures rest on this, that he is even prophesying, i. e., announcing future things, not present or past? If so, then he must be conscious of the interval between prophecy and fulfilment. He must know that what is prophesied lies far, far before him, too far for any human eye to recognize what lies beyond that interval. Hence I cannot agree with DELITZSCH in considering that the Prophet lives only in the Exile with his spirit. This were only possible did he forget that he prophesied.

[The comment of DELITZSCH directly following his words quoted above is: "From the beginning He has not spoken in secret (see xlv. 19); but from the time that all which now lies before their eyes—namely, the victorious career of Cyrus—has unfolded itself, He has been there, or has been by (שָׁם, 'there,' as in Prov. viii. 27), to regulate what was coming to pass, and to cause it to result in the redemption of Israel. 'I was there' affirms, that, at the time when the revolution caused by Cyrus was preparing in the distance, He caused it to be publicly foretold, and thereby proclaimed Himself the present Author and Lord of what was then occurring. Up to this point Jehovah is speaking; but who is it that now proceeds to say, 'And now'—namely, now that the redemption of Israel is about to appear (וְעַתָּה being here, as in many other instances, e. g., xxxiii. 10, the turning-point of salvation)—'now hath the Lord Jehovah sent me and His Spirit.' The majority of the commentators assume that the Prophet comes forward here in his own person, behind Him whom he has introduced, and interrupts Him. But since the Prophet has not spoken in his own person before, whereas, on the other hand, these words are followed in xlix. 1 sqq. by an address concerning himself from that Servant of Jehovah who announces Himself as the restorer of Israel and light of the Gentiles, and who cannot therefore be Israel as a nation or the Author of these prophecies, nothing is more natural than to suppose that the words, 'And now hath the Lord,' etc., form a prelude to the words of the One unequalled Servant of Jehovah concerning Himself which occur in xlix. The surprisingly mysterious way in which the words of Jehovah suddenly pass into those of His messenger, which is only comparable to Zech. ii. 12 sqq.; iv. 9 (where the speaker is also not the prophet, but a divine messenger exalted above him), can only be explained in this manner. And in no other way can we explain the ועתה, which means, that after Jehovah has prepared the way for the redemption of Israel by the raising up of Cyrus, in accordance with prophecy, and by his success in arms, He has sent him, the speaker in this case, to carry out, in a mediatorial capacity, the redemption thus proposed, and that not by force of arms, but in the power of the Spirit of God (xlii. 1; comp. Zech. iv. 6). Consequently the Spirit is not spoken of here as joining in the sending (as UMBREIT and STIER suppose, after JEROME and the TARGUM; the LXX. is indefinite, καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ); nor do we ever find the Spirit mentioned in such co-ordination as this (see, on the other hand, Zech. vii. 12, per spiritum suum). The meaning is, that it is also sent, i. e., sent in and with the Servant of Jehovah, who is speaking here." DEL. on Isa., vol. II. p. 252 sq. CLARK's For. Theol. Lib.

We may anticipate here the comment on vers. 17–19 for the purpose of saying, in support of the above exposition of DELITZSCH, that our vers. 16–19 seem to be the scripture (ἡ γραφή) referred to in John vii. 37–39. In our text, the messenger and the Spirit sent with or after him (ver. 16) are presented as the source of the blessings conditionally guaranteed in vers. 17–19. The emphatic way in which the mention of the Spirit is introduced (ver. 16), and the mention of "teaching," "hearkening to commandments," "peace" and "righteousness" (vers. 17, 18), make it plain that the agent of the blessings described (vers. 18, 19) must be the Spirit; not, however, excluding the priority of the Redeemer who is the speaker. The blessing described is the blessing of Abraham, as our Author shows below; and (against DEL. who translates "grains of sand") we may, with our Author, translate מְעוֹת = "viscera, bowels" (BARNES and J. A. ALEX. do the same). Of course we must understand the blessing of numerous offspring in a spiritual sense, such as the Spirit will generate, i. e., a spiritual Israel. Our Author has shown this in cognate passages, e. g., see under xliv. 3–5. Moreover the very parallelisms of ver. 18, "peace as the river," "righteousness as the waves," show this. In John vii. 38 the Lord Jesus says: "He that believes on Me, as the Scripture said: rivers of living water shall flow from his bowels (ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας αὐτοῦ)." This is an allusion and interpretation, rather than a quotation. It combines the spiritual figures of ver. 18 with the figure of offspring in ver. 19, where the LXX. has: καὶ τὰ ἔκγονα τῆς κοιλίας σου. By saying this, our Lord claims that He is the source of the Abrahamic blessing, and reproduces in Himself the speaker of our text. To relieve the obscurity of the allusion the Evangelist adds his comment (John vii. 39): "But this He spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified." By this John completes the allusion to our text, referring to the Spirit which our ver. 16 represents as sent with the messenger—but after; "and His Spirit (ורוחו)," curiously subjoined grammatically, seeming to express an after-thought, but really expressing an after-act. The day of Pentecost witnessed this sending, and the promised effect of it in the multiplication of offspring to those that believed on Christ, in the vast increase of the spiritual Israel, rivers of living waters, righteousness like waves, and seed like the offspring of the sea.

The view here given of the correlation of our text and John vii. 37–39, if correct, is invaluable as aid in understanding the former, confirming the exposition of DELITZSCH. At the same time it identifies the reference of ἡ γραφή in John vii. 38, which, so far as we know, has never been satisfactorily done by any commentator, and at the same time must imperatively control the interpretation put upon "rivers of living water." b) SECOND INSERTION.

Lament that Israel would not hear at the right time.

CHAPTER XLVIII. 17–19.

17 Thus saith the LORD,
Thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel;
I am the LORD thy God which teacheth thee to profit,
Which leadeth thee by the way that thou shouldest go.
18 O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments!
Then had thy peace been as a river,

And thy righteousness as the waves of the sea:
19 Thy seed also had been as the sand,
And the offspring of thy bowels [a]like the gravel thereof;
His name [b]should not have been cut off nor destroyed from before me.

[a] like that of its (the sea's) bowels. [b] shall not be.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These words interrupt the connection just as does ver. 16, and make the impression of belonging to the time when the Prophet was prophesying. For chap. xliii. is a recapitulation of the thoughts of chaps. xl.–xlvii. This recapitulation continues in vers. 20, 21, as we shall show afterwards. But in these vers. 17–19 there is not a trace of recapitulation. [It is hard to resist the conviction, that were our Author less dominated by this notion of recapitulation, he would see more clearly. See in the Introduction, p. 17, the remarks quoted from J. A. ALEX.—TR.] They bear a retrospective character. After announcing the deliverance by Cyrus, the Prophet is constrained to make the mournful remark, that Israel might have come to the same goal of salvation by the normal and direct way. This thought was perhaps in place after the recapitulation, but not during it, as a break in the context.

Jehovah, the Redeemer, the Holy One, the God of Israel, is naturally, as such, the teacher and leader also of the nation, and has the right to demand that the nation let itself be taught and led by Him. כלמדך להועיל (see List); הועיל is frugi esse, and is used of being able, ability in regard to useful things generally (comp. xxx. 5, 6; Jer. ii. 8, etc.). Here it stands particularly for doing that which is morally profitable. לוּא הקשבת וגו׳ (ver. 18) can only mean: if thou hadst regarded, then thy salvation had been, etc. Comp. EWALD, § 329, b; 358, a. Ch. lxiii. 19 reads exactly and literally: if thou hadst rent the heavens, and were come down. Of course in that passage it is not essentially important if one translate (inexactly) O that thou mightest rend the heavens and mightest come down. For the only difference is that the more exact construction expresses the impatient wish that the rending and coming down had already taken place. But in our passage one cannot say, that the LORD, if the words must relate to the future, wishes Israel might already have completed giving its attention. Every one would expect the wish to be that Israel would give attention now and in all the future. But to express that requires the imperfect or the imperative, and in the apodosis יְהִי or וְהָיָה. To be grammatically exact, therefore, one can only construe the words as retrospective. Had Israel regarded the commandments of the LORD, then its salvation had been as the river (the Euphrates, comp. lix. 19; lxvi. 12, where כַּנָּהָר is used), and its righteousness as waves of the sea. Corporeal and spiritual salvation would have extended over Israel in measureless abundance (comp. x. 22, and on the relation of שלום to צדקה, xxxii. 16; xlvi. 13). All promises of salvation contain the benedictio vere theocratica of numerous posterity; for power and developed civilization presuppose a numerous people. A people few in numbers can neither be powerful nor enjoy in spiritual respects an all-sided development. Our passage is founded on Gen. xxii. 17; xxxii. 13; comp. xii. 2; xiii. 16; xv. 5, etc. צאצאים occurs only in Job (v. 25; xxi. 8; xxvii. 14; xxxi. 8), and in Isa., see List. כְּמְעֹתָיו is of uncertain meaning. It occurs only here. The ancient versions convey the notion of "gravel, lapilli." Gesenius, on the other hand, translates: "propagines viscerum tuorum ut (propagines) viscerum ejus," and by propagines viscerum maris are to be understood the fish (sea-animals). [The invariable usage of the Bible is to refer to "the sand of the sea" as the figure for multitude; we think there is not an instance of the animal life of the sea being so used. As a combined figure of multitude and off-spring the sand is more appropriate than the fish. It is beside the standing comparison for the Abrahamic blessing, TR.] HITZIG, MAURER, KNOBEL [BARNES, J. A. ALEX.] follow the exposition of GESENIUS [J. A. A. ascribes it to J. D. MICHAELIS, TR.]. Both interpretations have a weak foundation. Yet the latter has in its favor, that מְעוֹת, viscera = מעים, after the analogy of נהרות along with נהרים, etc., is more probable than the ingeniously deduced lapilli.

Therefore the Prophet here expresses the thought, that, had Israel followed the commandments of Jehovah, then the promises given the fathers would have been fulfilled without the mournful intervening stadium of the Exile. [It seems better, with most commentators, to regard vers. 16–19 as spoken from the stand-point of the foregoing and subsequent context, i. e., of the Exile. This is involved in interpreting "the river" to mean the Euphrates. "Nothing could well be more appropriate at the close of this division of the prophecies, than such an affecting statement of the truth, so frequently propounded in didactic form already, that Israel, although the chosen people of Jehovah, and as such secure from total ruin, was and was to be a sufferer, not from any want of faithfulness or care on God's part, but as the necessary fruit of its own imperfections and corruptions." J. A. ALEX. on ver. 18. "His name shall not be cut off nor destroyed before me." "We may suppose that the writer, after wishing that the people had escaped the strokes provoked by their iniquities, declares that even now they shall not be entirely destroyed. This is precisely the sense given to the clause in the LXX. (οὐδὲ νῦν ἀπολεῖται), and is recommended by two considerations: first, the absence of the Vav conversive, which in the other clause may indicate an indirect construction; and secondly, its perfect agreement with the whole drift of the passage, and the analogy of others like it, when the explanation of the sufferings of the people as the fruit of their own sin is combined with a promise of exemption from complete destruction," ibid. on ver. 19. DELITZSCH similarly.—TR.]

5. SUMMONS TO ISRAEL TO FLEE OUT OF BABYLON.

CHAPTER XLVIII. 20, 21.

20 Go ye forth of Babylon.
Flee ye from the Chaldeans, with voice of singing
Declare ye, tell this,
Utter it even to the end of the earth;
Say ye, The LORD hath redeemed his servant Jacob.
21 And they thirsted not when he led them through the deserts:
He caused waters to flow out of the rock for them:
He clave the rock also, and the waters gushed out.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Both these verses bear entirely the character of the representation in vers. 1–15; that is to say, the chief particulars of chaps. xl.–xlvii. are recapitulated. They especially correspond to chaps. xlvi., xlvii., which are principally occupied with Babylon. That Babylon must be destroyed, and that redeemed Israel must go free from the destroyed prison, has been variously declared in preceding chapters. It is to be especially noted that wherever the deliverance of Israel and Jehovah as their Redeemer are spoken of, it is always primarily the deliverance from Babylon that is meant (xli. 14; xliii. 1, 14; xliv. 6, 22, 24 sqq.; xlv. 13, 17; xlvii. 4). We read in xlii. 22 that Israel is held captive as in a prison. Babylon's fall is specially announced xliii. 14; xlvi. 1, 2; xlvii. 1 sqq. It is said in xlii. 10–12; xliv. 23; xlv. 6, 22–24 that the praise of Jehovah's acts of deliverance must be sounded to the end of the earth, and be to all nations a guaranty of their own salvation. That on the way the Israelites shall have water in great abundance is promised xli. 17–19; xliii. 19 sq.; xliv. 3 sq. That the return from Babylon shall not be inferior to the return out of Egypt in miraculous displays of the saving hand of God is stated xlii. 16; xliii. 16; xliv. 27. Thus verses 20, 21 also bear the character of recapitulation. And hence I believe that ver. 16 and the verses 17–19 were originally supplements, but through misunderstanding were inserted out of place. As regards particulars, it must be noticed that what is to be proclaimed to the end of the earth begins with The Lord hath redeemed and ends with waters gushed out. The redemption of Israel and its joyful return home must be proclaimed to all nations as a pledge of their own salvation (comp. especially xlv. 22 sqq.) And particularly this point must be emphasized, to them, that the LORD had now a second time given such a miraculous deliverance to the people Israel. For in that lies even a confirmation of His methodical willing and ability to do. And the waters gushed out occurs again Psalm lxxviii. 20; cv. 41. Moreover see List. ["Unless we are prepared to assume an irrational confusion of language, setting all interpretation at defiance, our only alternative is to conclude, on the one hand, that Isaiah meant to foretell a miraculous supply of water during the journey from Babylon to Jerusalem, or that the whole description is a figurative one, meaning simply that the wonders of the Exodus should be renewed. Against the former is the silence of history; against the latter nothing but the foregone conclusion that this and other like passages must relate exclusively to Babylon and the return from exile."—J. A. ALEXANDER.]

6. THE CONTRASTIVE CONCLUSION.

CHAPTER XLVIII. 22.

22 There is no peace, saith the LORD, unto the wicked.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These words do not fit on to vers. 20–21. They could better connect with ver. 19 as the negative proof of the thought, that Israel, had it hearkened to the commandments of the LORD, would have found abundant salvation (comp. especially "thy peace had been as a river," ver. 18). But if ver. 22 were only to belong to vers. 17–19, then the words would not occur in another place and connection. But such is the case at the close of lvii. This circumstance proves that the words are meant to form a similar and hence the like-sounding conclusion of the first two Enneads. Indeed even chap. lxvi. concludes, not with the same words, yet with the same thought, and that in an enhanced and drastic form. It is certainly not accidental that chaps. xl.–lxvi. are in general a book of consolation, that the three chief parts begin with words of consolation, and yet all of them conclude with the words so threatening. Doubtless the Prophet would thereby impress on his readers that the consolation is not unconditional for all, but that only the pious shall partake of it. This threatening earnestness of the respective conclusions, so harshly emphasized and directly in contrast with the predominating consolatory character of the book, should lead the wicked to a thorough introspection.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlviii. 1, 2. "We, for our part, are also quite fallen into Jewish security. For we take great comfort from this, that we know, that we have God's word simple and pure, and the same is indeed highly to be praised and valued. But it is not enough for one to have the word. One ought and must live according to it, then will God make account of us. But where one lives without the fear of God and in sin, and hears the word without amendment, there God will punish all the harder, as Christ shows in the parable of the servant that knew his Lord's will and did it not. Therefore one should let go such fleshly confidence, and labor to live in the fear of God, and hold faithfully to His word. Then if we fall into distress and pray for deliverance, it will surely be granted to us. But those who brag about God as do the Jews, and yet fear Him not, nor will live according to His word, will boast in vain. God will single them out and punish them as He did the Jews. For these two things must go together: trusting God, and fearing God. Neither can be right without the other. If thou fearest not God, thou becomest proud and presumptuous as the Jews. But if thou believest not, and only fearest, thou wilt become anxious and fall into despair. Therefore the Psalm says: "The LORD taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in those that hope in His mercy," Ps. cxlvii. 10. VEIT DIETRICH.

3. On xlvii. 9-11. THE DIVINE DISCIPLINE OF CHILDREN. 1) Its course of procedure: a. God is patient (ver. 9); b. God punishes severely (ver. 10). 2) Its aims: a. God is patient a. for the sake of His honor (in order to reveal Himself as the "good"); β. for our sakes (ver. 9 b that we may not be exterminated); b. God is severe a. for the sake of His honor (that He may not be blasphemed, ver. 11); β. for our sakes (that we may be purified and confirmed in the furnace of affliction).

4. On xlviii. 17-19. "That is our most blessed knowledge that we know God through His self-witness, and who, as one veiled, speaks from the prophets as the One Eternal Prophet; as the reflected splendor of the invisible Divinity that became flesh and blood in Jesus, and is now as our Brother constantly with us. Yea, blessed and forever safe is he that pays heed to God's testimony of the very gracious condescension of God to us! God makes such heedful ones forever at peace in Himself, whose peace becomes overflowing and overwhelming as a river, because God in it imparts to us pardon and justification. Our righteousness in God is as waves of the sea, that continually swell up in great abundance, for God's grace that works in us and accomplishes our righteousness is, in fact, infinite. Dost thou lack peace and righteousness, then believe assuredly that the only reason is that thou hast despised the word of thy God. Yea, whoever stablishes himself in God by believing acceptance of His word, he is forever established, and also has eternal bloom. He belongs to the innumerable family of God, that moves on through all times. How can he ever want for posterity?" J. DIEDRICH.

5. On xlviii. 20. "So God is wont to do: when the enemies of the churches pull hardest on the rope, it must break. We should mark this well, and comfort ourselves by it. For else we will become faint-hearted and despond, when matters go so ill." VEIT DIETRICH.

6. On xlviii. 20–22. Israel's Egyptian and Babylonian captivity is a type of the church in the world, and of individual believing souls in the body of this death. But we are to a certain degree ourselves to blame for the pressure of this captivity. There is even very much that holds us back to the flesh-pots of Egypt. We are often wanting in proper love for the one thing needful, in proper faith, in courage, in fidelity, in diligence in good works. Yet the Lord has deprived the devil of his power. The enemy is even really conquered already; "ein Woertlein kann ihn faellen." Hence the Christian must be exhorted to depart from Babylon courageously and intrepidly. This the Prophet does in our text. We see in it a warning call to depart out of Babylon. 1) The possibility of going out is a. objectively presented by redemption "that is by Jesus Christ;" but b. depends subjectively on our love to God and our faith. 2) The return home is difficult, indeed, as it was with Israel. It is through deserts of distress and danger. But God will not forsake His own. The spiritual rock (1 Cor. x. 4) follows along with them. 3) At home, with the Lord, in communion with Him, they find peace, whereas the wicked nowhere and never shall find peace, not even in all the power, splendor and glory of this world.

7. [On xlviii. 22. "The wicked, as a matter of sober truth and verity, have no permanent and substantial peace and joy. (1) In the act of wickedness; (2) in the business or the pleasures of life; (3) no peace of conscience; (4) on a death-bed; (5) there is often not only no peace, but the actual reverse, apprehension; despair: (6) beyond the grave, a sinner CAN have no peace at the judgment bar of God; he CAN have no peace in hell." Abbreviated from BARNES.]

B.—THE PERSONAL SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

CHAPTERS XLIX.—LVII.

The second Ennead of chapts. xl.–lxvi. has for its all-controlling, central point the personal Servant of Jehovah, in whom all the typical forms already encountered under this name in chapts. xl.–xlviii. combine as in their higher unity. Hence in xlix.–lvii. the Servant of Jehovah is no longer the people of Israel, nor the Prophet, nor the prophetic institution, but only the Messiah in His servant-form. But these chapters do not speak only of the suffering and enduring Servant, but also of Israel's sin and of the redemption that the Servant effects by His suffering. Thus it happens that the elements of announcing the suffering, of punishment and consolation cross one another artistically as the various colored threads of a woven web. Yet this crossing occurs only in the first half. For as in the first Ennead Cyrus appears from xli. on successively growing, until in the middle (xliv. 28; xlv. 1) he appears as the ripe fruit, so from xlix. on we see the Servant of Jehovah developing in ever greater distinctness, until in the middle (lii. 13–liii. 12) he meets us in the complete Ecce-homo form. But with the laying in the grave He disappears. From liv. on the Servant of Jehovah is spoken of no more. What then follows is a description of the salvation effected by the Servant in its objective and subjective aspects. This description extends to lvi. 9, where it breaks off with a distant view of the final and highest fruits of salvation, the glorification of nature. With lvi. 10 begins a section in strongest contrast with what precedes. For the Prophet, having finished his description of the glorious future, turns his eye to the present. In this he sees mournful things in the leaders of the people and in the nation itself. Still he cannot conclude without giving the comforting assurance, that even the present deep degradation will not hinder the fulfilment of the promises of salvation. For the LORD will heal those that let themselves be healed. Only for the wicked, that persistently oppose themselves, there will be no salvation. Thus the second Ennead concludes with the same words as the first.

As to particulars, the following plan, in my opinion, underlies these nine chapters. The first discourse comprises chapt. xlix. In this the Prophet draws a parallel between the Servant of God and Zion. Both are alike in this, that they begin small and end great. The chapter divides accordingly into two halves, the first of which gives a total survey of the person and work of the Servant of God (xlix. 1–13), while the second shows how Zion arises out of deepest forsakenness, rebuilds itself anew by the heathen, and finally soars aloft to the highest elevation and glory (xlix. 14–26).—In the second discourse also (chapt. l.) the Prophet opposes Zion and the Servant of God, indicating the connection between the guilt of Israel and the suffering of the Servant, and the deliverance from the former by faith in the latter. He shows in the first part (l. 1–3), namely, that just the not-receiving of the Lord when He came to His possession, had as its consequence the temporary rejection of Israel. To this guiltiness of Israel corresponds (in the second part l. 4-9) the suffering which the Servant declares Himself willing to undertake with the consciousness that He still cannot come to disgrace.

Then in the third part (l. 10, 11), by a brief alternative, is shown to the people the possibility of their being accepted again. In the third discourse (chap. li.), we encounter a dialogue, in which the Servant, Israel, Jehovah and the Prophet appear one after another as actors, and that has for subject the final redemption of Israel. In the first part (li. 1–8) the Servant, appearing incognito as if veiled, and just by that intimating the highness of His being, holds out to the people of Israel the conditions of its redemption. In the second part (li. 9-11) Israel exhorts the LORD to give new proofs of His ancient power. In the third Jehovah replies to Israel's exhortation with exhortation, and at the same time holds up to His Servant the origin, means and end of His efficiency (li. 12-16). In the fourth part the Prophet speaks. He promises Jerusalem, drunk with the cup of wrath, that the cup of wrath shall pass from its hand to the hand of its enemies (li. 17-23). The fourth discourse (chap. lii.), treats of the restoration of Jerusalem to glory. In the first part of it (lii. 1-6) it is stated that Jehovah must restore Jerusalem for the sake of the honor of His name. In the second part (lii. 7-12) the accomplishment of the restoration is described. The fifth discourse (lii. 13—liii. 12), which represents the culminating point of the second Ennead, can hardly have a better superscription given it than that which DELITZSCH has given: Golgotha and Scheblimini [the second term is from the Hebrew of Ps. cx. 1, meaning "sit at my right hand."—TR.]. Here the Servant's lowliness, luminous with divine majesty, appears in its highest degree. The discourse has three parts. The first (lii. 13-15) contains the theme of the prophecy. The second (liii. 1-7) portrays the lowliness of the Servant as the Lamb that bears the sin of the people. Finally the third (liii. 8-12) treats of the exaltation of the Servant to glory. The sixth discourse (chap. liv.), describes the new salvation as the glorious fruit of all that the Servant of God has done and suffered. In the first part of it (liv. 1-10) is described the wonderfully rich blessing of posterity, i. e., the incorporation of the Gentile world in Zion as the first fruit of the grace of Jehovah. In the second (liv. 11-17) the Prophet describes the new estate of salvation as an universal one. The seventh discourse (chap. lv.) treats of this: that for the new salvation there must supervene an entirely new way of appropriating salvation. First (lv. 1-5) it is shown positively, wherein consists the essence of this new appropriation of salvation; then (lv. 6-13) negatively, what obstacles and scruples are to be overcome in order that this new mode of appropriating salvation may be established. The short section (lvi. 1-9), the eighth discourse, describes the moral, social and physical fruits of the new way of salvation. Finally, in the ninth discourse (chap. lvi. 10—lvii. 21) we see a word of conclusion. After the Prophet's glance had penetrated into the remotest future, he returns to the present. But it is to be noticed that by the present he understands the whole time previous to the beginning of redemption, therefore the time previous to the end of the Exile. The mournful state of this present makes him reflect whether the atrocities of the present must not make impossible the fulfilment of the glorious promises of the future. For this reason he describes first the mournful situation prevailing at present among the shepherds (lvi. 10—lvii. 2) and among the people (lvii. 3-14), but comes to the conclusion, that God's love will really heal those that let themselves be healed, and that only for the wicked, who persistently oppose the divine love, there can be no peace (lvii. 15-21).

I.—THE FIRST DISCOURSE.

Parallel between the Servant of God and Zion.

CHAPTER XLIX.

In a sketchy way the Prophet draws a picture of the similar course of development in the case of the Servant of God and that of Israel, which, in consequence of its rejecting the Servant, is repudiated unto the extremest misery, yet shall arise again to the full glory of the church of God. The Servant of God begins His course as a little child in the body of his mother, but Israel, as a repudiated wife, must begin an entirely new course of life. Both come also to the most glorious goal. The chapter has accordingly two parts; the first comprising vers. 1-13, the second vers. 14-26.

1. TOTAL SURVEY OF THE PERSON AND WORK OF THE SERVANT OF GOD.

CHAPTER XLIX. 1-13.

1 LISTEN, O isles, unto me;
And hearken, ye people, from far;
The LORD hath called me from the womb;
From the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name.
2 And he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;
In the shadow of his hand hath he hid me,
And made me a polished shaft;
In his quiver hath he hid me;

3 And said unto me, Thou art my servant,
O Israel, in whom I will be glorified.
4 Then I said, I have laboured in vain,
I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain:
Yet surely my judgment is with the LORD,
And [1]my work with my God.
5 And now, saith the LORD
That formed me from the womb to be his servant,
To bring Jacob again to him,
[2]Though Israel be not gathered,
Yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the LORD,
And my God shall be my strength.
6 And he said, [3]It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant
To raise up the tribes of Jacob,
And to restore the [4]preserved of Israel:
[a]I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles,
That thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth.
7 Thus saith the LORD,
The Redeemer of Israel and his Holy One;
[5]To him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation abhorreth,
To a servant of rulers,
Kings shall see and arise,
Princes also shall worship,
Because of the LORD that is faithful,
And the Holy One of Israel, and he[b] shall choose thee.
8 Thus saith the LORD,
In an acceptable time have I heard thee,
And in a day of salvation have I helped thee:
And I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people,
To [6]establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages;
9 That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth;
To them that are in darkness, Show yourselves.
They shall feed in the ways,
And their pastures shall be in all high places.
10 They shall not hunger nor thirst;
Neither shall the [c]heat nor sun smite them:
For he that hath mercy on them shall lead them,
Even by the springs of water shall he guide them.
11 And I will make all my mountains a way,
And my highways shall be exalted.
12 Behold these shall come from far:
And, lo, these from the north and from the west;
And these from the land of Sinim.
13 Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth;
And break forth into singing, O mountains:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
And will have mercy upon his afflicted.

[1] Or, my reward. [2] Or, That Israel may be gathered to him, and I may, etc.
[3] Or, Art thou lighter than that thou shouldest, etc. [4] Or, desolations.
[5] Or, To him that is despised in soul. [6] Or, raise up.

[a] I have made thee. [b] hath chosen. [c] the mirage.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. מִבְּטֶן. Ver. 4. הֶבֶל, לְתֹהוּ וְהֶבֶל comp. xxx. 7; Job ix. 29.—פְּעֻלָּה. Ver. 5. עֹז—שׁוֹב, xii. 2; Ps. xxviii. 7. Ver. 7. בְּזֹה—גֹּאֵל יִשְׂרָאֵל קְדוֹשׁוֹ.

Ver. 1. מֵרָחוֹק can be dependent on הַקְשִׁיבוּ, but just as well on לְאֻמִּים (comp. v. 26; xxii. 3; xxiii. 7; lvii. 9) according to familiar usage.

Ver. 5. Instead of לֹא before יֵאָסֵף, the K'ri reads לוֹ. The same is the case in ten other passages: Exod. xxi. 8; Lev. xi. 21; xxv. 30; 2 Sam. xvi. 8; xix. 7; Isa. ix. 2; lxiii. 9; Job vi. 21; xiii. 15; xli. 4. In only one passage

K'ri reads לא, while K'thibh has לו: 1 Sam. xx. 2. In two passages K'thibh reads לא, but K'ri ולו: Lam. ii. 2; v. 5. As regards our text, the LXX. translates, and after it the Vetus Latinus, "congregabor et glorificabor coram Domino," from which one sees that they read ואאסף ואכבד; thus, probably, they drew the first letter of the word לא to the foregoing ישראל, and the second to the following יאסף, or substituted it for the י. JEROME is very much discontented with this translation, which SYMMACHUS and THEODOTION also have, because it surrenders a fortissimum contra Judaeorum perfidiam testimonium. AQUILA translates: "et Israel ei congregabitur." Therefore he read לו. It seems therefore that party stand-point had an influence on the reading. Among moderns HITZIG translates "in that he leads Jacob back to himself, and Israel will not be carried off." HOFMANN: "Israel that will not be carried away." B. FR. OEHLER: "And that Israel be not carried away." All these take אסף in the sense of "to carry away." Though I will not deny that it may be taken so, yet this negative thought partly disturbs the sense, partly it is flat and superfluous. It suits the parallelism much better to construe the clause as a positive statement. Then the finite verb stands instead of the infinitive with ל according to the grammatical usage that demands the speedy return from the subordinate forms to the chief forms. ל for אל or על is not suspicious, as HITZIG supposes. For beside לו יאסף being quite as admissible as באו לך ver. 18, it is quite common for a preposition to be superseded by a kindred one in the second clause (comp. Jer. iii. 17; Ps. xxxiii. 18).——The clause ואכבד as far as עזי is a parenthesis. The latter part of it is in the perfect והיה, because, according to Hebrew grammar, two future things are not as such made to follow one another in like verbal form, but only the first stands in the future, while the second is expressed by the perfect as being directly present viewed from the stand-point of the future. Therefore here: I will be honored and then is (as immediate consequence) my God my strength.

Ver. 6. מן before היותך is properly superfluous, or rather it ought to stand before the member that utters the intenser notion: considered from this, that I will make thee a light to the heathen, it is a small thing that thou art my servant to raise up the tribes of Israel. But מן stands here to intimate generally a comparative relation, and, as DELITZSCH also observes, one may not press the matter of its position. In Ezek. viii. 17 also, the only other place where נקל occurs impersonally with מן (comp. 2 Sam. vi. 22), this preposition does not stand in the logically correct place. Probably there hovered before the Prophet the thought נקל ממך היותך לי וגו׳, i. e., it is from thee, from thy stand-point or in comparison with thy claims, a small thing that thou art my servant to raise up Israel, I will make thee a light to the heathen. That ממך היותך would accordingly be contracted into מהיותך.——In placing the infin. להשיב after, there is a certain poetic effect: the two infinitive clauses form a whole with corresponding beginning and end. Comp. xliv. 10; Ps. vi. 10.

Ver. 7. In בזה־נפש the בזה is simple infinitive, which is however to be construed here as abstractum pro concreto. נפש is not to be conceived of as in the accusative (of nearer definition), but as standing in the genitive. For it is not the soul of the Servant that is meant, but the soul of the despiser. For not merely outwardly, with words, but truly, inwardly, with their whole soul. He is to them an object of contempt (comp. שחק Job xii. 4; משל Job xvii. 6.——In regard to the order יראו וקמו comp. the remarks on the parenthesis in ver. 5. It is to be noted that it does not read שרים והשתחוו. For the ו after שרים does not stand parallel with the ו before קמו, and moreover יראו is not to be supplied before it, but the ו after שרים has demonstrative force = princes, they shall worship him (comp. EWALD, § 344, b; Gen. xxii. 4, 24; Exod. xvi. 6, 7, etc.).—The ו before יבחרך is to be taken in the same way. It stands demonstratively, corresponding to the אשר before נאמן, and rhetorically substituted for it for the sake of variety. We could say not more correctly, yet more intelligibly and by a really more common construction: for Jehovah's sake who is faithful, for the sake of the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen thee.

Ver. 9. To take לאמר gerundively (DELITZSCH) is not impossible, but it is also not necessary. For what follows is the specification of what precedes, as now there is said after, what all must previously happen to make possible that הקים ארץ and הנחיל. Yet לאמר is here more than a mere sign of quotation. It denotes an actual, audible speaking, without which the captives would not be able to hear the summons.——יכם zeugma, comp. Ps. cxxi. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The one who forms the chief person of the second Ennead, the personal Servant of Jehovah, is also the first that enters here as speaker. What He says and hears affords us a panoramic image of His life and labor from their first mysterious beginning to the remotest glorious end. As the Servant of God begins by summoning all lands of the earth to give heed, He lets it be understood that what is now to be heard concerns all (ver. 1 a). Then He designates Himself as one called from His mother's womb (ver. 1 b), and as an instrument equipped for a successful contest (ver. 2), to whom Jehovah has given the honorable name "Servant of God" and "Israel," and by whom He has determined to glorify Himself (ver. 3). The present out of which the Servant of God speaks does not correspond to these gracious declarations. For He is constrained to say: I have labored and suffered in vain (ver. 4 a). But He instantly consoles Himself again with the thought that His right and His reward are in the hands of God, thus in good hands (ver. 4 b). And then Jehovah Himself confirms this ground of comfort by a threefold declaration: 1) that the work of His chosen Servant, so far from being unsuccessful, will attain a much higher end than what was originally determined. That is, He shall not only bring back the people of Israel to its God, but also bring light and salvation to all nations (ver. 5, 6). 2) The Servant of God, become an object of contempt and aversion, shall become an object of the highest veneration even for kings (ver. 7). 3) The Servant of God, to a certain time seemingly repudiated, shall yet, when the time for it arrives, be raised aloft and made the mediator of a new Covenant, in consequence of which the Holy Land shall be restored and newly divided, the people redeemed and brought home under divine protection and support from all nations and regions of the world (vers. 8–12). On account of this glorious redemption, heaven and earth are summoned to praise God (ver. 13).

2. Listen, O isles——with my God.—Vers. 1–4. Islands and nations are here in parallelism, as in xli. 1. As what follows concerns all, we have here a discourse of universal importance (comp. i. 2; xxxiv. 1). This introduction quite corresponds to the statement of ver. 6, that the Servant of God shall be the light of the heathen and salvation of God to the end of the earth. But who is here the Servant of God? At first sight the Prophet himself seems to speak in vers. 1, 2, declaring his call from his mother's womb (comp. Jer. i. 5), his equipment for the prophetic calling and the protection experienced in its exercise. But instantly ver. 3 contradicts this. For it is incomprehensible how the Prophet alone can be called Israel. Added to this the Prophet certainly cannot say that the LORD has made him a light to the Gentiles, etc. (ver. 6). As little can it be said of him that kings shall worship him (ver. 7), or that he is set for a covenant of the people (ver. 8).—The designation of the one addressed as "Israel" in ver. 3 suggests the thought that Israel is meant, either as a nation or as the nucleus of the nation (the spiritual Israel). But vers. 5, 6, conflict with this, where both Israel in general and also the nucleus of Israel are expressly distinguished from the Servant of God (see below). But how can one say with OEHLER (D. Knecht Jehovah's, p. 87): "the nation as an ideal Israel leads back the people in their empirical manifestion?" Where is it ever said in any sense whatever that the nation led itself back? And was then the ideal Israel, that would yet be the one to lead back, only among the returned? And did not those that remained in the Exile also belong to empirical Israel?—By the Servant of Jehovah in our text I can only understand the personal Servant. He constitutes in the whole second Ennead the principal person. What was said of Him in the first Ennead by way of prelude now comes to its full development. The Servant of Jehovah is also a man who lay in the womb of his mother. The Prophet portrays his life ab ovo. It is perhaps not superfluous to remark that while the Prophet says of the people of Israel, God chose, formed, brought on, kept, bore them from the womb on (מִבֶּטֶן, xliv. 2, 24; xlvi. 3; xli. 8, 9, 10), of the personal Servant, he formed and called him from the womb (xlix. 1, 5), he says of Cyrus, only, he called him by his name and brought him on (xlv. 1, 3, 4). From this it is seen that the Servant of Jehovah in both senses stands nearer Jehovah than does Cyrus. For in the two first named the LORD claims a certain paternity. But Israel gives him most care. It must also be kept, borne and supported. The personal Servant does not need this help. He is merely formed, then called. Cyrus, however, appears as originating from a region that lies more remote from the LORD. From that he is called up by his name (and in fact by שֵׁם and כִּנָּה, xlv. 4).

It is even self-evident that מבטן קראני does not mean: he has called me out of my mother's womb (HAHN). For thus understood the expression suggests absurd ideas. But it were quite in place to say, that the personal Servant of Jehovah was also an instrument formed ad hoc, and led as it were by the voice of God from birth on. The parallel expression הִזְכִּיר שְׁמִי means "to make memory, remembrance of the name." It is used of places of worship intended for calling on the divine name (Exod. xx. 21); of a monument intended to perpetuate a name (2 Sam. xviii. 18); of a tribute of praise meant to keep the memory of a name for all times (Ps. xlv. 18; Isa. xxvi. 13). On הַזְכִּיר בְּשֵׁם, comp. xlviii. 1. Here, where the expression is parallel with קָרָא, which, however, can happen only by means of the name, it seems to designate a more enduring keeping of the name in mind: the LORD has not only called me once, He has also afterwards continually thought of my name; He has never lost sight of me from the bowels of my mother (comp. מֵרָחַם, xlvi. 3).

Next the life of the Servant of Jehovah is sketched with only two, yet two double strokes. On the one hand it is said that the LORD has made His mouth like a sharp sword, and that He has made Him (the Servant) like a polished shaft. The prominent mention of the mouth of the Servant shows that His task consisted eminently in speaking. It is clear that here only a speaking of divine things according to his calling is meant. Thus the Servant of God is characterized as a prophet. God called and equipped him that he might give sharp, incisive testimony to the divine truth. The expression: "he made my mouth a sharp sword," is really a metonymy. For what produces the effect of a sharp sword is not the mouth in itself, but the word that proceeds from it (comp. xi. 4; Rev. i. 16; Heb. iv. 12). In the words: "he made me a polished (בָּרוּר, "smooth, polished to gleaming," hence easily penetrating, comp. Job xxxiii. 3; Zeph. iii. 9) shaft," the metonymy is pushed still further, as, not only the mouth, but (for the sake of brevity and manifoldness) the whole person stands for the word that proceeds from it. Thus is ascribed to the Servant a penetrating effectiveness that seizes and arouses men to their inmost souls. The experience of such inward operation is not agreeable to such as are not born from that Spirit whose sword and shaft by the Servant penetrate their hearts. These, according to the spirit that rules them, react against it with murderous wrath. For, incapable of meeting the thrusts of the Servant of God with like spiritual weapons, they seek with fleshly ones to silence the mouth that molests them. And they would soon succeed were not that mouth under a higher protection. Hence the Prophet here represents the sword and shaft as at once sharp-cutting and well protected. It is not otherwise usual to describe the cutting sword as one well concealed, and the pointed shaft as one safely hid in the quiver. For sword and shaft are in nowise there in order to be hid under the hand or in the quiver. But the Prophet does not carry out his figure consistently. Having ver. 2, 1 a, compared the mouth to a sharp sword, the sword designates in 1 b the whole person. For when he says: in the shadow of His hand hath He hid me, he, of course, means primarily the sword, which, as the shaft in the quiver, is hid in the sheath under the hand held over it. But here the concealed sword is no longer image of the word, but of the person from which the sword-like, effective word proceeds. But in ver. 2, 2 a, it is not said, as according to 1 a, one might expect, "He made my mouth a shaft." That is said under the influence of 1 b, and, as remarked, presses the metonymy further. Still, by the polished shaft the word is meant, whereas הסתירני in 2 b again refers to the person. Evidently the Prophet would say, that the one whose word will work on men as sword and shaft, shall at the same time be protected against the hostile opposition of those that are struck, as a sword over whose hands its mighty Lord holds His sheltering hand (comp. li. 16), as a shaft that is hid in the quiver (comp. Ps. cxxvii. 5). I cannot believe that the "hiding" refers to the "time preceding the period of appearing, or eternity." Why then would the clauses בצל ידו החביאני and באשפתו הסתירני stand after? And did the thought require prominence, that the Servant before His appearance was protected? Certainly not. But it did need to be made prominent that the Servant, whilst He roused the world to bitter wrath, was at the same time hid safely.

In ver. 3 the motive of this protection is given. The Lord cannot leave unprotected the Servant by whom He will glorify Himself. Thus ויאמר is to be construed as explanatory. The Lord not only actually affords His protection: He says to him also why. He protects him because he is His servant, His instrument, and in fact one that in strife and victory shall reveal and glorify the power of God. Israel is, of course, not in apposition with the subject, but a second predicate, parallel with my servant. But here one may by no means take "Israel" as a designation of the nation. For the expression is to be explained as an allusion to Gen. xxxii. 28: "Thy name shall be called no more of Jacob, but Israel: for thou hast striven with God and men and hast prevailed." As there is a second Adam, a second David, and Solomon, so there is a second Israel. Jacob, at the time he received the name Israel, had sustained not only many perilous conflicts with men, but also the conflict with the mysterious appearance of the angel. We may not doubt that this his contending with God was also typical. Also He, whose type he was, must pass through conflict to victory, through pains and labor to rest, through shame to glory. Ver. 2 designates the conflicts that the Servant of God had to sustain with men. That He had also to contend with God, who was at the same time His protector, we see from Matth. xxvi. 36 sqq. Conflict and strife is the task of His earthly existence, but in the contender with God and by Him Jehovah glorifies Himself. For His decree of salvation realizes itself in the whole fullness of its love, wisdom and glory only in and through the second Israel. Of course not at once. For the Servant of God, during the period of His conflict, has dark hours, in which it appears as if He had labored in vain (ver. 4; comp. xxx. 7; lxv. 23; Job xxxix. 16), consumed His strength for emptiness and a breath (see Text. and Gramm.).

When, spite of all mighty operations of the Spirit, only inferior success, or even decided miscarriage, evidenced by the hatred of the majority of the people, is His reward, such despondency might well come over Him. But He consoles himself that His right is still with (את=penes, kept preserved by) Jehovah, and His reward (comp. xl. 10) with His God. With this the course of life of the Servant of Jehovah is briefly sketched, and the outwardly observable fruit of it designated. In both respects the result is, indeed, unfavorable, but the faith and hope of the Servant of God is not shaken.

3. And now saith—end of the earth.—Vers. 5, 6. In ver. 4 the Servant of Jehovah expresses the assured hope that, spite of past miscarriage, His cause will yet have a good issue. That this hope is well founded is declared by all that follows to ver. 13. For in these verses the Lord gives His Servant, in threefold gradation, the consoling promise that from lowliness He shall be raised to great glory. Therefore ועתה here is not contrastive, but is to be construed as confirmatory: "and now also really" (comp. v. 3, 5). With joyful emotion the Servant repeats ver. 5 first of all the facts that had served as the basis of His hope, and now after a momentary shaking prove to be actually steadfast. First He refers to the Lord's having prepared Him for His Servant even from His mother's womb (comp. on ver. 1 b). And, indeed, He was prepared as a Servant for the sake of a work, whose accomplishment the Lord must very pressingly desire in His own interest. For how often has not the Lord given assurance that for His own sake He will accomplish the redemption of Israel (comp., e. g., xlviii. 9, 11)! This work is the restoration of Israel to its God. We encounter here therefore the so important notion of שוב, concerning which see above Text. and Gram. Yet shall I——my strength. These words form a parenthesis. What the Servant of God hoped for, according to ver. 4 a, which in ver. 5 a the Lord holds out to Him indirectly, He here describes as a second possession: He shall be honored, if not in the eyes of men, yet in God's eyes (בעיני different from לעיני, comp. v. 21). Who does not recall here Jno. v. 41–44; viii. 50)? His calling the Lord His strength forms the antithesis to the previously expressed (ver. 4 a) sense of His own weakness (comp. xii. 2; Ps. xxviii. 7).

"And he said," (ver. 6), resumes the discourse interrupted by the parenthesis, in order to add something stronger to what is said, ver. 5. For the Servant having stated (ver. 5) that His task was the restoration of Israel to Jehovah, He now announces that, in the moment of His despondency, Jehovah has promised that that original task shall be small compared with (see Text. and Gram.) what henceforth is to be the aim of His activity: the Servant shall become the light of the Gentiles, and bear the salvation to the end of the earth. The expression, "raise up the tribes of Jacob, says more than one at first sight supposes. For it implies that the nation shall be restored according to its original distribution into twelve tribes. But after the deportation of the Ten tribes into the Assyrian captivity this never happened. For the great mass of the Ten tribes disappeared in the exile. The two tribes of Judah and Benjamin did indeed in greater number return; but after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus all knowledge of tribal belongings ceased. First in Rev. vii. 4 sqq. do we encounter again the sharp distinction of the Twelve tribes, and in Matth. xix. 29 it is said that the Twelve Apostles shall sit on twelve thrones to judge the Twelve tribes of Israel. Therefore the restoration of the Twelve tribes can be ascribed neither to the people of Israel as a whole, nor to the ideal Israel, nor to the Prophet, nor to the prophetic institution. Only He shall also restore again the Twelve tribes who restores Israel generally, therefore the one who performs the work of הָשִׁיב (comp. on שׁוֹבֵב, ver. 5) in relation to the נְצוּרֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, i. e., to the שְׁאָר, the שְׁאֵרִית or פְּלֵיטָה (comp. iv. 2, 3; vi. 13; x. 20 sqq.) in its full comprehensiveness. For a light to the Gentiles, therefore for all nations, shall the Servant of God be made, as is also said xlii. 6. Comp. Luke ii. 32; Acts xiii. 47. He that is the light of the nations shall also be their salvation (by metonymy for Saviour, bringer of salvation). In fact, by being their light, He becomes their salvation. The Prophet likely has in mind passages like Exod. xv. 2; 2 Sam. x. 11.

4. Thus saith——chose thee.—Ver. 7. The Prophet confirms the hope expressed with growing certainty by the Servant of Jehovah (vers. 4 b–6), by introducing (vers. 7, 8) the Lord Himself as speaker, to repeat to the Servant the promise of his deliverance and exaltation. The Lord designates Himself as the Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One, because the things spoken of in the words that follow shall reveal, not only the redemption of the Servant, but also of Israel, and not only God's gracious will, but also His holiness. But the Lord names His Servant by three predicates descriptive of His humiliation. This particular finds a stronger expression here than before or after. We hear sounds that evidently serve as a prelude to what we hear in chap. liii., especially ver. 3. The נֶפֶשׁ is here conceived of as the seat of pleasure and displeasure, longing and contempt (comp. Delitzsch, Psychologie, IV. § 6, p. 160; Prov. xxiii. 2; Ps. xxvii. 12; xxxv. 25; Num. xxi. 5; Job vi. 7, etc.) בְּזֹה (see Text. and Gram.) is only used as here this once. The fact that the word occurs again only in liii. 3 (bis) is perhaps a not unimportant sign of the relation of our text to that. מְתָעֵב־גּוֹי is qualitatively the same as בְּזֹה־נֶפֶשׁ, only quantitatively different. For the expression means: "he who makes the nation feel disgust, aversion." It is easily seen how here, too, the allusion is to the "sensation" of the soul. But while בזה־נפש designates an aversion felt in the inmost soul, גוי (meaning here neither the Israelite nor a heathen nation) expresses that the aversion is general, felt in the entire nation, in the entire natural community. For גוי is a people as a natural, worldly tribal communion (confluxus hominum). Hence the word designates the heathen nations, but also Israel, where it is spoken of in the sense just referred to (comp. i. 4; ix. 2). A servant of rulers the Servant of Jehovah is called because by men in power generally, and thus not kings only, He is regarded as a slave, as an individual with no rights. Every one of any command or consideration, deals with Him arbitrarily. But this relation shall undergo a mighty change. The Servant shall be raised to such a height and consideration, that even those possessed of the greatest power, the kings, shall rise up at the sight of Him (xiv. 9) and worship Him. Because of the LORD, etc., assigns a reason, and does not express the aim. The words recognize the connection between Jehovah and His Servant. Therefore for Jehovah's sake, i. e., inwardly determined by Him who stands true to His word, and hence helps His Servant, for the sake of the Holy One in Israel, who does not suffer him who is once chosen to fall, they do that expressed in the words "kings shall see—worship:

5. Thus saith——upon His afflicted.—Vers. 8–13. In this section, too, the Lord confirms with His own words the hope of His Servant. The particular of the humiliation, made so prominent in ver. 7, is here only alluded to. For I have heard thee and I have helped thee imply that the Servant was in a situation, out of which He must implore help. On the other hand the particular of mediation and effecting salvation is unfolded most gloriously. Everything must have its time. Also the Lord's display of grace. It belongs only to the wisdom of God to know the right time for everything. Thus He did not let the Saviour of the world come before the time was fulfilled (Gal. iv. 4). So Paul understood our text (2 Cor. vi. 2). And Christ Himself (Luke iv. 4), by taking Isa. lxi. 1 sq., for a text, in general explains the time of His appearing as "the acceptable year," which must be identical with the "acceptable time" of our text. The prophetic gaze, however, in the "year of salvation" sees comprehensively all those points of time that belong, by way of preparation and development, to this central point of the redemption of Israel. It begins with the deliverance from the Babylonish captivity and only ends in the completion of salvation in the world beyond. But it must be noted in our text, that the Prophet by no means has in mind the period of the redeeming appearance of the Servant of Jehovah in relation to the precedent suffering of Israel. But the time when He may appear to save is for the Servant Himself a time of salvation, in contrast with a precedent time of suffering, wherein He could not save because He Himself needed salvation in the highest degree. This appears from the antithesis of our ver. to vers. 7 and 4 a, and from the suffix ["thee"] in עֲנִיתִיךָ and עֲזַרְתִּיךָ, which can refer to no one but the Servant of Jehovah. Therefore this Servant must also, in the deep sufferings He must undergo, await the time that the wisdom of God has determined for His own deliverance. Beside an "acceptable time" and an "acceptable year" the Prophet also mentions an "acceptable day" lviii. 5, where see. The acceptable day will be for the Servant, naturally a day of salvation, of deliverance. On ישׁועה see immediately below. עזרתיך comp. xli. 14. With ואצרך "I will preserve thee" the discourse receives a direction toward the future. The rescued shall at once become a rescuer. To this end He must Himself, first of all, be preserved from all further assaults. Then the LORD will make Him a covenant of the people. The words: And I will preserve thee—people are repeated verbatim from xlii. 6, where also see the explanation of the expression "covenant of the people." This identity of language makes it evident that He who is made the covenant of the people is in both passages the same. Were the people of Israel meant by the mediator of the new covenant, then it would need to read גוים instead of עם. For Israel cannot be at the same time the one covenanted and the mediator, of the covenant. Nor can Israel be the one to distribute the land, for the land is to be distributed among the Israelites. Nor does Israel raise up the land. For this raising up happens only by the raising up of the people, i. e., Israel itself. Nor can one say that this restorer and divider is the ideal Israel. For precisely this latter is the one which, as possessor of the new covenant is put in possession of the renovated inheritance, and which thereby raised up, will be made a glorious and mighty nation. To this there is something additional. Who does not, with "raise up the land," and "cause to inherit the inheritances" recall Joshua, who raised up the land of Canaan to the honor of being the dwelling-place of the holy people and distributed it among the tribes of Israel (comp. Josh. i. 6, תנחיל את־העם את־הארץ)? This makes it natural for us to regard the one that is helped in a day of salvation and who is to be a second restorer and divider of the land as a second Joshua, as in ver. 8, we learned to know him as a second Israel. The first Joshua had to divide the land as one already inhabited and cultivated. The second will distribute it to the returning exiles as one hitherto lying waste. From this it appears that the Prophet has in mind primarily those returning from the Babylonish exile. These, too, came back under the conduct of a יֵשׁוּעַ to Palestine (Ezr. ii. 2; iii. 2, 8, 9, etc.). But this was not the right fulfilment of this promise (comp. the remarks on הקים את־שבטי י׳ ver. 6). Here, again, the Prophet contemplates together beginning and end, and correctly describes what must happen as a preliminary meager fulfilment before the historical appearance of the personal Servant of Jehovah, as also His work.

In ver. 9 a (comp. xlii. 7) the captives are addressed as persons; but in what follows they appear as a flock. The Prophet describes here, as often repeatedly in what has preceded, the all-important way home (xl. 11; xli. 17 sqq.; xliii. 2, 15 sqq.; xliv. 27; xlviii. 20 sq.). As in xl. 11, he represents Israel as a flock that finds pasture, both in the way, and on the high places (xlvi. 18) that are more arid than the valleys, so that they shall neither hunger nor thirst, nor suffer from the treacherous Fata Morgana (see on xxxv. 7). For Israel shall be under the best of leadership: "he that hath mercy on them shall lead them," (that is of course, indirectly, by the Servant according to ver. 8 b), even by springs of water shall He guide them.

Ver. 11 is to be explained according to xl. 4. Jehovah will lead His people the next and directest way. To this end the mountains, exempt from human power, but subject to the LORD as His mountains, i. e., as His creatures, must submit to be a way, i. e., doubtless where necessary lower themselves, while the valleys must fill up, and become elevated causeways (מסלות). To the particular that the return shall be happily accomplished by God's help, the Prophet adds, as in xliii. 5 sq., that the return shall take place from every quarter. Having begun with the general מרחוק, and added afterwards the more exact designations of the quarters of the heavens, he prompts the conjecture that only after the word of general contents was written, did the thought of the plagae coeli come to him. Hence we will not press מרחוק, nor venture to give it the meaning "south" in antithesis to צפון. For it never has it elsewhere. The passage Ps. cvii. 3, may not be cited as proof that יָם in antithesis to צפון means the south. For the latter passage appears just to rest on ours, and only proves that the author of that Psalm thought he must make מים in our text denote "from the south." Therefore I believe that מים here as everywhere else means "from the west." To this is put in antithesis the land of Sinim, as the remotest eastern land. This name must any way represent an entire quarter of the heavens and probably the east. Neither the people סיני mentioned Gen. x. 17, who belonged to the Phœnicians and dwelt in the north of Lebanon (comp. KNOBEL on Gen. x. 17), nor Sin-Pelusium (SAAD. BOCHART, EWALD), and still less the Kurd clan Sin (EGLI, Zeitschr. für wissensch. Theol. VI. p. 400 sqq.), meets these demands. Hence the majority of opinion inclines to understand the Chinese to be meant by the Sinim. [See a very copious note of J. A. ALEX., in loc., who holds the same view.—TR.]. It has been abundantly shown that already in very remote times wares from India and China were received by the Phœnicians in the emporiums of the Euphrates and Arabia, and brought by them to the west (comp. beside GESENIUS in his Thes., and Comm., and LASSEN, Ind. Alterthumsk. especially MOVERS Phoen. II. 3, p. 240 sq.). But if one ask how the Prophet came to call the Chinese by the name סִינִים, it is much questioned whether already in Isaiah's time they could be named Sinim as inhabitants of a land Thsin or Tsin (comp. WUTTKE, Die Entstehung der Schrift., p. 241). VICTOR v. STRAUSS (in an excursus in DELITZSCH, p. 712) consequently takes the view that the name סין is to be derived from the Chinese sjin, i. e., man. The extraordinarily frequent use that the Chinese made of this word, not only to designate all possible qualities, conditions, sorts of business, but also the relations of descent, moved foreigners to call the nation itself by this name. A decision on this point must be waited for. In conclusion the Prophet summons heaven and earth to rejoice at the important fact, so interesting also to them, that the LORD has again had mercy on His chosen people (comp. xliv. 23; lii. 9; lv. 12). The Prophet closes here in an artistic way as with a forte allegro, while the following strophe begins with a piano maestoso.

2. FORSAKEN ISRAEL BUILT AFRESH FROM THE GENTILES.

CHAPTER XLIX. 14–26.

14 But Zion said, The LORD hath forsaken me,
And [a]my Lord hath forgotten me.
15 [b]Can a woman forget her sucking child,
[1]That she should not have compassion on the son of her womb?
Yea, they may forget,
Yet will I not forget thee.
16 Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands;
Thy walls are continually before me.
17 Thy children [c]shall make haste;
Thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee.
18 Lift up thine eyes round about, and behold:
All these gather themselves together, and come to thee.
As I live, saith the LORD,
Thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all, as with an ornament,
And bind them on thee, as a bride doeth.
19 For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction,
[d]Shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants,
And they that swallowed thee up shall be far away.
20 The children [e]which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other,
Shall say again in thine ears, The place is too straight for me:
[f]Give place to me that I may dwell.
21 Then shalt thou say in thine heart,
Who hath [g]begotten me these,
Seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate,
[h]A captive, and removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these?
Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?
22 Thus saith the Lord [i]God,
Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles,
And set up my standard to the [j]people:
And they shall bring thy sons in their [2]arms,
And thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders.
23 And kings shall be thy [3]nursing fathers,
And their [4]queens thy nursing mothers:
They shall bow down to thee with their face toward the earth,
And lick up the dust of thy feet;
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD:
[k]For they shall not be ashamed that wait for me.
24 Shall the prey be taken from the mighty,
Or [5]the [l]lawful captive delivered?
25 But thus saith the LORD,
Even the [6]captives of the mighty shall be taken away,
And the prey of the terrible shall be delivered:
For I will contend with him that contendeth with thee,
And I will save thy children.
26 And I will [m]feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh;
And they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with [7]sweet wine:
And all flesh shall know

That I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer,
The mighty One of Jacob.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 15. עוּל. Ver. 16. חַקֹּתִי. Ver. 17. מַהֵר. Ver. 20. שִׁכֻּלִים. Ver. 21. גֹּלָה part. fem. from גָּלָה—סוּרָה = מוּסָרָה again only Jer. xvii. 13. Ver. 22. חֹצֶן. Ver. 23, generally.

Ver. 15. מִן before רַחֵם has the sense of a negative conjunction — so that not.—In the clause גם אלה וגו׳, as is often the case, the conditional particle is omitted.

Ver. 19. I construe the first כִּי as causal, but the second as the pleonastic כִּי that is wont to stand after a verbum dicendi (here to be supplied, comp. vii. 9).——תצרי מיושב is: thou wilt be strait from the viewpoint of the dweller, i. e., thou wilt be too strait for dwelling. תֵּצְרִי from צָרַר; comp. OLSH., § 243, b. [FUERST, Lex. derives it from יָצַר.—TR.]

Ver. 20. The imperat. גְּשָׁה relates necessarily to the same person as the suffixes in אָזְנַיִךְ and שִׁכֻּלַיִךְ.——לִי is not dat. loci, but dat. commodi.

Ver. 22. The expression נשׂא יד occurs in Isaiah only here. It plainly means "with uplifted hand to give a sign." For similar expressions comp. x. 32; xi. 15; xiii. 2; xix. 16. On the other hand הרים נס occurs again lxii. 10; yet more frequently נשׂא נס, (v. 26; xi. 12; xiii. 2; xviii. 3).

Ver. 24. Great difficulty is presented by שבי צדיק, which seems to correspond to שבי גבור of ver. 25. Is שבי צדיק the captivitas, i. e., captive of the righteous, or is it the troop of captives taken from the righteous, i. e., the righteous nation, Israel (comp. גְּזֵלַת הֶעָנִי the plunder taken from the poor, iii. 14), or is it the captive righteous, or, finally, is שבי עריץ to be read instead of שבי צדיק, which the SYR. rendering "captivitas herois," the VULG. "captum a robusto," the LXX., ἐὰν αἰχμαλωτεύσῃ τις ἀδίκως seem to justify? First, in regard to the change of reading, I do not think we can rely here on the ancient versions, for they were evidently uncertain about the sense, and guessed at it. The SYR. without more ado, felt justified in making the corresponding members of the parallel conform, since it translates: num auferetur praeda gigantis aut captivitas herois eripietur? Immo sic ait Dominus: praeda gigantis auferetur et captivitas herois eripietur." We would, therefore, be only continuing the arbitrariness of the ancients did we read עָרִיץ for צַדִּיק.——If we translate "the captives of the righteous one," then it must either be admitted that he is called a righteous one who still holds captive the people of God (at the very time when, according to ver. 23 sq., other heathen powers have begun to bring them back with great honor), and is fearfully punished for it (ver. 25 sq.), or all sorts of far-fetched meanings must be given to צדיק (as e. g., J. D. MICH. makes it mean "victor," or PAULUS, after SCHULTENS, — one who is right, what he ought to be, viz., a brave soldier).——But if we take שבי צדיק as genitive of the object according to iii. 14, then we must either take it in the sense of "plunder" (GESENIUS), which however is poorly supported by appeal to 2 Chron. xxi. 17, or else it is forgotten that when I say "to pillage the poor," what is pillaged is not the poor man himself but his goods. But if I say "to lead the righteous man captive," then the object of capture is the righteous man himself. Hence שבי צדיק were then nothing else than a troop of captives consisting of righteous persons. But then one would expect שבי צַדִּיקִים, since, indeed, the notion שְׁבִי, quite differently from גּוֹלָה, refers to a plurality. But since it reads simply שבי צדיק, I think it is to be translated simply "captivitas justa" (compare גוי צדיק xxvi. 2) i. e., "righteous prisoner." The qualification צדיק is prompted by Israel being the predominant thought in mind.

Ver. 25. אֵת before יריבך can be a preposition as in l. 8; Jer. ii. 9; comp. Hos. iv. 1; xii. 3; but also sign of the accusative, as in xxvii. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 8; Job x. 2. The accusative expresses more, and better suits the context.

Ver. 26. מוֹנֶה part. Hiph. from יָנָה (oppressit, comp. Lev. xix. 33; xxv. 14; Deut. xxiii. 17) occurs only here.——אֲבִיר—אָבִיר, occurs only in the connection אֲבִיר יעקב Gen. xlix. 24; Isa, lx. 16; Ps. cxxxii. 2, 5, and אביר ישראל Isa. i. 24.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In the second half of the chapter, in antithesis to the Servant of Jehovah, the Restorer, appears Zion, that, according to ver. 8 sqq., was to be restored by Him, and is restored. Accordingly, from ver. 14 on nothing more is said of the Servant of the LORD, but the discourse is only of Zion as the married wife that is apparently forsaken, yet is still tenderly beloved by the LORD, of her new upbuilding by countless children that are born to her, she knows not where or how, and (in contrast with this), of the judgments of God that shall come on the nations hostile to Israel.

2. But Zion said——continually before me.—Vers. 14-16. Zion can only say "the LORD hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me," when the Theocracy seems broken and irrevocably destroyed. The time after the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar was such. But with as much justice the time after the destruction by Titus may be regarded as such. The Prophet sees both together, as previously (ver. 8 sqq.) he had seen together the return out of the Babylonian and the Roman exile. Therefore these words of Zion also fall, and that very particularly, in the time when the Servant of Jehovah must lament that He has labored in vain (ver. 3). Is it an accident that the lament of Zion, ver. 14, follows immediately after the lament of the Servant of Jehovah? Did the Servant not need to lament that He labored in vain, then Zion would not have had to lament that it was forsaken. Both stand in the closest causal connection. To Zion's complaint Jehovah returns a wonderfully consoling reply. Here, too, as in xlii. 14; xlvi. 3 sq.: lxvi. 13, there is ascribed to Jehovah a feminine sensibility, a more than maternal love. How could the LORD forget Zion, seeing that her image was not merely in His heart, but also inscribed upon His hands, as a continual souvenir always before His eyes! In general these words call to mind Deut. vi. 8 sq.; xi. 18, comp. Prov. iii. 3; vii. 3. Others refer to the custom of branding or tattooing on the forehead, arm, or wrist of a slave the name of his master, of a soldier the name of his general, of an idolater the name of his divinity (comp. GESEN. on xliv. 5). Also Rev. xiii. 16 alludes to this custom. From "thy walls are continually before me," it is seen that the LORD would say He has the image of the city, not its name, always before His eyes. For the walls represent the outlines of the figure.

3. Thy children——where had they been. Vers. 17-21. Zion, forsaken and repudiated by her husband, and thus supposing herself debarred from bearing children, is in a wonderful way suddenly surrounded by the most numerous fresh growth, the richest blessing of children and ornament of children. Thy children hasten hither, says ver. 17. Manifestly there is in בָּנַיִךְ an allusion to בֹּנַיִךְ, as also the LXX., VULG. TARG. AR. actually seem to have read. LUTHER, too, translates "thy builders will hasten". Though this reading is neither justifiable nor a necessity, still the contrast with the second half of the verse demands that we press the radical notion in בנין, viz. בָּנָה, and recognize in it an allusion to the fact that it is the children which, so to speak, as the living stones build the house, the family, the generation (comp. Gen. xvi. 2; Exod. i. 21; Deut. xxv. 9; 1 Sam. ii. 35; xxv. 28; 2 Sam. vii. 27; Ruth iv. 11). Therefore, those who join stone to stone, that the house of Israel may grow endlessly, shall come on in haste, but those that destroy and desolate it shall make off. Israel, however, the mother, shall look around. She sees a great crowd. It has one goal: Zion. Thither all hasten. At first Zion cannot credit it, that all these press on to her as their maternal centre. But the LORD assures her of the important fact with an oath (חי אני, first, Num. xiv. 21, 28; Dt. xxxii. 40; only here in Isa.; Jer. xxii. 24; xlvi. 18; most frequent in Ezek. v. 11; xiv. 16; xvi. 48, etc. Comp. Isa. xlv. 23). Zion may regard all this as her own; she may put on the glorious crown of children as an ornament; she may gird herself with them as with the splendid girdle of the bride (קִשֻּׁרִים, iii. 20). But Zion makes objection. She points to the ruins of her cities, her wasted land. And, in fact, is there no contradiction in this double act of God? On the one hand He destroys the land and decimates the people, and then He brings on a countless multitude as children. And then what is a great multitude to do in a desert? In reply, the LORD persists in His assertion that Zion is to regard this crowd as her blessing of children. For, He says: as regards thy ruins and desolations and thy devastated land, I say to thee, that now thou shalt be too contracted to dwell in (see Text. and Gram.). Therefore, far from being frightened off by ruins and desolations, the new people even press on. Here is a straitened distress of a new sort! Formerly it was the Philistines, Ammonites, Syrians, Assyrians, etc., that took away the bread from the Israelites in their own land (comp. xxxiii. 30). Now it is her own children! On the other hand, the ancient מְבַלְּעִים, the ancient devourers have disappeared! That תצרי מיושב is more exactly explained ver. 20. The בני שכלים appear as speakers, and beg the mother to make room for them. It is especially to be noted that the mother is addressed as the representative of the family (see Text. and Gram.). The individual crowded inhabitants, one might think, ought to apply to their individual neighbors. But such a moving act can only be possible as the act of the totality. Hence the Prophet lets the demand be addressed to the ideal representative of the totality. So that it is to be remarked respecting גשה, that the word evidently means, not a moving to the speaker, but to the one dwelling in the opposite direction, thus not a moving to but away (comp. Gen. xix. 9).

Zion, destroyed by Assyrians, Babylonians, Romans (for the Prophet contemplates all these together), stands at last solitary, robbed of all her children. The ideal Zion has become essentially an abstraction, devoid of being. For when all single individuals have disappeared, as was the case after the final destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, then, indeed, the representative of the totality has nothing more to represent, she no more has anything real on which to lean. If now a numerous Israel comes on, then the question of ver. 21 is quite natural: who hath borne me these? יָלַד may not be rendered "begotten." For then Zion would know who had borne these children, but not who had begotten them. She rather says: I have not borne them; who then has borne them for me?—ואני וגו׳ is a causal clause: for I was childless (שכולה only here in Isa.), unfruitful (גלמודה, sterilis, again only Job iii. 7; xv. 34; xxx. 3), banished, driven away. Since the children stand before her, not as new born, but as grown up, she asks further: Who hath brought them up for me?

4. Thus saith——that wait for me. Vers. 22, 23. Now the LORD solves the riddle. The countless children are those converted to Jehovah from the Gentiles, and thus primarily become members of the spiritual Israel. But the spiritual Israel is the inward, everlasting core of the fleshly Israel. As the ἔσω ἄνθρωπος is the everlasting, abiding core of men in general; as therefore after the new birth, after death and the resurrection, the core of the personality remains ever the same, spite of all the changes of the outward manifestation, so is the "spiritual Israel" ever the same ideal personality that had already formed the centre of the "fleshly Israel." Hence, with our Prophet, it is the same subject that complains of the ruin of the outward Theocracy and the loss of motherhood ascribed to that, and then still is required to regard the converts from the Gentile world as its children. Hence I do not believe that by the children coming out of the Gentiles we are to understand the returning Israelites. For Israel could not ask, with reference to these: Who hath borne me these? Though for a time they might have been lost to the sight of the ideal mother, still must she have known them again and recognized them as children of her own body. Whence so many children, whom I have yet not borne myself? is Israel's inquiry. The LORD replies: at my sign the Gentiles bring thy children hither. Two things are new here: first, that the streaming hither of the children of Zion happens at the command (see Text. and Gram.) of Jehovah; second, that the Gentiles bring them hither with the greatest care and reverence. The first, already, shows that Jehovah and Zion have a common interest in the matter. They are in fact children of Jehovah and of Zion, viz. spiritual children that have received the spiritual Zion from its Lord, and are now come on to build again Zion corporally, in a certain sense (ver. 17). This construction is confirmed by what follows: And they shall bring thy sons in their bosom, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. Therefore these children born in the heathen nations are called Zion's, the children of the spiritual Israel. Or, as Paul says, Gal. iv. 26: "But Jerusalem which is from above is free, which is the mother of us all." Whether he himself understood that correctly or not, still the Prophet sees in the spirit that the outward, corporeal Zion ("the Jerusalem that now is") must be repudiated, (Gal. iv. 30; Gen. xxi. 10, 12), destroyed; but that in place of it shall come out of the spirit of Zion (now truly made free and far extended) a countless posterity, that shall build itself up a new, greater and more glorious Zion even in the corporeal sense (comp. liv. 1 sqq.). חֹצֶן is the sinus formed by the wide upper garment, in which one may even carry small children. For this expression, as also the one following: they shall be carried on the shoulder, denotes such children as demand careful watch and culture. Such care the new Zion shall receive even on the part of princes, i. e. states (comp. lx. 16; lxvi. 12). We need not here explain how this prophecy has been realized in a good as well as an evil sense. But fact it is, that the Zion here meant by the Prophet has received from the rich of this world not only nurture, but also reverence, that partly went the length even of idolatry (אפים ארץ; comp. Gen. xix. 1; xlii. 6; 1 Sam. xxiv. 9, etc.). The Prophet distinguishes here as little the individual princes as he does the gradations of the fulfilment. He does not know that he portrays the mutual relation of the Christian church and the Christian state, and comprehends in one expression blessing and curse, the earthly beginnings and the heavenly completion of this relation. The mention of princesses along with the kings has likely only a rhetorical significance. In a picture of well-nurtured little children, the nurses must not be wanting. Thus Zion will experience that its God is the true God, the eternally existent One, whose divinity evidences itself to men in this, that those who, even in the deepest distress, do not lose their trust in Him, will not be brought to shame (comp. xl. 3; Ps. xxv. 3).

5. Shall the prey —— mighty One of Jacob, vers. 24-26. The verses 22, 23, testify to a surprising turn in the sentiment of the world-powers toward Israel. The inquiry is suggested: Will all Gentile powers be converted to such a recognition of the high significance of Israel? And if not, what is the prospect for those Israelites that are held fast by such nations as persist in their hostility. To this the Prophet replies in these verses, 24-26. He says, to begin with: a strong man will not allow his plunder or captives to be taken from him. In Luke xi. 21 the Lord evidently has in mind our passage when He speaks of "the strong man armed keeping his palace." (On שב׳ צדיק, see Text. and Gram.). Israel, ready for the return home, is, any way צדיק, however it may have been with respect to the guilt or innocence of those that were led away into exile. With reference to Israel it is therefore asked, whether perhaps righteous prisoners are easier to free than others. Of course one would think that, with a strong man, it mattered little whether his captives came into his power justly or unjustly, that thus under any circumstances it were impossible to take his captives from him. But the Prophet, notwithstanding, answers the question whether this be possible, with yes. For the LORD has said so, in case Israel is this captivitas, this spoil. In that case the LORD Himself will be the champion for Israel against those contending against it (יָרִיב, comp. Ps. xxxv. 1; Jer. xviii. 19 and יָרֵב, Hos. v. 13; x. 6), and will redeem his children (see Text. and Gram). In ver. 26 a, by a strong figure, it is described how the LORD will contend with the contenders; He will reduce them to a condition where they will eat their own flesh and make themselves drunk with their own blood as with new wine. It seems absurd to point to an historical realization of this as e. g. KNOBEL does by referring our passage to "dissensions among the enemies of Cyrus," and especially to the desertion of the Hyrcanians and of the Babylonian subject-kings Gobryas and Gadatas from the Babylonian cause (Cyrop. iv. 2; iv. 6; v. 1-3). Our entire prophecy has an eschatological character. It presupposes the final judgment of the "fleshly Israel," and describes how, like a phœnix, the new spiritual Israel will arise out of its ashes. The strong figure of eating one's own flesh, etc., recalls such texts as ix. 19 sq.; Zech. xi. 9; ix. 15. Thus shall the whole world know that the alone true. eternally existent God, Jehovah, and the Deliverer and Redeemer of Israel, the Mighty One of Jacob, is one and the same. For Israel's deliverance is also only a means to attain the highest end, viz. that all the world may be blessed, and God's holy name may be known and praised. There occurs a repetition of ver. 26 b in lx. 16.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlix. 1. "Jactat vocationem suam ad confirmdos gentium animos, ne offendantur stulta et infirma Christi specie, qui praedicatur crucifixus. Nolite me ideo contemnere, inquit. Venio divina auctoritate."—LUTHER.

2. On xlix. 1, 2. "When Jesus says here, God has called Him by name from His mother's womb on, it may be seen that no one should press into an office without regular commission (Heb. v. 4), and how no man can receive any thing unless it be given him from heaven (Jno. iii. 27). The power of the divine word is this, that it cuts as a sharp sword and pierces as an arrow and wounds the hearts of men, on the one hand so that they know their sin, accept the offered pardon in Christ, are inflamed with love towards God, and receive everlasting life, on the other hand, however, so that they wilfully oppose the word, and are thus wounded to everlasting death. For this sword of the word can do both, can kill and make alive, as also Paul says, it is to some a savor of death unto death, but to some a savor of life unto life (2 Cor. ii. 16)."—RENNER.

3. On xlix. 3. "Jesus is the true, perfect Servant of God, by whom the Father perfectly carries out all His gracious purpose. He is the true Israel, hero of God, and contender with God in one person, and only in and through Him do other men belong to the true Israel. Through Him God performed His highest work; for He conquered sin and death, and won peace with God by His soul-struggle and His bitter suffering. So God is now rightly known in Him, and praised as love." DIEDRICH.

4. On xlix. 4. "Christ Himself does not suppose. But we, when we see the beginning of Christ, must think and suppose, Christ labors in vain. For if one looks to His birth, to His preaching, to His suffering, to His death, to His poor twelve fisher servants by whom He would reform and take possession of the whole world, one must suppose, for the life of him it will never do. Yet the LORD's purpose will still prosper in His hand (liii. 11), and His counsel is wonderful and gloriously accomplishes itself (xxviii. 29). But if a preacher happens to think that his labor is in vain, let him consider, first, that the affair is not his, but God's, who will carry it out (Ps. lxxiv. 22), for it would be a reproach to him to let it fail. Second, let him consider, that God has called him. He that has put him into the regular office, will doubtless also make him prosper." CRAMER.

5. [On xlix. 6. "We may learn hence, (1) that God will raise up the tribes of Jacob; that is, that large numbers of the Jews shall yet be 'preserved' or recovered to Himself; (2) that the gospel shall certainly be extended to the ends of the earth; (3) that it is an honor to be made instrumental in extending the true religion. So great is this honor, that it is mentioned as the highest which could be conferred even on the Redeemer in this world. And if He deemed it an honor, shall we not also regard it as a privilege to engage in the work of Christian Missions, and endeavor to save the world from ruin? There is no higher glory for man than to tread in the footsteps of the Son of God; and he who, by self-denial and charity, and personal toil and prayer, does most for the conversion of this whole world to God, is most like the Redeemer, and will have the most elevated seat in the glories of the heavenly world." BARNES.].

6. On xlix. 7. He who among all beings unites the greatest contrasts in Himself is that one Mediator between God and man. For He alone belongs to two worlds, and He alone stands on the lowest and the highest step. Many have been born in a stall, and have hung on a cross, but in no one case was contempt so contemptible as in His, and no one felt it so keenly as He. To none however but to Him, is given a name that is above every name (Phil. ii. 9 sqq.). "Eo ipso vocabulo, quo se commendat, significat faciem ecclesiae . . . . Coram mundo enim nihil ecclesia est calamitosius, nihil improbius, nihil magis profanum. Quare vocat eam animam contemptibilem, gentem abominabilem et servum tyrranorum. Hi sunt magni tituli Christianorum, quorum si quos pudet, illi cogitent, se frustra Christum quaerere." LUTHER.

7. On xlix. 8. The time of Christ's sufferings is here called the time of the gracious hearing of the Messiah; the great day of salvation, in which the salvation of men was acquired by Christ; the time of help and deliverance of the Saviour calling for help in deep waters of suffering (Ps. lxix. 2, 3), the time of mighty preservation and protection of the Redeemer pressed down to the ground by the burden of sin, the time when God set Him for a covenant among the people." STARKE.

8. On xlix. 12. Although even in the Old Testament, some of the heathen were scatteringly added on, as is seen in the case of Jethro, Ruth, Rahab, the Gibeonites, Ittai the Gittite (2 Sam. xv. 19) and others beside; yet this was first to take place in full measure in the time of the coming of the Messiah, who is especially the consolation of all Gentiles (Hag. ii. 8)." CRAMER.

9. On xlix. 14. "If thou thinkest, God has wholly forsaken thee, then He has thee in His arms and fondles thee."—LUTHER.——"We are not forgotten of God, for there is a memorandum written before Him of those that love the LORD (Mal. iii. 16). Yea, He has a fatherly and motherly love for us, seeing we are borne by Him in His body (xlvi. 3). We ought, for this reason, not to judge by outward fortune and looks, how God is minded toward us, but hold exclusively to the word and promises."—CRAMER.

10. On xlix. 15. "God compares Himself to a father (Ps. ciii. 13; Mal. iii. 17), and if that were not enough, also to a mother. Now as to how a father's and mother's heart is affected, a father and mother can easily measure with respect to their children. Examples: Hagar cannot bear to see her son Ishmael die (Gen. xxi. 16); the real mother before Solomon's judgment seat cannot suffer her son to be divided (1 Ki. iii. 26). Therefore, now God breaks His heart over us, so that He must have mercy on us (Jer. xxxi. 20). Yea, God's love far excels the fatherly and motherly στοργή. For there are cases where pitiful women have even boiled their children (Lam. iv. 10). Examples: In the siege of Samaria (2 Ki. vi. 20), and in the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans (JOSEPHUS). But God is very differently affected toward us, for He is love itself, grace itself, compassion itself."—CRAMER.

11. On xlix. 22, 23. It was known to the Gentiles that the Jews called themselves the chosen people of God. How they made sport of it may, among other instances, be seen from Cicero's oration pro Flacco, chap. 28. This Flaccus, while administering the province of Asia, had prohibited the Jews from sending the annual temple tax to Jerusalem. This constituted one of the points of complaint against him. For the Jews must even at that time have had not inconsiderable influence in Rome. This appears from Cicero giving it to be understood that the matter was dealt with "non longe a gradibus Aureliis" (probably the Jews' quarter for dwelling or business at that time). He adds: "Scis quanta sit manus, quanta concordia, quantum valeat in concionibus". Then he continues to speak summissa voce, in order to be understood only by the judges, and not by such as would set the Jews on him. He justifies the procedure of his client as quite legal. Finally he concludes with the words: Sua cuique civitati religio est, nostra nobis. Stantibus Hierosolymis, pacatisque Judaeis, tamen istorum religio sacrorum a splendore hujus imperii, gravitate nominis nostri, majorum institutis abhorrebat; nunc vero hoc magis, quod illa gens, quid de imperio nostro sentiret, ostendit armis. Quam cara Diis immortalibus esset, docuit, quod est victa, quod elocata, quod servata. This last clause evidently contains mockery. Cicero starts with saying that the Jews were described as especially dear to the gods. But how much there is in this special favor of the gods may be seen from the gens judaica being victa, elocata servata. This language seems to be a play on words. For the words can mean: "conquered, hired out, saved,"—but also: "conquered, transplanted (from their home to some other place), made slaves." Then servare would be formed ad hoc from servus, as, e. g., sociare from socius, filiare from filius, etc. Pompeius brought many thousands of the Jews to Rome, who being found useless as slaves, laid the foundation of the Jewish congregation of after times. Comp. PRESSEL in HERZ., R.-Enc., XVII., p. 253.

12. On xlix. 23. "Worldly dominion should tend to this, viz., to seek the best advantage of the Church of God, and maintain its protection. Otherwise, if God were not concerned about His Church, kings and princes would be of no use on earth. And just that they ought even to know." CRAMER.

13. On xlix. 24 sqq. Whether we understand by the "strong one" the devil, or the power of carnal Judaism, or political powers hostile to Christianity, it is in any case certain that the LORD will conquer the strong one in all these forms, and wrest his plunder from him. In reference to the oppressors eating their own flesh and intoxicating themselves with their own blood, it is to be remembered how all enemies of the truth must finally fall out with one another and tear each other's flesh, and even devour one another (Judg. vii. 22; 1 Sam. xiv. 20; Ps. lxxxiii.). Recall the many judgments of God: Christ and unbelieving Israel (especially the contests of the zealots in the siege of Jerusalem); Nero, who was by the senate declared to be an enemy of the state; the heroes of the French Revolution, etc.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xlix. 1-6. In times of the Church's distress and conflict, when it seems as if the Church of the LORD must be destroyed by its enemies, this passage can be held up to the congregation as a glorious word of consolation. For what is here said primarily of the Servant of God may be so applied to the Church of the LORD to show: The grounds of comfort that assure us that the Church of Christ can never perish. 1) The Church in its beginnings was willed and prepared by the LORD (ver. 1); 2) It is equipped with weapons that are effective for all times (sharp sword, clean arrow = word of God, Heb. iv. 12); 3) It always enjoys the divine protection (shadow of the hand, quiver ver. 2); 4) God's honor and the salvation of the world is its task (vers. 3, 6), which, a. amid many conflicts and infirmities (ver. 4), yet b. in the power of God (ver. 5), it will at last gloriously execute (vers. 5, 6).

2. On xlix. 6. "The Lord Jesus in the halo of the world-mission. 1) It is a small thing for the LORD to be the consolation of Israel, He is also a light to the Gentiles; 2) It is also a small thing for the LORD to be the light to the Gentiles, He is also their salvation to the end of the earth. 3) It is a small thing for the LORD to be light and salvation to the world, He is also thy light and thy salvation" E. QUANDT.

3. On xlix. 7. Even if the Church of Christ be often quite despised, and an object of aversion and trodden under the feet of tyrants like a slave, yet it must never forget that it is where it is for the LORD's sake. The LORD can as little give Himself up as forsake His Church. He must be faithful to it, and so the time shall at last come when kings shall see and shall rise up, princes shall worship for the LORD's sake.

4. On xlix. 7-13. The salvation of God. 1) It is well founded, for it rests on the Mediator of the Covenant, Jesus Christ, the Son of God (ver. 8). 2) It is universal, for it consists a. in salvation from all distress (vers. 8-11); b. it is destined and prepared FOR ALL (ver. 12). 3) It is exceeding glorious (ver. 13). 4) But it has its appointed day, the day of salvation (ver. 8), and that must be waited for with patience and hope.

5. On xlix. 14-16. The motherly love of God. 1) It hides itself at times (ver. 14); 2) it is founded on our being children of His body (ver. 15); 3) it leads all to a glorious end (vers. 15, 16).

6. On xlix. 17-23. This passage must be regarded in the light of Gal. iv. 22-31. According to that, we know that the ruined and shattered city, the desolate land, is the earthly Jerusalem, that is judged by God, whose children are given up to death and destruction. But in this Jerusalem is concealed, as the abiding kernel, that Jerusalem that is above, the free. This is the mother of us all, viz. us Christians. All out of all nations that come to Christ become children of this heavenly Jerusalem. Dead as the earthly Jerusalem is, conscious of having lost her husband and her children, Zion arises again as the heavenly Jerusalem, and is now visibly surprised to see innumerable hosts of children hasting to her, and herself the recipient of every sign of honor from the rich of this world.

7. On xlix. 24–26. The redemption that comes by Christ is also a victory over Satan. Hence we also praise Christ as the one who has redeemed us from the power of the devil. 1) By what has He redeemed us? (He quarreled with the quarreler, and on the cross conquered the strong one, Heb. ii. 14, 15; Eph. iv. 8; Col. ii. 14, 15). 2) How far did He redeem us? (He freed us, a. from the guilt and punishment of sin; b. from the dominion of sin.) 3) To what purpose did He redeem us? (That we should experience and taste the grace of our God, ver. 26.)

II.—THE SECOND DISCOURSE.

The Connection between the Guilt of Israel and the Suffering of the Servant, and the Deliverance from Guilt by Faith in the Latter.

CHAPTER L.

With reference to xlix. 14 the Prophet inquires: Where is Zion's writing of divorcement? Zion is not repudiated, but only punished, because when its Lord came it did not receive Him. But that is the connection between the guilt of Israel and the sufferings of the Servant, who willingly takes them on Himself because He is strong in God and assured of His final victory. Also Israel can become free from its guilt and the punishment of it by turning again to the LORD in the exercise of faith. Of course those that persevere in their sin must be destroyed in it as in a self-kindled flame.

The discourse accordingly subdivides into three parts: 1) vers. 1-3; 2) vers. 4-9; 3) vers. 10, 11.

1. TO WHAT EXTENT AND WHY ZION IS A FORSAKEN WIFE.

CHAPTER L. 1–3.

1 THUS saith the LORD,
Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement,
[a]Whom I have put away?
Or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you?
Behold, for your iniquities have ye [b]sold yourselves,
And for your transgressions is your mother put away.
2 Wherefore when I came, was there no man?
When I called was there none to answer?
Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem?
Or have I no power to deliver?
Behold, [c]at my rebuke [d]I dry up the sea,
[d]I make the rivers a wilderness:
Their fish [e]stinketh, because there is no water,
And [f]dieth for thirst.
3 [d]I clothe the heavens with blackness,
And [d]I make sackcloth their covering.

[a] With which I put her away. [b] been sold. [c] by.
[d] I will. [e] shall stink. [f] shall die.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 2. גערה—פרות—מדוע often used of dividing waters, Ps. xviii. 16; civ. 7. Ver. 3. קדרות, comp. Joel ii. 10; iv. 15.——שׂק. Note the comparatively numerous relative or absolute ἅπ. λεγ. ending in וּת, occurring in verses 1-3. There are four: כריתות, פרות, קדרות and כסות.

Ver. 1. אֲשֶׁר after ספר כריתות אמכם is the acc. instrumenti — "wherewith."

Ver. 2. כִּפְדוּת (comp. Exod. viii. 19; Ps. cxi. 9; cxxx. 7). The construction with מִן is as in xlix. 19; vii. 13; xxxiii. 19.——וְתָמֹת is the jussive form without jussive meaning. The like often occurs: xxvii. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. ix. 10; xi. 6; civ. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet here introduces the LORD as the speaker, letting Him explain Himself His relation to Zion, which all through these chapters He has in mind, viz. to the Zion that has rejected the Servant of God, and thus is self-rejected, still not on that account repudiated forever. This Zion has exclaimed, xlix. 14: "The LORD hath forsaken me, the LORD hath forgotten me." The LORD has already replied to this xlix. 15 by emphasizing His paternal or rather His maternal position, but not His position as husband. Here He replies to that complaint as Zion's husband. He does not deny that in a certain sense Zion is a divorced wife, her children sold into captivity. But He denies that Zion is definitively divorced by a writing of divorcement, and that the children are sold to a creditor as equivalent for a debt. Rather both the divorce and the sale are come on them only as a means of chastisement, as punishment for their sins (ver. 1). This punishment, of course, needed to be because the LORD, in coming to His own possession, found no one to receive Him, because when He called, no one answered, although His redeeming power was in no way exhausted. For He is and continues under all circumstances the Lord of heaven and earth, who can dry up sea and river (ver. 2), and can clothe the heavens with darkness (ver. 3).

2. Thus saith——put away, ver. 1. Of course this verse refers to xliv. 14. But one must not on that account separate vers. 1-3 from what follows and join them to chap. xlix, as many do. For apart from chap. xlix. being well rounded and complete in itself in its homogeneous parts, vers. 1-3, after a joyous beginning, have a very serious meaning that points to what follows. Zion has, indeed, received no writing of divorcement; but still it needed to be punished for its sins (see under § 1 above). The manner of the coming is described vers. 4-9, and the unavoidable punishment, vers. 10, 11.

Some have found in ver. 1 an "apparent contradiction," and would explain it away by saying: Jehovah had, indeed, given Israel a writing of divorcement, but not a usual one, in which the cause of separation needed not to be assigned (Deut. xxiv. 1), but one in which the sin of Israel was named as the cause. But the Rabbins, JEROME, ROSENM., HAHN, DEL., and others justly remark, that the question of the LORD, אי זה, evidently involves the meaning, Israel has in fact no writing of divorcement to show. It was sent away without a bill of divorcement, which, according to Deut. xxiv. 1, was necessary to give the divorcement legal force,—therefore it was not definitively sent away, but only provisionally, with the prospect of being received back again. [" The simplest and most obvious interpretation of the first clause is the one suggested by the second, which evidently stands related to it as an answer to the question which occasions it. In the present case, the answer is wholly unambiguous, viz.; that they were sold for their sins, and that she was put away for their transgressions. The question naturally corresponding to this answer is the question, why the mother was divorced, and why the sons were sold? Supposing this to be the substance of the first clause, its form is very easily accounted for. Where is your mother's bill of divorcement? produce it that we may see the cause of her repudiation. Where is the creditor to whom I sold you? let him appear, and tell us what was the occasion of your being sold."—J. A. ALEX.]. In the same manner the Prophet would say, that the LORD has not sold the children of Zion, His children, to a creditor as the equivalent for a debt, in which case He would have lost all right to them. Thus both divorce and sale were temporary, and with the right of repurchase. It is of course to be remarked here, that according to Jer. iii. 8, the LORD did, indeed, give Israel of the Ten Tribes a bill of divorce. Yet the same Prophet makes in ver. 1 the extraordinary statement that the LORD will receive again His divorced wife spite of the legal enactment Deut. xxiv. 4. [This reference to Jeremiah seems fatal to the Author's interpretation, and completely to confirm that of J. A. A., given above.—TR.].

The distinction that the Prophet makes between mother and children in the two clauses of this comparison is intended only to emphasize the notion of totality; not merely the abstract communion shall be preserved, but it shall retain its natural members. For it were conceivable that the LORD would restore an Israel community with the institutions of the old, but with a non-Israelitish population, with foreign born, branches only grafted into the olive tree Israel (Rom. xi. 17 sqq.). This, says the Prophet, shall not be; but to the olive tree shall be given also the natural branches, to the national communion the natural children shall be given back. Not all! For only the שְׁאָר, the ἐκλογή is worthy and capable of being the heir to this promise. This distinction is further marked by representing the mother as divorced, the children as sold. In Matt. xviii. 25, Jesus speaks of selling wife and children to pay debts. The Old Testament indeed speaks of a man selling himself with wife and children (Exod. xxi. 1-6; Lev. xxv. 39 sqq.; Deut. xv. 12 sqq.). But it is controverted that a man might legally sell his wife or his children in order to pay his debts (comp. SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. Recht. p. 860, and ŒHLER HERZ. R.-Encycl. XIV. p. 465 sq., against MICHAELIS, Mos. Recht. III. p. 36 sqq.). But whether legal or not, it seems as a matter of fact to have been a practice to sell children or to take them by force from their father in discharge of a debt, and I think that in this sense MICHAELIS not unjustly appeals to 2 Kings iv. 1; Job xxiv. 9; Neh. v. 1. Naturally the selling of children would occur oftener than the selling of a wife. How deep-rooted a law of custom may become, even when contrary to statute law, is seen in the analogous case related in Jer. xxxiv. 8 sqq. נֹשֶׁה (comp. xxiv. 2) is the creditor that loans money and demands repayment. The Babylonian Exile was such a temporary sending away of the wife and sale of children. But also the Roman Exile is such; for both are of a sort, and the Prophet contemplates both together. Israel is never to be entirely and definitively repudiated.

3. Wherefore when I came —— their covering.—Vers. 2, 3. The sin for which Israel must be punished consisted in this, that "the LORD came to His own and His own received Him not" (Jno. i. 11). It was as if a stranger, unknown and without rights had come. The servants went each his way; He called, no one answered Him (lxv. 12; lxvi. 4). Most recent commentators understand this to refer to the LORD's coming by the Prophets. Without saying that this is impossible, I must still maintain that it is unusual, on which account it is not by the commentators supported by examples. That the LORD unceasingly sent His prophets to call Israel to repentance, that Israel would not hear, and that therefore the Babylonian Exile must come on them, became, especially in Jeremiah, almost a standing expression. But the word שָׁלַח is always used with emphasis: Jer. vii. 25; xxv. 4; xxvi. 5; xxix. 19; xxxv. 15; xliv. 4. That Isaiah writes בָּאתִי and not שָׁלַחְתִּי has doubtless its reason. And it is precisely this, that he really meant a personal coming of the LORD, and conceives of it as mediated by the Servant of the LORD, whose appearance forms the chief contents of this second Ennead.

Israel's not receiving the LORD, might be explained were the LORD grown powerless. But such is not the case. Therefore it has no reasonable ground. It is base contempt, deserving punishment. As the long hand is a figure for wide-reaching power (num nescis longas regibus esse manus? comp. GESEN. in loc.), so the short hand is of a power confined to a narrow sphere. The expression is founded on Num. xi. 23, and occurs again only xxxvii. 27; lix. 1. In proof that Israel had no reason for rejecting Him as weak and powerless because He came in the form of a servant, the LORD urges that He is still able to do what He could do at that time when He appeared in majesty before the eyes of Israel, when the people did not dare to refuse Him. For "at my rebuke I dry up the sea, etc., recalls the passage through the dead sea and the Jordan, and I clothe the heavens with blackness, etc., recalls the black cloud on Sinai that veiled the sight of God from the people. One ought to see the δόξα under the present ταπεινότης. The Prophet had repeatedly, in what precedes, used the deliverance out of the Egyptian captivity as a type and pledge of future deliverance (xliii. 2, 16, 17; xliv. 27). He does the same here. As regards the passage of the Red Sea, Ps. cvi. 9 has a manifest connection with our passage, the latter clause of which corresponds with the words "I make the rivers a wilderness." These same words occur verbatim Ps. cvii. 33, as proof of the divine omnipotence in general that can both make waters a desert and the desert waters. The latter is expressed by a word drawn from Isa. xli. 18. The stinking and dying of the fish are cited as proof of the entire drying up of the waters. This trait, which is no where mentioned in reference to the passage of the Red Sea and Jordan, seems to me to be drawn from the events attending the turning the Nile water into blood (Exod. vii. 18, 21). In this case there would be, in some sense, a confusio duarum figurarum, the poetic transference of an Egyptian event to a fact of later date connected with it. Also the words of ver. 3 remind one of the exodous from Egypt; comp. Exod. xix. 9, 16; xx. 18; xxiv. 15 sqq.

2. THE OFFENSE OF ISRAEL CORRESPONDS TO THE SUFFERING OF THE SERVANT, WHO WILLINGLY SUFFERS, YET IS STRONG IN GOD.

CHAPTER L. 4-9.

4 [a]The LORD God hath given me the tongue of [a]the learned,
That I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary:
He wakeneth morning by morning,
He wakeneth mine ear
To hear as [a]the learned.
5 [a]The Lord God hath opened mine ear,
And I was not rebellious,
Neither turned away back.
6 I gave my back to the smiters,
And my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair:
I hid not my face from shame and spitting.
7 [a]For the Lord God [b]will help me;
Therefore [c]shall I not be confounded:
Therefore have I set my face like a flint,
[d]And I know that I shall not be ashamed.
8 He is near that justifieth me;
Who will contend with me? let us stand together:
Who is [e]mine adversary? let him come near to me.

9 Behold, [e]the Lord God will help me;
Who is he that shall condemn me?
Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment;
The moth shall eat them up.

[1] Heb. the master of my cause. [e] The Lord Jehovah.
[a] disciples. [b] helps. [c] I am not. [d] For I knew.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Vers. 4, 5, 7, 9. אדני יהוה. Ver. 4. עוּת. Ver. 5. מָרָה. Ver. 6. מרטים. Ver. 7. חלמישׁ—כָּלָּם, comp. Ezek. iii. 8, 9. Ver. 8. מצדיק.

Ver. 4. For עות an analogous Arabic root gives sufficient reason for adopting the meaning "succurrere, sustentare." The combination with עֵת (לָעוּת—לְעוֹת from עָתַת, denomin. from עֵת, ABULWALID, KIMCHI, LUTHER, et al.) is on the contrary quite uncertain. The derivation from לָעָה (לָעוּת substantive, as פְּדוּת, etc.), is impossible because לָעָה is used only in a bad sense — "to babble, βαττολογεῖν."——דָּבָר is — with the word. It is the same accusative that we had in אֲשֶׁר שִׁלַּחְתִּיהָ verse 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The form of the Servant of God develops with increasing distinctness. The Prophet characterizes Him here in a double aspect. First he describes Him as docile in respect to learning what He was called to perform actively: viz., raising up the weary by means of the word. By this the schoolmaster (pedagogical) activity of the Servant of God is intimated (ver. 4). But the Servant of God is docile in another sense. He is obedient and willing to suffer according to God's will. He does not elude the abuse to which men subject Him, and which answers to just that unsusceptibility of Israel intimated in ver. 2 (vers. 5, 6). But He knows, too, that the LORD will sustain Him, and He shall not come to shame, and this enables Him to harden His face like a flint (ver. 7). He knows that the LORD will conduct His cause and justify Him, and can, therefore, boldly summon His adversaries before the bar of judgment. They shall pass away as a moth-eaten garment (vers. 8. 9).

2. The Lord God——as the learned.—Ver. 4. The divine name אדני יהוה (The Lord Jehovah) occurs in this chapt. relatively oftener than in any other Isaianic passage, viz., four times, vers. 4, 5, 7, 9. The tongue of a disciple is a docile tongue, willing and capable of learning. The Prophet, therefore, sees in the Servant of God one who must learn, and who likes to learn. The picture of the Servant of God that appears before the spiritual eye of the Prophet has not entirely clear and complete outlines. It is one that is prophetically obscure, not wholly comprehensible to the Seer himself. One learns from it only this much, that the Prophet sees the Servant of God active in the service of the "weary and heavy laden." For those described, Matth. xi. 28, best answer to the יָעֵף.

According to the accents, בבוקר בבקר should be joined together as in xxviii. 19. But it seems to me more fitting to arrange them palindromically after the example of xxvii. 5 (יַעֲשֶׂה שָׁלוֹם לִי־שָׁלוֹם יַעֲשֶׂה לִי). DELITZSCH well remarks that the Servant is here plainly distinguished from the prophets. For the latter receive their revelations mostly by night. But the Servant of God says that His ear is every morning awakened in order to hear after the manner of a disciple. He is thought of, therefore, not as under the influence of a momentary inspiration repeated at intervals, coming upon Him in the condition of sleep, but as under the constant influence of the Spirit that gives testimony of itself to Him every day from the moment He awakes to consciousness in the morning and on. Evidently the latter is a higher form of spiritual communication; it implies a more intimate relation between God and him who receives it. But this communication concerning the way in which the Servant of God receives the revelation of the Spirit stands between the descriptions of His active (ver. 4 a) and passive obedience (ver. 5 sqq.), if I may use the expression. Is it, then, to be referred to both kinds of obedience? At least it is not to be conceived why "opening my ear" should accomplish itself in another way.

3. The Lord God——eat them up.—Vers. 5–9. The revelation and instruction that the Servant of God receives relate more to the will than to knowledge. The ear that is opened is that inward ear where the voice of God is audible and welcome to the soul, and where, therefore, hearing and obeying are one. For what is spoken of here is how the Servant of God has learned obedience, how He ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθε τὴν ὑπακοήν, as is said, Heb. v. 8, with evident reference to our text, and a modification of its thought. I was not disobedient and I turned not back, show that demands were made on His patientia, His willingness to suffer, and capacity for suffering. This is instantly confirmed by ver. 6. For there the Servant of God enumerates what was expected of Him. He gave his back to the blows (properly to the smiters, Matth. xxvii. 26), his cheeks to the plucking, he hid not his face from shame and spit (doubtless a hendiadys; comp. Matth. xxvi. 27; xxvii. 30). And these sufferings must, by the connection of this discourse, answer just to that offence of Israel for the sake of which it was sold and put away (ver. 1). By inflicting them it displayed that insusceptibility in consequence of which it would not receive its LORD nor follow His call (ver. 2). But not merely obedience gives the Servant of God the power to submit to the severe sufferings. He is also mightily strengthened in this self-surrender by the firm belief that God supports Him. To understand the two halves of ver. 7 in their right relation, the first must be referred to the past, the second to the future. The first יַעֲזָר is to be taken in the sense of continuance: But the Lord helps me, hence I have not (hitherto) come to shame.—Just because by this support hitherto experienced I have been strengthened and encouraged, I am become all the more firm, and insensible to persecutions. I have made my face like flint, because (ו in וָאֵדַע is causal) I knew that I would not be put to shame.—The Servant of the LORD knows that He is hated of the world, in many ways censured and persecuted. But He knows, too, that the LORD, His legal assistant, will bring His innocence to light, and will destroy the adversaries. Confident in His support who will prove Him to be a righteous one, He boldly challenges His adversaries. "Who will contend with me?" He says (comp. on xlix. 25). Let us stand together (comp. xliii. 26)! Who is my adversary? (בַּעַל מִשְׁפָּט only here, comp. xli. 11 and Exod. xxiv. 14, which passages perhaps hovered in the Prophet's mind). In ver. 9, יַעֲזָר לִי is decidedly to be taken in the future. הִרְשִׁיעַ, in the sense of "to make bad, guilty, i. e., to condemn," is found in Isa. again only liv. 17. Comp., moreover, Job xxxiv. 29; Rom. viii. 34. ["Rom. viii. 33, 34 is an obvious imitation of this passage as to form. But even VITRINGA, and the warmest advocates for letting the New Testament explain the Old, are forced to acknowledge that in this case Paul merely borrows his expressions from the Prophet, and applies them to a different object."—J. A. ALEX.]. The words כֻּלָּם כַּבֶּגֶד יִבְלוּ are quoted from our text in Ps. cii. 27. Comp., moreover, li. 6, 8; Job xiii. 28, and the List.

3. THE CONDITION ON WHICH ISRAEL MAY BE RECEIVED TO GRACE.

CHAPTER L. 10, 11.

10 Who is among you that feareth the LORD,
That obeyeth the voice of his servant,
[a]That walketh in darkness, and hath no [b]light?
Let him trust in the name of the LORD,
And stay upon his God.
11 Behold, all ye that kindle a fire,
That [c]compass yourselves about with [d]sparks:
Walk in the light of your fire,
And in the [d]sparks that ye have kindled.
This shall ye have of mine hand; ye shall lie down in [e]sorrow.

[a] Who. [b] splendor about him. [c] gird. [d] fiery darts. [e] torment.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 11. קָדַח, comp. Deut. xxxii. 22; Jer. xv. 14; xvii. 4.—זִיקוֹת, comp. זִקִּים xlv. 14.

Ver. 10. The passage at first sight seems to admit of a double construction. Either one may understand the question מִי בָכֶם וגו׳ as one that requires the answer "no one;" then the second half of the verse must be referred to the Servant of Jehovah. Or one takes מִי in the sense of "quisquis," and יִבְטַח וגו׳ as a comforting call to those who incline to put their trust in the Servant of God spite of his humble condition. I regard the latter construction as the correct one, for the following reasons: First, according to the former construction, the whole characteristic of the Servant (אֲשֶׁר as far as בֵּאלֹהָיו) is superfluous, for it contains nothing but a needless repetition of what is said immediately before in vers. 5-9. For it is said in vers. 6, 7, that the Servant of the LORD walks in rayless darkness; and he himself testifies in vers. 7-9 that he trusts in the LORD. Why this repetition?——Second, in that case ver. 10 b must read וְהוּא יִבְטַח וגו׳. For there is no justification of what HAHN says: viz., that, by the use of the perfect, the clause is subordinated to that beginning with יִבְטַח, so that we are to translate: "who trusts, although he walks." If the notion "although" needed to be expressed, it could not be done by means of the perfect הָלַךְ, but it must then read: וְהוּא יִבְטַח וגו׳. Hence I share the view of GESENIUS, MAURER, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH, that the question מִי בָכֶם וגו׳ singles out of the totality of Israel all the individuals to whom apply the predicates יְרֵא ה׳ and שֹׁמֵעַ בְּקוֹל עַבְדּוֹ. The words מִי as far as לוֹ are subject of the whole clause, as KNOBEL correctly says. It is quite natural that יְרֵא ה׳ should stand first; for only he that fears God hears also the voice of His Servant (Jno. viii. 47). The relative sentence אֲשֶׁר as far as נֹגַהּ לוֹ is regarded by many as a continuation of the particip. construction יְרֵא—שֹׁמֵעַ, so that it describes the situation of the God-fearing, that makes them appear as those that need help. But, first one looks in that case for וְהָלַךְ, and, second, the negative ואין נגה לו would be too weak a description of the mournful condition implied in their case. Hence I think the relative clause is to be referred to the Servant. Then אֲשֶׁר involves a significant contrast: he who fears Jehovah and hearkens to the voice of His Servant, which (i. e., although the same) walks in darkness and dispenses with all splendor,—let him trust, etc.—— הָלַךְ חֲשֵׁכִים, comp. ix. 1; the accusative is the acc. localis according to analogy of הָלַךְ רוּחַ, צְדָקוֹת.

Ver. 11. Instead of מְאַזְּרֵי some would read מְאִירֵי according to the Syriac; or even arbitrarily change the reading (Hitz.) to מְאַוְּרֵי (a non-Hebrew word formed from the Arabic). Both are unnecessary. אִזֵּר is the direct causative Piel = "to make compass about."—— למעצבה וגו׳ is not—ye shall lie in torment; לְ denotes the terminus in quem of the laying (Job vii. 21; Lam. ii. 21, comp. 2 Sam. viii. 2; xii. 16; xiii. 31).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As the discourse of the Servant, which forms the pith of this chapter, was introduced by a word of Jehovah's, so now it is concluded in the same way. For that vers. 10, 11, are the words of Jehovah appears from this ye shall have from my hand. He turns to the two classes into which Israel separates in relation to the Servant of God. Even after Israel, for the most part, has rejected the Servant of Jehovah, those that fear God and hearken to the voice of the Servant spite His lowliness and obscurity, and lean on Him, may still be blessed (ver. 10). But those who with flaming torches and burning arrows raged against the Servant of God and His cause are told that the fire kindled by them shall devour themselves. That will be the painful punishment prepared for them by the Lord (ver. 11).

2. Who is among——in sorrow, vers. 10, 11. As ver. 6 in a measure formed a prelude to the positive statements concerning the suffering of the Servant contained in liii., so hath no light (splendor) are a prelude to the negative ones (liii. 2 b). Walketh in darkness along with hath no light, which is the reverse side, is the Biblical expression for the deepest misery, unalleviated by a ray. Therefore whoever, spite of this miserable exterior (see Text. and Gram.), still heeds the voice of the Servant, may trust in the name of Jehovah (Ps. xxxiii. 21) and lean on his God (x. 20; comp. xxx. 12; xxxi. 1); therefore he may comfort himself by the promises of grace given vers. 1–3.—The enemies of the Servant are called fire-kindlers. Doubtless a fire is meant that burns in them and by which they then set the outward world on fire. For wickedness is a fire, and the wicked, poisonous tongue (which we are specially to understand by זִיקוֹת) is, in Jas. iii. 5, 6, expressly called a little fire that yet sets a world on fire, and a world of iniquity. Making one's girding of fiery darts may be said in the same sense as one speaks of girding with strength (Ps. xviii. 33, 40), or with joy (Ps. xxx. 12), i. e. figuratively. Fiery darts are their favorite weapons. Gesenius seems to think of a fire inadvertently kindled, because in ver. 11 a he finds only the continuation of the figure of the darkness and the thought of arbitrary self-help. Others refer the kindling of a fire to the persecutions of the prophets, or to the insurrections of the Jews against the Romans. Of course events of this sort may contribute to the accomplishment of what the Prophet would say. But it is perverse to think exclusively of special events. All that wicked Israel did, directly and indirectly, against the Servant of God, with fiery darts kindled with hell fire, only kindled a fire that consumed themselves. Thus their own fire turned into a fire of divine wrath, and into that they were constrained to enter. Jerusalem with the Temple perished in it. Of that day when this fire must burn, the Lord says in advance to them: from my hand is this come upon you; in torment ye shall lay yourselves down. The day when Israel shall experience that fiery judgment from the Lord is the day when, after having played their part, they shall lie down; but they then lie down not in repose, but in torment.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On l. 1. The church of the Lord may be sorely punished, it may be overrun with enemies, partly destroyed, reduced, as in the days of Elijah, to 7,000 that are invisible, but it can never receive a bill of divorce. For what God has joined together men shall not put asunder. If this be true of the original and Christian marriage, why not still more of the original type of marriage? Eph. v. 23 sqq.

2. On l. 2. "Quia veni et non erat vir. Veni in carnem, inquit, sum mortuus pro vobis, resurrexi, implevi et exhibui praesens omnes promissiones. Verum vos me non recepistis. Sicut est Joh. i.: 'venit in propria et sui eum non receperunt.'—Numquid abbreviata et parvula, etc. Jactat potentiam suam contra Judaeos et objurgat eos. Quasi dicat: vos me ideo negligitis, quod sine aliqua pompa veniam. Spectatis corporale regnum et hanc infirmitatem contemnitis. Verum ego sic soleo; numquam liberavi vos per virtutem, sed semper per infirmitatem, in qua summa virtus et potentia est, et tum soleo esse potentissimus, cum prorsus nihil posse existimor." Luther.

3. On l. 2. At My rebuke. "God can destroy the wicked by a rebuke (Ps. ix. 6). When He rebuked the Red sea it became dry (Ps. cvi. 9). And when Christ threatened the wind it became still (Luke viii. 24). If God can then do so much by chiding, what will happen when He joins the deed to the word, and takes the iron sceptre or the goad in hand (Ps. ii. 9; Acts ix. 5)?" Cramer.

4. On l. 4 sqq. Luther, who renders לשון למודים by "learned tongue" still gives in his commentary the explanation that thereby is not to be understood a "lingua magistri," but a "lingua discipuli" or a "lingua disciplulata, quae nihil loquitur, nisi quod a Deo didicit." And with this agrees admirably what the Lord, especially in the Gospel by John, so often affirms, that He says nothing but what He has heard from His Father, that He does nothing but what He has received from the same, wills nothing but what He wills (John iii. 11, 32; iv. 34; v. 19, 30; vi. 38; vii. 16; viii. 16, 38; x. 18, 37, 38; xii. 49, 50; xiv. 10, 31; xv. 15; xvi. 32). But that the Lord was not docile only with reference to speaking and doing, but also with reference to suffering, He says Himself in the words: "My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt," Matth. xxvi. 39. And hence, Paul testifies that Christ was obedient unto death, even the death on the cross (Phil. ii. 8).

5. On l. 6. The Lord said, Luke xviii. 31–33: "Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. For He shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: and they shall scourge Him, and put Him to death: and the third day He shall rise again." Regarding this it must be noted, that there is no other Old Testament passage that declares that the Servant of God would be spit upon. Moreover no other passage speaks at least so plainly of scourging and smiting. It is further very probable that "ὑβρισθήσεται" especially answers to לחיי למרטים; for if anything can be an ὕβρις, it is this ill-treatment of the face. It is accordingly in the highest degree probable that in Luke xviii. 31 sqq. the Lord had especially in mind our passage. It then appears also what good reason we have for referring our passage to the Servant of Jehovah.

On l. 7–9. "Spes confisa Deo nunquam confusa recedit."—"He who holds out through Passion-week with Christ alone, must and shall also keep Easter there with Him." FOERSTER.

7. On l. 11. Regarding the meaning and the fulfilment of this passage, both may be best learned from what JOSEPHUS (bell. jud. VI. 4, 5 sqq.) relates concerning the taking of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple. Titus had commanded to preserve the Temple. But "τοῦ δὲ (viz., τοῦ ναοῦ) κατεψήφιστο τὸ πῦρ ὁ θεὸς πάλαι." A Roman soldier, "δαιμονίῳ ὁρμῇ τινι χρώμενος" casts a fire-brand through the golden window into the Temple. Titus hastens up and commands to extinguish the conflagration. He is not heard, or men will not hear. A soldier secretly applies fire to the door-posts of the Temple building proper. The Temple was consumed "ἄκοντος καίσαρος." JOSEPHUS repeatedly testifies that it was the LORD that gave the Temple to the flames, and thereafter the whole city of Jerusalem. One might fancy, while reading his account, that he had in mind the words of our text: "This shall ye have of Mine hand." And who does not think also of: "ye shall lie down in sorrow" (torment) when reading of the surviving Jews, how some were sent off to the mines, some kept to contend as gladiators and with wild beasts in the theatres, the rest sold as slaves (JOSEPHUS, l. c. VI. 9, 2).

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

7. On l. 1–3. Sermon of consolation in times of the Church's distress. What are we to think of the present conflicts of the Church? 1) We must regard them as a divine chastisement for the sins of the church, and suffer ourselves to be led by them to repentance (behold for your iniquities are ye sold—and no one answered vers. 1, 2)—2) We ought not to despair in these conflicts, but comfort ourselves in the expectation of a gracious deliverance. For God a. is willing for it, because He has neither given the church a bill of divorce, nor can give it (ver. 1, where is the bill, etc.); b. He has also the power to do it (is my hand shortened, etc., ver. 1, I clothe the heavens, etc., ver. 3).

2. On l. 4. The LORD says Matt. xi. 28: "Come unto me all ye that are weary," etc. That is a right well-intended summons and worthy of all confidence. For no one can in fact so refresh the weary as He. Has not God just for this given Him an instructed tongue? "This too may serve to comfort (the weary) when they pour out their hearts toward the servants and children of the LORD, who, mighty in His word, tried and preserved under many a cross, have learned by experience, after their Redeemer's example, to speak a word in season to the weary (weak, wretched, comfortless, that bear away at their cross nearly tired out, and nearly unable to get on)." SCHRIVER, Seelenschatz, Theil. IV. 9 Pred. § 6. If, by the waters of such distress and tribulation, there remain still a little spark of faith, apply yourself diligently to consider the word of God, that it may not be utterly quenched, although the devil will be marvellously glad to hinder it. How Christ comforts one by His dear word! As also it is said: "The LORD hath given me a learned tongue," etc. THOLUCK, "Hours of Devotion," p. 252.

3. On l. 4–9. PASSION SERMON. The sufferings of the Lord. 1) The ground of them (obedience, vers. 4, 5); 2) The nature of them (ill-use of every sort on the part of those that hated the LORD, vers. 6, 7); 3) The use of them (that we may boldly say: who will contend with me? who is He that condemneth? [Rom. viii. 33, 34] vers. 8, 9).

4. On l. 6. "O Lamb of God, how hast Thou tasted to their full extent the impositions of human sinfulness! The blindness and wickedness of the human heart could only become manifest by contrast with Thy holiness, as night is only known in its entire darkness by contrast with the spotless light; and thus it has now even happened. And thou wast silent, and Thou hast endured all contradiction of sinners, silent when they struck Thee with their fists, when they spit in Thy face—the unjust thus treating the Just one, the servants their LORD, the creature the Only Begotten of the Father! "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks . . . shame and spitting:" thus it is written of Thee. Innocent Lamb of God, how hast Thou borne the sins of the world, and been obedient unto the depths of humiliation! THOLUCK, l. c. 493.

5. On l. 10, 11. PENITENTIAL SERMON. God is love, and at the same time holiness and justice. He bears the rod Gentle and the rod Woe. He announces to us the law and the gospel. To-day also He turns to the pious and the wicked, and offers to each His own. The Lord to-day presents to us life and death. 1) He offers life to those that fear Him (ver. 10). 2) But He presents death to those who have kindled their heart, word and work at the flames of hell, and thereby set ablaze a fire in which they shall themselves perish (ver. 11).

III.—THE THIRD DISCOURSE.

The Final Redemption of Israel. A Dialogue between the Servant of Jehovah who appears as one veiled, Israel, Jehovah Himself and the Prophet.

CHAPTER LI.

This chapter speaks of high and mighty things. We hear four persons speak one after the other. Each of the speakers from his view-point announces what he has to produce in reference to the chief subject. The Servant of God, appearing significantly veiled, presents to Israel the condition of its redemption (vers. 1–8). Israel then turns with believing supplication to its LORD, praying for a display of power as of old (vers. 9–11). The LORD answers Israel with comfort and exhortation, but then turns to the Servant, who is called to execute the work of redemption, in order to set before Him the origin, means and goal of His work (vers. 12–16). Finally the Prophet himself takes up the word in order to exhort Israel that it would take to heart the consolation given by Jehovah (vers. 17–23).

1. THE (VEILED) SERVANT OF JEHOVAH PRESENTS TO ISRAEL THE CONDITION OF THE REDEMPTION.

CHAPTER LI. 1-8.

1 HEARKEN to me, ye that follow after righteousness,
Ye that seek the LORD:
Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn,
And to the hole of the [a]pit whence ye are digged.
2 Look unto Abraham your father,
And unto Sarah that bare you:
[b]For I called him alone,
And blessed him, and increased him.
3 For the LORD shall comfort Zion:
He will comfort all her waste places;
And he will make her wilderness like Eden,
And her desert like the garden of the LORD;
Joy and gladness shall be found therein,
Thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.
4 Hearken unto me, my people;
And give ear unto me, O my nation:
For a law shall proceed from me,
And I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the people.
5 My righteousness is near; my salvation is gone forth,
And mine arms shall judge the people;
The isles shall wait upon me,
And on mine arm shall they trust.
6 Lift up your eyes to the heavens,
And look upon the earth beneath:
For the heavens shall vanish away like smoke,
And the earth shall wax old like a garment,
And they that dwell therein shall die in like manner:
But my salvation shall be forever,
And my righteousness shall not [c]be abolished.
7 Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness,

The people in whose heart is my law;
Fear ye not the reproach of men,
Neither be ye afraid of their revilings.
8 For the moth shall eat them up like a garment,
And the worm shall eat them like wool:
But my righteousness shall be forever,
And my salvation from generation to generation.

[a] well. [b] For he was alone when I called him. [c] perish.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 3. שָׂשׂוֹן וְשִׂמְחָה which, beside Ps. li. 10, occurs only in Isaiah; Jer. xv. 16; xxxi. 13, uses לְשָׂשׂוֹן וּלְשִׂמְחַת לְבָבִי, and vii. 34; xvi. 9 קוֹל שָׂשׂוֹן וְקוֹל שׂ׳. Comp. Zech. viii. 19. Ver. 5. זְרֹעַ—אִיִּים. Ver. 6. מָלַח. Ver. 8. לְדוֹר דּוֹרִים—סָס—צֶמֶר, comp. Ps. lxxii. 5; cii. 25.

Ver. 1. חֻצַּבְתֶּם abbreviated relative clause for אֲשֶׁר חֻצַּבְתֶּם מִמֶּנּוּ.

Ver. 2. The imperf. תְּחוֹלֶלְכֶם, before which אשר is likewise to be supplied, occasions surprise. Why is the perf. not employed? Had the Prophet had in mind the one act of physical birth he must have put the perf. As the word cannot be treated as a substantive (comp. תְּקוֹמְמֶיךָ Ps. cxxxix. 21), the choice of the word and the verbal form must be explained by understanding the Prophet to be thinking, not merely of the torqueri that accompanies the act of birth, but also of that torqueri spe (comp. Gen. viii. 10; Job xxxv. 14: Ps. xxxvii. 7) that Sarah had to endure through so many years.—— The punctuation of the verbs ואברכהו and וארבהו with the mere Vav, copulative indicates that we are to construe the Vav as denoting intention (Ewald, § 347, a).

Ver. 3. נִחַם and וַיָּשֶׂם are praeterita prophetica.—— The expression גַּן יְהוָה occurs only here. גַּן אלהים occurs several times in Ezek.: xxviii. 13; xxxi. 8, 9.—— קוֹל זִמְרָה occurs beside here in Ps. xcviii. 5. Isaiah uses זמרה again xii. 2; xxiv. 16.

Ver. 4. It is needless and conflicting with the context to read עַמִּים and לְאֻמִּים (Codd., Syr.), instead of עַמִּי and לְאוּמִּי, or even to take עַמִּי and לְאוּמִּי as plural endings (Gesen.) and to refer both to the Gentiles. For these verses contain an exhortation to Israel not to renounce its privilege. לְאֹם is indeed nowhere else used for Israel. Yet the use of גּוֹי Zeph. ii. 9 is analogous. In this case as there, the want of a second word fitted to correspond in parallelism with עַם occasions the abnormal use.—The diversities of meanings encountered in the root רָגַע, (e. g., the meanings of emotion, trembling, resting seem to combine in the same root), is probably to be explained thus: we must distinguish between a רגע with original ע, and another with an ע that is derived from a hissing consonant. Probably רָגַע, denoting tremefecit, terruit, and from which is derived רֶגַע momentum (movimentum, moment of the trembling emotion), is softened from רְגַז, רגשׁ (as e. g., the Hebrew צ becomes ע in Aramaic, comp. אַרְעָא, עָנָא, — צֹאן, etc.). But רגע that involves the meaning "to rest" has an original ע. The Hiph. הִרְגִּיעַ in our text means "to make rest," and that in a similar sense to הֵנִיחַ and הִנִּיחַ, which forms, as is well known, in like manner acquire the meaning "deposuit, demisit, posuit, collocavit" (comp. xxx. 32; xiv. 1; xlvi. 7, etc.). Thus ארגיע would involve the meaning of "settling permanently." For this right is that which from now on remains permanently, everlastingly.

Ver. 6. It is uncertain whether מָלַח is radically related to מָרַח "conterere," hence מֶלַח contritum, what is broken small, both salt and rags (Jer. xxxviii. 11, 12); or whether מלח has the fundamental meaning "to flood, to flow," hence מֶלַח — flow, salt-flux, salt and — that which has flowed, passed away.——כְּמוֹ־כֵן is taken by the ancient translators and expositors in the sense of "just as," which grammatically is quite correct, but is thought to be flat as to sense. Hence, after the example of Lowth and Vitringa, most recent expositors take כֵּן to mean "gnat." But כֵּן does not occur in this sense in the singular; and the plural כִּנִּים Exod. viii. 12 sqq.; Ps. cv. 31 is without doubt to be referred to כִּנָּה (comp. כִּנָּם Exod. viii. 13, 14) and not to כֵּן. Hence Delitzsch is of the opinion that כְּמוֹ־כֵן is to be taken in the sense of a "so" to which an accompanying gesture imparts a contemptuous meaning. But for this he can only appeal to classic analogies; for 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; Num. xiii. 33; Job ix. 35 are not fitting comparisons. I am of the opinion that if כְּמוֹ־כֵן is not taken in the sense of "just as," the application of the comparison is wanting. For whether כֵּן be taken — "gnat," or — contemptuous "so," in either case the clause וישביה to ימותון still belongs to the comparison and the application is wanting. Thus the discourse becomes obscure; whereas it is quite clear if the clause וישביה וגו׳ contains the application. For then it is said that all, that is nothing more than citizen of the earth, will pass away just as heaven and earth.

Ver. 7. חרפת אנושׁ comp. Ps. xxii. 7; and concerning אנושׁ the remarks on viii. 1.——גִּדּוּפֹת with fem. ending only here; yet comp. גדופות Ezek. v. 15; with masc. ending xliii. 28; Zeph. ii. 8.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Connecting with the exhortation, l. 10, to hearken to the voice of the Servant of God, the Prophet first lets a speaker enter of whom one does not exactly know whether he is Jehovah or one closely connected, indeed, with Jehovah, yet a distinct person from Him. If he is the latter, he can be no other than the Servant of Jehovah, who, veiling here His servant-form, already suffers His unity with Jehovah to appear. The following are reasons for thinking that it is the Servant of Jehovah that speaks in vers. 1–8: 1) the reference of שִׁמְעוּ אֵלַי, li. 1, to שֹׁמֵעַ בְּקוֹל עַבְדּוֹ, l. 10; 2) li. 1, 3, speak of Jehovah in the third person; 3) xlii. 4, the Zionitic law is called the law of the Servant of Jehovah, and the speaker in these verses describes the same law as proceeding from him (ver. 4) and as his law; 4) in ver. 16 the Servant is evidently addressed, and thus is assumed to be a participator in the dialogue, as πρόσωπον τοῦ διαλόγου. This discourse divides into three sections, each of which begins with an emphatic summons to give heed: שמעו (ver. 1), הקשיבו האזינו (ver. 4), שמעו (ver. 7).

2. Hearken to me——voice of melody, vers. 1–3. The exhortation "hearken to me" refers back to "who hearkeneth to the voice of my Servant," l. 10. Although li. 2 is proof that Jehovah is the speaker, still on the other hand Jehovah in ver. 1 a once and in ver. 3 twice is spoken of in the third person. Should not the Servant of Jehovah Himself be regarded as the speaker? His unity with Jehovah and His glory begin to shine through here; but because the servant-form and glory still stand uncombined side by side, He does not here appear plainly as the bearer of the latter. Those whom He summons to hear Him are the same that, l. 10, are described as those that "fear the Lord." The last expression is a general one. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Prov. i. 7). "To fear God" includes earnest endeavor after righteousness in the widest sense, involving being right and having salvation (proof-text for רדף צדק, Deut. xvi. 20; comp. Prov. xxi. 21). But the possession of salvation is assured to those that seek and find the Lord Himself, the highest good (" בִּקֵּשׁ said with reference to Exod. xxxiii. 7; Deut. iv. 20, especially in Hos. iii. 5; v. 6; vii. 10). These upright souls that strive after true righteousness and communion with God, and who are, hence, inclined and fitted "to trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon their God" (l. 10), the Servant of the Lord would strengthen and confirm by referring them to Abraham and Sarah. He compares Abraham to a rock from which building-stones are hewn, and Sarah to a well-hole (מַקֶּבֶת בּוֹר, the latter reminding one of נְקֵבָה, comp. xlviii. 1), from which earth, clay, etc., are taken. There lies in the figure the notion of the primitive paternal and maternal ancestry. Ancestors are authority. Their posterity ought to resemble them, not only physically, but spiritually. Israel, then, ought to look back to its ancestors in order to imitate their example. It is to be noticed that Sarah is named here, as in Heb. xi. 11, along with Abraham, as the companion of his faith (see Text. and Gram.). Sarah's pains in bearing the son of promise were two-fold: first, the inward struggles of faith, the sorrows of a hope again and again deceived, and yet not given up, joyfully ended at last by the physical sorrows of the birth. Thus תחוללכם leads over to the fact in which Abraham approved himself as an example of faith: the Lord called him as standing alone, as it were a solitary tree, but of course in order to bless and multiply him (see Text. and Gram.). The verbs "to bless and multiply" play a chief part in the promise given to Abraham. Therefore the Prophet points to these here (comp. Gen. xxii. 17; xii. 2, 3; xiii. 15, 16; xviii. 18, etc.). Through long decennials and up to years when posterity was no longer naturally to be expected, Abraham had stood alone like a tree in a wide field, about which, even after long years, there appeared no sign of young growth from seeds falling from it. But he was not on that account weak in faith. And thus he is a comforting example to his posterity. For that Zion that the Prophet has in mind, which will be contemporary with the Servant of God, and wasted and forsaken (comp. xlix. 14 sqq.), shall also grow up again and have a numerous seed and become a glorious garden of the Lord. By pointing to believing Abraham, the Prophet lets it be understood that just and only on the condition of a faith like Abraham's can wasted Zion become again a paradise (עֵדֶן, Gen. ii. 15; Joel ii. 3). Unbelieving Israel, however, remains a waste!

3. Hearken unto me——not be abolished.—Vers. 4–6. This section begins with a summons to hearken, still more emphatic than the preceding. It reminds one of xlix. 1. The Lord will let a new law go forth, He will promulgate a new right to the nations. According to xlii. 1–4; xlix. 6, it is the Servant of God that is the medium of this new revelation of Jehovah's. The Thorah here spoken of is, therefore, the Zionitic law, or the Gospel, and the right that will be set for a light to the nations is the new ordinance which, resting on the fact of the offering made on Golgotha, makes faith, and no longer works, the central point of subjective performance. I repeat here expressly, that I do not ascribe to the Prophet this knowledge, but that I only explain here what is objectively implied in the Prophet's words, but not clearly known by him.

If this new Thorah is promulgated, then, on the one hand, "righteousness is come near" that avails with God (xlvi. 12, 13), and with it salvation is gone forth (i. e., given out, offered to all); but, on the other hand, the time also of universal judgment has arrived. For when the Saviour of the world has appeared, then the time of judgment has come. But the judgment begins at the house of God. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is the first act of the world's judgment (Matth. xxiv.). We men living at present are, therefore, already in the world's judgment. In this time, then, of the publishing of the Zionitic law on the one hand, and of the world's judgment on the other, the isles shall hope in the Lord, and wait on his arm (זְרֹעַ symbolically = protection, support, hence singular; whereas before in 'זרעי ישפטו' the word is taken in the physical sense, therefore the plural). Here it is intimated, therefore, that just the isles, i. e., the remote, heathen nations, especially of the West, in that last time, that is to be both a time of salvation and of judgment, will accept salvation. It is to be noted that the Prophet says nothing of Israel's believing on the Servant of the LORD and on His law. Here, therefore, is a hint of that conflict in which Israel stood after the appearance of the Servant and still stands: either to cleave to the gospel with the Gentiles and thereby to disappear as a nation, or to reject the gospel and thereby to be themselves rejected, yet to be preserved as a nation for the time when, without jealousy or competition, the kingdom of God shall appear as the kingdom of David, and will be still one flock under one Shepherd. On "ייחלון" comp. on xlii. 4.

Of course Israel acts thus from no praiseworthy motives, but from obstinacy and pride. And hence fleshly Israel shall be destroyed in the judgment. In ver. 6 the Prophet commands to consider heaven and earth. The heavens, seemingly so firm (firmamentum, στερέωμα) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth that bears all, will become worm-eaten and rotten and pass away as an old garment, and the inhabitants of the earth shall perish just so. But the salvation of Jehovah shall be forever and his righteousness shall not perish. Therefore whoever possesses this salvation and this righteousness shall be preserved. It is not said that whoever is dug out of the fountain of Abraham shall be blessed. But he that will follow the call of the LORD as Abraham, he that takes His law and believes Him, he shall be blessed, though he were a heathen. Whoever does not believe, though of the seed of Abraham after the flesh, shall perish away just as (see Text. and Gram.) the heaven and earth. Thus the difference between Israel and Gentiles disappears. He that has not the "salvation" and "righteousness" of the LORD is a mere earth inhabitant, whether of the race of Israel or not, and as such he shall perish with the earth.

4. Hearken unto me——generation.—Vers. 7, 8. For the third time we hear the summons to hearken. This time it is not addressed to Israel, but to all those that know the true righteousness, and have the law of the Servant of Jehovah in their hearts. "Those that know righteousness" differ from "those that follow after righteousness" only so far as that one must first know righteousness before he can follow after it. It is implied that, not a mere outward acquaintance is meant, but one truly inward and experimental. With this agrees the additional clause the people in whose heart is my law. From this is seen: 1) That not the outward Israel is meant, that received the Mosaic law outwardly. The words manifestly contain an express antithesis (comp. Jer. xxxi. 33, which seems to rest on our text). 2) That here, too, the Servant of Jehovah is thought of. For this new, higher law is in xlii. 4, expressly called His law, and the Thorah of which ver. 4 speaks, can be no other than that of which the Servant of Jehovah is called to be the mediator. Just on this account, however, the nation, in whose heart is the law of the Servant of Jehovah cannot be regarded here as itself appertaining to the "Servant of Jehovah," as DEL. [also J. A. A.] supposes. The people that has the righteousness and the law of the Servant of Jehovah in their hearts is not the people of Israel. It is a great people, a more numerous congregation. It is believing mankind, the congregation of those born again, the spiritual Israel, in distinction from unbelieving mankind, the world. This believing congregation has ever and everywhere to contend with the world. It is hated and persecuted by the world (Matth. x. 34 sqq.; 2 Tim. iii. 12). But it can rest assured of the protection of its LORD. Hence the exhortation: fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings. For the moth shall eat them up as a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool. There is a play of sound in the original 'יאכלם עש' and 'יאכלם סס' that cannot be well reproduced in another language. This is the third time that the figure of the garment recurs (l. 9; li. 6), and the second time for that of the moth (l. 9). Both are here combined and strengthened by the rhetorical variation, "the worm shall eat them like wool." סָס, probably from the fundamental meaning of "to spring", allied to סוּס, is the Greek σὴς (Matth. vi. 19, comp. BOCHART, Hieroz., Lib. IV., cap. 25). The concluding clause, but my righteousness, etc., ver. 8 b, corresponds in part verbatim to the close of ver. 6; only that here, too, for the sake of variety there occurs a transposition of the notions.

2. ISRAEL EXHORTS THE LORD TO A NEW DISPLAY OF HIS ANCIENT POWER, AND HOPES FOR THE BEST FROM IT.

CHAPTER LI. 9–11.

9 Awake! Awake! put on strength, O arm of the LORD;
Awake! as in the ancient days, in the generation of old.
Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab,
And woundèd the dragon?

10 Art thou not it which hath dried the sea,
The waters of the great deep;
That hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?
11 Therefore the redeemed of the LORD shall return,
And come with singing unto Zion;
And everlasting joy shall be upon their head:
They shall obtain gladness and joy;
And sorrow and mourning shall flee away.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 9. עולמים-תַּנִּין-חֹלֵל Poel.—הָצַב Hiph.

Ver. 9. דורות עולמים depends on the כְּ before יְמֵי, and not, as HITZIG and HAHN suppose, on יְמֵי; for the expression יְמֵי דורות never occurs, and the absence of the preposition before דורות is according to common usage (comp. xlviii. 9, 14; xlvi. 5; xliv. 28, etc.). On the other hand the ימי קֶדֶם is a frequent expression (xxiii. 7; xxxvii. 26; Mich. vii. 20; Jer. xlvi. 26; Ps. xliv. 2; 2 Kings xix. 25; Lam. i. 7; ii. 17). The expression דורות עולמים does not occur again. The plural, עולמים, expressing the relative notion of an immeasurable duration of time past or to come (comp. lxiii. 11), belongs to the words that occur only in Part Second.

Ver. 10. הַשָּׂמָה, according to the Masoretic pointing with double-Pashta (comp. OLSH., § 41, k, 47, c. Anm.), should be read as Milel [accented on the penult.—TR.], consequently regarded as third pers. fem. perf. Then the expression must be taken in a relative sense (GESEN., § 100, Rem.). But this punctuation seems to me a needless refinement. For there is no grammatical or logical ground for departing from the simple and natural construction of the verse, according to which the word is a parallel participle to the foregoing הַמַּחֲרֶבֶת.

Ver. 11. The verse is repeated almost verbatim from xxxv. 10. The only difference is the small one of ישׂיגון נסו in our text instead of the ישׂיגו ונסו of xxxv. 10, which may be referred to an error of transcription. In xxxv. ver. 9 concludes with the words וְהָלְכוּ גְּאוּלִים. Our ver. 10 also concludes with גאולים. It is possible, indeed, that thus ending ver. 10, the Prophet was reminded of xxxv. 9, and that occasioned his repeating here the words that there follow, viz., xxxv. 10. But it is not correct, when HITZIG remarks, that ver. 11 does not suit the context because here those delivered from Egypt are meant. For the deliverance out of Egypt is only a type of that of final history.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Awake——flee away.—Vers. 9-11. In accordance with the almost dramatic arrangement that the Prophet observes, Zion now takes up the discourse. It is so bold as to return exhortation for exhortation. For if Israel was reminded in vers. 1-6 of what it needed to do for its salvation, it in turn summons the LORD to do His part now, i. e., in the time of the Servant of Jehovah, in the last time, as He did in the beginning time, in Egypt. There is in עוּרִי "awake" a slight intimation that the arm of the LORD has slept, i. e., that there has been a pause in the display of its power. How else could the destruction and desolation (ver. 3) of Zion, and its consequent second and greatest exile have come about? Thrice is the cry "awake" called out to the arm of the LORD, as to one lying in deepest slumber, and that can only be wakened by repeated calling. Comp. lii. 1; Jud. v. 12. Put on strength, equip one's self with strength, is a figure drawn from the arming of a warrior with pieces of armor. The naked arm is thought of as weaker, that covered with brazen bands as stronger, firmer, better able to resist (comp. lii. 1; Ps. xciii. 1). HITZIG cites HOMER, Il. 19, 36, δύσετο δ' ἀλκήν; DELITZSCH, Rev. xi. 17, λαμβάνειν δύναμιν. And now the LORD's former doings are, as it were, held up to Him as an example. Art thou not He that cut Rahab asunder, etc. Rahab, properly ferocia, then designation of a monstrum marinum, in which sense it corresponds to תַּנִּין, and thence, like the latter, which = "the crocodile," a symbolical name for Egypt (comp. on xxx. 7). On תַּנִּין comp. List and Ezek. xxix. 3; Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14.

In ver. 10, reference is further made to the drying up of the Red sea and the passage of the Israelites through it. Therefore here again we find the deliverance out of Egyptian bondage as a type of the last and final redemption. In ver. 11 (see Text. and Gram.) the Prophet, in entire agreement with the context, expresses the confidence that the arm of the Lord will, indeed, in the last time give proof again of its power displayed in ancient time, and that therefore the redeemed of the LORD shall return home to Zion with rejoicings and to everlasting joy.

3. JEHOVAH SPEAKS: HE REPLIES TO ISRAEL'S EXHORTATION WITH EXHORTATION, AND HOLDS UP TO HIS SERVANT THE ORIGIN, MEANS AND GOAL OF HIS LABOR.

CHAPTER LI. 12–16.

12 I, even I, am he that comforteth you:
Who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die?
And of the son of man which shall be [a]made as grass;
13 And forgettest the LORD thy Maker,
That hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth;
And hast feared continually every day
Because of the fury of the oppressor,
[b]As if he [1]were ready to destroy?
And where is the fury of the oppressor?
14 [c]The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed,
And [d]that he should not die in the pit,
Nor that his bread should fail.
15 [e]But I am the LORD thy God,
That [f]divided the sea, whose waves roared:
The LORD of hosts is his name.
16 And I have put my words in thy mouth,
And I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand,
[g]That I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth,
And say unto Zion, Thou art my people.

[1] Or, made himself ready.

[a] given. [b] As he took aim. [c] The one bowed down hastens.
[d] he will not die away to the pit, and will not want his bread. [e] And.
[f] [stilleth, LOWTH.—TR.] [g] To plant—to lay, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: ver. 14, צֹעֶה, comp. Jer. ii. 20; xlviii. 12; ver. 15 יהוה צ׳ שְׁמוֹ; the expression occurs in the same form in Jer. x. 16; xxxi. 35: xxxii. 18; xlvi. 18; xlviii. 15; l. 34; li. 19, 57. It seems original with Amos, where it appears now in a simpler form (v. 8; ix. 6), now in a more extended form (iv. 13; v. 27).

Ver. 12. In מִי־אַתְּ the מִי is self-evidently qualis. The expression also corresponds in sound to את־היא ver. 9. The Prophet uses freedom in respect to gender and number. After מנחמכם he puts the sing. מי־את, and after the feminine מי־את ותיראי the masculines ותשכח and ותפחד, according as the notion Zion or Israel is uppermost. The Vav consec. after מי־את expresses the effect, and hence is = ut; qualis eras, ut timeres. Thus מי־את by no means signifies "how little art thou?" (KNOBEL). For the same interrogative form may mean: "how great art thou?" comp. Judg. ix. 28. And any way מי may, regardless of size great or small, inquire for the occasioning quality generally. Comp. ver. 19 and מי־את Ruth iii. 16 with the same phrase, Ruth iii. 9; Isa. lvii. 4, 11.

Ver. 13. One may supply חִצָּיו "his arrows" after כּוֹנֵן (Ps. xi. 2; comp. Isa. vii. 13); still, without an expressed object, the word also means "to aim" (Ps. xxi. 13).

Ver. 14. מהר לחפתח is construed as e. g., מִהַרְתָּ לִמְצֹא Gen. xxvii. 20. צֹעֶה is "to bow" transitive and intransitive. Here it means the one bowed down by chains or the מַהְפֶּכֶת (Jer. xx. 2; xxix. 26; 2 Chron. xvi. 10). הפתח is a metonymy as in xiv. 17, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. I, even I——should fail.—Vers. 12–14. Jehovah enters here as the third and most exalted person of the dialogue. The "I, even I" corresponds to the "awake, awake" of ver. 9 and replies to it. It seems to me that "He that comforteth you" refers back to the double נִחַם "comforted" ver. 3. It is as if the LORD would say: Have ye not heard that I, I Jehovah am He that comforts Zion? Are ye not competently assured of this? Who art thou, now, that thou fearest a man that will die? (See Text. and Gram.). Man that dies, the son of man who is given away as grass, such is the enemy that Israel ought not to fear. There could be no mention of this fear, were it not that Israel forgot Jehovah, who, as Maker of His people (xliii. 1) stretcher forth of the heavens and founder of the earth (xl. 22; xlii. 5; xliv. 24; xlv. 12) surely offered a sufficient guaranty for trusting in Him. Forgetting Jehovah is really the cause both of fearing men (ver. 12) and of the continual trembling (ver. 13). The mention of one effect before and of the other after the cause, thus proceeding in the one case from effect to cause, and in the other from cause to effect, though not quite exact, is still a common way of speaking (comp. Amos v. 10–12; Jer. ii. 9 sq.; xlix. 19 sq.; 2 Sam. xii. 9). Evidently and hast trembled every day, etc., ver. 13, makes stronger the expression of ver. 12, both qualitatively and quantitatively. To understand by "the oppressor" the Babylonian oppressor (KNOBEL) is only possible to one that has no conception of the wide reach of the prophetic gaze. Though Babylon may be included, it cannot be all that is meant, for the Prophet sees together all that Israel feels as an oppressor until the end. Moreover the expression is founded on Deut. xxviii. 53, 55, 57, and is used by Isaiah here and xxix. 2, 7 in this sense, and besides only by Jer. xix. 9. כאשר = "according as," and thus expresses that the trembling is in proportion to the aiming of the oppressor.

"But where is the fury of the oppressor?" asks the LORD, anticipating, as it were, the future. The question intimates that a time will come when that fury shall suddenly vanish. With this wondrously quick disappearance of the oppressor connects the instant, and unhindered release of the captives. Prison scenes appear here before the Prophet's mind: he sees captives bent under the weight of chains, or, worse still, by racking instruments, who are now quickly let go, and thus escape a dreadful fate of slow dying to the pit (a pregnant construction) for want of necessary food.

2. But I am——My people.—Vers. 15, 16. I regard both these verses as the address of Jehovah to His Servant. Such an address is not out of place, but the contrary, if we were right in regarding the Servant of Jehovah as taking part in the dialogue and the vers. 1–8 as His words. ואנכי "and I" answers to the double אנכי ver. 12 as a similar beginning. The Servant of Jehovah has also great conflicts to endure. The world storms against Him like a raging sea (Ps. ii. 1; Isaiah lvii. 20). Hence Jehovah, to strengthen Him, calls Himself in relation to Him His God, that has power over the sea, to raise it up and, naturally, to quiet it again (xvii. 12, 13; xxiii. 11; l. 2; li. 10). Jehovah Sabaoth is this God called, as Lord of the heavenly hosts. Shall He that has dominion over the powers of heaven not have dominion also over the powers of the earth?

The expression רָגַע הַיָּם "to arouse the sea" occurs first Job xxvi. 12. Afterwards comes our text, and our text is literally reproduced by Jer. xxxi. 35. [The Author has an argument that follows here to prove that the language is original with Isaiah, and borrowed by Jeremiah. This is reproduced in brief in the Introduction, pp. 23, 24. The present amplification adds nothing to the clearness of it, and is omitted to save space. As an argument it is not forcible. His explanation is that Jeremiah uses the language in question to denote "a regularly recurring motion of the sea," and that the ebb and flow of the tide must be meant, because that is the only firmly established ordinance for the sea's motion that can be classified with the sun, moon and stars, and made a type of the stability of God's covenant with His people. But the context of Jer. xxxi. 35 does not require us to think that Jeremiah gives this application to the language. Moreover רָגַע in any of its accepted meanings is unsuitable to express such motion as the tide. Besides, to Hebrews, remote as they were from the ocean, the tide was an unfamiliar phenomenon, and thus does not appear in their literature. And it may be said that, in relation to our ver. 13 a. the notion of phenomenal stability is as much demanded for ver. 15 as in Jer. xxxi. 35.

The best treatment of the attempt to prove that our text is borrowed from Jeremiah, and therefore not genuine Isaianic, is to ignore it as frivolous. Still, perhaps, the scrutiny which the debate occasions may lead to a more exact understanding of the language in question. The LXX. render Job xxvi. 12, רָגַע הַיָּם, κατέπαυσε τὴν θάλασσαν. The Author's discussion of רָגַע under li. 4 shows how ambiguous the word is in itself, and that we must rely on our tact and the context to determine its meaning. The general scriptural appeal to the sea as proof of God's power, is to the evidence it gives of His controlling it. It is the sea that rages, He settles it and holds it in bounds. Comp. Job xxxviii. 8–11, and Christ stilling the tempest Mark iv. 35 sqq. It seems preferable therefore to accept LOWTH's rendering. "He who stilleth the sea, though the waves thereof roar," which also BARNES adopts. TR.]

The words ver. 16 can only be spoken to the Servant of God. "I have put My words in Thy mouth" designates both the task and the equipment the Servant of God receives. The words recall xlix. 2, where it is said: "And He hath made My mouth like a sharp sword." The Servant of God must proclaim the will of God. To be able to do this, He must be able to find the proper, powerful, incisive words (Heb. iv. 12). This comes about by God's word being put into His mouth. If the wrath of men that are enemies to the truth be thereby aroused, the LORD protects Him: "I have covered Thee in the shadow of My hand." The same is said xlix. 2, in almost the same words of the Servant of the LORD, viz., בְּצֵל יָדוֹ הֶחְבִּיאָנִי. By this means the Servant of God will be preserved and enabled to carry out His work. The aim of this work is that He may plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth. Who must this Servant of God be to whom is assigned such a task? What heaven shall He plant? what earth shall He found? Certainly not the old heaven and the old earth that have already been planted and founded, but which, too, are destined, according to ver. 6 "to vanish away like smoke, and wax old like a garment," in that assize that the Servant of God will hold. But the Servant of God will plant a new heaven and found a new earth (lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; Rev. xxi. 1). Concerning the way in which He has done this see under Doctrinal and Ethical, p. 559, § 6. But the new heaven and the new earth are also a dwelling for the people of God, the Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός, which of course has not proceeded merely from the Twelve Tribes. Nevertheless the historical Israel constitutes the frame into which the new humanity will be joined on as members. Hence, as is said lxvi. 22: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before Me,—so shall your seed and your name remain," so here the people that is to populate the new heaven and new earth is called Zion. Jerusalem, which is from above is the mother of us all, says Paul (Gal. iv. 26).

Those that do not recognize the Servant of God as the speaker in vers. 1–8, must, in order to get tolerable sense out of our passage, assume that Jehovah is the subject of "to plant," "to found" and "to say." Let this even be justified respecting "to plant" and "to found," yet it remains inexplicable how Jehovah should put His word in Zion's mouth, in order that He, Jehovah, may say: thou art My people.—Others, as Hitzig, take the three infinitives in a gerundive sense: in planting a heaven, and founding an earth, and saying to Zion, etc. Apart from the planting and founding of heaven and earth being made to mean only a new order of things on this earth, or even a new founding of Israel as a state, one can never prove that the Lord thereby put His word into the mouth of His Servant, and thereby protected Him, in that He renewed heaven and earth. For it is inconceivable that the Servant of the Lord will still stand in need of inspiration after heaven and earth are become new.—Less justifiable still, grammatically, is the exposition of Hahn, who would take לנטע וגו׳ simply as a paraphrase of the future: I will plant. He appeals to the usage that permits the use of הָיָה with following לְ and the infin. constr. to paraphrase the verb. fin. But there can be no mention of this here, not, indeed, because היה is wanting, which would make no difference, but because the subject is wanting. For according to Hahn לנטע וגו׳ should represent an independent sentence. But for that at least a subject were requisite. It must at least read אָנֹכִי לִנְטֹעַ. But as a subject is every way wanting, it follows, necessarily, that לנטע וגו׳ can only be construed as a dependent infinitive clause.

4. THE PROPHET SPEAKS. HE EXHORTS ISRAEL TO TAKE TO HEART THE COMFORT THAT JEHOVAH DISPENSES.

Chapter LI. 17–23.

17 Awake! Awake! stand up, O Jerusalem,
Which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury;
Thou hast drunken the [i]dregs of the cup of [h]trembling,
And [a]wrung them out.
18 There is none to guide her
Among all the sons whom she hath brought forth;
Neither is there any that taketh her by the hand
Of all the sons that she hath brought up.
19 These two things [1]are come unto thee;
Who shall be sorry for thee?
[b]Desolation, and [2]destruction, and the famine, and the sword:
[c]By whom shall I comfort thee?
20 Thy sons [d]have fainted.
They lie at the head of all the streets, as a [e]wild bull in a net:
[f]They are full of the fury of the Lord,
The rebuke of thy God.
21 Therefore hear now this, thou afflicted,
And drunken, but not with wine:
22 Thus saith thy Lord the Lord,
And thy God that [g]pleadeth the cause of his people,
Behold, I have taken out of thine hand the cup of [h]trembling,
Even the [i]dregs of the cup of my fury;
Thou shalt no more drink it again:
23 But I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee:
Which have said to thy soul, Bow down, that we may go over:
And thou hast laid thy body as the ground,
And [j]as the street, to them that went over.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 17. כָּצָה. Ver. 19. חרב–רעב–הַשֹּׁד וְהַשֶּׁבֶר. Ver. 20. מִכְמָר–עֻלָּף. Ver. 21. שְׁכֻרָה. Ver. 22. אֲדֹנִים. Ver. 23. מוֹגִים.

Ver. 18. Note the many liquidas, and the likeness in sound of the conclusion of both halves of the verse. Both impart to the words a character of tenderness, sadness.

Ver. 19. Here, too, both halves of the verse have a similar conclusion. For the two interjection-like parentheses מי ינוד לך and אנחמך, each beginning with מִי, are two rhymes in sentiment. The form of expression שתים הנה recalls Job xiii. 20; Prov. xxx. 7; comp. Jer. ii. 13; xv. 3. קֹרְאֹת (from קָרָא = קָרָה lx. 18), and also מי ינוד לך, שֹׁד and מי אנחמך are undeniable points of contact between our text and Nahum iii. 7. For our קֹרְאֹתַיִךְ answers to the רֹאַיִךְ there; our שֹׁד to שָׁדְּדָה there; our מי אנחמך to the מֵאַיִן אֲבַקֵּשׁ מְנַחֲמִים לָךְ there.——מִי in the concluding question מי אנחמך can only mean qualis. It is properly an abbreviation of מִי אָנֹכִי וַאֲנַחֲמֵךְ, answering to the מִי־אַתְּ וַתִּירְאִי, ver. 12.

Ver. 20. מִכְמָר means the same as מִכְמֶרֶת (xix. 8; Hab. i. 15, 16) and מִכְמֹר Ps. cxli. 10).——שְׁכֻרַת part. pass. only here, comp. xxix. 9; the st. constr. is explained by all that follows being conceived of as one notion, a very common construction in Isaiah: v. 11; viii. 6; ix. 2; xxviii. 9; xiv. 6, 19; lvi. 9, 10, etc.

Ver. 22. אֲדֹנַיִם of Jehovah only here.——רִיב with that for which God contends in the accusative as in i. 17; comp. on xlix. 25.

Ver. 23. מוֹגִים "tormentors," occurs only here in Isaiah, but occurs oftenest in Lamentations, where, however, it is used only of God who visits men with tribulation (Lam. i. 5, 12; iii. 32, 33). Only in Job xix. 2, is it used, as here, of men who torment the souls of their fellow-men. Perhaps the latter passage was in the mind of the Prophet. It favors this that he continues: "Which have said to thy soul."——Our text is the only one in all the Old Testament where the Kal. שָׁחָה occurs. With this exception the verb is only used in Hithp.——לַעֹבְרִים may depend on תָּשִׂימִי, but also on כַּחוּץ. The latter is more likely: first, because of the position; second, because just in the connection with חוץ there is a strengthening of the thought. For the earth is not chiefly destined to serve the use of the עֹבְרִים; but such is the special destination of a street.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The reverse side of the redemption of Israel is here presented, viz., the judgment on the enemies of the Theocracy (comp. xi. 14; xiv. 2; xxv. 10 sqq.; xxxiv. 1 sqq., etc.), as if to strengthen the effect of light by contrast with its corresponding shadow. But now it is the Prophet that speaks, as if he, too, on his part would induce Israel to take cheerful courage from God's word. Perhaps this section is meant to form a transition to chap. lii. For instance, in this li. 17–23 the population of Jerusalem is addressed, whereas chap. lii. speaks of the holy nation reunited to the holy places.

2. Awake——rebuke of thy God.—Vers. 17–20. The double התעוררי corresponds to the double עורי (ver. 9) and אנכי (ver. 12). In relation to עורי, the Hithp. involves the idea of self as an object, = "rouse thyself." Jerusalem must not persist in a state devoid of comfort and courage; it must wake itself up, cheer up, rouse itself (comp. lxiv. 6). It has received from the hand of its LORD the cup of His fury, which by its intoxicating contents, is also a cup of reeling, and has drunk it to the dregs, even sipped it empty. The figure of the cup of wrath is found also Ps. lxxv. 9; Jer. xxv. 15, 17, 28; xlix. 12; li. 7; Hab. ii. 16; Ezek. xxiii. 31 sqq.: Lam. iv. 21. The figure of drinking divine fury occurs already Job xxi. 20, and beside that Obad. 16; Jer. xlviii. 26. קֻבַּעַת (comp. כּוֹבַע, קוֹבַע "a helmet," κύβη, cupa, Passow, s. v.), the helm-like, rounded [convex] top of the cup, occurs only here and ver. 22. תַּרְעֵלָה (comp. רְעָלוֹת iii. 19) that denotes the effect of the drink, beside here and ver. 17, occurs only Ps. lx. 5. The intensifying of the figure by וּמָצִית occurs for substance Obad. 16, by the same word Ps. lxxv. 9 (8), and (which is probably an imitation of our text) Ezek. xxiii. 34. In ver. 18 the figure of the drunken woman is continued by saying, that none of the sons of Zion have been in condition to lead their drunken mother. What the Prophet means by this figure appears from ver. 20. What is said figuratively in vers. 17, 18, is said without figure in vers. 19, 20. Answering to the full cup, Jerusalem's misfortune is, ver. 19, represented as a double one, each half, of which is again divided into two parts, so that there results a sort of arithmetical progression. See Text. and Gram. Whether our text or the similar one in Nah. iii. 7 is the original, in my opinion, cannot be doubtful. Manifestly the passage in Isaiah is bolder, of more original construction, it even sounds harsh compared with the smooth form in which it appears in Nahum. The two interjectional clauses have disappeared. The bold, and difficult מי אנחמך is resolved into the sober: "whence shall I seek comforters for thee?" And it may be further remarked, that מִי appears to be referred to a human subject and not to the person of Jehovah. Thus it may be said, that the modern expositors, who following the LXX. and Vulg. take אנחמך without further ado for ינחמך (Boettcher, N. ex. krit. Æhrenlese, Nr. 765), or construe מִי as acc. instrument. (Hitzig.), have their predecessor already in Nahum. נוד is "commiserari, to compassionate, sympathize with," and occurs with following לְ, and נִחֵם also Job ii. 11; xlii. 11; comp. Jer. xv. 5; xvi. 5; xxii. 10; xlviii. 17.

Each of the two evils that come on Jerusalem is, according to the parenthesis, represented as a whole consisting of two parts. The first whole is called הַשֹּׁד וְהַשֶּׁבֶר "the blow and the downfall" [E. V., "desolation and destruction"]. The two words occur together as here lix. 7; lx. 18; Jer. xlviii. 3, which last text seems to lean on Isa. lx. 18, because in both שׁד ושׁבר is spoken of as something audible. While "the blow" and "the downfall" primarily concern the city as a complex of buildings, רָעָב and חרב "hunger and sword" relate to the persons. The conjunction of these words occurs in Isaiah only here. It occurs more frequently in Jer., and Ezek. (Jer. xiv. 15, 16; xxi. 7, etc.; Ezek. xiv. 21; vi. 11; xii. 16). Ver. 20 corresponds to ver. 18, explaining what has rendered the sons of Jerusalem incapable of helping their mother. They were themselves overtaken by the destroying woe. עֻלַּף, which occurs only in Pual and Hithp., means "to be enveloped, especially by a night of tribulation" (comp. Amos viii. 13). The Prophet graphically describes the scenes that took place in the city just taken. Thy sons are not small children as in Lam. ii. 11, 12; iv. 4, but children in general, and especially the sons that ought to be able to help their mother. At the corner of all the streets these unfortunate children lie. This expression, also, appears in Nah. iii. 10, as if borrowed from our passage (comp. Lam. ii. 19; iv. 1), and Nahum seems to have taken our passage in the sense of xiii. 16, in as much as he writes גַּם עֹלָלֶיהָ יְרֻטְּשׁוּ בְּרֹאשׁ כָּל־חוּצוֹת. The vigorous, and genuinely Isaianic expression כְּתוֹא מִכְמָר proves the originality of our passage. The children of Jerusalem are compared to an antelope entangled in a net, and making desperate, but vain efforts to free itself. תוא occurs again only Deut. xiv. 5, and is there pointed תְּאוֹ. It signifies a large kind of antelope, classified among the clean beasts, fit for food. Comp. BOCHART, HIEROZ. Tom. II. p. 367, ed. Lips., and especially the remarks of ROSENMUELLER, pp. 369, 281. המלאים is in apposition with בָּנַיִךְ. The words form, so to speak, the bridge between the figure of the cup of fury, ver. 17 and the literal description in ver. 20 a. so that ver. 20 a. is a description of the effect of the cup of fury.

3. Therefore hear——went over.—Vers. 21–23. Having, from ver. 17 on, described the effect of the cup of fury, the Prophet now gives his reason for calling to Jerusalem "rouse thyself." Jerusalem, that hitherto was wretched (x. 30; liv. 11), that was drunken but not with wine, but with misery, shall hear (xlvii. 8) that its Lord, Jehovah, its God, who represents His people in the judicial contest (רִיב see Text. and Gram.), takes the cup of fury out of their hand, and gives it into the hand of their enemies. The thought is the same as Obad. 16; Jer. xlix. 12; xlviii. 26. By the departure of the cup of fury from the hand of Jerusalem into the hand of its enemy is revealed the rule of the divine nemesis. The enemies had provoked this by the arrogance with which they had ill-treated and abused Jerusalem. The expression: which said to thy soul, bow down, beside being an echo of Job xix. 2. is a sort of metonymy. For what the humiliation feels is named as that which the outward act suffers. The figure indicates how wicked and excessive had been the ill usage inflicted on Israel (comp. x. 5 sqq.; Jer. li. 20 sqq). [See BARNES in loc., for rich illustration of the final clause from oriental usages.—TR.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On li. 1–3. Here one clearly recognises the evangelist of the Old Testament. Is it not as if we heard Paul, who wrote Rom. iv. 11 sqq.; Gal. iii. 6 sqq.? Abraham, says Isaiah, is not merely the rock from which ye are hewn, i. e. he is not merely your fleshly ancestor. Look also on his faith. Become also his spiritual children! "And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that what He had promised He was able to perform" (Rom. iv. 19–21). So ye should have a firm faith that God can make also the ruins of Zion into an Eden, and her waste places into a garden of God. And this hope we ought ever to have respecting the Church of the LORD. If it has even become a "solitarius Abraham et sicut desertum et ruina," still it may hope to become a paradise and garden of God. And just so may the individual "episcopus et pastor" cheer himself in such a way, "ut credat, ministeriam suum non esse inefficax, etiamsi in specie nullus fructus videatur sequi" (LUTHER).

2. On li. 4–6. The time when the gospel, the tidings of justification by faith, went forth into the world was at once a time of salvation and of judgment. For these tidings were despised by the Jews and received with joy by the Gentiles. Hence Jerusalem was destroyed. That was the beginning of the judgment of the world, which needed to happen to the house of God. Had Israel received the gospel, it would have disappeared among the Gentiles. We see this daily in the case of single Israelitish families that are converted to Christianity. They mix with the Gentiles and disappear in their preponderant numbers. Such would have been the case with all Israel had the nation en masse believed on Christ. Just by its unbelief it was preserved as a nation. At last, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have entered in, all Israel, too, will become believing. That is, the ἐκλογή, the remnant, will become so. All the rest of Israel, all the Ἰσραὴλ σαρκικός, will be overtaken by the judgment, and, with the earthly heaven and the earthly earth and all earthly minded men on it, they shall pass away like smoke in the wind, or like a garment consumed by fire. But everything that will have laid hold on the salvation of the Servant of God and His righteousness shall be called Zion, and will belong to the Bride of the LORD, whose wedding-day will then have come. The people of Israel will, indeed, even then retain their individuality, as generally every creature that becomes new in the kingdom of God will retain its specific peculiarity. Indeed, Israel will ever remain what it was: the son of the house, the first-born. But then it will assume this position without prejudice or disregard of the Gentile world, and without danger for itself. For no one will then any more be able to make of any avail personal reputation or personal merit, but all will recognize that they are what they are by God's grace.

3. On li. 7, 8. JEROME says of the רֹדְפֵי צֶדֶק and the עַם תּוֹרָתִי בְלִבָּם, that they are those "qui habeant legem, quam per Jeremiam Dominus pollicitur, dicens, 'statuam testamentum novum, non juxta testamentum, quod deposui patribus eorum; sed statuam testamentum, dans leges meas in mentibus eorum (Jer. xxxi. 31 sqq.),' ut nequaquam vivant juxta literam, sed juxta spiritum instaurantes naturalem legem in cordibus suis (Rom. ii. 14; Ps. xxxvii. 30, 31)." But those who have the law of the Servant of God in their hearts, stand in the directest opposition to the world, and have only to expect the hatred of the world in the highest degree; yet even alone they are strong against the world, and need not fear its rage (Matth. v. 11, 12; x. 23).

4. On li. 9-11. "Dicit 'consurge,' perinde atque si Deus altum somnum dormiat." LUTHER. Comp. the sleeping of Jesus in the boat (Matth. viii. 24 sqq.—"Arise! So the pious pray, not because they believe God is lying idle in heaven, but because they confess their slothfulness and their ignorance, inasmuch as they are unable to think of God as long as they do not feel His help. But although the flesh supposes He sleeps, and that He does not concern Himself about our suffering, yet faith raises itself higher up and lays hold on God's everlasting power." HEIM u. HOFFMANN.—"Sentit ecclesia suam Aegyptum et premitur variis tentationibus mundi, Satanae et conscientiae. Christus tamen promittit: tristitia vestra vertetur in gaudiam. . . . Sed hoc molestum est, quod Christus et Petrus dicunt, modicum expectandum esse. Videtur enim hoc modicum tum, cum in tentatione sumus, aeternitas quaedam esse, quare opus habemus his consolationibus verbi." LUTHER.—"As the Prophets appeal to previous examples, and, as has happened a little before, the Prophet Isaiah quotes Abraham's history, and here recalls that of Pharaoh, thus the ancient books of Moses are canonized and confirmed, so that one may not doubt their certainty." CRAMER.—"As the people of Israel in the Babylonian captivity sighed for deliverance and said: If the LORD will redeem the captives of Zion, then we will be like those that dream; then our mouth shall be full of laughter, and our tongue full of singing (Ps. cxxvi. 1, 2); and as the most ardent longings of the believers in the ancient world were for the coming of Christ in the flesh, as old Jacob says: 'I have waited for thy salvation, O LORD' (Gen. xlix. 18), so we are to long for nothing more than for the coming of Christ to judgment, in which also John precedes us with the words: 'Even so come, Lord Jesus!' after it was said: 'I come quickly. Amen' (Rev. xxii. 20). When, therefore, we hear of the signs of the coming of Christ, we should raise up our heads because our salvation draws near (Luke xxi. 18). There will be no more suffering, cry, pain (Rev. xxi. 4), but fulness of joy and lovely existence at the right hand of God forevermore (Ps. xvi. 11)." RENNER.

5. On li. 12-14. "I, I comfort thee. Not gold, not silver, not honor, not the world, but my word, my Spirit, shall keep and protect thee. Thou fearest men that terrify thee. Why then dost thou not let thyself be raised up when I comfort? For I am God that fill heaven and earth. They are water-bubbles, moths, stalks of straw, drops in the bucket, dust in the balance, burning thorns. I am a comforter, not alarmer, although the flesh in time of tribulation so judges. I am thy Creator, not thine executioner or tormentor, and my power is so great that I have spread out the heavens and founded the earth. Hence thou hast no cause to fear that I have not strength enough to redeem thee." HEIM and HOFFMANN.—"God often withdraws from us consolationes rerum, so that the consolatio verbi may have room and operation with us." FOERSTER.—"What is man? What is he good for? What can he profit, or what harm can he do (Ecclus. xviii. 7; Ps. lvi. 12; cxviii. 6)? And if God be for us, who can be against us (Rom. viii. 31)? As is to be seen in the examples of Pharaoh, Sennacherib and countless others." CRAMER.

6. On li. 15, 16. In the second Psalm it is said: "Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth . . . cast away their cords from us." And in Ps. xvi.: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar," etc. The LORD who has power over the sea, and over those powers that rage like the sea, protects His servant against this raging. The Servant of the LORD does not speak of himself, but what He speaks He speaks as the Father has said to Him (Jno. xii. 49, 50). And even if what He has spoken and done according to the Father's will bring Him on the cross, still this bitter day of death is followed by a glorious day of resurrection. And this day of the resurrection is a second creative day. It is the beginning cf a new and better world. The glorified life, which in Christ entered into this world out of the cavern of the grave, was not confined to His person. Rather it has penetrated from Him forth, by word and sacrament, to all men. As through the first Adam death seized also the creation, so through the second Adam the glorified life communicates itself to the whole creation. Not only a new humanity will be formed from Him, but a new heaven and a new earth. Thus it can be said of the Servant of God, that He plants the heaven and lays the foundation of the earth.

7. On li. 15, 16. "Comfort for the sacred office of the ministry. 1) On account of the founder, who is God Himself. As the great lords, when they issue commands, use their titles in advance, and subscribe themselves by their lands and peoples, so God does also, who is the LORD of hosts. He is strong and reputable enough. 2) This founder and beginner Himself makes those in the gospel ministry capable persons to discharge the office of the Spirit. For our ability is of God (2

Cor. iii. 5). 3) The word that they preach is not their own, but God's word, which He Himself puts into their mouths (Matth. x. 20). 4) God takes the preachers under His guidance, protection and shelter, and covers them under the shadow of His hand, hides them secretly with Himself against every man's arrogance (Ps. xxxi. 21). 5) Their office is dear and precious before God, because through them not only are the foundations of the earth laid, but also heaven is set with glorious plants of honor that shall grow and bloom in all eternity to the glory of God."—Cramer.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On li. 4–6. Missionary Sermon. The Lord says: "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Matth. xxiv. 14. According to this, there is a close connection between missions and the judgment of the world. The former belongs to the preliminary conditions of the latter. The judgment of the world does not come before missions have accomplished their task, and at the same time missions offer to men what they must have in order to be able to stand in judgment. If now, beside this, all believing souls long for the second coming of the Lord, because only by that will our redemption be accomplished (Luke xxi. 18), and the first three petitions of the Lord's Prayer be heard, so, from the view-point of Christianity, the wish is justified, that missions may soon accomplish their work, that the day of the Lord may soon come. In this lies a motive to be, not neglectful, but diligent and zealous in missionary labor. Thus we may discourse in this wise on the connection between the last judgment and missions, and show: 1) how the coming of the judgment depends on missions accomplishing their task (vers. 4, 5, the law of the Lord and His righteousness are here; the isles wait. Let us bring to them the former; the sooner they come to all nations, the sooner will the Lord come also, and with Him our redemption). 2) How standing in judgment depends on the acceptance of what missions offer (ver. 6, he that has the righteousness of Christ will not despond; he that has it not, will perish).

2. On li. 7, 8. Consolation in time of persecution. Why the children of God need not fear the hostility of the world. 1) Because they are strong (the law of God is in their hearts, they have the righteousness that avails with God; God Himself lives in them with His Spirit and His strength; their cause is God's cause, therefore the power of God is on their side). 2) Because the world is weak (its power is only apparent; the world is inwardly hollow, untrue, therefore forsaken of God, and judged, and this condition of being judged must in a short time become manifest).

3. On li. 9–11. These words, too, can be applied to address consolation to the Church. The appeal is to the facts by which the Lord even in ancient time proved His saving power, especially by redeeming the people of Israel out of Egyptian bondage, and by leading them through the Red Sea. God is still the same that He was then. His arm is still just as strong. Therefore He can do again what He did then. Hence the children of God, to-day also, have nothing to fear from the fury of the dragon, from the deep waters through which they must pass. They shall arrive prosperously at their goal, and everlasting joy shall be their portion (lxvi. 14; Jno. xvi. 22).

4. On li. 12–14. Warning against the fear of man. 1) It is a sin. For it is to forget what God has already done for us, and what He promises. 2) It is folly; for men are powerless and perishing.

5. On li. 15, 16. Even though the world tosses and rages ever so much, still let us hold fast to Jesus Christ the Son of God; for in Him we find 1) the divine truth, 2) the most powerful protection, 3) participation in divine glory (the new heaven and new earth).

6. On li. 17–23. A call to the Church militant. Two things are certainly in prospect for it: 1) That here on earth, for its trial and purification, it must empty the cup of wrath; 2) That, after it has drunk, the cup of wrath shall be put into the hands of its enemies that they may be judged, while it is saved.

IV.—THE FOURTH DISCOURSE.

The Restoration of the City Jerusalem.

Chapter LII.

This chapter closely connects with li. We see this even outwardly by "Awake, Awake," ver. 1, which plainly refers back to the same words, li. 9. The vers. li. 17–23 we have already recognized as a transition to chap. lii. from the fact that in them the discourse of Jehovah exchanges with that of the Prophet, and that Jerusalem is addressed. But by Jerusalem, then, we must understand the population of Jerusalem, whereas chap. lii. deals entirely with the city as such, i. e., with the holy places (עִיר הַקֹּדֶשׁ). At the same time in chap. lii. the Prophet alone speaks, or at least only as the publisher of the words of Jehovah. The chapter divides into two parts. In the first (vers. 1–6) the Prophet shows why the city of the sanctuary must be restored. The name, i. e., the honor of Jehovah demands it. In the second part (vers. 7–12) the holy place looks forward immediately to the entrance of its holy inhabitants, who come, under Jehovah's guidance, from the unholy land. We observe the accomplishment of the restoration.

1. THE NAME OF JEHOVAH DEMANDS THE RESTORATION OF JERUSALEM.

Chapter LII. 1–6.

1 Awake! awake! put on thy strength, O Zion;
Put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city:
For henceforth there shall no more come into thee
The uncircumcised and the unclean.
2 Shake thyself from the dust;
Arise, [a]and sit down, O Jerusalem:
Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck,
O captive daughter of Zion.
3 For thus saith the Lord,
Ye have [b]sold yourselves for nought;
And ye shall be redeemed without money.
4 For thus saith the Lord God [Jehovah],
My people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn there;
And the Assyrian oppressed them without cause.
5 Now therefore, what have I here, saith the Lord,
[c]That my people is taken away for nought?
[d]They that rule over them make them to howl, saith the Lord;
And my name continually [e]every day is blasphemed.
6 Therefore my people shall know my name:
Therefore they shall know in that day that I am he that doth speak:
[f]Behold it is I.

[a] dwell as Jerusalem. [b] been sold for. [c] for.
[d] Their rulers howl. [e] all day. [f] Here am I.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: ver. 2, נָעַר—פָּתַח Hithp.—שְׁבִיָּה, of like meaning with שְׁבִיָּה, שְׁבִי, שְׁבוּת, שְׁבִית; vers. 3, 5, חִנָּם.

Ver. 2. שְׁבִי cannot be construed with קוּמִי, so as to read: "sit upright" (Gesen.). For the Prophet certainly does not mean that Jerusalem shall sit up; it must stand up, i. e., raise itself up wholly. Nor can שבי (with Koppe, Hitzig), be rendered "captive people;" for then there must be שְׁבִיָּה between קומי and יְרוּשָׁלַיִם. Rather שבי is imperative from יָשַׁב.—From this it appears that I do not take ירושלים in ver. 2, a, as subject, but as in apposition with the subject. The subject is שביה בת ציון. One might also regard ירושלים as the object of שבי. But it seems to me better to suit the context and also Isaiah's style of thought generally, to take Jerusalem as meaning the unity of city and inhabitants. Then, too, it results that the clause התפתחו מוסרי צוארך is to be construed as a parenthesis, and that K'ri is the correct, original reading.

Ver. 5. מְנֹאָץ is part. Hithpoel or Hithpoal, with assimilated ת.

Ver. 6. In the second clause לָכֵן is repeated (comp. the repetition of כְּעַל lix. 18) but not יֵדַע, which must be supplied.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The first two verses contain the theme. In ver. 1 the holy city is summoned to awake to consciousness of new strength and new glory, for from henceforth it will be preserved from all desecration. In ver. 2 the captive people of Jerusalem is summoned to shake itself from the dust of the captivity, to cast away the chains and now again to dwell as Jerusalem. On the promise follows an historical proof (vers. 3, 4). Jerusalem is like a worthless possession, given away to the enemy without gain or compensation; so it shall without gain for the enemy be redeemed (ver. 3). For what gain had the Lord when His people languished in Egyptian bondage, and when Assyria oppressed it (ver. 4)? And now, too, i. e., after the deportation of the nation by the Babylonians, the Lord has in Jerusalem nothing but an empty place. The people are dragged away into exile; its oppressors howl in cruelty and haughtiness, while the name of the Lord is continually blasphemed as that of a powerless, conquered God (ver. 5). But as it is impossible for the name of the Lord to remain covered with this infamy, the Lord will again reveal His name to His people. They shall at the right time know who is their God, and what it means when He says: "here am I" (ver. 6).

2. Awake——daughter of Zion.—Vers. 1,

2. This address to Zion begins with the same words that li. 9 begin the address to the arm of Jehovah. It is like an echo which that call has found in the heart of Jehovah. It seems to me incorrect to take עֹז (with DATHE, GESEN., HITZIG, etc.), in the sense of ornament, splendor, according to Ps. xcvi. 6; cxxxii. 8. Why should Jerusalem become merely glorious again? Why not strong and glorious, after having been weak and covered with infamy? The figurative expression בגדי תפארת occurs only here (comp. lxi. 10). That by Zion is to be understood the city, as also HITZIG, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH have recognized, appears plainly from עִיר הקדשׁ. This expression (comp. on xlviii. 2) intimates wherein the strength and glory of Jerusalem consists. As the earthly dwelling-place of Jehovah, Jerusalem stands high in power and honor above all other dwelling-places of men on earth. But hitherto the holy city was only too often exposed to desecration by the uncircumcised and the unclean (the heathen) coming into the city, not with the intent of paying humble homage, but with a hostile intent. As often as this happened, it was a proof that Jerusalem had so far lost its "strength" as not to be able to protect its תפארת, "magnificence." In the future that shall not happen again. The strength of Jerusalem shall ever be so great that it will be able to preserve its "magnificence". The words כי לא יוסיף עוד are repeated, Nah. ii. 1, in which verse the initial words of both clauses are taken from our text and ver. 7 (comp. on li. 19, 20). Into Jerusalem, now clothed with new power and honor, the banished people shall enter again. They had languished in slavery. They had lain in the dust (xlvii. 1). Jerusalem must rise up from the dust (xxxiii. 9. 15), shaking it off, and stand up, and dwell again as Jerusalem (see Text. and Gram.). Neither the city without people, nor the people without city is the true Jerusalem. The chief thing is that Jerusalem will cease to be a desert, and become inhabited again by its people as it ought to be.

3. For thus saith——it is I.—Vers. 3-6. The foregoing promise of a restored Jerusalem is now accounted for by explaining that the honor of Jehovah Himself demanded the restoration. For, says the LORD, ye were sold for nothing. חנם here can only mean that in surrendering the holy people, the holy land, and the holy city, the LORD received no corresponding indemnification. [Comp. Ps. xliv. 12.] For there was given to Him no other holy people, land, or city for them. Therefore He had, as it were, in respect to earthly possession, got only injury, yea, as ver. 5 even says, mockery and scorn to boot (comp. xlviii. 9 sqq.). That cannot go on so. The infamy, that has in this way come on the name of the LORD, must be washed out by His making those nations, (who might mock after the fashion intimated Num. iv. 15 sq.; Deut. ix. 28; Ezek. xx. 14), feel His power in such a way as simply to compel them to surrender the people of Israel. This is the meaning of and ye shall be redeemed without money. Vers. 4, 5 give the historical proof that Israel was sold for nothing. The first time was in Egypt, while Israel dwelt there as a stranger. The Prophet merely intimates this. Regarding the Egyptian bondage one sees this from the fact that he designates the entire Egyptian episode by the words ירד עמי לגור שם. By לגור שם (according to Gen. xii. 10, where it is said of Abraham) he seems to allude merely to the original object of the going down to Egypt. But we see from עַמִּי that he means all that Israel experienced in Egypt. For those that went down were as yet no nation. But it was just the nation that must suffer all that, on account of which their stay in Egypt is called the first example of being sold. Also the expression and the Assyrian oppressed them is merely an intimation. Every sort of injury that Assyria did both to the kingdom of Israel, and to the kingdom of Judah is included in it. What did the LORD get by that first Egyptian exile? Nothing, but that, for the time being, the already chosen and consecrated land stood empty. The plan of the LORD to provide for Himself a place of revelation and worship, which He had already begun to realize through Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, suffered by that a postponement of several hundred years. Assyria, too, ill-treated Israel בְּאֶפֶס, i. e., "for nothing" (אֶפֶס "defectus, not being," comp. on xli. 29, with the בְּ pretii only here, yet comp. Job vii. 6). For what equivalent in goods of like sort was given to the LORD in place of what He lost by Assyria? Third, the LORD looks on the condition He sees created by the Babylonian Exile. מה־לי־פה, in my opinion, can be referred neither to heaven (HITZIG), nor to the lands of the Babylonian exile (ROSENMUELLER, STIER, EWALD, UMBREIT, DELITZSCH and, in another sense, KNOBEL). Was then Jehovah transported to Babylon along with the people? The context every way demands that we refer פה to Jerusalem. For 1) the holy city (עיר הקדשׁ ver. 1), is the fundamental thought of the chapter. It treats of the reinhabiting of it, as its standing empty was opposed to Jehovah's interests. To this standing empty there is plain enough allusion in "My people went down into Egypt" ver. 4; less plainly in "the Assyrian oppressed them." But Assyria had only wished to empty the holy city, and only partly emptied the holy land. 2) It is quite plain that in for my people is taken away the LORD has before His eyes the desolation of the holy land and city. If the people are taken away, then the land and city are empty. In that case what does the LORD find there? Shall the beasts and the land do Him honor? Is it not His will to reveal Himself to men, and to be known and honored by them? No; more extendedly than He does in regard to Egypt and Assyria, the LORD shows that Babylon has emptied His land and city חִנָּם, i. e., without a corresponding equivalent of like sort. And, indeed, they do this with wicked haughtiness. They are rough, savage drivers, that with wild howls use their power over Israel. With most commentators, I refer those that rule over them to the Chaldeans (xiv. 5; xlix. 7). The Israelitish princes would hardly be called משׁלים, seeing they had nothing more to command.

They were at most שָׂרִים. The meaning "singers" is not adequately supported by Num. xxi. 27, and moreover does not suit the context. הֵילִיל, rendered by the LXX. sometimes ἀλαλάζειν, sometimes ὀλολύζειν, occurs only thirty times in the Old Testament (nine of these in Isaiah see List), and means chiefly the howl of woe. But I can't see why it may not signify other sorts of howling, as howl of rage, howl of vengeance, howl of victory, just as well as our German heulen and the Latin ululare, with which, moreover, it is radically related. It is certainly no flattering expression. The overweening conquerors, that do not spare the people, spare their God as little. They praise their idols as being more powerful (x. 10 sq.). Hence the LORD must complain that His name is blasphemed the whole day (comp. li. 13; xxviii. 24; lxii. 6; lxv. 2, 5).

The conclusion is drawn in ver. 6: because Jerusalem's desolation is of no profit to the LORD, but rather an injury to His honor, the LORD will reveal His name, i. e., His being (xxx. 27). Israel shall know what his name is, i. e., what it means, or what sort of a name it is. Whether one think of אל or אלהים or יהוה, in each of these names, and still more in all together, there lies the meaning of the absolute, eternal, powerful being. In that day points to the time in which the LORD has concluded the restoration of Jerusalem. When this time is fulfilled, one will appear and say: here am I. Then Israel shall know that this is its God, Jehovah. For He will speak His here am I so powerfully, so precluding all opposition, that all will recognize the LORD and Master of the world. Thus the Prophet has proved that the restoration of Jerusalem must necessarily follow.

2. THE RESTORATION ACCOMPLISHED.

CHAPTER LII. 7-12.

7 How beautiful upon the mountains
Are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace;
That bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation;
That saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!
8 [a]Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice;
With the voice together shall they sing:
[b]For they shall see eye to eye,
When the LORD shall bring again Zion.
9 Break forth into joy, sing together,
Ye waste places of Jerusalem:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
He hath redeemed Jerusalem.
10 The LORD hath made bare his holy arm
In the eyes of all the nations;
And all the ends of the earth
Shall see the salvation of our God.
11 Depart ye! Depart ye! go ye out from thence,
Touch no unclean thing;
Go ye out of the midst of her;
[c]Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the LORD.
12 For ye shall not go out with haste,
Nor go by flight:
For the LORD will go before you;
And the God of Israel will [1]be your rereward.

[1] Heb. gather you up.

[a] Hark, thy watchmen! They raise the voice! Together they rejoice.
[b] For eye in eye they see, as Jehovah returns to Zion.
[c] Cleanse yourselves.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: ver. 7, נָאָה.—בְּשֵׂר particip.; ver. 11, בָּרַר, imper. Niph.; ver. 12, מְנוּסָה.

Ver. 7, נָאוּת is Pilel from נָאָה, for according to the law underlying the formation of these verbs, נָאָה stands for נָאוֹ, and נָאוָה for נָאֲוֵו; [see GREEN § 174, 1]

Ver. 11. הִבָּרוּ is imper. Niph. from ברר.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In an exalted poetic personification the Prophet describes the actual accomplishment of the restoration of Jerusalem. He sees Jerusalem in ruins and uninhabited, yet the ruins are watched by spirit-spies that wait for the resurrection of the city. And look! A messenger comes with the glad news: Jehovah is King (ver. 7). And then the spies rejoicing see eye in eye the LORD returning to Zion (ver. 8). Then the ruins of Jerusalem are summoned to rejoice that the LORD has redeemed His people and His city (ver. 9), and has shown the strength of His arm and His salvation to all nations (ver. 10). Now also there issues at length to the people of Jerusalem the summons to return home from the lands of exile. But, since Jerusalem is now cleansed and sanctified anew, they must touch nothing unclean, and must be cleansed themselves and bear the vessels of Jehovah (ver. 11). For this cleansing they will have time. For they will not go out in haste as in the flight from Egypt, since Jehovah Himself will both lead their expedition and protect their rear against attack (ver. 12). It is seen that here, too, the Prophet distinguishes between the city and the inhabitants, and sees in the reunion of both the salvation of the future.

2. How beautiful——of our God.—Vers. 7–10. The words: "upon the mountains . . . publisheth peace" occur again Nah. ii. 1 (i. 15), where also, in the second half of the verse, are found the words "for—shall no more pass through thee," which are a modification of the language of lii. 1. If we were correct in pronouncing the passage li. 19 to be the original in comparison with Nah. iii. 7, it follows that there is a like relationship in the present instance. But apart from that, Nahum in the present instance appears as a dilution of our text. How flat is his הִנֵּה instead of the very poetical מַה־נָּאווּ! LOWTH remarks that, "the imitation does not equal the beauty of the original." And does not this הנה have the appearance of an attempt to avoid the difficulty of the proper signification of מה־נאוו? Moreover לא יוסיף לעבר is manifestly a smoother mode of expression, more accordant with common usage, than the harsher and less frequent לֹא יוֹסִיף יָבֹא (lii. 1). And it may be further noted, that עָבַר, which Nahum uses for בּא, occurs shortly before in Isaiah (li. 23), so that Nah. ii. 1 b (i. 15 b) appears to be combined from the elements of Isa. li. 23 and lii. 1.

How beautiful (lovely) are the feet. The expression refers neither to the sound nor to the sight of the feet ("that bound like gazelles over the mountains" DELITZSCH); but is a poetical metonymy. The feet stand for what they do. The feet walk, come. The coming, the advent of the messenger of good tidings is lovely (so LOWTH). The coming over the mountains is also poetic embellishment (comp. on xiii. 4). It is not probable that מְבַשֵּׂר is to be taken collectively. Why not use the plural directly? And why suppose a plurality of messengers? It would be neither more poetical, nor historically more likely. The contents of the glad tidings is presented in a sacred triad. One might say that "peace" is most general (comp. ix. 5, 6 and the greeting שָׁלוֹם לָכֶם), "good" refers more to corporeal goods (comp. 1 Kings x. 7; Job xxii. 18; Ps. civ. 28), salvation more to spiritual salvation (σωτηρία, hence the name of the Redeemer 'Ιησοῦς). But all are comprehended in the words thy God reigneth. The antithesis to this is the dominion of the world-power. "The kingdom of God" denotes the sole dominion of Jehovah on earth, that implies the discontinuance of the dominion of all that is world-power. The return from the Exile represents only the feeble beginning of the restoration of God's reign. When John the Baptist and Jesus Himself proclaimed that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matth. iii. 2; iv. 17), the latter was about to lay the immediate foundation of it. But the whole period of the Church is as a pause, during which, along with many outward retrogressions, there is only a quiet, inward extension and deepening, and a weak, partial outward progress (comp. Rom. x. 15 [where Paul quotes our Text. TR.]). The completion will only take place when the Lord will come again visibly to realize His inward and outward sole-dominion on earth (Rev. xii. 10; xix. 6). All these periods of time are comprehended in the gaze of the Prophet.

The cry of the messenger of good news comes from without. It is heard in Jerusalem by the צֹפִים ["watchers"]. As Jerusalem still lies waste, these must be invisible, spirit-watchers, as it were the genii of the place. I do not comprehend how any one can think that the prophets are meant here. Were there then prophets in Jerusalem while it lay waste? And yet the message came to Jerusalem and not to the exiles. [The Author's own conception must be regarded as inferior to any other that has been entertained. It is objectionable even as introducing heathenish imagery which is wholly foreign to Bible poetry. If these watchers are "genii of the locality as it were," then, as in effect is said below, the messenger of good news is a similar genius? But the persons of the scene are all personifications, and Jerusalem itself is treated dramatically. It is represented as looking for the good things to come. Watchers are on the look-out, and the expected messenger appears. The language paints the emotions of such a crisis. The Jerusalem of this picture is not a solitude, as the Author says, but is expressly peopled. It is Jerusalem ideally conceived to suit the spiritual realities of this prophecy. To identify the messengers or watchers as prophets or the like is "an unnecessary restriction and objectionable, as it mars the unity and beauty of the scene presented, which is simply that of a messenger of good news drawing near to a walled town, whose watchmen take up and repeat his tidings to the people within" (J. A. ALEX.).—TR.] קול צפיך is an exclamation as xiii. 4; xl. 3, 6; lxvi. 6. Like a joyful echo the rejoicing of the spies* responds to the shout of the messenger. But they rejoice not merely at the message, but more that they may behold the instant fulfilment of it. For "eye in eye" (עַיִן בְּעַיִן Num. xiv. 14) they see Jehovah's return to Jerusalem. That שׁוּב may not be translated here "to lead back" [Eng. V. "bring again"] appears from the fact that the bringing back of the people is not yet spoken of, but only the return of Jehovah to Jerusalem, which He had forsaken as a desolate and desecrated place (comp. מַה־לִּי פֹה ver. 5). The spies see the Lord take possession again of the place of His sanctuary. No man sees that. As the מְבַשֵּׂר and the צֹפִים are spirits, therefore, that return is one invisible to human eyes, but quite within the cognizance of the eyes of spirits (hence עַיִן בְּעַיִן). It is accomplished in transcendent, spirit-corporeal reality. The desolate ruins of Jerusalem, however, are summoned to burst forth into joy because Jehovah has compassionated His people (li. 3), has redeemed Jerusalem. The Prophet sees in that transcendental occupation of Jerusalem the guaranty and principle of the redemption. The perfects נחם and גאל are perfecta prophetica. And parallel with these perfects stands also חָשַׂף ver. 10. For by the redemption of Jerusalem the spiritual eye sees unveiled also to the nations what hitherto was manifest only to the former. The Lord hath made bare His holy arm means, that that redemption shall be made manifest to the nations as Jehovah's act. I do not think, therefore, that the expression here is to be compared to that baring of the arm that the warrior does in order to fight with more freedom. But the sense is as in liii. 1; Exod. viii. 15 (19); Luke xi. 20. Jehovah reveals Himself to the nations as the originator of the events by which the redemption of Israel is accomplished, that all the ends of the earth (xlv. 22) may see with eyes the salvation that the Lord has prepared for His people.

3. Depart ye——your rereward.—Vers. 11, 12. Now that the Lord has again seized possession of His anciently chosen holy place, the people of Israel also is summoned to return thither from the lands of exile. They must get away (סוּרוּ comp. xxx. 11; Lam. iv. 15) and go out. But as they are to come to "the holy city," into which nothing unholy must come (comp. ver. 1), they must not make themselves unclean by contact with what is unclean. Yea, as the holy vessels, (which the Prophet implies have been taken away as spoil,) are to be brought back along with them (comp. Ezr. i. 7 sqq.), they must undergo the legal requirements of purification. The Prophet has certainly in mind here the Levites and the purification prescribed for them (Num. viii. 6 sqq.) since, during the journey through the desert, the service of bearing devolved especially on them (Num. iv. 47, comp. ver. 24 sqq., ver. 49). Our passage recalls xxxv. 8, where the way on which the redeemed return is called a holy way, that nothing unclean shall go on. Abundance of time and opportunity will be given to prepare for the holy expedition by suitable purification. For this departure shall differ from the departure out of Egypt in not being in haste and like a flight. The latter was like a flight, because those long detained by Pharaoh were obliged to avail themselves of the moment he was willing to let them go. For he might suddenly change his mind, even though at that time men were urging their departure (Exod. xii. 33, 39). But from the second exile Israel should go forth as lord and conqueror (comp. xlvi. 1, 2; xlvii. 1 sqq.). חִפָּזוֹן "haste," which Isaiah uses nowhere else, is manifestly an allusion to Exod. xii. 11, where it is said of eating the Passover: "and ye shall eat it בְּחִפָּזוֹן," and Deut. xvi. 3, where in reference to the unleavened bread it is said: "for in haste (בחפזון) thou camest forth from the land of Egypt." As חפזון only occurs in our text and the two passages in Deut., so, too, מְנוּסָה occurs again only Lev. xxvi. 36, where of wicked and exiled Israel it is said, that, in the land of its enemies, it shall become cowardly and inclined to groundless מְנֻסַת־חֶרֶב. Thus in the choice of the word מנוסה, there appears to be an allusion intended. Israel went out from Egypt also under the protection and guidance of its God. But it was in haste and as if fleeing. If then it is promised here that the departure from Babylon (the suffix מִתּוֹכָהּ refers to Babylon) shall not be so, and that because the Lord will go before the expedition and close it up (מְאַסֵּף agmen claudens, alluding to Josh. vi. 9, 13; Num. x. 25), we must suppose that the Prophet implies an activity of God in guiding and protecting in reference to their enemies, such as is described in the passages cited above: xlvi. 1, 2; xlvii. 1 sqq.; comp. xlv. 1, 2; xlviii. 14, 20.

[*The Author uses the word Späher. Its common meaning is "spies" or "scouts." It is therefore so rendered in the text, and also because he interprets the scene as a solitude, and the צֹפִים as look-outs watching for the resurrection of the city (see ab. p. 565). They are therefore no watchmen in any ordinary sense; not even guardian genii. but only "as it were" ghostly videttes. One must wonder why the service would require many, i. e., enough to get up a scene of popular rejoicing such as the passage depicts. The entire conception is so extraordinary that the temptation has been strong to translate Späher "watchers," and thus gloss over what seems to be the Author's peculiar idea. He amplifies it below.—Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lii. 1–6. "This comforting assurance applies especially also to the spiritual Zion, the Church of Christ. It should ever arouse itself to be courageous and joyous in the midst of outward distress and weakness. The true Church is the holy city of God in which are found nothing but righteous and holy ones, gloriously adorned with the robe of Christ's righteousness and with garments of salvation (lxi. 10), strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, (Eph. vi. 10), able to do all things through Christ who strengtheneth them, (Phil. iv. 13), whose strength is mighty even in the weak (2 Cor. xii. 9), whereby they are strengthened with all might according to His glorious power unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness (Col. i. 11), free from the bands of their neck—from sins as the snares of the devil by whom they were taken captive at his will (2 Tim. ii. 26). (For because they were sold for nothing under sin, i. e. to the pure loss of their Creator and LORD—they shall also be redeemed for nothing, i. e., without their robber and oppressor receiving any indemnity). So the church becomes a congregation that has neither spot nor wrinkle nor any such thing, but is holy and unblameable (Eph. v. 27). In the visible church (of the called) there are indeed many unclean, unholy hypocrites, like chaff amid the corn (Matth. iii. 12), like bad fish in a net (Matth. xiii. 48), these will in due time be separated from the believers and elect and be cast into everlasting fire. Whereas the others shall be led into everlasting life, into the kingdom of everlasting glory (Matth. xxv. 46). Let us therefore gratefully acknowledge and lay hold on the precious grace of Christ that we may be found among the number of the elect."—RENNER.

2. On lii. 1–6. "If God has promised us redemption from the wicked world, as He has doubtless done, so ought we to flee out of it every day with all our thinking and imagining and doing. Israel had the command never to settle firmly forever in Babylon, but to await in faith their departure and to be ready for it. To this end Zion should put on her divine strength, her spiritual adornment, i. e. the faith unto righteousness, that she may become as a new, purified congregation free for herself. That came to pass first in the New Testament when God's people were founded not any more on things earthly, but only upon the gracious word of God which each one can receive in faith. Faith is the greatest power on earth, for it partakes of the omnipotence of God. Therefore God's people, when they strengthen themselves in faith, will break their bondage, and the world (which has indeed never paid God for the dominion with which it has long plagued us, but was only used for a season against us as a rod of anger) must, against its will, let the church go free. Israel was indeed a guest in Egypt, and later Assyria ill-used it. But now it is still worse; the world is ever more enraged against us. God will not always let it go on so; but because the heathen, in their conceit, boast and triumph over Israel, as if by their own might they had them and even their God in their power, God will reveal Himself to His people with glorious help." DIEDRICH.

3. On lii. 7. "Est collatio legis et evangelii et commendatio Christi loquentis per apostolos suos. Qui docent legem, sunt tristes bubones et terrent ululatu suo, sed nuntii evangelii habent amabiles pedes, afferunt enim laetissimum verbum pro conscientiis turbatis." LUTHER.

4. On lii. 7. Such poor wretched people, who know nothing of God, are not aware of their own misery and everlasting need, who are over head and ears in sin, and know not how to help the least of them,—I say, what better, greater, more joyful, can happen to such people than such a messenger, who, in the first place, announces peace, i. e. who brings the certain tidings that God would be at peace with us, and neither condemn nor be angry with us on account of our sins. On the other hand, who preaches good tidings of good, i. e. he gives the comfort that God will not only not punish according to our desert, but will give and vouchsafe to us His Spirit, His righteousness and all grace. In the third place, who proclaims salvation, i. e. who promises and comforts us with the assurance that we shall be helped against the devil and death forever. And to comprehend all in one morsel, who can say in truth to Zion, i. e., to believers, thy God is king, i. e. God Himself will receive thee, He will Himself be thy Lord and King; He Himself will teach and instruct thee with His mouth, He Himself will protect thee, and neither office will He any longer devolve on men, but will execute Himself." VEIT DEITRICH.

5. On lii. 8. "Preachers ought to be watchers (Ezek. iii. 17). Therefore they ought neither to be silent about sins and a scandalous life, nor about spreading doctrine that is false. If they are so, they are dumb dogs (lvi. 9)." CRAMER.

6. On lii. 9, 10. "When the conversion of the Jews takes place, it will not happen in a corner, but be so glorious and conspicuous that every one must confess: the LORD has done that." STARKE.

7. On lii. 11, 12. "Dost thou like to keep company with the wicked, and wouldst yet be a Christian? That cannot be; for what communion has light with darkness (2 Cor. vi. 14)? Christians are holy people. How would it ever do to make one's self unclean with sinners? Therefore sigh in all earnestness: 'Create in me a clean heart, O God,' etc. (Ps. li. 12).—The Church of Christ and every true believer has in Christ a faithful guide and leader, a mighty protector in distress. If they journey at His command and in their calling, He goes before them." STARKE.

8. On lii. 11. This passage is cited by the Roman Catholics as authority for the celibacy of the priests. The Apology of the Conf. August. remonstrates against this application of the passage in Art. XI. De conjugio sacerdotum, p. 248, ed HASE; comp. pp. 241, 27; 244, 41.

On lii. 12. "Est insignis exhortatio, ut simplici fide in solum Christum, ducem nostrum, respiciamus, qui nos colliget, ut maneamus in verbo et simus tuti ab omnibus peccatis. Sic legimus de quadam Sancta Moniali. Ea cum tentaretur ob admissa peccata, nihil aliud respondit, quam se Christianam esse. Sensit enim, se nec suis malis operibus damnari, quod haberet Christum, nec bonis operibus salvari posse, sed Christum pro se traditam victimam satisfecisse pro peccatis suis." LUTHER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lii. 1–6. Comfort and admonition to the church in time of distress. 1) Wherein the present distress consists (vers. 4, 5: how the world-power has ever been hostile to the kingdom of God); 2) What the church in this distress must correct in itself (ver. 2: it must make itself inwardly free from worldliness); 3) What the church has to hope in this distress: a. that the LORD will defend His own honor (ver. 6); b. that He will not suffer His enemies to have the advantage (ver. 3: He can for a while let them appear to have it by seeming to surrender His church to their enemies; but He will, at the right moment, take it away from them again); c. that in consequence of this the church will again become strong and glorious (ver. 1).

2. On lii. 7-10. "The lovely harmony brought about in the church by the glad tidings of Christ; 1) In the messengers who start it; 2) In the doctrines that continue its sound; 3) In the hearts that re-echo it." LAUXMANN, in "Zeugnissen ev. Glaubens von V. F. OEHLER, Stuttgart, 1869."

3. On lii. 11, 12. The church of the LORD may come to a situation that will compel it to go out of its previous relations. In that case it is important to observe three things: 1) Not to defile itself by participating in the nature and practices of the world; 2) Not to act with imprudent haste or cowardly fear; 3) To confide in the guidance and protection of the LORD.

V.—THE FIFTH DISCOURSE.

Golgotha and Sheblimini [sit at my right hand.—TR.].

CHAP. LII. 13—LIII. 12.

The transition from lii. 12 to lii. 13 is abrupt only in outward appearance. The attentive reader will see that inwardly there has been due preparation for it. For it was said already, xlix. 3, 4, that the Servant of the LORD, by whom the LORD will glorify Himself, will be surprised by this success as the unexpected reward of His afflictions. It is said, moreover, xlix. 5, 6, 8 sqq., that the restoration of Jerusalem will be accomplished by the Servant of the LORD. Also, l. 1, it is said, that Israel's sin was the ground of its repudiation. In the same chapter, ver. 4 sqq., is described the readiness of the Servant of the LORD to endure the sufferings laid on Him. Our present section (lii. 13—liii. 12; the erroneous division of chapters arose from supposing that lii. 13-15 continues, as the foregoing context, to speak of the people of Israel) shows us how these two particulars are inwardly connected: the sufferings that the Servant of Jehovah must bear, and which make Him appear as a refuse of mankind (xlix. 7) are nothing else than the atoning sufferings that He representatively takes on Himself, but from which He will issue as the high, glorious and mighty Ruler (comp. xlix. 7 with lii. 13, 15; liii. 12).

Chapters xlix.—lvii. are like a wreath of glorious flowers intertwined with black ribbon, or like a song of triumph, through whose muffled tone there courses the melody of a dirge, yet so that gradually the mournful chords merge into the melody of the song of triumph. And at the same time the discourse of the Prophet is arranged with so much art that the mourning ribbon ties into a great bow exactly in the middle. For chap. liii. forms the middle of the entire prophetic cycle of chaps. xl.—lxvi. It has four chapters of the second Ennead, and thirteen chapters of the second and first Enneads before it, and four chapters of the second Ennead and thirteen chapters of the second and third Enneads after it.

Who is the Servant of God, that forms the chief object of our prophecy? That we are not to think of Uzziah, Hezekiah, Josiah, Jeremiah (SAADIA, GROTIUS, BUNSEN, K. A. MENZEL, Staats u. Relig. Gesch. der Kœnigr. Israel u. Juda., Breslau, 1853, p. 298 sq.), or even of Isaiah himself, hardly requires proof at the present day (comp. GESENIUS Komm. p. 170 sqq.). Or need we pause to refute the view, that the whole Jewish people is the Servant of God, that therefore the speakers liii. 2 sqq. are the heathen who recognize that Israel has borne their (the heathen) sins? This is the view that the Rabbins put forward since they have begun to carry on polemics with Christians. But even Christian expositors have joined them, among whom HITZIG is to be named foremost. But it has often been shown, that Israel did not suffer as an innocent for the guilty heathen, but that it suffered for its own guilt; and that it has not borne its sufferings meekly, but with sullen anger, and, as far as possible, with obstinate resistance. Comp. especially MCCAUL, The doctrine and exposition of the liii. of Isaiah.—V. FR. OEHLER, Der knecht Jehovah's im Deuterojesaja II., p. 66 sqq.—WUENSCHE, Die Leiden des Messias, Leipzig, 1870, p. 35 sqq. Many Rabbins, indeed, as DAVID KIMCHI and ISAAK TROKI, have modified this view, saying, that not Israel thinks thus of itself, but the heathen will so say, "when they see that the faith of Israel is the truth, and on the contrary their faith is error" (WUENSCHE, l. c., p. 36). On the other hand, MCCAUL has called attention to the fact that liii. 11, 12, Jehovah Himself describes the suffering of His Servant as expiatory.—Others understand that by the Servant of Jehovah is meant the ideal Israel, i. e., the higher unity of the nation. This higher unity suffered, not because it consisted of nothing but guilty ones, but, on the contrary, in spite of its consisting only partially of such. It suffered therefore, because not all had sinned and yet all must suffer, in a certain sense innocently, and is so far a prophecy (not prediction) relating to Christ. So VATKE (Religion des Alten Test., 1835). But to this it is to be objected, that this view amounts to a distinction between the better and worse part of the nation to which the text makes no reference whatever. For it manifestly does not contrast one part of the nation with another part, but the entire nation with the one Servant of God. The Prophet does not distinguish guilty and innocent in the nation. He sees in the nation only guilty ones. This he utters plainly, ver. 6: "all we like lost sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the LORD hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—Others understand "the true worshippers of Jehovah" to be meant by the Servant of God. This is the view that KNOBEL represents. According to this the Prophet in liii. 2-6 speaks in the first person plural, "because he puts himself among the people, and would be a voice out of the midst of the totality."

His view of the sufferings of the Servant was only partially that of the nation, for the rest (viz., in respect to the cause of their sufferings) this ought to have been their view. That is, the sufferings of the Exile, which were regarded as punishments for the sins of the nation, concerned (according to KNOBEL) especially the true worshippers of Jehovah, who obstinately clung to their nationality, and were very zealous for Jehovah and opposed to idols. They were especially the עֲנִיִּים. The mass of the people, on the other hand, that did not cling strictly to the ancestral religion, stood in good terms with the heathen, and, on the whole, found themselves in tolerable relations. This explanation is so unnatural and inwardly conflicting that it refutes itself. It would have the suffering Servant of Jehovah represent the true worshippers of Jehovah, and those, that in vers. 2–6 speak of the Servant in the first person plural, to be the apostate Israelites, constituting the great mass of the nation. Then the worshippers of Jehovah and those apostates are opponents. Yet verily the apostates can not speak of the worshippers of Jehovah with great reverence and deep sympathy. In their mouth the name "Servant of Jehovah" could only be used in mockery. They could only be supposed to say: It is well that such fools are among us: then the hatred of the heathen will discharge itself on them without hurting us. But that serves them right. Why do they not do as we? Why do they not howl along with the wolves? They might fare as well as we, were they only prudent. In some such way must the apostates speak of the worshippers of Jehovah, if their real sentiments were to appear. But the words sound quite otherwise, that, according to KNOBEL, come out of the midst of the nation. They are words of the highest reverence. KNOBEL feels this himself, and hence he makes the Prophet speak these words, expressing thereby, not what the mass of the people actually thought, but what they ought to have thought! How unnatural! The Prophet of Jehovah, who can only be thought of as a worshipper of Jehovah, speaks as the representative, not of such worshippers, but of the great apostate mass of the nation. He expresses, however, not, indeed, the sentiments that these actually harbored, but such as they ought to harbor! What comedy is this? Verily, if such a distinction between apostates and worshippers of Jehovah be allowed, the Prophet could only meet the former with rebuke. He could only hold up to them their apostacy and admonish them to bear the infamy of Jehovah with the true Israelites, rather than to roll it off, in craven treachery, on their fellow-countrymen.——According to another view the Servant of Jehovah represents the prophetic class or the prophetic institution. Thus in various modifications especially GESENIUS and UMBREIT; whereas HOFMANN understands that by the Servant of God is meant Christ indeed, but only as a prophet. What is said of the sufferings of the Servant does, indeed, in a general way, apply well enough to the prophetic calling; for the prophets were often enough obliged to suffer distress, judgment, contempt, death for the sake of that calling. Yet one thing remains, that under no circumstances can be said of a prophet, viz., that God the Lord cast on Him the guilt of the people, that He bore the sin of the people, that by His wounds the people were healed and made well. If, indeed, one is determined to find in our passage only the idea of suffering in a calling and not suffering as a representative, I must say that this is only possible by means of an artful exegesis, and refer to the following exposition for the proof of this opinion. Comp. moreover the Doctrinal and Ethical thoughts.

I hold the Messianic interpretation to be the only one that is natural and founded on the sound of the words. When KNOBEL affirms that the Old Testament knows nothing of a suffering Messiah, and that Deutero-Isaiah knows nothing of a Messiah at all, it just depends on the way one expounds the passages in question. If one does this in the way exhibited in the above sample of KNOBEL's style of exegesis, then one can interpret away from every passage whatever he dislikes, and interpret whatever he likes into it. Whoever sees that Christ is the Lamb of God that bears away the sin of the world according to the eternal counsel of God already revealed in the Old covenant, must recognize the connection between this fact and Old Testament prophecy; he must especially recognize in Isa. liii. the outline of that plan of salvation.

As, speaking generally, all types of the old covenant combine in the one image of the מָשִׁיחַ, so also, in a narrower sphere, the various typical forms of the Servant of Jehovah, given partly in the nation of Israel generally (xli. 8 sqq.), partly in the pious core of the nation (xiv. 1–5), partly in the prophets (xliv. 26), finally unite in the one figure of the personal Servant of Jehovah. As the species of primitive rock form both the deepest foundation and the highest summit of the earth's body, so is Christ at once the original and fulfilment of all prophecy. He is in particular both the inmost core and the crowning summit of all typical forms of the Servant of Jehovah. It is to be observed, however, that the Servant of Jehovah is not a type-form co-ordinate with the types of the prophet, priest, and king. But He represents alone the character of the lowly, unsightly, pitiable "Servant-form" or the "sorrowful form" as far as that is common to all those type-forms. For that the Old Testament knows also a king "of the sorrowful form" is evident from Zech. ix. 9. Hence it is, of course, not correct to say, that in Isa. liii. is drawn the form of the messianic Priest, King, or Prophet. For Isa. liii. treats only of the Servant of Jehovah, and only of the Priest, King, or Prophet, so far as even in these also the poor, lowly Servant appears. Hence, too, one may not say that all the persons of the old covenant that have ever been designated (as servants and instruments of God) by the name Servant of Jehovah, are servants of God in the Isaianic sense. This specific Servant of Jehovah, that we find in Isa. xl.–liii. as type of the poverty and lowliness of the Messiah, does not appear at all in the older writing. When Moses (Exod. xiv. 31; Josh. i. 1, 2, 13; Ps. cv. 26; 2 Ki. xviii. 12, etc.), Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 10), the Patriarchs (Exod. xxxii. 13; Deut. ix. 27) are designated by this name, it is as the servants of Jehovah, without giving prominence to the form of the servant. What servant-form would one find in the angels, who are also called the servants of God in Job iv. 18? It is, indeed, possible that the idea of a servant-form veiling the inward glory gradually developed from observing the contrasts in the life of a David (comp. Ps. xviii. 1; lxxxix. 4, 21; cxxxii. 10; cxliv. 10; 2 Sam. vii. 5, 8, 18, 20 sqq., etc.), of a Job (i. 8; ii. 3; xlii. 7, 8) of the prophets (2 Ki. ix. 7, 36; x. 10; xiv. 25; xvii. 23, etc.), yea, of the pious in general (Ps. xix. 12, 14; xxxi. 17; xxxv. 27, etc.). But we first find this idea crystallized into a fixed form in the second part of Isaiah. Later writers may have taken the expression from Isaiah, and applied it in his sense, especially to the people of Israel (comp. Jer. xxx. 10; xlvi. 27, 28; Ps. cxxxvi. 22). But one must be on his guard about taking every use of the word by later writers in the Isaianic sense. Thus Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxv. 9) is called servant of Jehovah, but certainly not in Isaiah's sense. Before and in Isaiah, עֶבֶד is never found conjoined with any other name of God than יהוה. It is remarkable, that Moses, in later writings, beside being called עבד יהוה (2 Chr. i. 3; xxiv. 9), is also called עבד האלהים (1 Chr. vi. 34; 2 Chr. xxiv. 9; Neh. x. 30; Dan. ix. 11).

Our prophecy subdivides into three parts. The first (lii. 13-15) contains the theme of the prophecy; the second (liii. 1-7 treats of the lowliness of the Servant; the third (liii. 8-12) treats of his exaltation.

1. THE THEME OF THE PROPHECY.

Chapter LII. 13-15.

13 Behold, my servant shall [1]deal prudently,
He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high.
14 As many were [a]astonied at thee;
His visage was so marred more than any man,
And his form more than the sons of men:
15 So shall he [b]sprinkle many nations;
The kings shall shut their mouths at him:
[c]For that which had not been told them shall they see;
And that which they had not heard shall they consider.

[1] Or, prosper.

[a] horrified. [b] make spring up.

[c] For those to whom nothing was told, they see it, and those who have heard nothing, they understand it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13. נָבָה—שָׂכַל see List. The three-degree climax ירום ונשׂא ונבה must neither be pressed, nor regarded as without significance. It is a rhetorical expedient for expressing the superlative (comp. ὑπερύψωσε Phil. ii. 9; Acts ii. 33; v. 31; Eph. i. 20 sqq.).——That רום may mean "to raise one's-self" may be seen xxx 18.——The conjunction of רום ונשׂא and in that order is Isaianic: ii. 12, 13, 14; x. 33.

Ver. 14. כַּאֲשֶׁר—כֵּן is used here as in Exod. i. 12 (Gesen.). Therefore, with most expositors, I hold the clause כֵּן־מִשְׁחַת—אָדָם to be a parenthesis, that explains why many are astonished at the Servant. In regard to the change of person, there is notoriously great freedom in Hebrew, and also in Isaiah: i. 29; ii. 6; xiv. 30; xxxiii. 2, 6; xli. 1; xlii. 20; xlv. 8, 21). Haevernick, (Theol. d. A. T., p. 248), Hahn and V. F. Oehler regard the two clauses with כֵּן as the two degrees of the apodosis. Haevernick urges that כן does not mean adeo, and in that he is of course correct. It is only the comparative ita, not the intensive tam or adeo. But he is wrong in urging the rarity of the parenthesis in Hebrew, and asserting that כן can only introduce the apodosis. Hahn, who pronounces the change of persons carelessness, which one has not the least right to assume (he does not reflect, however, on the frequency of this usage!) is of the opinion, that as vers. 11, 12 speak of Israel, and ver. 13 of the Servant, so, too, ver. 14 speaks first of Israel, and then of the Servant. But that is quite a superficial construction. For there is a chasm between vers. 12 and 13. With ver. 13 there begins a new, specifically different section, and it is on the contrary quite unnatural and against the context to refer עָלֶיךָ again to the nation. V. Fr. Oehler apparently avoids this unnaturalness by referring also ver. 13 to the nation, and letting the transition to the servant begin with כן משחת. But this construction also does violence to the text.——מִשְׁחַת from שָׁחַת. Kal unused, Piel "corrupit, pessum dedit," is any way ἅπ. λεγ. Analogous formations מָשְׁחָת "corruptio, corruptum," Lev. xxii. 25 and מַשְׁחֵת "pernicies," Ezek. ix. 1. It is uncertain and indifferent as to sense which is the chief form, מִשְׁחָת or מִשְׁחַת (syncopated from מִשְׁחָתַת (Haevernick, et al.) or מִשְׁחַת as e. g., מֶרְכָּב, מִרְמַס. The expression משחת מאיש is explained from the capability of the preposition מִן to express a negation. Deformity away from the man is deformity or disfigurement to an appearance no longer human. מִן has an analogous meaning in the clause ותארו מבני אדם. For here also the literal meaning is: his form is away from men, i. e., no longer human.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. These verses, which by their contents necessarily belong to chap. liii. according to the common manner of the Prophet, stand in front as giving the theme. Ver. 13 sets forth the final goal: the glory and sublimity of the Servant of Jehovah. But in roughest contrast with this stands the way that He must go in order to reach that goal: deepest suffering, by which He almost loses His human appearance (ver. 14). But as the humiliation is deep, so is the exaltation high: the Gentile world and its kings will worship Him that is exalted out of suffering, for they, for whom the salvation appeared not to be destined, will also have a share in it (ver. 15).

2. Behold my Servant——they consider.—Vers. 13–15. The expression יַשְׂכִּיל points to the reciprocal relation of means and end. He that uses the means that lead to the end is wise. The Servant of God will use no false means, therefore He is wise. הִשְׂכִּיל never of itself has the meaning of הִצְלִיחַ; but in the sapienter rem gerere there is impliedly the bene rem gerere (comp. Jer. x. 21; Prov. xvii. 8). HENGSTENBERG sees in יַשְׂכִּיל a "retrospect" to 1 Sam. xviii. 14, 15 where this word is used of David (comp. 1 Kings ii. 3; Ps. ci. 2; 2 Kings xviii. 7). But he seems to me to go too far when, according to the parallel passage cited, he understands יַשְׂכִּיל to mean the wise administration of government, and STIER has properly protested against this construction. Yet we may suppose there is an allusion involving only comparison and not equalization. For the Servant of God appears here, not indeed as king, but as one that, like David, from a small, mean beginning worked himself aloft to high honor.

But the splendid description of ver. 13 anticipates merely the end. This end crowns a course of development of the contrary character. It passes through night to light, per ardua ad astra. The vers. 14, 15 say this. For many the Servant of God became an object of horror (שָׁמֵם comp. Lev. xxvi. 32; Ezek. xxvii. 35; xxviii. 19). But in the same proportion that He first provokes horror by the deformity of His appearance, He will later provoke wondering reverence. His visage was so marred, etc. ["His look however was in that degree disfigured to the inhuman, and His form not like a son of man's." DR. NAEGELSBACH's translation.—TR.]. These words are a parenthesis (see Text. and Gram.). There occurs accordingly a change of person, which, as HENGSTENBERG remarks, is explained by the parenthesis containing a remark of the Prophet, in which, naturally, the Servant is spoken of in the third person. But by this the continuation of Jehovah's discourse in ver. 15 is also diverted from the second to the third person (see Text. and Gram.).

Since l. 10 the expression עֶבֶד "servant" has not been used. Chapters li. lii. spoke of the people of Israel without applying to them the designation "Servant of God." According to ŒHLER's exposition, in lii. 14—liii. 12 also the personal Servant of God is not spoken of; and now ver. 13 must not be introduction to what follows, but recapitulation of what precedes! After previously speaking of Israel's elevation, and bringing this contemplation to a close in every respect, is it now again to be discoursed on? A section treating of the personal Servant of God ought to begin with a statement having the Servant of God for subject, and yet this Servant of God must not be the one of whom the new section treats, but the one of which the foregoing section treated, yet without designating it as the Servant of God! In this way ver. 13, from being a most suitable and artistic beginning of the new section, becomes an unsuitable conclusion of the foregoing one. Of course one will not venture to take כֵּן in the sense of "adeo," which it does not have. But it is equivalent to "corresponding to, in that degree that," and involves the meaning that the horror of the people answers to the looks of the Servant, so that the former is prompted by the latter. There will be a certain equality between fortunate and unfortunate consequences; in the same degree that one was horrified at Him, He will also provoke joyful wonder and reverence (ver. 15). נָזָה is "to spring," and with the exception of our text is used in the Old Testament (in twenty places) only of the springing or spurting of fluids. It occurs in this sense also lxiii. 3. This use is especially frequent in the Pentateuch, where the various acts of purification and consecration are spoken of, which were performed by sprinkling with blood or water. Hence very many expositors, following the VULG., and SYR., as LUTHER, VATABL., FORER., GROTIUS (who yet also approved the θαυμάσονται of the LXX. since he says, "minari est veluti aspergi fulgore alicujus," for which VITRINGA reproves him sharply), LOWTH (whom however this exposition does not satisfy), RAMBACH, HENGSTENBERG, HAEVERNICK, HAHN, etc. [BARNES, J. A. ALEX., BIRKS, etc.], have taken נָזָה in the sense of asperget, ["to asperse, besprinkle"] and have considered the reference to be to the atoning power of the blood of Christ ("Christus virtutem sanguinis a se fusi instar Magni Pontificis domus Dei applicabit ad purificationem conscientiarum gentium multarum." VITRINGA). This explanation was the one generally received by the church. But it is correctly objected to it, that הִזָּה never means "to be-sprinkle" but always "to spout," "to make burst," and is always followed by the accusative of the spurted fluid, with עַל or אֶל of the remoter object that is spurted on. Perhaps on this account the TARG. JONAT., then SAADIA and ABENEZRA gave the rendering disperget. But apart from this meaning not being grammatically established, it does not at all suit the context. There has been an effort to change the reading. Thus the Englishmen DURELL and JUBB, whom LOWTH quotes, would read יֶחֱזוּ, which they then take in the sense of the θαυμάσονται of the LXX.: so shall many nations wonder at him." But Piel of חָזָה never occurs, and the meaning "θαυμάζεσθαι" would be dragged in. J. Dav. Michaelis would point יַזֶּה after the Arabic nasiha (amoenus fuit, oblectavit), accordingly the sense would be: "so shall He be the delight of many Gentiles." This conjecture, also, must be called too far-fetched. The most satisfactory explanation is the one now approved by most expositors (since Ch. Dav. Martini, Comment. philol. crit. in Jes. cap. liii. Rost. 1791): "He will make spring np," which springing up is taken either as the expression of joy or of astonishment, surprise, or of reverence, and is construed in antithesis to שׁממו עליך ver. 14. Also Stier, Delitzsch, V. Fr. Œhler share this view. I side with them because I know of nothing better. The thought in itself, indeed, seems to me suitable. For one can, of course, suppose that the Prophet means to oppose to that horror with which the suffering Servant was regarded, a surprised springing up proceeding from respectful astonishment. One might quote as a parallel קָמוּ שָׂרִים וְיִשְׁתַּחֲוּוּ Isa. xlix. 7. And one might also fittingly refer to Jer. xxxiii. 9 (גּוֹיִם פָּחֲדוּ וְרָגְזוּ) and Hab. iii. 6 (וַיַּתֵּר גּוֹיִם). But nevertheless it remains an unfortunate affair, that נָזָה is used in the Old Testament only of the springing or spurting of fluids, and never of persons, and that for the latter use one can only appeal to Arabic analogies (nasa, see Gesen. Thes. p. 868 a). In my opinion, it is possible that the reading יַזֶּה is not correct. Perhaps we ought to read יַתֵּר גּוֹיִם as in Hab. iii. 6. That would give the same sense by means of a genuine Hebrew word, though one, indeed, not frequently used. For נָתַר "tremuit, subsilivit" occurs beside only Lev. xi. 12; Job xxxvii. 1. If יַתֵּר was the original reading in our text, it were alowable to think that the contents of chap. liii. occasioned the substitution of the priestly word יזה for the one that may have fallen out in some way, or have become indistinct. [The foregoing review of the state of the question concerning יַזֶּה, and the Author's own despairing attempt, dispose one to say "the old is better" and to adhere to the English accepted version. J. A. Alex., says of the other views and especially of that stated above to be the most generally adopted by modern expositors: "The explanation is in direct opposition to a perfectly uniform Hebrew usage, and without any real ground even in Arabic analogy. The ostensible reasons for this gross violation of the clearest principles of lexicography are: first the chimera of a perfect parallelism, which is never urged except in cases of great necessity; and secondly, the fact that in every other case the verb is followed by the substance sprinkled, and connected with the object upon which it is sprinkled by a preposition. But since both constructions of the verb "to sprinkle" are employed in other languages (as we may either speak of sprinkling a person or of sprinkling water on him), the transition must be natural, and no one can pretend to say, that two or more examples of it in a book of this size are required to demonstrate its existence. The real motive of the strange unanimity with which the true sense has been set aside, is the desire to obliterate this clear description, at the very outset, of the Servant of Jehovah as an expiatory purifier, one who must be innocent Himself in order to cleanse others.—Another objection to the modern explanation of the word is, that it then anticipates the declaration of the next clause, instead of forming a connecting link between it and the first."—Some that hold the modern view, as our Author and Delitzsch, may not be charged with what J. A. Alex. pronounces the real motive of it. See above the introduction to this section. But surely it is easier to conjecture that יַזֶּה has the force and construction involved in the old view (if that rendering can be charged with being no better than conjecture) than to resort to such a conjecture as that of the Author.—Tr.].—The added גּוֹיִם by no means represents, in relation to ver. 14 a, merely a (quantitative) intensification (see immediately below on ver. 14 b). Shall shut their mouths is a sign of reverence (comp. Matth. vii. 16, and in general Isa. xlix. 7). עָלָיו is causal: on account of His surprisingly imposing appearance they are dumb. To understand the causal clause כי אשר לא ספר ונו׳ as Delitzsch does ("what was never told they see, what was never heard they hear") the text must read כִּי אֲשֶׁר לֹא סֻפַּר רָאוּ. But the additional לָהֶם, of which that explanation makes no account, intimates rather that the Prophet lays the emphasis on the antithesis between the Jews and the Gentiles. Hence he adds before רַבִּים the word גּוֹיִם. Many heathen nations trembled before Him in reverence, and their kings were dumb before Him, whereas Israel felt only aversion for Him. Thus it happened that those did not recognize Him to whom He was announced in advance, whereas those to whom nothing about Him was announced saw Him and understood (lxv. 1; lxvi. 19). It is clear, therefore, that סֻפַּר and שָׁמְעוּ refer to the prophetic announcement that preceded the historical appearance of the Servant of Jehovah, and prepared the way for it. It was just that Israel, prophetically acquainted with Him in advance, that did not receive Him; whereas the heathen, that yet were without such preparation, made Him welcome. ["The last clause, in grammar, admits equally the received version or that of the LXX. given above (Birks translates as Dr. Naegelsbach does.—Tr.). But St. Paul's quotation, Rom. xv. 20, 21, where this very promise, as rendered above, is made the rule and law of his own conduct as the Apostle of the Gentiles, seems decisive in favor of the latter meaning (LXX., Vulg., Luth., Crusius, Stier). Beside the authority of an inspired comment, the context favors this construction. That wide publication of the gospel, to which Paul applies the words, and in which he was the chief instrument, explains how it would be that many nations and kings should come to do homage to Messiah. Birks.—Tr.]

2. THE LOWLINESS OF THE SERVANT AS THE LAMB THAT BEARS THE PEOPLE'S SIN.

Chapter LIII. 1–7.

1 Who hath believed our[1] [2]report?
And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?
2 For [a]he shall grow up before him as a tender plant,
And as a root out of a dry ground:
He hath no form nor comeliness; and when [b]we shall see him,
There is no beauty that we should desire him.
3 [c]He is despised and rejected of men;
A man of sorrows, and [d]acquainted with grief:
And[3] [4]we hid as it were our faces from him;
He was despised, and we esteemed him not.
4 Surely he hath borne our griefs,
And carried our sorrows:
Yet we did esteem him stricken,
Smitten of God, and afflicted.
5 But he was [5]wounded for our transgressions,
He was bruised for our iniquities:
The chastisement of our peace was upon him;
And with his [6]stripes we are healed.
6 All we like sheep have gone astray;
We have turned every one to his own way;
And the Lord [7]hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.
7 He was oppressed, and he [e]was afflicted,
[f]Yet he opened not his mouth:
[g]He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter,
And as a sheep before her shearers is dumb,
So he [h]openeth not his mouth.

[1] Or, doctrine. [2] Heb. hearing. [3] Or, he hid as it were his face from us.
[4] Heb. as an hiding of faces from him, or from us. [5] Or, tormented.
[6] Heb. bruise. [7] Heb. hath made the iniquities of us all to meet on him.

[a] he came up. [b] we saw. [c] Despised and ceasing to be man.
[d] noted for pain. [e] willingly bowed himself. [f] And.
[g] As a lamb is brought to the slaughter. [h] opened.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 3. נִבְזֶה (comp. Ps. xv. 4; Jer. xxii. 28; Mal. i. 7, 12; Dan. xi. 21). Ver. 4. אָכֵן. Ver. 5. חַבּוּרָה—מְחֹלָל everywhere else חַבּוּרָה comp. Gen. iv. 23; Exodus xxi. 25. מְדֻכָּא Ver. 6. פָּגַע.

Ver. 2. תֹּאַר like the Latin forma with the special meaning of the beautiful form, comp. Jer. xi. 16; 1 Sam. xvi. 18.——הָדָר in parallelism with תאר spoken of the nature of the environment.——וְנִרְאֵהוּ is neither the same as וְנִרְאֵהוּ, nor to be rendered: "that we may see him," for the latter words express such an absence of תאר and הדר that the Servant would be altogether invisible. But ונראהו is protasis of a hypothetical clause: and did we look at him, there was no such form that we would have had pleasure in him. Ver. 3 gives the meaning of the figure used in ver. 2 a, and a nearer definition of the homely appearance of the Servant described in ver 2 b. We may therefore regard ver. 3 as in apposition with the logical chief-subject of ver. 2, which is also at the same time the grammatical subject in the first clause of ver. 2 a.

Ver. 3. נִבְזֶה, which is repeated by way of recapitulation in the last clause of the verse, forms the chief conception. Comp. בְּזֹה־נֶפֶשׁ xlix. 7, בְּזוּי עָם Ps. xxii. 6; Obad. 2; Jer. xlix. 15.——In חֲדַל אִישִׁים Delitzsch would take אִישִׁים in the sense of viri spectabiles. This plural occurs again only Ps. cxli. 4 and Prov. viii. 4. In the Psalm it is used of the wicked. In the Proverbs it is, indeed, used in parallelism with בְּנֵי אָדָם. But in our text the Prophet can hardly intend to say, that the Servant is forsaken only by men of respectability, but not by inferior people. He would represent him rather as forsaken of all, as appears from what follows and xlix. 7. But it is very much a question whether חדל may be taken in the sense of "desertus." For Job xix. 14 it is said חָדְלוּ קְרוֹבַי, i. e., my neighbors have forsaken me. Therefore חָדֵל is not desertus but deserens. It has an active intransitive sense also in Ps. xxxix. 5 (let me know what a transitory thing I am) and in Ezek. iii. 27 (he that hears let him hear; and he that forbeareth let him forbear). I therefore agree with Hengstenberg, who regards the expression "as corresponding exactly to the 'from a man' and 'from the sons of men,' lii. 14." Then the plural would be chosen in order to intimate by the sound of the word the relation to the מֵאִישׁ lii. 14. חָדֵל is desinens, חדל אִישִׁים therefore desinens hominum, i. e., he of men that ceases scil. to be a man. Thus the LXX. render it as regards the sense: εἶδος ἐκλεῖπον παρὰ πάντας ἀνθρώπους; Symm.: ἐλάχιστος ἀνδρῶν; Vulg. novissimus virorum. The explanation of Hahn: avoidance of men (inf. const. as in בְּזֹה־נֶפֶשׁ xlix. 7), if not exactly ungrammatical, is still very far-fetched.——מַכְאוֹב occurs in Isaiah only in vers. 3, 4 of this chapter; in ver. 3 it has the feminine ending that never occurs elsewhere; in ver. 4 it has the common masc. plural ending (Gen. iii. 7; Ps. xxxii. 10).——יְדוּעַ חֹלִי can, of course, mean "the confidant of sickness," if יָדוּעַ be taken in the sense of מְיֻדָּע Ps. xxxi. 12; lv. 14, etc., מוֹדַע Isa. xii. 5, מֹדַע Ruth ii. 1; Prov. vii. 4 or מֹדַעַת Ruth iii. 2. But in the only passage where יָדוּעַ occurs beside the present (Deut. i. 13, 15) it means "the acquaintance," not in the sense of familiarity, but the man known and respected by all, the vir illustris or insignis. The genitive construction resolves itself into the construction of the verb with the accusative of nearer definition. For יְדוּעַ חֹלִי = יָדוּעַ חֹלִי, i. e., who is known in respect to sickness, as one may say נְשׂוּא פָנִים sublatus faciem 2 Kings v. 1. אֹבַד עֵצוֹת ἔθνος ἀπολωλεκὸς βουλήν (LXX.) Deut. xxxii. 28. תֹּעֵי לֵבָב πλανώμενοι τὴν καρδίαν Ps. xcv. 10, etc.—The explanation "scitus morbi (better edoctus morbum), i. e., as one put in the condition of knowing about sickness" (Delitzsch) seems to me too uncertain and far-fetched.——If we were warranted in reading כְּמַסְתִּיר, as indeed 4 Codd. do, or in taking מַסְתֵּר in the sense of מַסְתִּיר, we must translate and explain as Hengstenberg does, according to Lev. xiv. 45: "as one that hides the countenance from us." But this usage of מַסְתֵּר is not sufficiently attested. It must therefore be taken as substantive (ad form. מַרְפֵּא sanatio, מַשְׁחִית vastatio (Olsh. § 199 a) in the abstract sense of "veiling." But the further question arises, whether the abstract meaning applies directly or indirectly, and whether the words וּכְמַסְתֵּר פָּנִים מִמֶּנּוּ are to be construed as an independent sentence, or are to be joined with נִבְזֶה. If מסתר be taken directly as abstract, i. e., if it be left in its abstract meaning, then one must connect the whole clause with נִבְזֶה. For, "according to the veiling of the countenance from him," would be a sentence without a predicate, to gain which the words must lean on נבזה. But then their position before נבזה is surprising. One would expect וְנִבְזֶה כְּמַסְתֵּר וגו׳, so that the second half of the verse would begin with נבזה as does the first. But נבזה comes after, and, as remarked above, it corresponds to the נבזה beginning the verse, as a sort of relative, recapitulating conclusion, therefore we must take the words וּכְמַסְתֵּר פָּנִים מִמֶּנּוּ as an independent clause, which is also demanded by the accents. Then we must take מַסְתֵּר as the abstract for the concrete. Veiling the countenance from him would be = the object before which one veils the countenance. Thus כמסתר וגו׳ would be the same as כַּאֲשֶׁר מַסְתִּיר פָּנִים מִמֶּנּוּ.

Ver. 5. וְהוּא is opposed to וַאֲנַחְנוּ ver. 4 b, and this in turn to the הוּא before נָשָׂא ver. 4 a; so that here we have such a chain of adversative clauses as in li. 12, 13, where see.——מְחֹלָל is part. Poal, passive to מְחוֹלֶלֶת li. 9.——The expression מוּסַר שְׁלוֹמֵנוּ is to be judged as מוּסַר הַשְׂכֵּל Prov. i. 3, i. e., "chastisement, education to reason, to a reasonable being" (Hitzig, Zoeckler); מוּסַר חָכְמָה Prov. xv. 33, "chastisement to wisdom." תּוֹכַחַת חַיִּים Prov. xv. 31 "reproof to life." The construction is analogous to that of the participle in the construct state instead of the connection by a preposition.——חַבּוּרָה. One properly looks for a plural, which also occurs elsewhere (Ps. xxxviii. 9; Prov. xx. 30). For one cannot suppose that the Prophet would speak only of one mark of a blow. We must then take the word collectively. Its meaning is "vibex, wale," the marks left by a blow.——נִרְפָּא לָנוּ "healing is to us," is explained as passive of the causative Kal רָפָא = "to do healing." On this meaning is founded the construction of רפא with the dative of the person (e. g. Num. xii. 13; 2 Kings xx. 5, 8) and (more rarely) of the thing (Ps. ciii. 3), which occurs along with the construction with the accusative (xix. 22; xxx. 26; lvii. 18, 19, etc.). The word is found used impersonally (i. e., with indefinite subject) in vi. 10, where we translate: one brought him healing. Then נִרְפָּא is passive.

Ver. 7. נֶאֱלָמָה is, according to the accents, to be treated as a perfect and not as a participle. The perfect is used because it expresses here not a transaction accomplished successively, like the being led, but an accomplished, continuing state, the being dumb, standing dumb.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Having stated the theme in lii. 13-15, the Prophet introduces the people as speaking. They testify what was said by implication lii. 15 b, viz. that they have not believed the announcement of the prophets concerning the Servant that they have heard, and have not understood the revelation of the divine power imparted to them (ver. 1). Thus it came about that they treated as of no account the Servant of Jehovah who sprang up like a root-sprout out of dry ground (vers. 2, 3). This mean-looking form of the Servant of God is explained by the punishment of our sins being laid on Him, that through His suffering we might find peace and healing (vers. 4, 5). While we wearied ourselves in vain to find the way to salvation, Jehovah cast our guilt on Him (ver. 6); yet He bore it patiently like a sheep, that mutely suffers itself to be led to the slaughter or to shearing (ver. 7).

2. Who hath believed——revealed, ver. 1. At first sight that explanation (commended also by Jno. xii. 38; Rom. x. 16*), seems to deserve the preference, that construes ver. 1 as the language of the Prophet, by which he expresses the consciousness of having said something incredible to the world. Yet on closer examination we admit that those are right who construe ver. 1 as the utterance of Israel. For 1) the perfect would be very surprising in the mouth of the Prophet. One looks for יַאֲמִין from him, whereas in the mouth of the people, who, according to ver. 2 sqq., have the historical appearance of the Servant before them, the perfect is quite in place. By this Israel gives confirmation that it has, indeed, not believed the prophetic pre-announcement, and assigns thereby, at the same time, the reason why, in His lowliness, it regarded the manifested Servant as of no account. 2) The word שְׁמֻעָתֵנוּ likewise is much more appropriate in the mouth of Israel than of the Prophet. The choice of the word is explained by שָׁמְעוּ, lii. 15. With reference to this they designate the prophetic announcement imparted to them as שְׁמֻעָה, as a thing heard. This is the fundamental meaning properly corresponding to the form of the word. The same underlies directly the meaning "knowledge report" (xxxvii. 7). But as the something heard must at the same time be a something said, the word can, like the Greek ἀκοή, receive the meaning "announcement, preaching," in which sense we have already had it, xxviii. 9, 19. Yet in our text we do not need to have recourse to this meaning, as the original sense suffices perfectly. [The view presented here, taken in close connection with the explanation of lii. 15 given above, leads consistently to the following logical connection, viz. It is declared lii. 15 b: for they to whom it had not been told shall see, and those who had not heard shall consider. Thereupon the Jews are introduced saying: Who has believed our report (i. e., what was reported us, what we had heard)? and to whom is the arm of the LORD revealed (i. e., to whom has it been made plain that the LORD sent this Servant and had a hand in all that He was and did)? So connected the language of liii. 1 appears as an exclamation, which, with what follows, marks the contrast between those that heard and believed a revelation made to others (lii. 15), and those that did not believe that revelation, though it was their own (שְׁמֻעָתֵנוּ liii. 1, a thing heard by us). The language following (liii. 2 sqq.) proceeds, as the author says, to give the reason why the speakers did not believe, or rather it describes how they who were told did not believe what others did believe who were not the direct recipients of the prophetic announcement of what was to be. And the description is in terms that show how aggravated and perverse the unbelief was. Thus ver. 1 is not simply an indirect statement that none believed, but a double intimation of how some believed, and others, the very ones of whom the contrary was to be expected, did not. This explanation is quite consistent with the facts of salvation, and these facts are so set forth by Isaiah himself and reiterated in the New Testament (comp. Isa. lxv. 1-3; Rom. x. 19-21; xi. 11, 12). And this consideration gives great countenance to the view. —TR.]

The arm of the Lord is a metonymy for that of which the arm is the organ, viz. the almighty power of God (lii. 10). The arm of Jehovah is not only revealed to him who has seen its mighty efficiency a posteriori, but also to him who has recognized a priori what that arm can do. There is, therefore, an outward and an inward revelation of the divine power. The expression has the latter meaning here.

3. For He shall grow——esteemed Him not. Vers. 2, 3.—Israel was ill-prepared to receive the Servant of God when He came. The Rabbins, who in polemics with Christians refer our chapter to the Jewish nation or to individual persons, must, indeed, admit that the ancient Synagogue, whose exegesis was as yet unaffected by these polemics, knew very well of a suffering Messiah (comp. the proofs of this in the writing of CONSTANTIN L'EMPEREUR, D. Isaaci Abrabanelis et R. MOSIS ALSCHECHI, Comment. in Jesajae prophetiam 30, etc. Lugd., Batav., 1631, in WUENSCHE, l. c., and in MCCAUL, l. c., p. 14 sqq.). Yet all quotations from the writings of the ancient Synagogue given by the authors named prove at the same time that even the most ancient authorities acknowledged the suffering Messiah only very reluctantly and with all possible artful turns and distortions. As an example we may cite how JONATAN BEN USIEL, the Targumist, translates Isa. liii. 2, 3, 4, 7. Ver. 2. Et magnificabitur justus coram eo sicut surculi, qui florent, et sicut arbor, quae mittit radices suas juxta torrentes aquarum; sic multiplicabitur gens sancta in terra, quae indigebat eo. Non erit aspectus ejus sicut aspectus communis, nec timor ejus sicut idiotae, sed erit decor ejus decor sanctitatis, ut omnis, qui viderit eum, contempletur eum. Ver. 3. Erit quidem contemtus, verum auferet gloriam omnium regum: erunt infirmi et dolentes quasi vir doloribus et infirmitatibus expositus. Et cum subtrahebat vultum majestatis a nobis, eramus despecti et in nihilum reputati. Ver. 4. Propterea ipse deprecabitur pro peccatis nostris et delicta nostra propter eum dimittenter; et nos reputati sumus vulnerati, percussi a facie Domini et afflicti. Ver. 7. Deprecatus est, ipse exauditus est, et antiquam aperiret os suum, acceptus est. Robustos populorum quasi agnum ad victimam tradet, et sicut ovem, quae tacet coram tondente se, et non erit, qui aperiat os suum in conspectu ejus et loquatur verbum." One sees that this paraphrase pretty much makes the text say the very opposite of what it intends. The insignificant sprig becomes the splendid, flourishing, holy nation; the homely look of the Servant becomes an aspectus non communis; ver. 3, it is indeed confessed that He will be despised, but at the same time He will deprive kings of their fame, and by withdrawing His countenance draw contempt to the nation. Ver. 4. The substitutionary suffering is transformed into intercession, and those smitten by God are the Israelites. Ver. 7. Finally, the Servant prays, and, before He opens His mouth,

* [There is no need of making it appear as if one must choose between the interpretation of John and Paul on the one hand and that of the Author and other commentators on the other. For as DELITZSCH, in loc., says: "The references to this passage in John and Romans do not compel us to assign ver. 1 to the Prophet and his comrades in office."—TR.]

He is heard; the strong, however, among the nations He sacrifices like sheep, and no one dares to open His mouth before Him. Here the suffering Messiah is directly transformed into a victorious and triumphant Messiah. And it is not in a way that makes one say the translator must have had a different reading or have misunderstood. For that neither was the case appears partly from the fact that the other ancient versions agree exactly with the Masoretic text (see LOWTH in loc.), and partly from the Paraphrast translating quite correctly when it suits him. But he simply substitutes a Messiah, such as He must be according to his fancy, for the one described in the text, by which he involuntarily testifies, that in his day men indeed found the information of the suffering Messiah in the prophetic writing, but would not understand it. With this agrees admirably the manner in which the disciples of Jesus received the announcement of His impending passion (Luke ix. 45; xviii. 34). Just on this account we say, that the people of Israel were badly prepared when the Servant of Jehovah appeared in the midst of them.

Thus the Servant came up like a sprout before him. לפניו is to be referred to Jehovah, ver. 1, and not to the subject of the interrogative clause in ver. 1. For the latter mode of expression, even if not exactly incorrect logically, would be very artificial. One would expect לְפָנָיו. The meaning of לפניו, however, is that the Servant of God so grew up before God according to His counsel and will. יונק is properly "the suckling" (xi. 8), but is here used of the tender offshoot of a plant ["precisely like the cognate English word sucker, by which LOWTH translates it."—J. A. ALEX.]. יוֹנֶקֶת is every where else used in the latter sense (Job viii. 16; xiv. 7; Ps. lxxx. 12, etc.). The choice of the expression here is perhaps influenced by the Prophet having in mind the prophecy of xi. 1 sqq. There he spoke of the reviresence of the Davidic house reduced to an insignificant root-stock, and how this renewing would be by means of "a rod of the stem of Jesse" and "a Branch from his roots." Although he does not use there the expression יונק, and only by the way mentions the suckling that plays on the hole of the adder (xi. 8), still one sees that in general the Prophet transposes himself back into the sphere of thought of that prophecy. Hence, more plainly than יונק does כשרש recall that prophecy (comp. xi. 1–10). As a root can be said to mount up only in the sense of sending forth a sprout or shoot from itself, so ויעל כשרש is to be understood of the springing up of such a root-sprout (comp. נֵצֶר שָׁרָשִׁים, Dan. xi. 7). A root in dry ground has little hope of flourishing. This was exactly the situation of the Davidic royal house at the time Christ was born. When the carpenter Joseph was necessitated by the command of Cæsar Augustus (Luke ii. 1) to betake himself from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the house of David and his kingdom were like a root out of dry ground; it had no form nor splendor, and as men looked on him there was no such form that they could have pleasure in him (see Text. and Gram.).

Ver. 3 (see Text. and Gram.). By what means the Servant was brought to the state that He ceased to be a man, is said by the words: "a man of suffering and noted for pain."—And as one, before whom one veils the face, a despised one, whom we did not regard. According to HAHN, it is the countenance of Jehovah that is hid. It is true, so far as I know, that, often as there is mention of hiding the countenance as a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xix. 4; Ezek. xii. 6), or of anger (Isa. liv. 8; lix. 2, etc.), or of reverence (Ex. iii. 6) or in order not to be seen (Exod. xiii. 45), still our text gives the only instance of doing so in order not to see an object of disgust. Yet this is merely an accident. For the gesture is so natural, and so universal and necessary, for men that there is no need of seeking any confirmation of it in national custom. But the context is decidedly against the view of HAHN. For our passage only speaks of how the Servant of God appeared to men. The outward appearance of a man from whom God hides His face is by no means necessarily that of an ecce homo.

4. Surely he hath borne——his mouth.—Vers. 4–7. The Prophet leads us from the outward appearance to what is inward. He shows that this pitiable form of the Servant is not an outside corresponding to His interior. It was not He that drew that woful fate on Himself by His own guilt, but, according to God's will and for our salvation, He bears our guilt, and He bears it with the patience of a lamb.—אָכֵן, "surely," is best construed here in its simple and natural adversative meaning as in xlix. 4. As there the Servant's hope in God's righteousness is put in contrast with His apparent ill-success, so here to the outward appearance of sinfulness is opposed the inward truth of His innocence and love that suffers for others.—This is done first by declaring the true ground of these sufferings. They are those that we ought properly to have borne. Therefore He took our pains on Himself (נשׂא comp Matth. viii. 17 ἔλαβεν; Lev. xvii. 16; xx. 17, 20, etc.), and bore our sufferings (Matth. viii. 17 ἐβάστασεν). When Matth. l. c. refers these words to the trouble that the Lord underwent in healing crowds of sick-folk of every sort, it is not thereby affirmed that only in that sense did He bear our sufferings and pains. For the evangelist certainly saw in the passion of the LORD the chiefest fulfilment of our prophecy, as well as did Christ Himself (Luke xxii. 37) and Philip (Acts viii. 28 sqq.) and Peter (1 Pet. ii. 22 sqq.). But we learn from that citation in Matth., that we are not to refer our passage exclusively to the passion of the LORD. In the second half of ver. 4, the Prophet by no means repeats merely the thoughts to which the first half was set in antithesis. He adds an essentially new ingredient. For while ver. 3 only says: "we esteemed Him as nothing," it is said in ver. 4: but we esteemed Him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted. In נָגוּעַ has been justly detected an allusion to the plague of leprosy, which in Hebrew is especially called נֶגַע (Lev. xiii. 3, 9, 20 sqq.; 2 Kings xv. 5). At the same time one involuntarily recalls Job, of whom his friends entertained the same opinion that the people of Israel express about the Servant of Jehovah (comp. ii. 9; iv. 7; viii. 3, etc.). The position of "God" between "smitten" and "afflicted" intimates that both are referred to God's doing. The Rabbins reproach Christians with proving from מכה אלהים that the Messiah is both a smitten one and God. To this L'Empereur (p. 7 of the work named above at vers. 2, 3) replies to Abrabanel and Alschech in defence of Christians, that they know very well how to distinguish between convenientia and regimen (i. e. st. absol. and st. constr.).——Wuensche calls attention to the fact, that the thought that the Servant of God took on Himself our guilt occurs no less than twelve times in one chapt.: viz., 1) "He bore our sickness," ver. 4 a; 2) "He carried our griefs," ver. 4 a; 3) "He was wounded for our transgressions," ver. 5 a; 4) "He was pierced for our iniquities," ver. 5 a; 5) "The chastisement of our peace was upon Him," ver. 5 b; 6) "By His stripes we were healed," ver. 5 b; 7) "Jehovah laid on Him the iniquity of us all," ver. 6 b; 8) "For the transgression of my people He was stricken," ver. 8 b; 9) "When thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin," ver. 10 a; 10) "And He will bear their iniquity," ver. 11 b; 11) "And was numbered with the transgressors," ver. 12 a; 12) "He bore the sins of many," ver. 12 b. From this appears what eminent importance the Prophet attaches to this thought, and how he cannot leave off extolling this wonderful display of the self-denying love of the Servant of God to men.

Ver. 5. The description of the Servant as pierced and crushed, plainly intimates that the Prophet thinks of Him as mortally hurt, which is, moreover, confirmed by "He was cut off," etc. (ver. 8), and by the mention of His burial (ver. 9), and awakening to life (ver. 10), and finally by the unmistakable "He hath poured out His soul unto death" (ver. 12).—מִפְּשָׁעֵנוּ מֵעֲוֺנֹתֵינוּ; as מִן does not=ὑπό, but is=ἀπό, our sins and iniquities are not the direct origin of His being pierced and crushed, but only the indirect cause of it (Del.).—As יָסַר or יִסֵּר is very often used in the sense of "to punish," and is used in particular of the punishments that God decrees against sin (comp. e. g., Lev. xxvi. 28; Ps. xxxix. 12; Jer. x. 24; xxx. 11), we must refer מוסר to the first half of the verse, and must regard this being pierced and crushed for the sake of sin as the punishment that rests on the Servant to the salvation of His people. For שָׁלוֹם stands here evidently on the one hand in antithesis to the wounds and stripes, on the other parallel with נִרְפָּא, so that the sense is salvum esse, salus, healing, salvation, corresponding to the fundamental meaning of the word. The second half of the verse, like the first, consists of two members that are parallel in meaning.

Ver. 6 explains how it comes, that the Servant of God, though innocent Himself, has yet to bear the guilt of men. "All we," says Israel, "like lost sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." No distinction is observable here between true and apostate Israelites. There is rather an expression of universal sinfulness. Or did the Servant of God appear only for the apostate? Did, perhaps, "the true worshippers of Jehovah" need no expiation for their sins? That would be a contradiction of the universal Biblical view, that Paul so emphatically utters with special appeal to Old Testament passages (Rom. iii. 9 sqq., comp. Ps. xiv. 3; liii. 4; Isa. lix. 2 sqq.). No, Israel so speaks in the name of all its members. And it seems to me, that Israel has not merely its Babylonian forsakenness in mind, but the total character of its moral status in all times. For it seems to me that the words, ver. 6 a, according to the whole context, are to be referred, not to the outward, but to the inward condition, the state of the heart. In fact it is of the sins of the people that the context speaks, which the Servant is to bear. Wherein these sins consist is stated ver 6 a, viz.. that the Israelites were all of them wandering sheep, that had forsaken their shepherd (comp. Num. xxvii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 17; 2 Chr. xviii. 16), and were going their own self-chosen way, that gratified the flesh. כלנו and the corresponding איש לדרכו the Prophet utters with the greatest emphasis. Sinners they all are, even the prophets and the pious. Does not Isa vi. 5 exclaim: "woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips"? Thus all of them may, in a certain sense, be more or less compared to sheep, that strayed away behind their shepherd (comp. Num. xiv. 43, etc.), an went their own way (lxv. 2; comp. xlii. 24 and lvi. 11, where the same words are used). Of course they were divided into misleaders and misled (comp. Jer. l. 6, 7; Ezek. xxxiv. 2 sqq.). In fact under some conditions the הִתְעָה is ascribed to the Lord Himself (lxiii. 17).

Israel, therefore, has sinned, and the Servant of God is punished. How does that hang together? Did the Servant, perhaps, accidentally come into the domain of the evil that should come on Israel for the punishment of its sins? By no means. God intentionally laid on the Servant the guilt of Israel. פָּגַע means undoubtedly, "to strike, to hit against one, impingere, obvenire," in a hostile as in a friendly sense. That is, of course, wonderful, that the sufferings that strike the Servant of God are such as properly ought to strike us, the wandering sheep, but which the hand of God diverts and suffers to fall on His head. If now the object of this procedure was not to make the just punishment strike the Servant for imputed guilt with the same inward necessity with which it would have struck the actually guilty, and, in fact, that these guilty ones under certain conditions might be free from punishment, then I see not how the Prophet could say: "Jehovah laid on Him the iniquity of us all."—By that it is surely not said that the Servant "let Himself experience the violent death [occasioned] through [men's] enmity against God," but that God laid on Him the guilt of us all. What an injustice! Who without the least fault will let himself be loaded with the burden of another's faults to his own ruin? Who does not at least protest against it with all his might by word and deed? The Servant of God does not protest. He is dumb. If the ideas נִגַּשׂ and נַעֲנֶה were meant to be regarded as of equal value and more rhetorical repetition, it must read נִגַּשׂ הוּא וְנַעֲנֶה. The placing of ו before הוא and the participle gives the clause the character of a conditional clause and simultaneously makes prominent the subject. נִגַּשׂ is "urgere," "premere." It is commonly used in respect to violent oppressors (comp. iii. 5 12; ix. 3 and the נֹגְשִׂים of the Israelites in Egypt, Exod. v. 6 sqq.). In respect to this "oppression" the Servant maintains a passive attitude. Yet there is also a certain activity on His part, i. e., so far as He willingly submits Himself. This is expressed by וְהוּא נַעֲנֶה. We can therefore translate: He was oppressed (the doing of another), while He (the doing of the Servant) willingly submitted Himself. Hence the Niph. נִגַּשׂ is a pure passive Niph., while נַעֲנֶה is reflexive. This willing submission is emphatically portrayed by a double figure. But because the silent suffering of the Servant (comp. 1 Pet. ii. 23) would be made prominent, that is twice said of Him which is an index of the patience of the sheep both in the slaughter and the shearing, viz., He did not open His mouth.—And indeed this phrase is put before as if it were a thesis, to be illustrated by examples, and then it follows at the close as designation of the general truth drawn from the special facts. שֶׂה, properly nomen unitatis as צֹאן, designates here a single, and that a male sheep, such as was prescribed for sacrifice (Exod. xii. 5, etc.). רָחֵל is the grown mother-sheep, as lambs were not shorn. The figure of the dumb sheep occurs again Jer. xi. 19 also Ps. xxxviii. 14, 15 (13, 14); xxxix. 10 (9)). In the New Testament several passages refer to the present one: Matth. xxvi. 63; xxvii. 14; Mark xiv. 61; xv. 5; John i. 29; Acts viii. 32.

3. THE EXALTATION OF THE SERVANT TO GLORY.

Chapter LIII. 8–12.

8 He was taken [1]from [a]prison and from judgment:
And who shall declare his generation?
For he was cut off out of the land of the living:
For the transgression of my people [2]was he stricken.
9 And [b]he made his grave with the wicked,
And with [c]the rich in his [3]death;
Because he had done no violence,
Neither was any deceit in his mouth.
10 Yet it pleased the Lord to [d]bruise him;
He hath put him to grief:
[4]When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,
He shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days,
And the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.
11 [e]He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied:
By his knowledge shall [f]my righteous servant justify many;
[g]For he shall bear their iniquities.
12 Therefore will I [h]divide him a portion with the great,
And he shall divide the spoil with the strong;
[i]Because he hath poured out his soul unto death:
And he was numbered with the transgressors;
And he bare the sin of many,
And [j]made intercession for the transgressors.

[1] Or, away by distress and judgment: but, etc. [2] Heb. was the stroke upon him. [3] Heb. deaths.
[4] Or, When his soul shall make an offering.

[a] oppression. [b] they. [c] a rich man, when he was dead.
[d] painfully break him to pieces. [e] After the tribulation of his soul he shall, etc.
[f] the righteous One, my Servant cause righteousness to many. [g] And.
[h] devide to him the many, And the strong will he divide as spoil.
[i] In lieu of his having. [j] makes.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8. יְשׂוֹחֵחַ Pil. only recurs again Ps. cxliii. 5. Usually construed with בְּ, the word is found as here joined with the accusative of the thing Ps. cxlv. 5; with the accusative of the person addressed, as it seems, Prov. vi. 22.——מִפֶּשַׁע, the מִן here is causal, as in ver. 5.——Since לָמוֹ, according to xliv. 15 (comp. Ewald, § 247 d), can certainly be used as singular, all the explanations are superfluous that would refer it to the people-of Israel and take נֶגַע in various senses as in apposition with the whole preceding clause, or with some single word of it. Hence we may follow the Masorets who separate מִפֶּשַׁע עַמִּי from what precedes, and connect it with נֶגַע לָמוֹ. Thus מִפֶּשַׁע עַמִּי is to be explained according to ver. 5, and נֶגַע according to נָגוּעַ ver. 4.

Ver. 9. There is not the least grammatical difficulty about translating וַיִּתֵּן with the indefinite subject "they" (comp. vi. 10; vii. 24; viii. 4; x. 4; xiv. 32; xviii. 5; xxi. 9; xxxiii. 20; xxxiv. 11; xlv. 24). All the explanations that would make the subject to be the people or God or the Servant Himself are forced and unnecessary. The greatest difficulty is in בְּמֹתָיו. All the ancient versions express the idea "death." LXX: καὶ δώσω . . . . τοὺς πλουσίους ἀντὶ τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ. Vulg.: et dabit impios pro sepultura et divitem pro morte sua, which Jerome and Theodoret, understand of giving over the Jews to the power of the Romans. Abenezra, first with a יֵשׁ אוֹמְרִים mentions the view, that במתיו here as בָּמוֹתֵימוֹ Deut. xxxiii. 29 is to be taken in the sense of aedificium super sepulcro erectum synonymous with קֶבֶר. Among moderns, Beck, Ewald and Boettcher (De inferis § 79 sqq.), have approved this view. It is doubtless the most satisfactory according to the context, and it seems almost demanded by the parallelism. But there are grammatical objections, for 1) the word must be pointed בָּמֹתָיו if it were derived from בָּמָה "the height;" 2) בָּמָה has nowhere the meaning "grave mound," although the Greek βωμός, which means altar and grave mound, offers an interesting parallel. As long as the Masoretic pointing cannot be proved false we must derive בכתיו from מָוֶת, though it may not give a satisfactory sense. The predicate וַיִּתֵּן and the object קִבְרוֹ we must regard as applying also to the second member of the clause: and they gave with the wicked his grave, and with a rich man. On the other hand the qualification of time also extends backwards to the first member of the clause. For it does not suit to take (ואת עָשִׁיר ב as an independent clause: "and He was with a rich man in His death," for then הָיָה or הוּא must follow עָשִׁיר, nor does it suit to refer במתיו only to אֶת עָשִׁיר, because a corresponding designation of time is wanting in the first member of the clause. במתיו would then answer to the בְּמוֹתוֹ 2 Chron. xxii. 38 which denotes "when He was dead," or to the בְּמֹתָם Lev. xi. 31, 32; Num. vi. 7. The plural מֵתִים, however, has an analogy in Ezek. xxviii. 10, where it is said: מוֹתֵי עֲרֵלִים תָּמוּת (comp. the like-meaning מְמוֹתֵי חָלָל ibid. ver. 8, and מְמוֹתֵי תַחֲלֻאִים Jer. xvi. 4). מוֹתִים is the state of death consisting of a number of particulars or degrees. Thus, as is well-known, the Hebrew is wont to designates relations of time and space. The plural מוֹתִים is therefore the same as in חַיִּים "life," נְעוּרִים "the time of youth," בְּחֻרִים "age of young men," זְקֻנִים "old age," סַנְוֵרִים "state of blindness."——עַל לֹא חָמָס, the rendering "spite of" is not grammatically supported. For all the passages that are cited in proof (xxxviii. 15; Job x. 7; xvi. 17; 1 Kings xvi. 7 comp. Ewald § 217 i; 222 b), on closer examination demand the meaning "because, on account of."

Ver. 10. The construction חָפֵץ הֶחֱלִי, not taking החלי as equivalent to or miswritten for הֶחֱלִי, could not in itself seem strange. For it is no uncommon thing in Hebrew for a verb depending on another verb as object, instead of being subordinated in the infinitive, to be co-ordinated in the same verbal form. Comp. הוֹאִיל בֵּאֵר coepit inscripsit instead of coepit inscribere (Deut. i. 5), אוֹסִף אֲבַקְשֶׁנּוּ pergam quaeram instead of pergam quaerere (Prov. xxiii. 35); comp. Lam. iii. 3; Hos. v. 11; Isa. lii. 1; Jer. xlix. 19; Zeph. iii. 7; Lam. iv. 14.——But there occurs here the modification that between the dependent and the governing verb there is inserted an infinitive, that on the one hand seems to make that co-ordinate verb superfluous, on the other contains what the other wants, viz.: the designation of the object, i. e., the suffix. We will accordingly have to take דכאו החלי together, so that both words complete one another. The Hiph. החלי as causative conjugation has דכאו for its object, by which the latter is defined in respect to manner. From חָלָה may be assumed a secondary form חָלָא after תַּחֲלֻאִים Jer. xvi. 4; from this would be the Hiph. הֶחֱלִיא, and by rejecting the א, הֶחֱלִי like the form הֶחֱטִי 2 Kings xiii. 6. (Green, § 164, 1). The meaning of חָלָה is doluit, dolorem sensit. The Hiph. will accordingly mean "to give a painful sensation, make painful." Thus we read Mic. vi. 13: הֶחֱלֵיתִי הַכּוֹתֶךָ "I make painful the beating thee;" Hos. vii. 5; הֶחֱלוּ שָׂרִים חֲמַת מִיָּיִן "the princes make painful heating from wine," i. e., they bring about painful heating from indulgence in wine. So we may here render הֶחֱלִי דכאו; He made painful the crushing Him, i. e., He crushed, beat Him in a painful way. ——אִם־תָּשִׂים is quando posueris. There can be no doubt about the imperf. having the meaning of the fut. exacti (Amos vi. 9; Job viii. 18; xxii. 13). As regards the meaning of אָשָׁם, it is certain that it means "guilt offering" (comp. Umbreit, Die Suende, Beitrag zur Theol. d. A. T., 1853, p. 54 sq.). But one must not urge a sharp distinction between it and חַטָּאת. We read immediately after חֵטְא־רַבִּים נָשָׂא, etc., certainly the Prophet does not speak here according to the rules of the theory of sacrifices. I think that the effort to accumulate the s sound, and to gain a likeness of sound with תשים was not without its influence in the choice of the words in the little clause אם־תשים אשם נפשו. שִׂים is used in connection with offering a sacrifice Ezek. xx. 28. Comp. the New Testament phrase τιθέναι τὴν ψυχήν Jno. x. 12, 15, 17, 18; xiii. 37, 38; xv. 13; 1 Jno. iii. 16.

Ver. 11. מעמל (see List), the מִן I would not construe as causal with Delitzsch, for not the labor He endured, but the inmost being of the Servant is the ground of His exaltation (comp. Acts ii. 24). One will have to take מִן either temporally (= statim post comp. xxiv. 22; Ps. lxxiii. 20 and מִקֵּץ, e. g., Gen. xli. 1), or locally = to take out of the tribulation. יִרְאֶה specially favors the latter construction.——יִרְאֶה יִשְׂבָּע is an instance of the same construction as that of חפץ החלי explained at ver. 10 above. It is analogous to רָאִיתִי אוּר xliv. 16.

Ver. 12. For the expression אחלק לו ברבים there is only one parallel in the Old Testament, viz.: Job xxxix. 17, where it is said of the ostrich: לֹא חָלַק לָהּ בַּבִּינָה "God gave it not a share in understanding." In this, בינה is conceived of as a territory to be distributed in which God assigned not the ostrich a חֵלֶק, a portion. Accordingly here, too, רבים must be regarded as a region that God divides out: I will assign Him a חֵלֶק on or in the region that consists in רבים. But then the Servant would only be a partaker along with many equals. His whole reward would consist in His not being excluded from the partition. We must notice that in Job the Kal is used, while we have here the Piel. The later can have a causative meaning — make חֵלֶק, "make, give a share," and the prefix בְּ can refer to this substantive idea חֵלֶק and introduce just that wherein the חֵלֶק consists. As is well-known בְּ is often used in making specifications (Gen. vii. 21; ix. 2, 10, etc., comp. Isa. vii. 4; xx. 22).——Against the explanation of אֶת־עֲצוּמִים (see Exeg. and Crit.), the grammatical objection may be raised perhaps, that the nota acc., as a rule stands only before the definite noun. But, on the other hand it is to be remembered that the definite article is often wanting, where the word as a general designation is already rendered definite by the sense (comp. l. 4; Exod. xxi. 28; Prov. xiii. 21; Job xiii. 25). ——הערה is Hiph., from עָרָה (see List). The meaning of the Hiph., as of the Piel is "evacuare, effundere, to empty, to pour out, flow out." The word is used again of the soul Ps. cxli. 8.——נִמְנָה is taken by many here as Niph. tolerativum = He let Himself be numbered, although elsewhere this Niph. is used as simple Passive, Gen. xiii. 16; 2 Chron. v. 6; Eccl. i. 15.——והוא is, as to form, a departure from the dependence on תַּחַת, though as to substance the clauses והוא נשׂא and יפגיע are just as much causal as both those that precede them. The Hebrew shuns long chains of subordinated clauses; it prefers parataxis to syntaxis (comp. EWALD, § 339 a).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. With ver. 8 comes a transition. The Prophet perceives that the Servant of God will be released from the distress, and that from then onward His continuance will be endless. These words stand first like a theme. But the Servant will not go on living on the earth among men that live there, for, on account of the sin of the people He is taken away out of the land of the living (ver. 8). They have buried Him, too, but honorably, because He never used violence nor deceit (ver. 9), and His destruction was only in consequence of the divine decree. When, now, the LORD will have made a sin-offering of the soul of His Servant, the latter will prove to be the head of a new generation, He will continue to live forever, and Jehovah's counsel will be accomplished by Him (ver. 10). After tribulation and necessity He will find His satisfaction; by His insight He will help many to righteousness and He will carry their guilt (ver. 11). Therefore Jehovah will assign to Him the great multitude, and He will divide the strong as spoil—all this as reward for having given His life to death, having been reckoned among transgressors, having borne the sins of many, and continually praying for transgressors.

2. He was taken——prosper in his hand. Vers. 8–10. Having set forth, in what precedes, what and how the Servant will suffer, we are now told what kind of a turning of the scale shall happen after the suffering is accomplished. עֹצֶר, found again only Ps. cvii. 39; Prov. xxx. 16, is undoubtedly "coarctatio, restraint, oppression". Having a general meaning, the word can also mean imprisonment, but it does not mean exclusively confinement. מִשְׁפָּט conjoined with עֹצֶר, can only mean judicial procedure. We may even take the two words as a sort of hendiadys. For "oppression and judgment" is just an oppressive, violent, unjust judicial procedure, "unrighteous administration of justice", as DELITZSCH says. I cannot see why לֻקָּח should not mean "He is taken away". It means the same as in xlix. 24 (25). As there it is asked: can the prey be taken away from the strong? so here it is said that the Servant shall be taken away from the power of unrighteous oppression. This is one, the negative side of the transition. The positive side is stated in the words: and his generation who will think and declare? Every thing here depends on recognizing the theme-like character of the first part of ver. 8. Then the mention of his living on will not appear to be a "premature" thought. דור is manifestly, as to sense, an allusion to the theocratic promise, Exod. xx. 5, 6; Deut. v. 9, 10, and in respect to the sound an allusion to Deut. vii. 9 ("which keepeth covenant and mercy——to a thousand generations"). Whatever may be the fundamental meaning of דור, it any way means the γενεά, the generation, and that in various senses. From a temporal point of view, the members of the great chain to which one may compare the human race, or nation, are called דור with reference to the generations that succeed one another. Hence both past (comp. lviii. 12; lxi. 4) and future (comp. Exod. iii. 17; xxiii. 14, 31, 41, etc.) generations are called דורות. Thus there is mention of coming and going generations (Eccl. i. 4), of "another generation" (Ps. cxix. 13), of a first, second, third, etc., generation (Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 9). Hence דור can mean also the present generation, contemporaries (Num. xxxii. 13, etc.). But because every such generation has a character common to it good or bad, the word acquires also an ethical meaning, and designates a generation as a whole of this or that kind. Hence the meaning, "kind, race" (Jer. ii. 31, etc.). But because a generation is always the product of another, or also of a head of a race, it involves necessarily the idea of descent, posterity. Hence to the people of Israel may be said "your generations", i. e., your coming posterity (Lev. xxiii. 23), or: "to you and your posterity" (לכם או לדרתיכם, Num. ix. 10). But the total of the generations of posterity can be comprehended as a whole, and this whole be called דור. Comp. Ps. xxii. 31, where דור in this sense stands between זֶרַע and עַם נוֹלָד; Ps. lxxi. 18. And such is the meaning of the word here (LXX.

γενεὰ αὐτοῦ, VULG. generatio ejus). "His generation" are those descended from him conceived as a unit. This is the meaning of דוֹר in ver. 10. Therefore the words: "he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days" is not empty repetition, but explication of the particular intimated in the theme of the discourse. According to the most ancient Old Testament representations, as found in the Pentateuch, there is no continued living in the world beyond. Hence, excepting long life on earth, posterity is for each person the highest wish and happiness. Without posterity, to die is the same as to be condemned. Numerous, measureless posterity means the same as everlasting life. Hence the lawgiver threatens those that transgress Jehovah's commandments with visitation on children in the third and fourth degree, thus extinction in the third or fourth generation. On the contrary he promises those that keep the commandments, that the LORD will be gracious to them to a thousand generations (Exod. xx. 5, 6). The Prophet's thought here connects with this representation, and hence he uses דוֹר, and not זֶרַע. To him whom men thought to exterminate, the LORD promises דוֹר, posterity, a race that shall descend from him, but of a peculiar kind, as appears from what follows ("for he is taken away," etc.). Who is able to think out and declare the manner of this race?—For the ideas "to think and to declare" both lie in שִׂיחַ. It is a poetic word, belonging to higher and choice style, that is used partly of meditative contemplation (Ps. lv. 18; lxxvii. 4, 7, 13; cxix. 15, 23, 27, 48, etc.), partly of uttering the thoughts (Ps. lxix. 13, comp. Prov. vi. 22).

When a man is dead he is past begetting posterity. But it is otherwise with this wonderful Servant of God. Hence the nature of His posterity is so inexplicable, because He will have it after He is cut off from the land of the living. נָזַר (see List) is "to cut," "to hew," both "to cut through" (1 Kings iii. 25 sq.; 2 Kings vi. 2), and "to cut off," "to sunder" (2 Chr. xxvi. 21), always, however, with the secondary idea of cutting off sharp or smooth. "Land of the living" is the earth, the dwelling-place of men in the flesh (Deut. xii. 1; xxxi. 13; 1 Kings viii. 40), and stands in antithesis to Sheol, the dwelling of the departed, the shades (comp. Job xxviii. 13; Ps. xxvii. 13; Jer. xi. 19; Ezek. xxvi. 20; xxxii. 23 sqq.). Why He was so clean cut off from the land of the living the Prophet states in words that recall vers. 4, 5. We have already remarked that the Prophet surprisingly often and certainly on purpose repeats the thought that the Servant must die for the sin of His people. On account of the sin of my people is a plague to Him. It must be remembered that נֶגַע (used especially Lev. xiii., xiv. of the "plague of leprosy") beside the meaning of divine punitive judgment, includes that of leprosy.—The Prophet also gives intimation concerning the burial of the Servant. But it is obscure. One gets the impression as if the persons that attended the last stage of the Servant's earthly history were confused in the Prophet's view. We cannot be surprised if the Prophet sees forms and scenes whose nature and meaning he does not himself understand. But still his delineation always appears correct to those who are able to test it by the fulfilment. Here we might say that he saw the wicked, in whose company the Servant of God died, so near together with the rich man in whose grave he was laid, that he construes the relation of all these persons as fellowship with reference to the burial. Yet we do not know where the two malefactors were buried with whom the LORD was crucified. For that they were buried we may definitely conclude from JNO. xix. 31, and from what JOSEPHUS says of the care of the Jews for the burial even of those who were capitally punished ("so as also . . . to take down and bury those crucified before the setting of the sun," Bell. jud. iv. 5, 2). But if they were buried near the place of execution, then their grave was near to that of the LORD, and thus in general the Prophet's representation appears correct. אֵת undoubtedly means "with" also in a local sense (comp. Gen. xix. 33; Lev. xix. 13; Job ii. 13; Judg. iv. 11; 1 Kings ix. 26). He is buried with a rich man that lies in the rich man's grave, as much as He is buried with the wicked, who has His grave near theirs. F. PHILIPPI, whom DELITZSCH quotes, has justly remarked that the honorable burial with a rich man makes "the beginning of the glorifying (of the Servant) that begins with His death." He receives such a burial after severe suffering and a shameful death, because (see Text. and Gram.) He used no violence nor was guile in His mouth. Similar language is found Job xvi. 17. חמס and מרמה are found conjoined as here, Zeph. i. 9. "But Jehovah was pleased to smite Him painfully" does not begin a new thought, but connects closely with what precedes, and forms a conclusion. "When thou shalt have made His soul," begins a new chain of thought: the Servant is buried with a rich man because He had done no wrong, but only Jehovah had decreed to crush Him. The honor put upon the Servant therefore had its ground 1) in that He had done nothing bad, 2) in that His suffering was only in consequence of a divine decree. Guilt and punishment were in themselves something quite foreign to the sinless One; independent of that a divine decree would impose on Him the crushing load of sickness, of pain.

What is subject in the words אם תשים אשם נפשו? As the suffix in נפשו can only relate to the Servant, He cannot be the subject, but only either "soul" or Jehovah. To take the people as subject (HOFMANN) is forced and without ground in the context, though I cannot urge against the view that the people are here the speakers. For they cease to speak, ver. 6. From vers. 7–10 the Prophet speaks. If "soul" be taken for subject (as by most expositors: MAURER, UMBREIT, STIER, HENGSTENBERG, V. F. OEHLER, EBRARD, DELITZSCH, etc.), several objections appear. First of all it is an unusual mode of expression to say the soul has brought a sin-offering. If that points to an antithesis in Himself, one cannot understand why just the soul should be elevated into antithesis to spirit or body. But if "His soul" is as much as to say, "He Himself as contrasted with others," still it must be said what He offered in sacrifice. For if He brought any sort of offering that another also could bring, then that is nothing that deserves to be made prominent. But if it would be intimated that He sacrificed what others could not, viz.,

Himself, then that needs to be expressly said. Many, indeed, (STIER, HAHN, etc.), suppose that this idea is contained in the words themselves; for if the Servant, in so far as He is a living soul, makes a sacrifice, then He gives just Himself as a living soul away unto death. But that is by no means a necessary consequence. For then תשים אשם נפשו would only be another way of writing ישים אשם. But would these words imply that He offered Himself? V. F. OEHLER urges this very tellingly against HENGSTENBERG, STIER, HAHN, but overlooks the fact that he condemns his own view. For he gets the "soul" as subject from the context, while the others would take it from the words themselves. But that just the chief thing remains unsaid, is against his view as it is against theirs. Or is שים the same as "to set one's self," as KNOBEL would have, appealing to Ezek. xxiii. 24; 1 Sam. xv. 2; 1 Kings xx. 12? But in the places cited שים is used causatively= "to make a station, take a station." And this causative use requires that an object beside that which is inherent be not named. How would one combine אשם with that inherent object? In short, if נפשו is subject, then it is not said what the Servant brings as a sin-offering, and one cannot understand why the Prophet did not write simply ישים.—I believe (with HOFMANN and DELITZSCH in their earlier editions, and with HITZIG, but in another sense than his) that Jehovah is subject. The abrupt change of person need give no surprise. We have already had many examples of how common this is to the language in general, and to Isaiah in particular. Comp. ii. 6; xiv. 30; xxxiii. 2, 6; xli. 1; xlii. 20; xlv. 8, 21; lii. 14. Already in ver. 6, "Jehovah laid on Him the iniquity of us all," says that Jehovah gave up His Servant that He might take on Himself the guilt and punishment of the sinful people. Essentially the same is said in the words "He was pleased to smite Him painfully." For that this means here a smiting to death and not mere sickness as some would have it, is as certain as that the cause of this death was the sin of the people (ver. 8 מפשע עמי). But, it is replied, the expiation is offered to God, he does not perform it himself. That is true. But for this reason it is still possible that God may provide the beast of sacrifice, as in the case of Abraham, Gen. xxii. 8, 13. The Prophet, indeed, did not know how that could happen. But we, who see the prophecy in the light of its fulfilment, do know (Jno. iii. 16; 2 Cor. v. 21). According to this exposition we can understand why the Prophet did not avoid the abrupt change of person. Had he written ישים instead of תשים, undoubtedly the Servant would have been taken for subject of the clause. Just that He would avoid, and therefore speaks of Jehovah in the second person in spite of His being before and afterwards spoken of in the third person.——But death shall not swallow up the Servant of God. He shall be taken from "oppression and judgment" (ver. 8), and become the progenitor of a new race. For here the Prophet connects back with the thought of ver. 8, that was put first as the theme. Here, too, we learn what we are to understand by דור of ver. 8. Seed, posterity shall the Servant see.—There underlies the expression, and also the following: He shall prolong His days, primarily the Old Testament representation of life, viz., that the life-necessity of the pious is satisfied by a long life on earth (comp. "that thy days may be long" Exod. xx. 12; Deut. iv. 40; xxii. 7, etc.) and numerous posterity. But he that has these lives to see children's children (Gen. l. 23; Job xlii. 16; Ps. cxxviii. 6). Yet, though the Prophet's thought has this connection, it is in the nature of the Servant of God that the Old Testament letter must in Him be fulfilled in a higher sense. His posterity comes not by fleshly generation, but by a life-communication of another sort. How this will be the Prophet does not say. But we can perceive from מי ישוחח "who will think and declare," ver. 8, that he treats here of a life, and answering to it also, of a communication of life of a high and wonderful kind. But the Servant of God will do more than merely live and communicate life. He will also work and create. What was pleasing to God (חֵפֶץ comp. xliv. 28; xlvi. 10), His counsel and will, shall find its realization by the hand of the Servant (comp. liv. 17; xlviii. 15; lv. 11).

3. He shall see —— transgressors, vers. 11, 12. In lii. 13–15 God was the speaker; liii. 1–6, the people of Israel speak; 7–10 the Prophet speaks. The concluding word is put again into the mouth of God Himself. Also in their contents vers. 11, 12, have a great resemblance to lii. 13–15 as we shall see. Only in lii. 13 and in liii. 11 is He that is the subject of the whole prophecy named by His honorable title, and both times the form is my Servant. This my expresses high honor. Not men, but God Himself, with His own mouth, applies to the Servant this honorable title here at the culmination of this prophecy relating to Him.—Ver. 11 connects with what precedes, and continues the description of the ascent from lowliness to highness. The tribulation was night, in which one saw nothing (comp. l. 10). The seeing shows that it grows light (see Text. and Gram. on מעמל). It is possible that the Prophet combines both constructions [the temporal and the local meaning of מן, viz. "after and away from out of the tribulation of His soul He shall see"], which we are not able to reproduce in our language. Is בדעתו cognitio sui or cognitio sua? I believe with most expositors that the former is meant. For the latter only Mal. ii. 7 can be quoted; and there it is doubtful whether we ought to render conservant or custodiunt cognitionem. As the lips are not the seat of knowledge, the latter is more probable, and then the sense would be: the mouth of the priest must reprove those that depart from right knowledge. But then דעת is not doctrine, but knowledge. And so also in our text the assured meaning "cognitio," therefore in the passive sense "cognitio sui" is to be preferred. Without knowledge, indeed, there is also no faith (Rom. x. 14).—צַדִּיק is "as a righteous man." הצדיק is causative Hiph.: "to prepare righteousness;" hence the construction with לְ. As the one that has the righteousness, He can be the means of others obtaining it. Here, also, the Prophet can hardly have understood the deep import of his words. For we cannot assume that he had a clear knowledge that the "righteousness that avails with God" would be alone in the possession of Him who acquired it by His blood (Rom. iii. 21-26).—לָרַבִּים, "to many," answers to the New Testament τοῖς πολλοῖς (e. g. Matth. xx. 28; comp. 1 Tim. ii. 4; Rom. v. 18, where for οἱ πολλοὶ is simply πάντες). It expresses the majority, the great mass, compared with which single exceptions vanish, and in so far it is almost the same as "totality." עֲוֹנֹתָם יִסְבֹּל, He will bear their iniquities, cannot relate to that "bearing" that consists in sufferings in the place of others (ver. 4). For we are here in the condition of glory. Hence "to bear" here can only relate to that priestly bearing that the Mediator accomplishes by the ever-continued presentation of His merit before God (Heb. vii. 25). It is identical with "He will make intercession for the transgressor," ver. 12.

Ver. 12. לָכֵן introduces a concluding inference from what precedes. But what was previously represented (lii. 14, 15; liii. 8, 10, 11) as a suitable transition from bad to good appears now directly as a reward, and the situation of ver. 12, into which the Servant is translated as a reward for His suffering, appears as that of a ruler. For a great territory and glorious spoil are given Him. The first clause may be rendered: Therefore I will assign Him a part that shall consist of the many (see Text. and Gram.). Therefore the many themselves (taking the word in the same sense as in ver. 11), or the totality, shall make the region, in the assignment of which shall consist the Servant's reward. The rendering: "I give Him a part among the great," is not at all exactly conformed to the passage in Job. In Job בְּ marks the region on which or of which a share is given; but this explanation takes בְּ as marking the fellowship that the Servant is to share. If it be urged against our explanation that He that gets the whole cannot be said to get a part, it may be replied, that, in antithesis to the single parts, the whole, i. e. the highest power over all single parts, can be assigned to one. It is a result of this highest power when He that is entrusted with it on His part takes in hand the distribution of the individual parts of the spoil to His subjects. This is the meaning of the following words, which speak no more of a share that the Servant receives, but of the shares He distributes. This second clause ואת־עֲצוּמִים וגו׳ has a parallel in Prov. xvi. 19: "Better is it to be of an humble spirit with the lowly than to divide the spoil with the proud" (מֵחַלֵּק שָׁלָל אֶת־גֵּאִים). According to that we should translate here: "and with strong men will He divide spoil." But against this are to be urged the same considerations that we urge above (see Text. and Gram.) concerning the first clause. Who equals the Servant of God in merit? Whose reward shall equal His? Who are the strong that, as His peers, may divide the spoil with Him? It is true that אֶת־עֲצוּמִים can mean: with the strong, and that in the sole parallel passage אֵת does mean "with." But must it mean "with?" And that too when "with" gives an unsuitable meaning, and the sign of the accusative, on the contrary, a very suitable one? And the latter is the case when we remember that there is also living and human spoil (comp. Judg. v. 30; Zech. ii. 12, 13). Prisoners may be used as slaves or sold. So here it can be said that the Servant of Jehovah will make booty of the strong, and distribute them among His own. But then "the strong" must be understood not only as belonging to the corporeal sphere, but also to the spiritual. The choice of expressions in these clauses (רבים and עצומים and חלק) are intended to recall the passages in the Pentateuch that promise to the Israelites victory over the "many and mighty nations" that inhabited Palestine before them (comp. Deut. iv. 38; vii. 1, 17; ix. 7; xi. 23; Josh. xxiii. 9). [The Author's defence of his construction of the first two clauses of ver. 12 is enough to make one sensible of its difficulty, and prepare one to agree with J. A. ALEX., when, after noticing the construction as presented by others, he says: "It is better, therefore, to adopt the usual construction, sanctioned by CALVIN, GESENIUS and EWALD, which supposes Him (the Servant) to be described as equal to the greatest conquerors. If this is not enough, or if the sense is frigid, as MARTINI alleges, it is not the fault of the interpreter, who has no right to strengthen the expressions of his author by means of forced constructions. The simple meaning of the first clause is that He shall be triumphant; not that others shall be sharers of His victory, but that He shall be as gloriously successful in His enterprise as other victors ever were in theirs."—TR.]

תַּחַת וגו ["in lieu of this that," etc.] reaches back to what in ver. 11 has already served as a premise for the conclusion "therefore," etc., with which ver. 12 begins. So that there is a succession of links here also (comp. on vers. 4, 5). The Prophet would manifestly recapitulate by the words that follow what is of chief moment in the meritorious, representative suffering; a fresh proof of the high importance he attaches to this suffering. That the Servant was numbered with transgressors has not before been mentioned, although it is implied in the statements of vers 5-8, and especially in "they made His grave with the wicked," ver. 9. Comp. Mar. xv. 18; Luke xxii. 37.—He bore the sin of many stands related to "He bore our sickness," ver. 4, and the kindred expressions that follow, as the root to the fruits. One is reminded here of 2 Cor. v. 21, and still more, even to the sound of the words, of Heb. ix. 28. In the last clause הפגיע, Hiph., has the same sense of "to pray, to intercede," that we had to maintain for the Kal in xlvii. 3 (comp. lix. 16). As in ver. 11, the enumeration of what the Servant will do as priest after His exaltation stops with "He will bear their iniquities," so here the enumeration of what He did as a priest in His humiliation concludes with the mention of His work of intercession. But it is to be noted that it is not said הִפְגִּיעַ, but יַפְגִּיעַ. The reason for this seems to be that the Prophet understands the intercession in the same sense as at the end of ver. 11. He means the lasting intercession that the Mediator makes for us on the ground of His sacrificial death. This had indeed begun already in His state of humiliation; the very ones that put Him to death were the first for whom He prayed while dying (Luke xxiii. 34). But since then He intercedes forever for us all. That He can do this is the abiding fruit of His once dying on the cross. Hence the Prophet concludes his enumeration with the imperfect.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lii. 13—liii. 12. "This chapter, that has already silenced so many scoffers, and led so many honest doubters to believe, when they compared the prophecy with the fulfilment, and when the wonderful agreement with the history of the suffering, death and resurrection of our Redeemer shone upon them so glorious and clear—this master-piece from the armory of God, whose power unbelieving Israel even at this day fears so much that it has gone on omitting it from its yearly selections from the prophets for the weeks, but in doing so has given powerful testimony against itself and for the truth of the gospel—this chapter is a precious jewel of our Bible." AXENFELD, Der Proph. Jes., A Lecture, 1870, p. 60 sq.

2. On lii. 13. In the Midrasch Tanchuma, Fol. 53, c. 3, 1, 7 it reads: זֶה מֶלֶךְ הַמָּשִׁיחַ וְיָרוּם כִּן אַבְרָהָם וְנִשָּׂא מִמֹּשֶׁה וְגָבַהּ כִּן מַלְאֲכֵי הַשָּׁרֵת, i. e., this is the King Messiah, He will be higher than Abraham, and raise Himself up more than Moses and be exalted above the angels of the ministry. On this WUENSCHE l. c. remarks p. 42: "This passage is additionally important from the fact that it teaches the doctrine of the sublimity of the Messiah, so strongly opposed by the later Jews. He rises above all created being; even the angels of the ministry may not be compared with Him in respect to their dignity and rank."

3. On lii. 14. It is remarkable that the church in the times of persecution before Constantine, conceived of the bodily form of the Lord as ugly: (CLEM. ALEX. Paedag. III. 1. τόν κύριον αὐτὸν τὴν ὄψιν αἰσχρὸν γεγονέναι διὰ 'Ησαΐου τὸ πνεῦμα μαρτυρεῖ. ORIGEN, C. Cels. VI.: ὁμολογουμένως γέγραπται περὶ τοῦ δυσειδὲς γεγονέναι τοῦ 'Ιησοῦ σῶμα); the secularized church of the Middle Age conceived of Him as a form of ideal beauty (comp. the description of the form of Jesus in NICEPHORUS CALLISTI L. II. c. 7, and in the letter of the PSEUDO-LENTULUS, comp. HERZ. R. Enc. VIII. p. 292 sqq., DELITZSCH Jesus and Hillel, 1865, p. 4); the church of the Reformation took a middle course: "It is quite possible that some may have been as beautiful in body as Christ. Perhaps some have even been more beautiful than Christ. For we do not read that the Jews wondered at the beauty of the Lord." LUTHER.

4. On liii. 4, 5. "JUSTIN MARTYR (Apol. I. c. 54) sees in Asklepios, the physician that healed all diseases, a type of Christ parallel to that of the Servant who bears our sickness." EDWARD MUELLER, "Parallels to the Messianic prophecies and types of the Old Testament from Greek antiquity" (Jahrbb. f. Klass. Philol. v. FLECKEISEN VIII. Supplem.-Bd. 1 Hft. p. 5).

5. On liii. 4-6. The peculiarity of V. HOFMANN'S doctrine of the atonement seems to me to have its root in this, that he distinguishes a twofold wrath of God against sinful humanity, viz., "how God is angry with sinful humanity that is destined to be brought back again into love-fellowship with Him, and how He is angry with those who refuse obedience to His work of salvation." (Schutzschriften für eine neue Weise die alte Wahrheit zu Lehren III. Stück, Noerdlingen, 1859, p. 13 sq.). "In both instances His anger is an enmity of the holy Living (One) against sin that delivers the sinner to death. But in the one case it delivers him to death in order to redeem him out of it, in the other case that he may remain in it. Had God not intended to save mankind, then the death to which He delivered those first created would have been complete and enduring." There appears to me to be a contradiction in this. For first it is said, that had God not intended to redeem mankind, then the first pair had been delivered to complete and enduring death. And then it is said, that the wrath of God does so deliver the one that is disobedient to His work of salvation over to death that he abides in it. Thus eternal death appears at one moment as punishment for sin in itself, and at another as punishment for rejecting the work of salvation. That God did not deliver over to complete and enduring death the first pair and their descendants was then merely because He had formed the purpose to redeem mankind. Therefore one would still think that what the Redeemer suffered made it possible for the divine righteousness to remit to men the complete and abiding death. Consequently, one might still think that Christ, by His death had given the divine righteousness an equivalent for the "complete and abiding death" of mankind. But, according to HOFMANN, such is not the case. For he asserts that the wrath of God delivers to abiding death only those that refuse obedience to His work of salvation. For this reason Christ did not bear the torments of damnation. Indeed for this reason a redemption from eternal death is neither possible nor necessary. For those that do not accept the work of salvation cannot be redeemed from eternal death at all, while those that do accept need not to be redeemed, because eternal death belongs in fact only to those that do not accept the work of salvation. There we have I think a circulus vitiosus. In view of the redemption, the first pair and their descendants are not punished with the eternal death that their sin in itself deserves, but only with corporeal death. But the Redeemer does not die in order to redeem men from eternal death, for the latter is suddenly only the consequence of unbelief in the work of salvation. But the Redeemer dies to redeem men from that punishment which was laid on them as a mitigated sort in view of the redemption. For Christ was only subjected to that anger with which God was angry at those who were destined to a re-entrance into His fellowship of love, not to that "which abides on those who are disobedient to the grace of God," l. c. p. 14. Consequently one would think Christ only redeemed us from bodily death. And yet from that we are not redeemed. Hofmann says, indeed: "we do not abide in it" (p. 51). It is true, the redeemed do not abide in it. But that is only for the reason that they are also redeemed from eternal death. For were the latter not the case, then the bodily death would only be a transit to what is worse, i. e., to eternal death. Therefore eternal death is the punishment, not only of not believing inredemption, but of sin in general. But Christ redeemed us from sin and its punishment generally, and not merely from what remained of the punishment that, with reference to the redemption, was from the first remitted to us.

6. On liii. 4. "Hic est articulus justificationis, credere Christum pro nobis passum, sicut Paulus quoque dicit: Christus est factus maledictum pro nobis. Neque enim satis est, nosse, quod Christus sit passus, sed, sicut hic dicit, credendum etiam est, quod nostros languores tulerit, quod non pro se, neque pro suis peccatis sit passus, sed pro nobis; quod illos morbos tulerit, illos dolores in se receperit, quos nos oportuit pati. Atque hunc locum qui recte tenet, ille summam Christianismi tenet. Ex hoc enim loco Paulus tot epistolas, tot sententiarum et consolationum flumina hausit."—"Christianus quasi in alio mundo collocatus neque peccata neque merita aliqua nosse debet. Quodsi peccata se habere sentit, adspiciat ea, non qualia sint in sua persona, sed qualia sint in illa persona, in quam a Deo sunt conjecta, hoc est videat, qualia sint non in se nec in conscientia sua, sed in Christo, in qao expiata et devicta sunt. Sic fiet, ut habeat purum ac mundum cor ab omni peccato per fidem, quae credit, peccata sua in Christo victa et prostrata esse." Luther.

7. On liii. 4. "We have many wrath and fire mirrors of the just God, how He thunders and lightens on account of sin; such as the flood, Gen. vii.; Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen. xix.; Pharaoh and all his, Exod. xiv. But what are all those to this, that God so dreadfully racked and smote His only begotten Son, the highest and infinite good, that a stone in the ground might have lamented, and even the hard rocks did rend asunder on account of it at the time of His suffering?" Cramer.

8. On liii. 5. "O mirabile genus medicinae, ubi medicus aegrotat, ut aegrotis sanitatem efferat."—"Medico occiso sanati sumus. Quis unquam audivit talia?"—"Tota vita Christi crux fuit et martyrium, et tu quaeris gaudium?"—Omni diligentia atque vigilantia caveamus, ne vulneret diabolus quod sanavit Christus." Augustin. "Est jucundissima consolatio: livores ipsius sunt nostrum emplastrum. Atqui nos meriti eramus livores et ipsi debebatur sanitas. Si quis ergo sanitatem optat, ille non suam castigationem et crucem consideret, sed tantum respiciat in Christum et credat, tum sanabitur, hoc est, habebit justitiam eternam." Luther.

9. On liii. 6. Sin isolates men, because its principle is egoism. Every one accordingly makes himself a centre, around which all must revolve. But by this we lose the true, all-controlling, right guiding centre, and are as stars that are become excentric, that must finally dash to pieces on one another.—"Redimit pretiose, pascit laute, ducit sollicite, collocat securi." Bernhard of Clairvaux.

10. On liii. 6. God laid on Him the sin of us all. That is the great enigma of the Christian doctrine of atonement. It is the point that for so many is a stone of stumbling, since it appears as if God outwardly and arbitrarily transfers the guilt of men to One, who, Himself innocent, has no inward, real relation whatever to the guilt of another. And this is verily one of the mysteries of Christian doctrine. The Lord says: "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit," John xii. 24. And Paul says: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into His death?" And in the same connection he says: "Knowing this that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed [justified: Marg.] from sin," Rom. vi. 3, 6, 7. It is true, Christ stood alone in death, and though he had the imputed sin, the organic connection of our sin with Him was wanting. But in the sequel He suddenly stands as the centre of a great complex of fruit. By baptism we are all baptized into Him, and in fact such as we are by nature, with our old Adam and all its sins. Yet now Paul says that our old man is crucified with Christ in baptism. Therefore he assumes that we men are in the sequel transposed into the communion of the death of Christ, and that our justification rests on the fact that we have actually died with Christ. Still it will be said that this itself is an enigma; that one can as little solve one riddle by another, as cast out one devil by another. But perhaps the new enigma still shows where we must direct our inquiring thoughts in order at last to find the solution.

11. On liii. 8. "Innocent Lamb of God, yea, Thou shalt have seed; as long as the sun continues Thy name shall extend to posterity (Ps. lxxii. 17). Out of anguish and out of the judgment hast Thou come, and who will declare to the end the extent of Thy life? 'The lion that is of the tribe of Judah, the root of David has overcome, to open the book and to break its seven seals.' Now they sing to Thee a new song, and Thine whom Thou hast bought with Thy blood say eternally: 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature (says the seer) which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.'" 16. On liii. 11. (צַדִּיק). "PLATO *De rep. And as LUTHER says: 'Therefore Christ says, also; Good people do not brush against me, let me be the rock, and do not get into conflict with me; for if not, then I say for certain, I am a stone, and will not be afraid of jugs because they have big bellies, and which, the more they are swelled out, are the easier shattered and the easier to hit.' 7. On liii. 3 sqq. "Christ assumed no temporal honor or reputation, but with words and works contradicted all that would have praised, honored, and celebrated Him. For He ever shunned the honor of this world, and gave not even the slightest cause for it (Jno. vi. 15). Yea, in great humility He allowed the greatest contempt and blasphemy to be uttered against Him; for the Jews reproached Him with being a Samaritan, that had a devil and that did His miracles by the power of Satan (Jno. viii. 48). Men treated His divine doctrine as blasphemy. He was pestered by murderous cunning, many lies and calumnies, finally betrayed, sold, denied, struck in the face, spit upon, crowned with thorns, scourged, wounded, condemned, forsaken by God and man, stripped naked as a malefactor, yea, hanged up as a curse (Gal. iii. 13), while every one mocked at Him, laughed at His prayers, cast lots for His clothes, gave Him gall and vinegar to drink in His dying extremity (Jno. xix. 29). Lastly, He died on the tree in the greatest infamy and contumely, His dead body was pierced and opened on the cross, and at last buried as a wicked person; yea, even after His innocent death, He was reproached with being a deceiver (Matth. xxvii. 63). Men also contradicted His resurrection. And so in life and death and after death He was full of contumely." JOH. ARNDT, Wahr. Christenth. Buch 2, kap. 14.

8. On liii. 4–6. "This text is the only medicine, and true, sure and approved theriac against that hurtful soul-poison, despair." "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities;" and afterwards "all we like sheep have gone astray, but the LORD laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Thou hearest that He speaks of sins and iniquity; and that thou mayest not think He speaks of some particular people, and not of thee and me, the Holy Spirit lets the words go out strong, and lets this resound: He was wounded for our transgression, He was bruised for our iniquity. Item: God laid all our sin on Him. That means even that no man is excepted.

Now that this is true, that Christ, the Son of God, laden with the sin of all men, was on that account wounded and bruised, wilt thou regard God as so ungracious or so hard, that He will let a debt be paid Him twice? Or shall Christ have suffered such distress and death in vain? In fine; God laid thy sins on Christ; it follows that they no more rest on thee. God wounded Him for thy sins; it follows that thou shalt not bear the punishment. God smote Him for thy sake; it follows that thou shalt go free." VEIT DIETRICH.

9. On liii. 8–10. Is it not really a contradiction to say, that the Servant shall live long because He is taken out of the land of the living? And also, that He will have seed, when He shall have given His life an offering for sin? One sees here that the Prophet has some presentiment of the higher nature of Him whom he presents to us here as the Servant of Jehovah. According to the New Testament view, one must be cut off from the so called land of the living, but which is in truth the land of those devoted to death, in order to reach the land of true, of eternal life. Thus it is hereby intimated, that Christ will die in order to rise up again to everlasting life. Yea, even more! It is also intimated (ver. 10), that precisely by the giving up of His life He will accomplish, as it were, an act of generation, the result of which will be an immeasurably numerous and immortal posterity. For by His death He gives us eternal life (comp. Jno. xii. 24). The strange death of Christ: 1) By His death He laid down what was mortal in Him, and now appears wholly as the eternal living One; 2) by His death He gives life to them that were a prey to death.

10. On liii. 10. "The death of Christ: 1) Who willed and decreed it? (God Himself: it pleased the LORD to bruise Him). 2) Why did God will it? (He must give His life an offering for sin). 3) What are His fruits? (He shall see seed and live long, etc.). After SPURGEON, The Gospel of the Prophet Isaiah.

11. On liii. 11, 12. As the exaltation of Christ corresponds in general to His humiliation (comp. Phil. ii. 5–11), so also it corresponds in particulars: 1) Because His soul was in tribulation, He will see His pleasures and be satisfied. 2) Because He bore the sins of many, so He, the righteous One will by His knowledge make many righteous. 3) Because He was made like the wicked, He shall have the great multitude for a prey and the strong for spoil.

VI.—THE SIXTH DISCOURSE.

The New Salvation.

CHAPTER LIV.

The fifty-third chapter retained its ground color, black, to the end. For the Prophet purposely once again accumulated the dark images of suffering in the twelfth verse, although from ver. 8 on he had let the light of the Easter morning dawn. It is as if he designed to paint the edge of his mourning ribbon dark black, so that it might appear in sharp relief. Spite of this, chap. liv. has a close inward connection with what precedes. For was it not said already liii. 10, that the Servant will have seed, and in ver. 12 that a great crowd shall be given Him as spoil? Have we not read lii. 10, that the arm of the LORD shall be revealed before all nations, and that all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of God? Is it not represented in xlix. 12 sqq., that Zion, though a forsaken wife, shall have countless children? And is it not intimated xlix. 6 that this unaccountable increase of the children of Zion will be because the Servant of God is made the light of the Gentiles? This thought now forms the chief contents of chap. liv. viz.: that Zion, apparently forsaken and repudiated, shall be made happy by a wonderful blessing of children, and that by reason of the righteousness of the Servant being imparted to men far beyond the limits of the natural Israel.

The chapter has two parts: 1) The rich blessing of children a fruit of the eternal grace of Jehovah (vers. 1–10); 2) Israel's state of salvation is one extending on all sides (vers. 11–17).

1. ZION'S RICH BLESSING OF CHILDREN A FRUIT OF THE ETERNAL GRACE OF JEHOVAH. CHAPTER LIV. 1–10.

1 Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear;
Break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child:
For more are the children of the desolate
Than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent,
And let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations:
[a]Spare not, lengthen thy cords,
And strengthen thy stakes;
3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left;
And thy seed shall [b]inherit the Gentiles,
And make the desolate cities to be inhabited.
4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed:
Neither be thou [c]confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame:
For thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth,
And shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.
5 For thy Maker is thine husband;
The LORD of hosts is his name;
And thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel;
The God of the whole earth shall he be called.
6 For the LORD hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit,
And a wife of youth, when [d]thou wast refused, saith thy God,
7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee;
But with great mercies will I gather thee.
8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment;
But with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee,
Saith the LORD thy Redeemer.
9 For this is as the waters of Noah unto me;
For as I have sworn
That the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth;
So have I sworn
That I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.
10 For the mountains shall depart,
And the hills be removed;
But my kindness shall not depart from thee,
Neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed,
Saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

[a] Hinder it not. [b] possess. [c] depressed. [d] she was scorned.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 1. שְׂכָכָה under שָׂכַם. Ver. 4. כָּלַם—אַל־תִּירְאִי in Niph. Ver. 5. עֹשֶׂה. Ver. 8. שֶׁצֶף—קֶצֶף, גֹּאֲלֵךְ. Ver. 10. מְרַחֲמֵךְ.

Ver. 3. הוֹשִׁיב causative from the neuter יָשַׁב "to be inhabited," xiii. 20; Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18.

Ver. 5. עֹשַׂיִךְ (see Exeget. and Crit.) is subject, יהוה is in apposition with it, and בעליך is predicate. The plural בֹּעֲלַיִךְ is to be explained by בֹּעֵל being used here for בַּעַל, and being inflected and construed accordingly (see GREEN, § 202, 2). But why not simply בֹּעֲלֵךְ? I think for this reason: because after the overthrow of the Old Testament Theocracy a re-marriage, as it were, was necessary, a re-founding of the former relations. The plural, as remarked, draws the plural עֹשַׂיִךְ after it.

Ver. 6. קְרָאָךְ is a rare form for קְרָאֵךְ (comp. lx. 9).—אשת נעורים is still dependent on כְּ before אשה עזובה.—The imperf. תִּמָּאֵס is used because, not a definite, solitary fact, but something that often happens is to be thought of.

Ver. 8. שֶׁצֶף קֶצֶף is a genuine Isaianic play on words (comp. i. 4, 23; v. 7; vii. 9; viii. 10; xxii. 5; xxiv. 3, 4, 16 sqq.; xxv. 6; xxvii. 7; xxviii. 7, 10 sqq.; xxix. 2; xxxii. 7, 19, etc.).

Ver. 9. The LXX. translates ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος τοῦ ἐπὶ Νῶε. It seems therefore to have read מִמֵּי. But the whole translation of the verse is so confused that one sees the translator knew not what to do with the text. SYMM., THEOD., VULG., TARG., JON., SYR., SAAD. read כִּימֵי. Also Matth. xxiv. 37 (comp. Luke xvii. 26) seems to favor the reading כימי with its ὥσπερ αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ Νῶε, though the passage is not properly a quotation of our text. Yet most CODD. by far read כי־מי. In STIER and THEILE's Polyglott, the reading כימי is not quoted at all. Moreover the following מי־נח, as also the relation to the foregoing שצף קצף favors the reading כי־מי.——אֲשֶׁר cannot be construed pronominally, for the contorted construction that ensues, and the following כֵּן forbid it. We therefore take it as an adverb = כַּאֲשֶׁר (Jer. xxxiii. 22; EWALD, § 360, a).——נִשְׁבַּעְתִּי מֵעֲבֹר is construed as אֲצַוֶּה מֵהַמְטִיר ver. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Sing, O barren —— be inhabited.—Vers. 1–3. Of course the Prophet addresses Jerusalem or Zion, yet not as a local congregation, but as representative of the whole nation. And it is true also, that He has in mind the Israel of the Exile, yet not of the Exile in its temporal limitation, but in the prophetic sense, that is so far as this comprehends in one view the Israel of the Exile with the subsequent time to the downfall of the outward Theocracy. For the Israel to which he speaks here is the שֹׁמֵמָה "desolate," that is no more בְּעוּלָה "married," but is forsaken and repudiated by her husband (comp. ver. 6; xlix. 21). The old, outward Theocracy sets, is broken as one shivers an earthen vessel. In so far Israel is despised, repudiated, forsaken by its husband. But from the broken shell issues the kernel that from the beginning was hid in the shell till the period of ripeness. And this kernel now enters on a new existence, in which it develops to a greatness and glory, in comparision with which the greatness and glory of its former stage of existence almost vanish. For the narrow house becomes a mighty edifice under which all nations of the earth (ver. 3), find room. The Apostle Paul understands by this new, grand edifice the "Jerusalem from above that is the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 26, 27). And this "Jerusalem from above" is nothing else than the New Testament Zion, which itself, in turn, in the visible militant Christian Church, has only the first and initial stage of its existence. It is therefore a right meager construction when rationalistic expositors find nothing more said in our passage, than that Jerusalem after the Exile will be more populous than before, and that the people in the land will not have room, and consequently will spread out, and that to the south and to the north, i. e., toward Edom, Syria and Phoenicia (thus KNOBEL, SEINECKE, etc.). What is to be understood by גוים ver. 3 we shall see below at that verse.

Rejoice O barren, recalls the words of Hannah's song 1 Sam. ii. 5: "so that the barren hath borne seven," where the additional thought occurs that the one having many children proves to be an אֻמְלָלָה, an exhausta viribus. לא ילדה is one that has never hitherto borne children (Judg. xiii. 2). If Zion be meant here, which we are to regard as the antitype of Sarah (li. 1–3), and we may add also of Hannah, still barren cannot refer to the fact that Jerusalem during the Exile was robbed of her children and during that time bore no more (DELITZSCH). According to that we would need to understand the blessing of children to mean the children that should be born in Jerusalem when it would be rebuilt. The עקרה is rather the hidden kernel of the "spiritual Israel," within the "fleshly Israel," that is not yet released from the shell, that has not attained an independent existence. Although the children of the fleshly Israel have felt more or less the influence of the spiritual Israel, yet so far as such is the case, they are only children of an invisible mother, whose existence is latent, and who on this account must be reckoned as not bearing.——The same mother that is called barren is afterwards called desolate. Here the word itself (שוממה) shows Jerusalem when rebuilt cannot be meant. For the rebuilt Jerusalem is no longer "desolate," and is not less a married wife than she had been before. But the New Testament Zion implies the destruction of the outward Theocracy, and thus the apparent dissolution of the former relation between the latter and God. Just then, the Prophet would say, when Zion in respect to its outward situation will be desolate, a lonely woman forsaken of her husband, just then the new Zion will develop out of it and have a much richer blessing of children than Zion had before in its Old Testament form. שוממה is the destroyed, wasted, solitary one (comp. Lam. i. 13; iii. 11). בעולה (comp. lxii. 4, 5), according to the representation of the relation between Jehovah and Zion as a married one, designates Jerusalem as the Theocracy in whose stability appears also the stability of that married relation.

Ver. 2. As a measure of the greatness of the promised blessing of children, the Prophet calls on Zion to widen the place of her tent, i. e., she must prepare an extended surface for the erection of her tent for dwelling. For it is not probable that מקום designates the interior of the tent. What follows of itself shows that the extent of that interior will be great. נָטָה here does not mean "to stretch or strain" (xliv. 13), but "to expand" (xl. 22; xlv. 12). The third person plural is used in the sense of the indefinite subject = let them expand. The Prophet implies that Zion may become concerned lest her dwelling be too much extended, and that she would check the expansion.—He therefore calls on her not to do so: אל־תחשכי, "do not oppose, hinder it" (lviii. 1). For all the nations of the earth are to find their spiritual dwelling under this tent. Corresponding to the greatness of the tent, the ropes must be lengthened and the pins be set firmly. But it has been justly remarked that strengthening the stakes refers not only to the greater resistance required for a tent of greater dimensions, but also to the fact that this is to be no more a momadic tent, but is to be a tabernacle continuing forever (xxxiii. 20).

Ver. 3. For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left. There appears in these words to be an allusion to Gen. xxviii. 14, "and thy seed shall be as dust of the earth, and thou shalt break forth (וּפָרַצְתָּ) to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south." One sees from this passage also, that the Prophet does not merely name the right and left side (north and south) because breaking forth on the west would be hindered by the seas and on the east by the desert. But, spite of the comparison of the fastened stakes, the Prophet entertains the thought of an issuing forth in an appointed way. In such a connection the two lateral directions are ever named (comp. Gen. xxiv. 49; Num. xx. 17; xxii. 26; Deut. ii. 27; v. 32; Isa. ix. 19, etc.).—When it is further stated: and thy seed shall possess (יָרַשׁ as frequently, Deut. ii. 12, 21, 22; ix. 1, etc.), the nations, we must remember what has been already said by the Prophet, xlix. 6, 12, 18, sqq. We learn from these passages that the seed of Israel shall not merely take possession of some nations, but of all nations, and not of lands by expelling the inhabitants, but actually of the inhabitants themselves. For these themselves shall become the seed of Israel. But Zion shall wonder to see herself surrounded by a countless posterity, and how she came by these many children (xlix. 21 sqq.)——The seed of Israel will also make desolate cities to be inhabited. That the Prophet does not mean the desolate cities of Palestine that are to be repeopled, appears from the whole context which has a much loftier aim. Men are not wont to choose desolated places for residences. Colonists prefer to lay out a new city, rather than settle in the ruins of an ancient one. But the seed of Zion penetrates to all nations and seeks out even ruined nations, destroyed and desolated regions. It has in fact the mission of bearing new life everywhere that men are found.

2. Fear not——the LORD thy Redeemer.—Vers. 4–8. In the name שׁוֹמֵמָה "desolate," that is given to Zion, ver. 1, there is an intimation of a dreadful catastrophe. There will then come a time when Zion will no more be the "married wife" as heretofore, but "desolate." That will, any way, be a severe and alarming crisis. In reference to just this critical time, Zion is called on not to fear, for, spite of the blow that seems to threaten annihilation, she will not come to shame (comp. xlv. 16, 17). She is further exhorted not to become depressed by the sense of shame, for she will actually have no occasion to blush with shame (comp. xxxiii. 9). Yea, she will even forget the shame of her youth, and remember the reproach of her widowhood no more. The Prophet, therefore, distinguishes two periods of that time that precedes the issuing of the new Zion out of its Old Testament shell, viz., the youth and the widowhood, and both are designated as periods of reproach. The youth is the commencement period until David. It is the period when the Theocracy had a miserable existence, distressfully asserted itself in the midst of heathen nations, sometimes, as in the days of Samson and Elijah seeming to be lost in the struggle with its enemies, especially the Philistines. The widowhood denotes the period of exile, not merely the Babylonian, but also the Assyrian and the Roman exiles. For just with the beginning of the last named was coincident the issuing of the New Testament Zion from its Old Testament shell. In what follows is given the reason why Zion need not fear being brought to shame (vers. 5–8).

Ver. 5. Although apparently no longer "married," Zion still has an "husband," and He is identical with her Maker. Can then the Maker suffer His work to be destroyed? Were that not a reproach to Him? And is it conceivable that Jehovah, who is the Maker here, will let Himself be loaded with this disgrace? Therefore He that is Jehovah, and indeed Jehovah of hosts, the Lord and Commander of all heavenly powers, He is the Maker of Israel and also its husband. What security in these titles? And the same is true of the predicates given to God in what follows. What kind of a גְּאֻלָּה "redemption" must that be, that proceeds from the Holy One of Israel (comp. xli. 14; xliii. 14; xlviii. 17)! Can He be faithless to His word, unmerciful, cruel? And beside all this, this "Holy One of Israel" is the God of the whole earth (comp. Gen. xxiv. 3). He will therefore not have merely the will, but also the power to redeem Israel.—But if Jehovah was hitherto Israel's Maker, Husband and Redeemer, why is He so no more? When we look exactly, He has not ceased to be.—Ver. 6. He, in fact, calls Israel back to Him as a woman forsaken (lx. 15; lxii. 4), heart sore (properly, mortified in spirit, comp. lxiii. 10; Gen. vi. 6); as a man calls back the beloved wife of his youth, after having once scorned her.—Ver. 7. Only a small moment did the LORD forsake His people. But this moment of giving pain He will make good again by so much greater mercy. The centrifugal עָזַב shall have a corresponding centripetal קִבֵּץ (comp. the remark at xliii. 5.—Ver. 8, states the occasion of this momentary infliction of pain. It was the welling up of wrath, which, however, only prompted a momentary hiding of the face (comp. viii. 17; lix. 2; lxiv. 6).—שֶׁצֶף has plainly the same meaning as שֶׁטֶף "super-abundance," that is often used of a great flood of water and welling up of anger (Prov. xxvii. 4; Ps. xxxii. 6; Job xxxviii. 25; comp. Isa. viii. 8; xxx. 28; lxvi. 12). But here, as the antithesis of "everlasting kindness, it does not mean a lasting overflow, but only a momentary boiling over, like, say, the boiling over of a kettle. Therefore I allow myself to translate "in Gluth der Wuth" [an effort to copy the paronomasia of the original. See other attempts quoted in J. A. ALEX., in loc.—TR.].

3. For this——hath mercy on thee.—Vers. 9, 10. The Prophet supports the foregoing promise of "everlasting kindness" by giving it equal rank with the promise made to Noah (Gen. viii. 21 sq.; ix. 8 sqq.). Jehovah Himself calls this promise an everlasting covenant (Gen. ix. 16). And on this covenant, as on an immovable basis, rests the present stability of the earth. Here then the promise that the LORD will no more be wroth with Zion is put on a par with this covenant. If by Zion is to be understood the Israel of the exile, thus the fleshly Israel, then, indeed, as HENDEWERK remarks, the LORD did not keep His word. But we have seen above under ver. 1, that the spiritual Israel is meant. Thus זֹאת ver. 9 relates to the turn in Israel's affairs described in vers. 1–8. And as the general abstract זֹאת refers to that whole stage of the Theocracy's development, so also מֵי נֹחַ waters of Noah as pars pro toto, represent by metonymy the whole Noachian period. But from what follows, it appears that the LORD makes prominent a central point in the two periods. That is He makes the promise just given to Zion parallel with that given to Noah. He calls both an oath, although the word "to swear" occurs neither in what precedes, nor in the places in Genesis that have been cited. But when the Lord gives His word, it is always an oath in substance, though it may not be as to form. For whether He expressly says it or not, when the Lord gives His word, He stakes His honor, and so His very divinity, as a man does the highest good he has, his salvation. קָצַף and גָּעַר are related to one another as the inward sensation and outward manifestation. But גער here, as often, designates the real divine acts of judgment as a rebuking (comp. xvii. 13; Ps. ix. 6; lxviii. 31; lxxx. 17).——Finally in ver. 10, the Lord gives another image of the immovable fixedness of the covenant He makes with Zion. It shall stand more firmly than mountains and hills. For though these are elsewhere taken as the image of what is firm and immovable (Ps. xxxvi. 7; lxv. 7; civ. 5, 8), still here and in other passages (xxiv. 18–20; Hab. iii. 6; Job ix. 5; xiv. 18; Ps. xlvi. 3, 4; cxiv. 4, 6), the possibility is also recognized of mountains shaking, leaping, and even falling down. But such a possibility is positively denied in respect to the grace of God and His covenant of peace (covenant whose aim and consequence is peace, Num. xxv. 12; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; xxxvii. 26). In regard to the formula of assurance in ver. 10, it is to be remarked that this sort of thing occurs four times in this section. The first two times it sounds quite simply, "saith the LORD," ver. 1; saith thy God, ver. 6. But toward the end, where the pathos of the Prophet rises, the formula grows to "saith the LORD thy Redeemer," ver. 8, and "saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee," ver. 10.

2. ISRAEL'S CONDITION OF SALVATION EXTENDS ON ALL SIDES.

Chapter LIV. 11–17.

11 O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted,
Behold, [a]I will lay thy stones [b]with fair colours,
And [c]lay thy foundations with sapphires.
12 And I will make thy [d]windows of [e]agates,
And thy gates of carbuncles,
And all thy borders of pleasant stones.
13 And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord;
And great shall be the peace of thy children.
14 In righteousness shalt thou be established:
[f]Thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear:
And from terror; for it shall not come near thee.
15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me:
Whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall [g]for thy sake.
16 Behold, I have created the smith
That bloweth the coals in the fire,
And that bringeth forth an instrument [h]for his work;
And I have created the waster to destroy.
17 No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper;
And every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn.
This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord,
And their [i]righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.

[a] I lay. [b] in stibium. [c] will found thee. [d] pinnacles.
[e] rubies. [f] Be far from oppression. [g] on thee, i. e., dash to pieces on thee.
[h] after his craft. [i] righteousness from me.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11. עֲנִי see List.——סֹעֲרָה is part. Kal from סָעַר "tumultuari, to storm, be moved by tempests, to be hunted" (comp. Jonah i. 11, 13, Hos. xiii.. 3).——נֻחָמָה is perf., for as part. it would need to read מְנֻחָמָה (comp. on liii. 7).——בְּ before סַפִּירִים cannot be taken strictly as instrumental. For the stone is not the instrument with which one lays a foundation, but only one of the means. One may therefore only regard בְּ as instrumental in the wider sense, unless it may be treated as a species of בְּ essentiae. It were, indeed, not impossible to translate with Gesenius, "super saphiros." But there occurs no instance of designating the basis on which something is founded by בְּ. In this sense everywhere עַל is used (Ps. xxiv. 2; civ. 5; Amos ix. 6; Song of Sol. v. 15).

Ver. 12. We may make particular note here of the grammatical construction. According to Hebrew usage, what is made of any stuff is not described as the product of the stuff, but the material is put in apposition with the object to be made, or the object made is put in apposition with the material. Thus 1 Kings xviii. 32, "he built the stones an altar." Here the object made is in apposition with the material. But the reverse occurs Exod. xxxviii. 3, "All his vessels he made brass," i. e., brasen. The Hebrew conceives of the thing fabricated as a particular form of appearance of the material of which the artist makes it. This form of expression may be owing to its poverty in respect to adjective forms. In our text, therefore, the construction לְאַבְנֵי אֶקְדָּח and לְאַבְנֵי חֵפֶץ is to be understood like the immediately preceding וְשַׂמְתִּי כַּדְכֹד שִׁמְשֹׁתַיִךְ, only that in the two cases first named the Hebrew way of conception appears more pregnantly. For it is in general possible in Heb. after the verbs עָשָׂה, נָתַן, שִׂים, to designate that into which something is made not merely by לְ, but also by the simple accusative.

Ver. 13. This verse may be treated as dependent on שַׂמְתִּי, or as an independent nominal clause.——רַב, as third pers. perf. masc. Kal from רָבַב does not occur elsewhere. It must therefore be construed as adjective.

Ver. 14. תִּכּוֹנָנִי is Hithpalel with assimilated ת. The meaning is "to make ready, fast." What follows suits very well this construction of צְדָקָה in a subjective sense. First the imperative רַחֲקִי seems strange, if a promise is given and not an exhortation. Then עֹשֶׁק means "the oppressio, violence," in an active sense. The meaning "terror" is badly supported by xxxviii. 14.

Ver. 15. הֵן with almost a hypothetical significance, see EWALD, § 103, g.——מֵאוֹתִי stands here instead of מֵאִתִּי, as in lix. 11 אוֹתָם for אִתָּם. These are solitary instances of this use that became frequent only later. One may not cite Gen. xxxiv. 2; Lev. xv. 18, 26 as analogous examples. For in these passages אוֹתָהּ is really nota accusativi, because שָׁכַב that precedes the word in all the passages named, involves there the transitive meaning of "lying with, sleeping with." But Josh. xiv. 12 can be quoted as an example of this isolated use.——מִי before גָּר stands here in the sense it has when at the point of transition from an interrogative to a relative meaning. Comp. xliv. 10; l. 10.

Ver. 16. לְמַעֲשֵׂהוּ is not = "for his use;" for the smith forges swords not for his own use. But לְ is here = secundum. Therefore he produces an implement, a weapon according to his workmanship, i. e., such as answers to his manufacture in general and to his individual craft in particular.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. O thou afflicted——pleasant stones.—Vers. 11, 12. The foregoing strophe promised Zion a wonderful blessing of children, the "benedictio vere theocratica," as the fundamental condition of national well-being in the largest measure. Now the blessing is extended to all. Zion was wretched, hunted, comfortless in her youth and widowhood. Lo-nuhama [not comforted] recalls Lo-ruhama [not having obtained mercy] Hos. i. 6. But now Zion shall mount so high in splendor and glory that her walls shall consist of sapphires bedded in stibium, her doors of carbuncles, yea, her border-walls of precious stones. What a contrast between this past and the future which the Prophet has in mind, and which of course has also its stages! For it is not realized at once, but only by degrees, until it is accomplished in the image of the future that the Apostle John portrays in Rev. xxi. 18 sqq. פּוּךְ is a paint made of sulphuret of antimony or grey stibium, Arabic Kohl, hence alchohol; to which is related the Hebrew כָּחַל "to paint," Ezek. xxiii. 40, see HERZ. R. Enc. IX. p. 446; XIII. p. 607. The stones shall be bedded in stibium. It was a custom to paint around the eyes with a shining black paint, which 2 Kings ix. 30 is called שׂוּם עֵינֶיהָ בַּפּוּךְ. So also the stones of the walls shall be set in costly stibium instead of mortar. Their edges therefore shall have its color, and the stones themselves the effect that stibium imparts to the eyes. This explanation may be harmonized with the mention of אַבְנֵי פוּךְ in the list of materials collected by David for the building of the Temple, 1 Chr. xxix. 2, by supposing that there פּוּךְ means stones prepared in a peculiar manner unknown to us. But the stones of the foundation shall be blue sapphires (Job xxviii. 6, 16). The pinnacles of the walls (שִׁמְשׁוֹת, plural form occurring only here, properly the sun-beams, hence the projecting points, pinnacles of the wall, ἐπάλξεις) shall consist of כַּדְכֹּד (comp. EWALD § 48, c). This word, which only occurs again Ezek. xxvii. 16, is likely connected with כִּידוֹר scintilla (Job xli. 11), and designates a shining, sparkling stone. The LXX. translates ἴασπις; modern writers understand it to mean the ruby or carbuncle, a stone of red hue. The gates shall consist of אַבְנֵי אֶקְדָּח (ἅπ. λεγ. from קָדַח "accendit, exarsit," comp. קַדַּחַת "febris ardens," a precious stone of fiery appearance, thus probably carbunculus, small glowing coal). גְּבוּל cannot mean here the boundary line, for the wall itself is such for the city, and it has already been spoken of. And there is no Biblical authority for a boundary wall that enclosed also the territory of the city extra muros, i. e., a sort of Chinese wall. We will therefore need to take גבול in the sense of that which is bounded, i. e., of the city territory that is bounded by the wall, a not unfrequent meaning (comp. Gen. x. 19; Exod. x. 14, 19; 1 Sam. xi. 3, 7 and the Latin finis). This city territory shall be paved with choice stones (אבני חפץ, a general expression found only here). Such is the understanding of our text that the author of the book of Tobit had, for he writes: "And the streets (πλατεῖαι) of Jerusalem shall be paved (ψηφολογηθήσονται, laid in mosaic) with beryl and carbuncle and stones of Ophir," Tobit xiii. 17. He had therefore the idea of a tesselated pavement.

2. And all thy children——saith the Lord.—Vers. 13–17. After these intimations of an outward glory equally grand and symbolical, the Prophet turns to the inward blessings that relate to the sphere of intelligence, of the life of the soul, of right-living. "All thy children," he says, "shall be Jehovah-learned," i. e., taught by Jehovah. Thus he promises knowledge, and in fact the highest and most infallible, since Jehovah Himself is its source. Kindred expressions occur xliv. 3; Joel iii. 1 sq.; Jer. xxxi. 34, while their fulfilment is declared in the New Testament in such passages as John vi. 45 (διδακτοὶ θεοῦ); 1 Thess. iv. 9 (θεοδίδακτοι); Acts ii. 16 sqq.; Heb. viii. 10 sqq.; 1 John ii. 20. Where the Lord is Himself and alone the teacher, there the result can only be the deepest and most universal satisfaction for spirit and soul. For what the Lord teaches is the true wisdom. But that is not mere theory, but also practice as well, and satisfies the whole man.—Israel so taught cannot practice unrighteousness. It must be holy as its Lord is holy. By the exercise of righteousness it shall itself be established; for righteousness exalts a nation (Prov. xiv. 34). Israel must not, as the world does, regard as good everything that furthers its own interest. It must not in impending danger, itself practice unrighteousness and violence. For in fact it has nothing to fear. It must be on its guard both against unrighteousness and alarm. It must be neither insolent nor despondent. מְחִתָּה is "fractio, consternatio," in a subjective or passive sense (comp. Prov. xiii. 3; xiv. 28). For it (viz., the subject of מחתה) shall not come near (fem. in a neuter sense) thee.

Ver. 15. In connection with the statement of ver. 14, that Israel need not fear, the Prophet now sets forth the reason. First he does not deny that there may be hostile conspiracies against Israel. Behold, they shall surely gather ["they band together in bands," Dr. N—'s. rendering.—Tr.]. גּוּר has this meaning of banding together in a hostile sense also in Ps. lvi. 7; lix. 4; cxl. 3. But though that may happen it is not from Me, says the Lord. Whoever, then, without Jehovah's approval, bands together at Zion (the neighborhood of conspirators is ever hostile), He will, as it were attracted like birds are said to be by the rattlesnake, fall on thee and so dash to pieces (comp. Luke xx. 18).—Ver. 16. And because God the Lord "causes iron to grow" and has taught men to make swords of it, and that for the מַשְׁחִית "the waster" to use for destroying, so also He has the power to compel the creature of His hand not to use his destructive efficiency on Israel.—I cannot treat the clause ואנ׳ ב׳ משחית לחבל as the apodosis. The sentence rather affirms that the Lord made the weapons not for play, but of course for destruction. But opposed to Israel, the weapons shall fail in their mission, although they have that mission from God. From iron weapons the transition to the fleshly weapon is easy, viz., to the tongue, which is often compared to weapons of iron and is called worse (Ps. lv. 22; lvii. 5; lxiv. 4; Jer. ix. 3, 8; xviii. 18). Every such tongue that shall raise itself in legal strife with Israel shall be proved by the latter to be a רָשָׁע, criminal and guilty (l. 9).

A brief word in conclusion finishes the discourse. This (זאת) refers back to the rich promise of blessing of the chapter. This is given to the servants of Jehovah. Isaiah intentionally speaks here for the first and only time of servants of Jehovah. Manifestly there is intended an antithesis to the Servant of Jehovah that plays so prominent a part in chap. liii. After that chapter the Prophet has nothing more to say concerning the Servant of Jehovah. But he has still to indicate how the salvation from the Saviour will be conveyed to those that need and are worthy of salvation. The expression עַבְדֵי י׳ "servants of Jehovah" occurs again 2 Kings ix. 7; x. 23; Ps. cxiii. 1; cxxxiv. 1; cxxxv. 1. Now to these servants of Jehovah the promise of this chapter is given, pointing out, as it were, their inheritance and the righteousness acquired for them. Beck (Die Cyrojes. Weiss., p. 161) even recognized that צדקתם forms an antithesis to תרשיעי. The enemies of Israel shall dash to pieces (ver. 15), and if they contend before a judgment bar, shall be condemned. But the servants of the Lord shall, as the seed of the Servant of Jehovah (liii. 10, 8), inherit the glory that is promised to Him, and obtain the righteousness which He the Righteous One, according to liii. 11, shall impart to the many.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On liv. 2. "God dwelt in the Old Testament with His divine service in the Tabernacle, which was fifty ells broad and a hundred ells long. But it is not accomplished with this in the New Testament. For the stakes must be set out much further, because Christ will reign from one sea to the other (Ps. lxxii. 8)." Cramer.

2. On liv. 4, 5. "We do God no honor when we are so very much afraid of our spiritual enemies. O, how joyful and assured we can be when we have God for a friend! Luke xii. 32; Rom. viii. 31.—A believing follower of Jesus cannot perish. He is as a living member united to Christ his Head. Will the head let one of its members be reviled, and not rescue its honor? Luke xviii. 7, 8.—The timid and shy ought not to be made more timid and shy, but one ought to comfort and cheer them up. 1 Thess. v. 14."—Starke.

3. On liv. 5. "Habebis maritum non Mosen, non Petrum, non Paulum, non papam, etc., sed Dominum qui fecit te." Luther. In the plurals בעליך, עשיך the old theologians found an adumbratio mysterii S. S. Trinitatis: "sponsi vel sponsoris tui factores tui Jehova." Foerster.

4. On liv. 6–8. What is all time in comparison with eternity? Therefore what are especially the exile-periods of Israel, even the longest, the Roman exile, in comparison with the everlasting communion of the nation with its Lord? Therefore what are the tribulations of Christendom compared with the everlasting rest that is promised to the people of God? Heb. iv. 9. We ought, therefore, in the greatest distress, while sighing: O, Lord, how long! never to forget that with the Lord a thousand years are as one day. We ought to remember that every earthly period of time is for the LORD but a moment. For the prize of everlasting bliss, an earthly moment of tribulation may well be endured.—"Ratio non potest credere, momentum et punctum esse tentationem, sed putat aeternam et infinitum esse, quia tantum in praesenti sensu haeret, nihil sentit, vidit, audit, cogitat, intelligit quam praesentem dolorem et praesens malum. Quare spiritualis haec est practica, omnia apparentia spectra relinquire et assuefacere cor ad non apparentia, hoc est fide in verbo haerere." —LUTHER.

5. On liv. 9. "Nonnunquam pluit, ut sit species aliqua futuri diluvii, non tamen redit diluvium. Quoties homines cernunt unam nubeculam ascendentem, tum putant rediturum diluvium. Hoc est, levis tentatio frangit animum, sed oportet, ut sic ex fide in fidem proficiamus. Nisi nonunquam desperatio incideret, non disceremus vere credere." LUTHER.

6. [On liv. 11, 12. "In the foregoing chapter we had the humiliation and exaltation of Christ; here we have the humiliation and exaltation of the Church; for if we suffer with Him, we shall reign with Him." Ver. 12. "That which the children of the world lay up among their treasures, and too often in their hearts, the children of God make pavements of, and put under their feet, the fittest place of it." M. HENRY.]

7. On liv. 11, 12. "The color display of precious stones in which the New Jerusalem shines is more than childish painting. Whence then have the precious stones their charm? The ultimate ground of this charm is this, that in all nature everything stretches up to the light, and that in the mineral world the precious stones represent the highest stage of this ascending process of inward absorption. It is the process of self-unfolding of the divine glory itself, that is reflected typologically in the ascending scale of the play of color and in the transparency of the precious stones. Therefore the high-priest bears a breast-plate with twelve precious stones, and on them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, and therefore Rev. xxi. takes the picture of the New Jerusalem, that the Old Testament Prophet here sketches (without distinguishing the last time and the world to come), and paints it in detail, adding to the precious stones, which he names individually, also crystal and pearls. How could that be explained if the stone-world did not absorb in itself a reflection of the eternal lights, from which God is called πατὴρ τῶν φώτων, and were it not implied that the blessed will some time be able to translate these stony types into the words of God out of which they have their being?" DELITZSCH.

8. [On liv. 13. "The church's children, being born of God, shall be taught of God; being His children by adoption, He will take care of their education. It was promised (ver. 1) that the church's children should be many; but lest we should think that being many, as sometimes it happens in numerous families, they will be neglected, and not have instruction given them so carefully as if they were but few, God here takes that work into His own hand: They shall all be taught of God, that is, they shall be taught by those whom God shall appoint, and whose labors shall be under His direction and blessing. He will ordain the methods of instruction, and by His word and ordinances will diffuse a much greater light than the Old Testament church had. Care should be taken for the teaching of the church's children, that knowledge may be transmitted from generation to generation, and that all may be enriched with it, from the least even to the greatest." M. HENRY.]

9. On liv. 16 sq. "Verily He is also with our enemies. But not to give them success against us, but to restrain them from us, and precisely not to let them succeed. God says, He is also there when weapons are forged against us; He is also there when they sally forth for our destruction. Thus He will hold them, so that with all their equipping they will do nothing. If our almighty Friend Himself is with our enemies, we may well have no fear of any enemy. God causes the weapons of all the world to be forged so soft that they can do nothing to His children armed with a panoply by His word. So shall it be also with tongues that blaspheme against us. We will convict them, and in that they shall have their judgment." DIEDRICH.

10. [On liv. 17. "The idea is, that truth and victory, in every strife of words, would be on the side of the church. To those who have watched the progress of discussions thus far on the subject of true religion, it is needless to say that this has been triumphantly fulfilled. Argument, sophism, ridicule, have all been tried to overthrow the truth of the Christian religion. Appeals have been made to astronomy, geology, antiquities, history, and indeed to almost every department of human science, and with the same want of success. Poetry has lent the charm of its numbers; the grave historian has interwoven with the thread of his narrative covert attacks and sly insinuations against the Bible; the earth has been explored to prove that 'He who made the earth and revealed its age to Moses was mistaken in its age,' and the records of Oriental nations, tracing their history up cycles of ages beyond the Scripture account of the creation of the world, have been appealed to; but thus far, in all these contests, the ultimate victory has declared in favor of the Bible.—Those who are desirous of examining the effects of the controversy of Christianity with science, and the results, can find them detailed with great learning and talent in 'Twelve Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion,' by Dr. NICHOLAS WISEMAN, Andover, 1837." BARNES.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On liv. 1–3. Thoughts equally applicable in preaching on missions to the Jews and to the heathen. As long as the Old Testament, fleshly Israel had the husband, the spiritual Israel was unfruitful. But when that fleshly Israel had become desolate, then the spiritual Israel became free and began to stir itself, to develop its soarings and activity. And with what results! As soon as it was no longer important where one must worship, but the chief concern was how one must worship, and that one must worship "in spirit and in truth," immediately to the true Israel was opened the way to the heathen, and to the heathen the way to Israel. And from that moment Zion became the mother of countless heathen children. And these, who hitherto had been without God and without hope in the world, now suddenly gained a Father, a home and a child's rights that are eternal. In the spiritual Israel, which is one with the Christian church, there is for this reason the uniting centre between Jew and Gentile. The Jews should recognize in the church of the gospel the kernel of their Theocracy long since broken up, and the fulfilment of all the promises and hopes of the Old Covenant. And the Gentiles should see that by means of the Christian church they may become children of Abraham, and thus be grafted into the old holy olive tree (Rom. xi. 17 sqq.).

2. On liv. 2–8. "An urgent call to gospel mission work. 1) God wills it. 2) Fear not. 3) God is with thee." DR. THIELE.

3. On liv. 7–14. "The great mercy of the LORD. 1) How deep it goes, a. from God's heart (great mercy, ver. 7); b. from an eternal purpose of grace (with everlasting grace, ver. 8). 2) How firm it stands, a. on God's oath (ver. 9); b. when everything gives way and falls (ver. 10). 3) How it raises up (vers. 11–14)." SCHEERER, Manch. Gaben u. Ein G., 1868, p. 284.

4. On liv. 10. "It is true, histories give us examples of mountains being displaced and sinking away; but that the Lord Jesus ever forsook or cast out a believing soul, of that no man will find an example. Ah! how should He forsake that which, when it forsakes Him, He seeks, with such great, divine patience and long-suffering, to restore again, and calls to it: Return again, thou backslider, and I will not change my countenance against thee, for I am merciful; I will not keep anger forever (Jer. iii. 12)."—SCRIVER.

5. On liv. 11–13. "There are names for you! Whoever will judge by them must say that God is ungracious towards the church, and is angry with it and punishes it. For to be wretched, suffer all weathers, be comfortless, as God Himself here confesses of Christians, that is very hard and does not go off without vexation. What becomes then of the assurance: I will not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee? The comfort is given above, it shall in the first place be the anger of a father, accordingly it shall not endure long, it is but for a moment. With this agrees the Prophet here, and says how God would adorn and embellish the church with sapphire pavements, crystal windows, and gates of rubies. One must not think of this as happening in a physical sense. The Holy Ghost means the spiritual adornments, that all her children, i. e., all true Christians are taught of the LORD. That is, they have the Holy Ghost, and by faith in Christ much peace. For the hearts know God, that He is gracious; they look to Him for all good, call on Him in every distress, experience His gracious deliverance and help. Therefore, let it storm as it may, the heart is still joyful in God. These are the sapphire, crystal, rubies that are found in the church, and with which she is embellished. But note particularly what it means, to be taught of God. For it does not mean what the Anabaptists and other deluded spirits dream, that God converts the people by some particular revelation. But God teaches by the office of the ministry, which He has ordained for men here on earth, that in the name of His Son Christ Jesus they should preach repentance and forgiveness of sins, and baptize. With such preaching and baptism is the Holy Ghost, and He kindles in hearts reliance on the grace of God and impels to obedience. That then is what is meant by being taught of God, and goes on without special revelation."—VEIT DIETRICH.

6. On liv. 14–17. The church should in all times remember that it is the house of the holy and righteous God, and should draw from that both warning and comfort. The church of the Lord stands on righteousness. 1) It is itself righteous, a. in that it appropriates the righteousness that the Lord has acquired for it; b. in that it does no wrong itself, but in every thing and toward every one exercises righteousness. 2) It obtains justice from the LORD against those that would do it wrong. For a. those that complot against the church do so without the righteous God; hence they have b. the righteous God against them, and they and their purposes must come to confusion.

VII.—THE SEVENTH DISCOURSE.

The New Way of appropriating Salvation.

CHAPTER LV. 1–5.

When we contemplate the contents of our chapters, one could almost outdo the modern criticism and exclaim: This was never written in the Exile! It must have been written after Christ, by a disciple of Paul who read the epistles to the Romans and Galatians! But on closer inspection one observes that our Prophet describes, not what he lived to see and learned to know by experience, but future things that were still enigmatical to himself. A Frenchman would say: il ne voit pas, il entrevoit seulment les chose futures. I can only understand the contents of our chapter in its relation to what precedes, as representing in what a new and hitherto unknown way Israel is to obtain a countless posterity and a salvation extending in every direction. That is, in connection with chap. liv., our chap. lv. shows, that the mode of subjective appropriation of salvation will be a new one. No longer by doing works, but by believing acceptance shall one put himself in possession of that salvation, which a new David, as a new mediator of a covenant, shall offer to the world, not by force of arms, but by His direct and indirect testimony. But this testimony must meet with a timely acceptance, and sincere repentance must prepare an entrance for the mercy of God. Also no one should regard the new way of salvation as unreasonable and impracticable, for not only Israel, but the entire creation, shall quite certainly partake of this salvation.

The chapter has two parts. The first is positive in its contents. It designates believing acceptance of the word as the essence of the new way of salvation. The second part is negative. It points with warning to the obstacles and scruples that must be set aside in order not to frustrate the new way of salvation.

1. THE POSITIVE NATURE OF THE NEW WAY OF APPROPRIATING THE SALVATION OF GOD. CHAPTER LV. 1–5.

1 Ho, every one that thirsteth,
Come ye to the waters,
And he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat;
Yea, come, buy wine and milk
Without money and without price.
2 Wherefore do ye [1]spend money for that which is not bread?
And your [a]labor for that which satisfieth not?
[b]Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good,
[c]And let your soul delight itself in fatness.
3 Incline your ear, and come unto me:
Hear, and your soul shall live;
And I will make an everlasting covenant with you,
Even the sure mercies of David.
4 Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people,
A leader and commander to the people.
5 Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not,
And [d]nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee
[e]Because of the LORD thy God,
And [f]for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified thee.

[1] Heb. weigh.

[a] acquisition. [b] Hearken, hearken. [c] And your soul shall.
[d] a nation. [e] For the sake of. [f] to.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. שָׁבַר is here denom. from שֶׁבֶר annona [from שָׁבַר see FUERST. Lex.—TR.], (comp. xlii. 7, 10; xlvii. 14, etc.). In Isaiah the word is found in this sense only here.——לוא־לחם is Oxymoron as לֹא־עָם, לֹא־אֵל (Deut. xxxii. 21), לֹא־עֵץ (Isa. x. 15), לֹא־אִישׁ, לֹא־אָדָם (Isa. xxxi. 8).

Ver. 3. The expression כָּרַת בְּרִית לְ is almost as common in the Old Testament as כָּרַת בְּרִית אֵת or עִם. It occurs Exod. xxiii. 32; xxxiv. 12, 15; Deut. vii. 2; Josh. ix. 6, 7, 11, 15, 16; xxiv. 25; Judg. ii. 2; 1 Sam. xi. 1, 2; 2 Sam. v. 3; 1 Kings xx. 34; 2 Kings xi. 4; Hos. ii. 20; Isa. lxi. 8; Jer. xxxii. 40; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; xxxvii. 26; Job xxxi. 1; Ps. lxxxix. 4; 1 Chron. xi. 13; 2 Chron. vii. 18 (without ברית); xxi. 7; xxix. 10. It is true that the expression is chiefly used in the case of a covenant that a superior concludes with an inferior as a benefaction or imposing a duty for the latter (see e. g. Job xxxi. 1). Once (2 Chron. xxix. 10) it is used in the case of a covenant that the man concludes with God. The expression is evidently in its origin a pregnant construction, as the preposition לְ depends on the verb, not according to its verbal meaning, but according to some latent meaning in the verb. This meaning may be that of laying on, assuring, or offering, according to the context.——The expression חַסְדֵי דָוִד is found again 2 Chr. vi. 42 in Solomon's prayer of consecration. It does not occur in the corresponding passage, 1 Kings viii., as indeed none of 2 Chr. vi. 40-42 does (comp. ZOECKLER in loc.). It seems to me that the author of 2 Chron. borrowed the words חסדי דוד from our text, and thereby bears testimony to its having relation to 2 Sam. vii. As regards the construction, it is zeugmatic. For the accusative חסדי ד׳ depends on the latent idea of giving in אכרתה ברית, and in fact Paul so renders the words Acts xiii. 34: ὅτι δώσω ὑμῖν τὰ ὅσια Δαυίδ.

Ver. 4. The grammatical construction of נָגִיד וּמְצַוֵּה לְאֻמִּים is not normal. It ought at least to read נָגִיד וגו׳ (comp. Ezek. xxxi. 16 מִבְחַר וְטוֹב לְבָנוֹן; Dan. i. 4). The expressions נְבְזֵה וַחֲדַל אִישִׁים liii. 3, and נָגוּעַ מֻכֵּה אֱלֹהִים liii. 4, are not at all to be compared as EWALD supposes (Gram., § 339, b; see above the comm. in loc.). This construction is therefore an unicum, if indeed the pointing be correct. Moreover מְצַוֶּה in a substantive sense occurs only here. It seems to me that the choice of expression was occasioned by the Prophet having in mind 2 Sam. vi. 21, where David says to Michal: the LORD chose me before thy father לְצַוֹּת אֹתִי נָגִיד עַל־עַם י׳.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In chap. liv. the LORD promised Israel a blessing that would extend on every hand. As if in a well supplied market, all these blessed possessions shall be spread out before Israel. Now the people are summoned to come up and buy, but —without money (ver. 1)! It is no longer as it once was when one must do a hard work in order to get food, which—still did not satisfy. One sees at once that the Prophet does not mean corporeal nourishment, for he calls on men to hear. By that one shall receive dainty nourishment (ver. 2). And that the importance of this hearing may be felt, he repeats his summons to hear twice. By virtue of this hearing the soul shall live and be capable of entering into the everlasting covenant with the LORD, that shall procure the sure mercies of David (ver. 3). The David that is to be the mediator of this grace will be first of all a witness, and hearing will be the condition of partaking of His grace. By His testimony to the truth He will however become also prince and commander of nations (ver. 4). But the great chief witness will avail himself of Israel in order to bring his testimony to the nations. Israel shall call nations that it did not know, and these nations will hasten to Israel that heretofore remained unknown to them. But they will hasten up in order to come to Jehovah and to the Holy One of Israel, who also glorifies His people in this way (ver. 5). Thus the chief emphasis in this section rests upon the inward, believing inclination to the word of the LORD, something high as heaven above outward merit of works. This believing inclination Israel should bring to the word of the LORD that announces to it the glory of David's kingdom. Then it will itself dare to preach this word, and, by means of the faith that it will find, it will gather the nations to it, which, according to liv. 1 sqq., will be its seed, and also the basis of the new, eternal Davidic kingdom.

2. Ho, every one——mercies of David. —Vers. 1-3. Before the gaze of the Prophet stands Israel, made inwardly and outwardly free from the chains of the world-power by the Servant of God. According to chap. liv. a rich blessing from the LORD is promised to it. But it cannot partake of it without more ado. Like the old Israel it must fulfill a condition. To the old Israel it was said (Deut. xxviii. 1 sq.): "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all His commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: and all these blessings shall come upon thee, and overtake thee." Here, therefore, the fulfilment of the law was set up as a condition of obtaining the blessing. It is otherwise in the new kingdom that the Prophet sees from afar with the eye of the spirit. There nothing is demanded but hunger and thirst, and yet, of course, such as is contented with the gratification that the LORD offers. STIER justly calls attention to the fact that our LORD must have had in mind our text when He said: "blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled" (Matth. v. 6). Comp. also Matth. xi. 28; Jno. vii. 37. הוֹי does not depart here from its fundamental meaning. It must not be taken here as a cry merely summoning together, any more than in xvii. 1; xviii. 1, or like Zech. ii. 10, 11, where KOEHLER appropriately translates "Hui" ["Ho," "quick"]. In our passage, the cry of woe has reference only to the suffering condition of those addressed. It is an expression of compassion for their lamentable fate, that offers only an illusory satisfaction for their wants. It is as if we were to say: Alas, ye poor needy ones! Thus MAURER, with whom STIER needed not to find fault.—What sort of hunger and thirst the Prophet means first appears from his offering to satisfy it without compensation. The rationalistic expositors will have it that only earthly blessings are meant. Thus they would understand that the exiles are indirectly summoned to return home by painting up the possessions that would follow on that, which were to be had as water for the thirsty and without sacrifice (GESENIUS, HITZIG). Others think only of eating and drinking. Canaan would be incomparably more than in former days a land flowing with milk and honey (SEINECKE, KNOBEL). But construed in this way the words contain a disgraceful deception. No emigration agent ever sought to seduce ignorant peasants to emigrate to Brazil or Texas with such lies as this would-be Prophet Isaiah would have used, if these expositors were correct. For did he represent to them "the restoration of the state under the image of refreshing food and drink," or did he promise them literally "food and drink, and that for nothing," then both were unblushing lies, as in general the passages that speak of an easy, safe return over a convenient road well supplied with every thing needful (xxxv. 6 sqq.; xli. 17 sqq.; xliii. 18 sqq.; xlix. 8 sqq.; li. 11; lii. 8 sqq.), would contain nothing but fraud, if they are referred in the ordinary sense to the return from the Babylonian captivity. For what ever justified such an agitator in promising to the Israelites splendid political relations, support without cost? The outward relations of the returning exiles were by no means splendid. They continued to be under the Persian rule. In that prayer at their feast recorded in Neh. ix. we find them complaining (ver. 36): "Behold, we are servants this day, and for the land that thou gavest unto our fathers to eat the fruit thereof and the good thereof, behold, we are servants in it." And we see that they were obliged to pay taxes as much as in the land of exile; for ver. 37 says: "And it (the land) yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins; also they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle, at their pleasure, and we are in great distress." And the same appears still more clearly from Ezra iv. 13, where in the accusing letter of Rehum and Shimshai we read: "Be it known now unto the king, that, if this city be builded, and the walls set up again, then will they (the Israelites) not pay toll, tribute and custom, and so thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings." According to Ezra vii. 24, King Artasasta [Artaxerxes] released only the priests and the other servants of the Temple from all taxes.—From

Neh. v. 1-5 we see that the returning Israelites, at least the poorer among them, had hunger and distress enough to suffer in the promised land, for the poor among those engaged in building the walls beg for a distribution of grain, because otherwise, in order to keep their numerous families, they must pawn their lands, or even, where that had already been done, surrender their children to servitude. Thus it is seen that the returned exiles experienced neither a restoration of the commonwealth, nor was their daily bread given either in abundance or without cost. And yet we do not find in the historical books of this period a trace of their considering themselves cheated. They themselves certainly did not take the words of our Prophet in the sense in which the rationalistic expounders would understand them. For why then did so many, in fact the majority of the exiles remain in exile? If the taxes in the Exile were so oppressive, as some suppose, and the condition of wages so unfavorable, why did not all return to Palestine? Was then the return more advantageous in every respect? According to Ezra i. 5 only those resolved to return "whose spirit God raised" (aroused). The resolve to return was thus a victory of the spirit over the flesh. Therefore they knew well that they would not find the flesh pots of Egypt in desolate Palestine. Thus they were far from regarding the words of our Prophet as promising these flesh pots. We see, accordingly, that if the Prophet was no enthusiast or cheat, but would say the truth, it was impossible that he could mean to promise to the returning exiles fortunate outward circumstances. Now since, as is well known, the expressions "to thirst, hunger, eat, drink, bread, wine," are very often used in a spiritual sense (comp. xxv. 6; xliv. 3; lxv. 13; Amos viii. 11; Ps. xlii. 3; lxiii. 2; Matth. v. 6; Jno. vi. 35, etc.), so it is manifest that the Prophet means them in this sense. In addition to this the Prophet afterwards in vers. 2, 3 expressly designates the satisfaction as the fruit of hearing: on which more hereafter. לְכוּ is used three times in ver. 1 not meaning "go," but "come hither," because the speaker himself has in possession the things he invites others to receive. The word, therefore, stands here, as often elsewhere (comp. ii. 3–5) in the sense of a particula excitandi, as age, δεῦρο, δεῦτε, "come on, here!"

The second member of the verse contains a completion of the first. It adds, that satisfaction will be given not only to those thirsty ones that have money, but also to those that have none. ואשׁר אין-לו כסף is thus a second subject of לכו and nearer definition of כל-צמא. Vav before אשׁר. therefore, involves the idea of "and indeed." In the third member come buy and eat a third particular is introduced, namely that of hunger and its correlative bread. The fourth member repeats and intensifies: not only is "for not money" strengthened by the further "for not wages" (מְחִיר comp. xlv. 13), but wine and milk are named in addition as things to be bought. They are costlier and nobler means of nourishment than water. Milk is the wine of infancy, wine the milk of maturity. Thus not merely bare necessities, but the daintiest, noblest gratification, is offered to those craving it (comp. on ver. 2 b).

Ver. 2. The question: why are you weighing out money? intimates that the man in this case, has a certain inclination to weigh out his money, and that effort is needed to prevent him. And such is actually the fact. The hardest law is easier for a man than the gospel. He would rather put himself to the rack like a fakir or a Trappist, than receive the gift of God for nothing. He will not have any thing for nothing. He does not want grace, but wages, for his merit. And yet what he gets in this way is not bread, not satiety.—For one's own works are not able to give the true righteousness, and so, too, cannot give true peace. Recall LUTHER's monastic life, and then what he found when he had learned to believe. It may at first sight appear objectionable that the Prophet even in ver. 1, makes use of the oxymoron (see Text. and Gram.), by saying "buy for not-gold, for not-wages," whereas one expects "buy not for money, not for wages," as, indeed, before he invited every one אשׁר אין לו כסף to come on. Thus one expects לא בכסף. ולא במחיר. But the Prophet would evidently say, that of course they should buy. שִׁבְרוּ does not stand before ואכלו to no purpose. There shall indeed be a purchase price paid, but it shall consist of לא-כסף and לא-מחיר. That is, of course, something odd. For לא-לחם explained by לוא לשׂבעה evidently denotes a nourishment that does not deserve the name of bread, that is worse than bread. Therefore לא-לחם is a contemptuous expression. Accordingly לא-כסף and לא-מחיר must designate a price that is worse than money or wages, that does not deserve this name. The sense of שׁברו בלוא-כסף וגו׳ could not be then: "buy, but not with gold, but with a higher, better price." These words must rather mean: "buy for a price that has not even the value of money or of any other sort material compensation." Can the Prophet mean to say that? Shall the purchase price that he demands be worse than money, not even money? That cannot possibly be his meaning. Thus we see that we cannot take לא-כסף and לא-לחם in quite the same sense. Now such a negative expression formed by the use of לא may have a various antithesis according to the context; a superius or inferius may be its antithesis. Thus in x. 15 we were obliged to take לא-עֵץ = "not wood but something much higher; and just so in xxxi. 8, לא-אישׁ and לא-אדם = "not a man, but something higher," whereas לא-אֵל, לא-אָדָם designate something that is less than God, less than a nation. The evangelist of the Old Testament gives here (ver. 2) a genuine evangelical counsel, whose meaning and long range was certainly concealed from himself. Israel shall no more bring money, and labor (one could construe יְגִיעַ also in the sense of "res labore parta, gains of labor," xlv. 14). For legal works are as money that one has paid for food that deserves not the name of bread, because it does not satisfy. For legal works a man receives his own deserts! But that is just לֹא־לֶחֶם! It does not satisfy, it gives no peace. It does not procure for us the wedding garment, but only our own clothes, with which one will be cast out (Matt. xxii. 12, 13). In contrast with weighing out money, the Prophet now says what Israel should do in order to get satiety. He names therefore now the true purchasing price, the לֹא־כֶסֶף and לֹא־מְחִיר. It consists in hearkening to the LORD. There can be no doubt about the sort of hearing that is meant. It must any way be a very significant hearing, for the Prophet exhorts to it three times by saying שִׁמְעוּ שָׁמוֹעַ, then הַטּוּ אָזְנְכֶם and finally שִׁמְעוּ (ver. 3). He cannot mean the hearing with the outward ear, for the LORD would not be satisfied with that. Hearing with the inward ear, the receptivety of the heart, faith must be meant. Amos viii. 11, to which KIMCHI text refers us, is nearly related to ours. It is not impossible that it hovered in the mind of the Prophet. There it is said: "Behold the days come, saith the LORD God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the LORD." Receiving the word, the message of salvation, the gospel, such is the price that is better than money and wages (כֶּסֶף and יְגִיעַ). Thus in eat good and your soul shall delight itself in fatness, "eat" and "enjoy itself" are meant in a spiritual sense. טוֹב, meaning "good" in general has a physical or spiritual sense according to the context (comp. Jer. xxxi. 12, 14; Prov. xix. 8; xxiv. 25, etc.). On the expression תִּתְעַנַּג בַּדֶּשֶׁן נ׳ comp. lviii. 14; lxvi. 11; Ps. xxxvii. 4; Job xxii. 26; xxvii. 10, and with respect to דֶּשֶׁן Ps. xxxvi.-iv.—lxiii. 6), and תְּחִי נַפְשְׁכֶם, comp. Ezek. xviii. 27; Ps. cxix. 175.

Ver. 3. The LORD then demands faith in His word. But this word is extraordinary: for it announces the salvation that the Servant of Jehovah acquired by His suffering and death (liii). Those to whom the gospel of Jesus Christ is no foolishness, no offence, receive the mercies of David. In the Crucified One David is latent. The inscription above the cross unconsciously spoke the truth. The thief is a type to us of the faith that is demanded here. He saw in the Crucified the king. Therefore he is also promised a participation in the kingly glory. On כָּרַת בְּרִית לְ "to make a covenant," see Text. and Gram.). Covenant making is an ancient thing in the relation between Jehovah and the people Israel. The LORD foretold to the people salvation and the Saviour in a gradual way, always increasing in definiteness and clearness, until at last He informs the chosen king David that He will found for him an everlasting, all-comprehending kingdom on the basis of the sonship of God (2 Sam. vii. 12 sqq.). This promise is the highest and most glorious of all the promises ever yet made to Abraham and his seed, in this respect, that it comprehends all preceding promises, frees them from their generality, lays them on a definite head, and defines them as a promise of a dominion that shall far excel all others in extent, duration, title and power. This promise is also the foundation of all later promises. For all of them add nothing essentially new. Although they add the nearer definition that Israel itself, and the promised Son of David shall become servants of God, i. e., must pass through suffering to glory, and although they at later periods refine and paint up both these particulars more in detail and in a variety of ways, still that word of the Prophet Nathan continues to be the principal stock around which all later Messianic prophecies are grouped. The mercies of David therefore are those promises of mercy that were given to David in respect to an other, higher David. These mercies of David are also a covenant, as the promises given to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob are called a "covenant" (comp. Gen. xv. 18; xvii. 2 sqq.; Exod. ii. 24; Lev. xxvi. 42; 2 Kings xiii. 23, etc.). For in them God not only makes a gift, but requires a corresponding performance. It is true that this covenant has the peculiarity, that it is not broken by single acts of unfaithfulness on the part of men. For it is an everlasting covenant. Such acts of backsliding cause the LORD to use severity, but not to break the covenant. Such also is doubtless the meaning of the word נֶאֱמָנִים ["sure"]. At least it should be noted that Ps. lxxxix. after saying in vers. 29, 30 (28, 29): "My mercy will I keep for him forevermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him (נֶאֱמֶנֶת לוֹ). His seed also will I make to endure forever, and his throne as the days of heaven," it proceeds to say ver. 31 sqq. (30): "if his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail [lit. Marg.]," etc. It is in the highest degree probable that Ps. lxxxix. hovered in the mind of the Prophet as he wrote these words. KOESTER says in regard to this: "Ps. lxxxix. fere commentarii instar est ad nostrum locum. Similitudo tanta est, ut prophetam nostrum psalmi hujus auctorem esse conjicere liceat" (comp. STIER p. 548, Anm.). Although the latter idea is inadmissible, still the expression חַסְדֵי יהוה with which Ps. lxxxix. begins, (and which occurs beside only Ps. cvii. 43; Isa. lxiii. 7; Lam. iii. 22), reminds one of our text, as do also verses 4, 29, 38, 50 (3, 27, 37, 49); and in general the object of the whole Psalm is to hold up to God the promises given to David, and on the ground of them to implore protection in pressing need. Comp. remarks below on ver. 4, and Text. and Gram. on ver. 3, חַסְדֵי דָוִד.

Ver. 4. If in vers. 1–3, the Prophet has in mind the time when no longer personal works, but the believing acceptance of God's word is decisive in respect to receiving salvation, then he stands with his thought in the midst of the Messianic period. And, indeed, the further particular pressed upon him, that not Israel alone will receive that salvation, but also the Gentile world. He sees the barriers broken down that separate Israel from the Gentiles. The David that was promised to the first David is made by the Lord a witness of the nations, i. e., one that shall testify salvation to the nations. That the suffix in נְתַתִּיו ("I have given him") refers to David ver. 3, is certain. But the one made a witness cannot possibly be the first David. How would a statement come into this context concerning the task to be fulfilled by the successor of Saul in his time? According to vers. 1–3, the Prophet's thoughts are in the future when the marvellous change will take place, that God will no longer require giving from men but only receiving. Therefore I take the expression "mercies of David" as having a double meaning, viz.: not only the promises given to David, but also pointing to David. This of course assumes that the name David may be applied to the Messiah also. But this assumption is fully justified, since not only later, but also earlier prophets expressly designate the Messiah by the name of David (Hos. iii. 5; Jer. xxx. 9; Ezek. xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24, 25). The expression עֵד ("witness") likewise appears to me to be borrowed from Ps. lxxxix. For in ver. 38 of this Psalm the author concludes the representation of the promise given to David with the words: וְעֵד בַּשַּׁחַק נֶאֱמָן. I share the view of Maurer, Hitzig, Delitzsch, Moll, etc., that by עד בשחק we are to understand God Himself (comp. Job xvi. 19, and regarding the expression שחק Ps. lxxxix. 7). In our text, then, David, who fulfills "the mercies of David," is called a witness of the nations, because He testifies also to the Gentile world what God had testified to the people Israel, because He carries out to the Gentiles that same gospel to whose believing acceptance Israel was summoned in vers. 2, 3. In this peaceful way, not by force of arms, shall the other David also become a prince and commander of the nations. To take עֵד in the sense of "lawgiver," with Hitzig, is altogether arbitrary. On the construction of ver. 4 b see Text. and Gram. Any way it would express, that the second David shall be the same in respect to the nations that the first was in respect to the people Israel.

Ver. 5. But the manner in which the second David will be a witness of God to the nations will be, not that He will personally and directly exercise the office of witness, but He will let it be exercised by His people Israel to whom He immediately belongs. Although I regard the "witness" of ver. 4 as being the second and not the first David, still I believe that the Prophet here has in mind those words of the first David in Ps. xviii. 43 sqq. where, speaking primarily of His activity as an earthly conqueror, he also certainly as a "prophet" (Acts ii. 30), speaks of the call of His kingdom to make spiritual conquests. Especially our words "a nation whom thou knewest not," recall the words Ps. xviii. 44 (43): "a people whom I have not known shall serve me." The disciples and Apostles of the Lord, who received the command to preach the gospel to all nations, were, in fact, Israelites. Through them Israel called nations that it previously did not know, and nations that before knew nothing of Israel hastened to it (ii. 2, 3). Israel and the Gentile world have even found in the second David a common centre that draws one to the other. This thought is so expressed in ver. 5 b, that there Jehovah is designated as the object and goal of this running hither. They came, not for Israel's sake, but for the sake of Jehovah its God, and not to Israel, but to the Holy One of Israel. But it is nevertheless an honor of a high and unique sort, that Israel is favored with being the instrument of calling the nations to Jehovah. And the honor that the Lord has purposed for Israel, has its root just therein; for this reason it is עֶלְיוֹן עַל כָּל־הַגּוֹיִם ("high above all nations" (Deut. iv. 6 sqq.; xxvi. 19; xxviii. 1; 2 Sam. vii. 23 sq.) and "servant of Jehovah," so far as this expression also designates the call of Israel to be the medium of salvation ("salvation is of the Jews," John iv. 22, comp. xliii. 19). And it belongs also to this, that Israel is repeatedly called directly the "witness of Jehovah" (xliii. 10; xliv. 8). Besides, this clause of the verse is repeated verbatim lx. 9. As Israel is everywhere thought of as masculine (אֱלֹהֶיךָ, אֵלֶיךָ, יְדָעוּךָ) the suffix of פֵּאֲרָךְ cannot be a fem. suffix, but is a masculine pausal form, as in עָנָךְ xxx. 19.

2. WHAT HINDERANCES AND SCRUPLES ARE TO BE REMOVED, THAT THE NEW WAY OF APPROPRIATING SALVATION MAY OBTAIN.

Chapter LV. 6–13.

6 Seek ye the Lord while he may be found,
Call ye upon him while he is near:
7 Let the wicked forsake his way,
And [1]the unrighteous man his thoughts:
And let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him;
And to our God, for [2]he will abundantly pardon.
8 For my thoughts are not your thoughts,
Neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord.

9 For as the heavens are higher than the earth,
So are my ways higher than your ways,
And my thoughts than your thoughts.
10 For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven,
And returneth not thither,
But watereth the earth,
And maketh it bring forth and bud,
That it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater:
11 So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth:
It shall not return unto me void,
But it shall accomplish that which I please,
And it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.
12 For ye shall go out with joy,
And be led forth with peace:
The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing,
And all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.
13 Instead of the thorn shall come up the [a]fir tree,
And instead of the [b]brier shall come up the myrtle tree:
And it shall be to the Lord for a name,
For an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

[1] Heb. the man of iniquity.
[2] Heb. he will multiply to pardon.
[a] cypress.
[b] flea-wort.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 9. Before גָבְהוּ the particle of comparison is omitted; comp. Jer. iii. 20.

Ver. 10. נתן, subject גשם and שׁלג.—The imperf. יֵרֵד designates what happens continuously; יָשׁוּב that which is supposed, not actual; הרוה, הולידה, הצמיחה, נתן on the other hand designate simple objective facts.

Ver. 11. The accusative אֲשֶׁר before שְׁלַחְתִּי is quite normal. Verbs of teaching, commanding, commissioning, as is well known, stand with a double accusative; comp. Exod. iv. 28; 1 Sam. xxi. 3, etc.

Ver. 13. היה is to be construed neutrally.——One might take שֵׁם here as meaning "monumentum," as in 2 Sam. viii. 13, and as Isaiah uses it lvi. 5. But one does better to take it in the sense of "renown" (comp. Deut. xxvi. 19; Zeph. iii. 19); but אות, on account of the addition אשר לא יכרת, had better be taken in the sense of "signum, monumentum," that which, as it were, bears and preserves the renown (comp. xix. 20; Deut. xxviii. 46; Num. xvii. 3, etc.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Seek the Lord——abundantly pardon.—Vers. 6–7. The entire section vers. 6–11 deals with the difficulties that actually, or in human opinion, oppose that "hearing" that the Lord has demanded in vers. 2, 3. The first difficulty is, that so many men are unable to make up their minds to lay hold, i. e., to respond to the Lord's call, and on their side to desire and seek what offers itself to them. For, of course, the soul must on its part incline to the Lord, who inclines Himself to it. This is the "seeking" and "calling" of which verse 6 speaks. Believing is a hard matter. Hence many hesitate until it is too late. And hence the Prophet's warning, to turn to the Lord in season, to seek and call on Him. For the Lord is not near and able to be found without limitation. Hast thou suffered thy heart to harden or become callous, or hast thou suffered the time to lapse wherein believing is any way possible, i. e., the period of earthly life, that ends with death and with the world beyond which begins the seeing,—then thou findest the Lord no more, He withdraws. Thou canst then no more believe, even though wishing painfully to do so, as Esau who found no room for repentance though he sought it with tears (Heb. xii. 17), or as those who have slipped past the fateful "to-day" (comp. Heb. iii. 7 sqq.; iv. 7 and the parables of the invited guests Luke xiv. 17 sqq., and the laborers in the vineyard Matth. xx. 1 sqq.). The second and chiefest hinderance to believing is this, that men cleave too much to evil. They love it too much; all their imagining and doing is directed to it. They cannot get rid of sin, they are under the ban and constraint of it. Hence the Prophet warns, that the wicked first of all must forsake his wicked way and the man of iniquity (Prov. vi. 12, 18, which likely was in the Prophet's mind) his thoughts. This is the negative side of the exhortation. With this is joined the positive; the wicked should turn to Jehovah a. to the end that He may have mercy on him, b. for the reason that Jehovah is (not a strange but) Israel's ("our") God, and is inclined and accustomed to pardon abundantly.

2. For My thoughts——whereto I sent it.—Vers. 8–11. These verses reply to those objections that the natural man opposes to the new way of salvation proposed by God in vers. 1–3. The first objection runs: it is inconceivable that man can obtain salvation simply by believing and not by his own works. The Prophet declares that this objection is groundless. For, he says, My thoughts are not your thoughts, etc. What is foolishness with men is wisdom with God, 1 Cor. i. 18 sqq. God is great in littleness, strong in weakness, glorious in lowliness, wise in foolishness. Just for that reason He is approachable. The poor and lowly do not take offence at this form of His appearance. No, just thus He is comprehensible to them. But the wise and prudent are sifted by it as through a sieve. Whoever holds his head so high that he cannot go through the narrow gate, must remain without. He is not fit to be in the kingdom of God. But whoever is not offended at the gospel of the manger and of the cross, will be sensible that there is in it a power and wisdom that is as high as heaven above all the wisdom of both scribes and philosophers. The second objection runs: the sermon that, according to vers. 1-3, demands only hearing and accepting must remain without effect. This objection also is groundless. For it is with the word that announces God's lofty thoughts, as it is with the products of the physical atmosphere that descend to the earth, in order to render the latter capable of unfolding its life-forces. Rain and snow do not return without accomplishing their ends, but they fructify (הוליד cause to give birth, comp. lxvi. 9; 1 Chr. ii. 18) the earth, and cause it to bring forth צִמַּח (sprouts comp. on iv. 2) and give seed to the sower and bread to the eater. The efficiency of the word should be designated as (see Text and G.) an actual certainty. I translate כי אם simply by "but." The word of God (and one may think here of all that is called λόγος θεοῦ), does not return empty. Thus it is expressly said of it that it does return. And in fact every thing that goes out from God, also that word spoken or written by men by the power of His Spirit, must, as an eternal, real, divine existence, unite itself again with its original source; or more correctly: what comes out of God remains also eternally in God.

3. For ye shall——not be cut off.—Vers. 12, 13. כִּי, "for", beginning ver. 12, introduces the proof of the statement of ver. 11. The word of God shall return, not unsuccessful, but wholly successful. For Israel shall go forth and be led with joy. Such is just the efficiency of that word of God that is meant, vers. 1-3. It is clear that the Prophet cannot mean the future departure out of the Babylonian exile. But he does mean an exodus of which that physical exodus is only the type. For the historical redemption out of the Exile is both a type and a pledge of the redemption out of the exile of sin, out of the bondage of the devil. The same God that would and could redeem "the fleshly Israel" out of the corporeal exile, will by force of the same love and power redeem the spiritual Israel out of the spiritual exile. And in that exodus Israel will rejoice, and be led in peace. And the non-personal creation will share in Israel's joy: the mountains and the hills will break forth into singing, and all trees clap their hands. That this could not be on the occasion of the corporeal exodus from Babylon, is clear. It is manifest, then, that the Prophet intends a much higher, a spiritual exodus. But this latter also has its gradations. When once nature itself is penetrated with spirit and glorified (lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; Rom. viii. 21), then, what in the word of the Prophet is not merely poetic imagery, but real contents of life, will at last receive its entire accomplishment. In the time the Prophet thinks of, noxious growths will give place to noble growths that bring a blessing with them. Instead of נַעֲצוּץ (again only vii. 19, therefore a genuine Isaianic word) shall grow up the cypress (comp. on xli. 19), instead of the flea-bane (סִרְפַּד, ἀπ. λεγ., its meaning is debated, comp. GESEN., Thes., and HERZ., R.-Enc. XIV., p. 666. I translate, with DELITZSCH, after the LXX., AQU. THEOD., κόνυζα, flea-wort, flea-bane), the myrtle (see on xli. 19). We had similar expressions, xxxv. 1 sqq.; xli. 18 sq.; xliv. 23; xlix. 13; lii. 9. This glorious act of salvation shall redound to the LORD's everlasting renown, and be an everlasting monument of His love, power, and wisdom.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lv. 1-3. "Hac periphrasi allegorica (sitiendi et carendi pecunia) notantur ii, quibus arida est conscientia ex aestu irae divinae propter peccata, quique anxie sitiunt gratiam Dei ac remissionem peccatorum, quam se propriis operibus consequi posse plane desperant."—FOERSTER.

2. On lv. 1. "It is no legal commanding and ordering, that gives nothing of which it speaks, but an evangelical offer and invitation, that also gives what it demands. He who gives the command to come, also gives the strength to enable one to come, i. e., faith (Matth. xi. 28; Jno. vi. 27, 44)."—STARKE.

3. On lv. 1. "Robustis, qui tentationibus peccati et mortis exercentur, datur vinum ad consolationem; rudibus autem et infirmis datur lac ad alimentum, quo instituuntur et docentur."—LUTHER. "In Proconsular Africa the ancient church had a custom of offering to those baptized milk and honey for the new childhood and childishness. But JEROME informs us that they took also wine and milk."—STIER. Offering milk and honey was an oriental custom.

4. On lv. 1, 2. "The salvation of Christ cannot be bought for money, as Peter let Simon know when he offered money for it: 'Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money' (Acts viii. 20). It is not to be obtained by any sort of personal merit or work, trouble, or labor (whoever would have it thus fatigues himself in vain, and can never be satisfied, nor find any comfort for his soul), but by the pure, undeserved divine grace (Rom. iii. 23 sq.; Eph. ii. 8)."—RENNER.

5. On lv. 2. "Est confutatio et abrogatio omnium aliarum religionum, doctrinarum et operum. Quod omnes religiones, omnes doctrinae et studia omnia extra hanc gratiae doctrinam sint frustranea et tamen laboriosa, quae non tranquillum faciant animum sed affligant. Diligenter autem notabis hoc praedicatum, quod tribuit omnibus justitiis, quae sunt extra gratiam, quod scilicet sint laboriosae et tamen frustraneae, sicut sub papa experti sumus."—LUTHER.

"The Papists make God a sun shop-keeper, who would sell his heaven."—FOERSTER.

6. On lv. 3. The peculiarity of "the sure mercies of David" consists in this, that under no circumstances can they be withdrawn from the throne and kingdom of David. Individuals, yea, even whole races and generations, that belonged to those entitled to them, may be excluded on account of their sin. But taking all together, David's throne and kingdom shall stand and develop, grow and increase to the elevation and extent that God has determined for it. It is to regard the matter from another side when one says: "No man should doubt the grace of God or despair of it. And when we are assaulted by the doubt whether God will even preserve us in the knowledge of Himself, we should oppose to it the sure mercies of David. For mountains and hills may fall away, but His grace shall not remove from us (liv. 10)."—CRAMER.

7. On lv. 3, 4. "But what is the contents of the sure mercies promised to David? It is this High, Wonderful One, whom God has set for a Witness to men, in whom they should see the divinity, yea, whom He has made Head of the nations! Therefore a Person? Yes, indeed; the Messiah, the God-man, of whom Isaiah has so long spoken mysteriously, as of the Servant of Jehovah. He is a Person! For I (myself even a person) am surely not to go down beneath myself and find my soul's contents and life in a thing! That were utterly heathenish. No. A Person is the sure mercy of David, and, indeed, the greatest of all: He in whom God bears witness of Himself to mankind, and in whom God comprehends all mankind as in their Head, Son of God, Son of man, the eternally youthful Lord of mankind, and also her, the Virgin Mary's, Son. Of such a Lord the virgin mother, and mankind will not have to complain. Since this one must arise in Israel, the true Israel, the Apostle choir, shall draw the remotest heathen to itself, and the latter shall run up with joy because they recognize the almighty, eternal God in His church, as He glorifies it."—DIEDRICH.

8. On lv. 6. "Quaerite eum, dum estis in corpore, dum datur locus poenitentiae, et quaerite non loco sed fide. . . . . Appropinquat autem appropinquantibus sibi (Jac. iv. 8), et filio longo post tempore revertenti laetus occurrit." JEROME.

9. On lv. 7. "That is the only way of salvation. First, for a man to turn away from his own will of evil thoughts, and then conversion to God who is rich in pardon, and His pity will not tarry." UMBREIT.

10. On lv. 8. "One of the most sublime passages of Scripture, where more than commonly the נְאֻם יְהוָה should evince itself as a truth to every conscience. . . . . Whoever in such discourses is unable to hear the speaking Person of God, lacks something in his own personality; he has not yet become a thou that the greatest I may address." STIER.

11. On lv. 8, 9. The human heart comprehends with difficulty the doctrine that "God hath concluded all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all." But such as do comprehend it exclaim with Paul: "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!" (Rom. xi. 32 sq.).—"Quanto sum sublimior, tanto et clementior." GROTIUS in STIER.—"Not merely the thoughts of an adulterer, fornicator, thief, are deep beneath the divine thoughts, but also those that to reason are good, holy human thoughts of reformation, of the way of salvation and righteousness, are not good for anything, until they attain the elevation of compassion and pardon. Especially in respect to justification, God declares all דְּרָכִים ["ways"], i. e. even religions, doctrines and wise ones among men, basely false, because in the best case they ever obstinately wish to bring price and money for His grace! They ever wish to help themselves, though it is before their eyes that even in nature nothing grows on earth without rain from above." STIER.

12. On lv. 10, 11. "The prophetic preaching since Deut. xxxii. 1 is frequently compared to rain, and the word is also conceived of as a messenger, envoy of God, ix. 7 (8); Ps. cvii. 20; cxlvii. 15 sqq. The personification assumes that the word is no mere sound or letter. Emitted from the mouth of God, it acquires form, and in this form it conceals divine life by reason of its divine origin, and so it runs, alive of God, endued with divine power, charged with divine commissions, as a swift messenger through nature and the world of men, there for instance to melt the ice, here to protect and save, nor does it come back from its round of errands until it has made the will of its Sender operative. This return of the word of God also presupposes a divine essence in that word. The will of God that is concrete and audible in the word is the expression of His essence, and resolves itself into this again as soon as it is fulfilled. The images chosen are rich with allusions. As snow and rain are the mediate cause of growth, and thus also of the enjoyment of what is harvested, so also by the word of God the ground and soil of the human heart is softened, refreshed and made fertile and vegetative, and this word gives the Prophet, who is like the sower, the seed which he scatters, and it brings with it bread that nourishes the soul; for every word that proceeds from the mouth of God is also bread (Deut. viii. 3). The particular point of comparison, however, is the energy with which the word converts itself into reality."—DELITZSCH.

13. On lv. 12, 13. "Away with the base, stale thoughts, as if God the LORD were here only letting lofty words sound through His Prophet, about all the conveniences of the journey for the small number of Jews of that time! This exodus, this return home of the redeemed, is something quite different, extends indeed in the long perspective through much and various till the goal is reached. The first exodus from the world and sin is meant, thus indeed from Israel that has become unholy, into the reproach of Christ—furthermore the whole way of the church since that time, with all its recurring goings forth, presenting themselves in such variety of ways, finally, and indeed in the most perfect sense, the last redemption to the glory of the children. For again Israel's return out of obduracy will furnish the last prelude that will be the reconciliation of type and reality." STIER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lv. 1–5. The LORD a merchant. 1) He invites the whole world to buy. 2) The price He demands is not money nor performance, but that men will let Him present His wares to them. 3) His wares; He offers the mercy of David, that gives peace to all the world.

2. On lv. 1–5. MISSIONARY SERMON. "God's invitation to the sure mercies in Christ. 1) We hear in it the call of a love that wills that help be extended to all men. 2) We see in it the law of a wisdom that has resolved to save all nations by a Mediator. 3) We find in it the reminder of a promise that continues still to-day to be fulfilled among the nations."—"Missions the best glorifying of the kingdom of Christ. For 1) They help the constitution of the kingdom to attain its rights. 2) They set the LORD of the kingdom in the full light. 3) They bring the distant members of the kingdom into full course." DR. ZAPFF.

3. On lv. 1. "What God does not work in us Himself He does not recognize as His own. Therefore no compelling law is needed here, no command nor prohibition. For faith does all that is to be done in a free spirit. That is, it surrenders itself to God, who works everything in us out of grace. And that, also, is what Isaiah preaches, that we should come to the LORD in order to hear Him and to buy wine and milk for nothing." ARNDT, Wahres Christenthum, III. 2, 4.

4. [On lv. 1. "Our buying without money intimates, (1.) That the gifts offered us are invaluable and such as no price can be set upon. Wisdom is that which cannot be gotten for gold. (2.) That He who offers them has no need of us, nor of any returns we can make Him. He makes us these proposals, not because He has occasion to sell, but because He has a disposition to give. (3.) That the things offered are already bought and paid for. Christ purchased them at the full value, with price, not with money, but with His own blood, 1 Pet. i. 19. (4.) That we shall be welcome to the benefits of the promise, though we are utterly unworthy of them, and cannot make a tender of anything that looks like a valuable consideration." M. HENRY].

5. On lv. 6. "God has neither time nor place, is ever ready to help and to give, stands every moment before our door (Rev. iii. 20). His time is all time, but our time is not all time" (Ps. xcv. 8; Heb. iii. 7, 13, 15; iv. 7). ARNDT, ibid. II., 34, 12.

6. [On lv. 7. A call to repent. I. WHAT IT IS TO REPENT. (1.) It is to turn from sin; it is to forsake it, and with loathing, "forsake his way." There must be not only a change of way, but a change of mind, "forsake his thoughts." Repentance, if it be true, strikes at the root and washes the heart from wickedness. (2.) It is to return to the Lord: as to our sovereign Lord against whom we have rebelled; as to the fountain of life-giving waters.—II. THE ENCOURAGEMENT TO REPENT. (1) God will have mercy. Misery is the object of mercy. Now the consequences of sin, by which we have become truly miserable (Ezek. xvi. 5, 6), and the nature of repentance, by which we are made sensible of our misery and are brought to bemoan ourselves (Jer. xxxi. 18) make us objects of pity, and with God these are tender mercies. (2.) He will abundantly pardon. Though our sins have been very great and very many, and oft repeated, and we are still prone to offend. After M. HENRY].

7. On lv. 8, 9. "The consolations afforded by these words. 1) We learn from them self-renunciation. 2) We learn faith from them. 3) We gain from them the right hope." ED. ENGELHARDT, in Manch. Gaben, etc., III. Jahrg., p. 602.

8. On lv. 8–11. "The comparison of the divine thoughts and ways with ours. 1) They are different from ours. 2) They are more efficient than ours." NESSELMANN, Ibid., 1870, p. 477.

9. On lv. 8, 9. "One must take care that an exhortation to repentance with the promise of the gracious forgiveness of sins precede. . . . Thus the meaning is: do not wonder that I say, with God is much forgiveness, and He will have compassion even on the wicked and malicious, if they turn to Him. For ye men are so minded that ye do not willingly forgive and forget, when one has treated you roughly and often offended you. Therefore ye judge me according to your sentiment and thoughts, as if I too were so hard and unwilling to forgive. But my thoughts and my sentiment are in this respect as far from yours as heaven from earth." SCRIVER, Seelenschatz, II., Th. 8 Pred. § 13.

10. On lv. 10, 11. Comparison of the word with rain and snow. 1) Both come down from heaven. 2) Both operate fruitfully upon the earth. 3) Both return to heaven, but not without having successfully done their work on earth.

11. On lv. 12, 13. The departure of the people of God out of the exile of sin and evil. 1) That such a thing is to be looked for. 2) When it is to be looked for. 3) How it will be accomplished (in joy which shall be felt not only by redeemed mankind, but also by the impersonal creation).

VIII.—THE EIGHTH DISCOURSE.

CHAPTER LVI. 1–9.

The new salvation mediated by the Servant of God was described chap. liv. in its general, objective aspect; in chap. lv. in respect to the subjective appropriation of salvation. Chap. lvi., in a few but plain strokes, shows us the same as the source of an entirely new ethical, social and physical regulation of life. For vers. 1, 2 hold out the prospect of a holy walk, vers. 3–7 of a new legal regulation respecting strangers and eunuchs, finally vers. 8–9, that the salvation shall be extended also to the impersonal creature.

The vers. lvi. 10-12 belong as to substance to the following chapter.

The moral, social and physical fruits of the new way of salvation.

CHAP. LVI. 1–9.

1 THUS saith the LORD,
Keep ye [1]judgment, and do justice:
For my salvation is near to come,
And my righteousness to be revealed.
2 Blessed is the man that doeth this,
And the son of man that layeth hold on it;
That keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And keepeth his hand from doing any evil.
3 Neither let [a]the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the LORD, speak
Saying, The LORD [b]hath utterly separated me from his people:
Neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree.
4 For thus saith the LORD unto the eunuchs
That keep my sabbaths,
And choose the things that please me,
And take hold of my covenant;
5 Even unto them will I give in mine house
And within my walls a [c]place and a name
Better than of sons and of daughters:
I will give them an everlasting name,
That shall not be cut off.
6 Also [d]the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the LORD,
To serve him, and to love the name of the LORD,
To be his servants,
Every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And taketh hold of my covenant:
7 Even them will I bring to my holy mountain,
And make them joyful in my house of prayer:
Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar:
For mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people.
8 The Lord God [Jehovah] which gathereth the outcasts of Israel, saith,
Yet will I gather others to him,
[2]Beside those that are gathered unto him.
9 All ye beasts of the field, come [e]to devour,
Yea, all ye beasts in the forest.

[1] Or, equity.
[2] Heb. To his gathered.

[a] the foreigners.
[b] will utterly separate.
[c] mark.
[d] the foreigners.
[e] to eat.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. צדקה and משפט in parallelism as in xxviii. 17; xxxii. 16; xxxiii. 5; lix. 9, 14.

Ver. 2. זאת and בָּהּ can of course be grammatically referred to what follows. But grammar just as much admits of their being referred to what precedes. And I prefer the latter, because then there is no need of taking שֹׁמֵר for שָׁמוֹר or לִשְׁמֹר, but it can be understood simply as in apposition with אֱנוֹשׁ and בן־אדם in a specifying sense.——שֹׁמֵר שׁ׳ מחללו is not to be understood as if מן simply intimated from what the Sabbath should be kept, in which sense שמר and מן are frequently conjoined (e. g., שָׁמַר רַגְלְךָ מִלָּכֶד "he keeps thy foot from the snare" Prov. iii. 26, etc.). מן has here, as often, the negative meaning (comp. xliv. 18; xlix. 15; lviii. 13, etc.). We must therefore translate: "who keeps the Sabbath (comp. Exod. xxxi. 14) so that he does not profane it." For the suffix in חללו were quite superfluous if it were intended to be said only in general from what the Sabbath must be kept. In the latter case one would rather look for an infinitive passive or an abstract noun: he who keeps the Sabbath from being profaned, or from profanation. Moreover this involves the meaning that one must not only keep the Sabbath himself, but also guard it from every profanation by others. But the suffix is pertinent if the meaning is: he who keeps the Sabbath so that he does not profane it (the Sabbath, not anything in general). This explanation is commended by the fact that the same construction recurs lviii. 13. Of course, then, the following clause שמר ידו וגו׳ must be similarly explained.

Ver. 3. נִלְוָה is, from its ending, not the participle, but the perfect. If the pointing be correct, then the mode of expression belongs to the instances where the article involves a pronominal meaning: Josh. x. 24; Gen. xxi. 3; Ezra viii. 25; 1 Chr. xxix. 17; xxvi. 28.——In מעל עמו the על has a cumulative sense, as in xxxii. 10; Gen. xxviii. 9; xxxi. 50, etc.

Ver. 4. As regards the construction, one sees from ובחרו, that the Prophet arranges the clauses by that rule according to which, from the view-point of the first stage of the future attained, what remains is presented in the perfect as the simple unfolding of that stage. For the sake of variety, and doubtless also for the purpose of denoting the persistency of the holding fast, the Prophet expresses the third condition by the participle. For this reason we are not to construe מחזיקים as in apposition, say, with סריסים, but it stands parallel with ובחרו. The pronomen separatum הֵם is wanting, as very often happens, ii. 6; xxiv. 2; xxxiv. 21; xxxvii. 26; xli. 7, etc.——The words of Jehovah, announced by כה אמר ה׳, begin with אשר ישמרו as appears by the suffixes and afformatives of the first person.

Ver. 5. יָד וָשֵׁם, belong together as a double idea, and טוב מב׳ ומב׳ refers to it. Hence יָד cannot simply mean "side, place, share" (as e. g., Num. ii. 17; Deut. xxiii. 13; Gen. xlvi. 24, etc.), nor שֵׁם mean simply "name." But both together must designate a monument that preserves the memory of the name. In this sense יָד stands alone (2 Sam. xviii. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 12), and also שֵׁם (comp. on lv. 13). The combination has the force of a hendiadys: mark and memory = memorial mark.

Vers. 6, 7. אַהֲבָה is the infin. with the fem. ending ָה.——On יִקָּרֵא comp. liv. 5; xxxv. 8; lxii. 4, 12.

Ver. 8. Only here and Zech. xii. 1 is נאם so placed at the beginning. On the double name אדני יהוה see List.

Ver. 9. I construe כל חיתו שדי (instead of which xliii. 20 חַיַּת הַשָּׂדֶה) as the object of אֲקַבֵּץ ver. 8, and ver. 9 b as parallel clause. The form חַיְתוֹ (excepting in Zeph. ii. 14, where חַיְתוֹ גוֹי are spoken of, and thus the word is evidently used in a figurative sense), occurs only in connection with the substantives אֶרֶץ (Gen. i. 24; Ps. lxxix. 2), שָׂדַי (Ps. civ. 11) and יַעַר (Ps. l. 10; civ. 20). חיתו ארץ designates the totality of all beasts. The two halves of them are the חַיְתוֹ שָׂדַי and חַיְתוֹ יַעַר or בַּיַּעַר.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Thus saith the LORD——any evil.—Vers. 1, 2. It might appear from lv. 1–3, as if, for receiving the promised salvation, nothing more were necessary than receptivity, and as if all activity were excluded. That such is not the case is intimated already lv. 7, by the exhortation to penitent turning from evil and turning to the LORD. But the Prophet designedly declares in the present passage, that one should not suppose moral uncleanness is compatible with participation in the promised salvation. It is indeed God's free grace that accords to men the satisfaction spoken of in lv. 2, 3. But this grace is not only to make men blessed, but also to sanctify them. It is in fact impossible for one to enjoy the goodness of God, and at the same time to insult Him by transgressing His commandments. Such an exhortation is of course needless for those that have entered body and soul into the kingdom of God, i. e., for those that no longer live in the mortal body that is subject to sin. To all those that still stand in the conflict of this earthly life, the kingdom of God has only come near. To them the righteousness of God is not completely revealed (comp. Rom. viii. 24). When we note that the LORD, at the end of the first clause of ver. 1 requires of men that they "use righteousness," then the corresponding revelation of His righteousness, that He promises at the close of the verse, consist in this, that He for His part, as the one covenanting party (lv. 3), will keep what He has promised. Thus, too, it is said to Christians that have in faith laid hold of God's grace: "know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi. 9 sq.)? and: "this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, and of God" (Eph. v. 5); and: "follow after holiness, without which no man shall see the LORD" (Heb. xii. 14, comp. 1 Tim. vi. 11; 1 Thess. v. 23, etc.). Moreover the author of Ps. cvi. 3, seems to have had our passage before him.—Ver. 2. He that does what was required in ver. 1 (see Text. and Gram.), is to be esteemed blessed. For he has proved that he has true faith. Two commandments, or two categories of commandments, are named instead of all. First the Sabbath commandment. The Sabbath was the day consecrated to Jehovah. By its weekly recurrence, it was a standing admonition to the duty that Israel owed to Jehovah, and thus a touchstone of whether Israel would faithfully pay this duty. Hence it is called, Exod. xxxi. 13: "a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the LORD that doth sanctify you." Thus the Sabbath belonged to foundations of the Theocracy, its profanation was punished with death (Exod. xxxv. 2), which was to be inflicted by the whole congregation, and by means of stoning (Num. xv. 35). And keepeth his hand from doing any evil; one can say that in this clause the Prophet includes the sphere of the second table of the Decalogue. LUTHER says: Comprehendit nomine sabbati omnia ea, quas nos Deo debemus, hoc est primam tabulam. Rursus cum dicit "custodiens manus suas etc.," omnia caritatis opera complectitur, hoc est secundam tabulam. The Prophet means about the same that is demanded of the Israelites, i. 16, 17 (where see my comment). One may also say that he has in mind the image of the Old Testament צַדִּיק, the antithesis to which is the צְרִ״ן. It is moreover to be noted, that the Prophet, in contemplating the future Messianic salvation with reference to its moral behaviour, does so in the form of an exhortation. Although on the whole he gives a promise, still, agreeably to the nature of the subject, he appeals here with special emphasis also to the personal performance of men. His אַשְׁרֵי ver. 2 is conditioned on the admonition שמרו משפט ועשו צדקה ver. 1.

2. Neither let the son——for all people. Vers. 3–7. In these verses the Prophet shows that the new way of salvation will have in its train an entirely new order of law and life. The natural basis of the old covenant was the descent from Abraham, through the lineage consecrated by means of circumcision. This explains why the reception of strangers into this holy national communion could take place only under certain onerous conditions. For it was possible (Deut. xxiii. 4 sqq., comp. SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. Recht. chap. 100). Now evidently the Prophet would say, that the foreigners (בְּנֵי נֵכָר a broader conception than גֵּרִים; for גֵּר is only the foreigner sojourning in the land, whereas נָכְרִי or בֶּן־נֵכָר designates the foreigner generally, comp. xiv. 1, וְנִלְוָה הַגֵּר עֲלֵיהֶם; SAALSCHUETZ, l. c. p. 684 sq.), in the new covenant, will suppose that there will be greater stringency in the legal requirements respecting the reception of foreigners into the Israelitish communion in consequence of the enhanced glory. Thus the Prophet assumes, that Israel will be so glorious in the new covenant, that the inferiority of the heathen will, in contrast, only appear in so much the stronger light, that consequently nothing more will be said of receiving the latter into Israel, yea, that the question will even be raised of excluding those already received. A נִלְוָה אל־יהוה is one that has joined himself to the קְהַל יהוה "assembly of Jehovah," and has been received into it (comp. Neh. x. 29). The expression occurs in this sense xiv. 1; Jer. l. 5; Zech. ii. 15; Esth. ix. 27. From ver. 6, we will learn that an allusion to offering one's self for the priestly ministry is not foreign to the word. It seems to me to be a needless inquiry, whether the Prophet means by נלוה proselytes of the gate or proselytes of righteousness. For he would evidently say, that all those who are unable to trace back the origin of their race to the root of Israel, will question, whether, because not predestined by birth to the glory of this people, thus because not noble enough, they must not be expelled again from the national communion of Israel, spite of their reception into it, and spite of their having thereby become כְּיִשְׂרָאֵל לְכָל־דָּבָר (comp. LEYRER in HERZ. R.-Encycl. XII. p. 244). The Prophet negatives this inquiry, because the new covenant will rest on a totally different basis from the old. Not fleshly descent, not works of the law will be the chief thing, but the receptivity for God's word, and the disposition to receive His gift as a gift of grace (lv. 1–3). This negation is followed by another relating to the quite similar apprehension ascribed to the eunuchs. He, that on account of sexual impotency was unable to propogate his race, was, according to the Old Testament view, a man living in a certain measure under a curse. For since the Old Testament knows no continuance of life beyond the present, but only a continuance of life in the present in children, therefore the want of children appears to it ignominious punishment (comp. iv. 1; Gen. xxx. 23; 1 Sam. i. 5 sqq.; ii. 1 sqq. Luke i. 25).* A eunuch in the proper sense was, according to Deut. xxiii. 2, excluded forever from admission into the congregation. He could not continue to live, he was excluded from the possibility of co-operating in preserving the natural basis on which the whole Israelitish communion rested. Such a one must, of course, in the old covenant regard himself as a dry, unfruitful tree. There would be no reason for this in the new covenant, which makes the everlasting life depend on spiritual and not on fleshly conditions.

Ver. 4. The Prophet now names three such spiritual conditions of life. In their enumeration there is a progression from the special to the general. As the first he names the observance of a definite single commandment, that regarding the Sabbath. As already remarked, it belonged to the foundations of the Theocracy. At first sight the mention of this commandment gives the impression of Old Testament narrowness. And indeed we have observed often already, how the prophets continue to be rooted in their own times, and hence paint the future with the colors of the present.† But it is also to be considered, that the Prophet certainly knew how to distinguish between a merely outward and truly spiritual fulfilment of the Sabbath-commandment. He must, according to the whole character of his prophecy, have the latter in his mind. He thinks of the Sabbaths as the halting places of religious life, where the pilgrim provides himself with bread and water of life for the next stretch of life's way, until at last he arrives where all life is a great, holy Sabbath, i. e., an eternal resting in God. "The rest of God on the seventh creative day, that has no evening, hovers over the whole course of the world, in order at last to receive it into itself." ŒHLER. The second condition is expressed more generally, whereby it is to be noted that the expression בחרו designates as the right obedience that which is voluntary, and rests on an inward harmony with the divine will. The third and most general condition, is holding fast to the covenant of

* [See note, p. 77.—TR.]

† [The remarks of the Author on this mention of the Sabbath, and all "the impression of Old Testament narrowness" of which he would divest it, belong to a condition of "rootedness" in a state of religious life that has lost much of the blessing of the Sabbath. Those who believe in the perpetual obligation of the Fourth Commandment, and have lived in church communions that have observed the command, and have religious traditions through generations of Sabbath-keeping people, will see no "Old Testament narrowness" in the language of the Prophet. On the contrary, we must see in this language the express revelation, that the new covenant is not to involve an abrogation of the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment; that Sabbath is, in fact, to be more honored than ever, and the keeping of it is to be the first privilege of those that hold fast to that covenant. Though part of the foundations of the Theocracy, it did not pass away with the latter. Some of those foundations last still, e. g., the Abrahamic covenant.—TR.]

God in general. for to this belongs not only the right activity, but also the right receptivity (lv. 3). In this connection it seems to me inadmissible to think specially of the covenant of circumcision, when just in ver. 3, the irrelevancy of fleshly birth and generation has been emphasized.

Ver. 5. I will give them in My house and in My walls a mark and memory better than sons and daughters. On יד ושם ["a place and a name" English Version] see Text. and Gram. ["As the meaning place (for יד) is admissible in 2 Sam. xviii. 18, as in many other cases, it appears to be entitled to the preference." J. A. ALEX.]. The LORD will set up this mark in His house and in His walls. The Temple walls are not elsewhere made prominent, whereas the city walls are. For not only does the wall, in common usage, (comp. intra, extra muros: Ps. cxxii. 7) represent the circuit of the city, but it is personified as the representative of the city community (Lam. ii. 8, 18). So I believe here, the Prophet would denote the ecclesiastical and political communion, the ecclesiastical and political citizenship. The LORD will give the eunuchs a memorial-mark that will better preserve their name than sons and daughters, whose succession any way must at last become extinct, that is, an everlasting name that shall never be cut off. Note the repetition from lv. 13. ["A beautiful coincidence and partial fulfilment of the promise is pointed out by J. D. MICHAELIS, in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch, whose conversion is recorded Acts viii., and whose memory is far more honored in the church than it could have been by a long line of illustrious descendants." J. A. ALEX.]. What shall this everlasting name be? Living on in the memory of after-times? Yet just how will this be secured? Sons and daughters, in fact, only take the place in the Old Testament of personal immortality in the New Testament sense. The everlasting name is nothing else than everlasting personal continuance as it is promised in 1 Cor. xv. 29 sqq. on the ground of the resurrection of the Lord. If the bearer of the name himself lives everlastingly, then there is at length the true, new, everlasting name (lxv. 15; Rev. ii. 17; iii. 12). Of what avail is the everlasting name to him who himself is swallowed up of death?

Ver. 6. It is a sort of ὕστερον πρότερον when the Prophet discourses last of the בני נכר "the foreigners," after having put that first in the theme-like ver. 3. His designating them as those joining themselves to Jehovah to serve Him, reminds us very much of Num. xviii. 2, where it is said in reference to the Levites: "and they shall join themselves to thee and shall minister unto thee" (comp. ibid. ver. 4). If this passage hovered in the Prophet's mind, then his choice of expression would intimate that he promised to "the foreigner" a certain participation in the priestly character of the people Israel, that he conceives of their holding a relation to the latter, something like that of the Levites to the priests. The Piel שֵׁרֵת is chiefly used of the priestly ministrations (Exod. xxviii. 43; xxix. 30; xxxix. 1; Num. iii. 31; iv. 12, 14, etc.). The Prophet would evidently intimate by the word אהבה (see Text. and Gram.) "to love," that the foreigner's joining himself to Jehovah to serve Him will be voluntary, proceeding from the inmost necessity of the heart. The additional statement: to be his servants, seems to me to confirm the conjecture that the Prophet conceives of the relation of the foreigners to the Israelites as like that of the Levites to the priests. For the expression לעברים seems to me a reminder that עֲבֹדָה is the specific word used for the Levitical ministry (comp. Num. viii. 23 sqq.), which in Num. iv. 47 is distinguished into עֲבֹדַת עֲבֹדָה and עֲבֹדַת מַשָּׂא.

Ver. 7. Only to the foreigner is it promised, that the LORD, when they have fulfilled the conditions proposed already to the eunuch (ver. 4), will bring them up on His holy mountain (ii. 2 sq.; xxv. 6 sqq.), and make them joyful in His house of prayer. The LORD therefore distinguishes His house from His mountain, and calls the former His prayer-house, i. e., the house where one prays to Him and to Him alone. That there will be a place and time of the greatest joy, we know already from ii. 4 where the return of an aetas aurea is promised, and from xxv. 6 sqq. where the prospect is presented to the nation of a glorious meal and great joy (ver. 9) on the holy mount. To the colors of the present, with which the Prophet paints the future, belongs also his conception of the worship on the holy mountain, as being quite in the old style. He sees there still the altar on which burnt-offerings and sacrifices are offered! Still, it is not to be overlooked, that he calls the Temple a "house of prayer," before he speaks of the sacrifices, and that he afterwards emphatically repeats the designation "house of prayer" as a denominatio a potiori, so to speak. Although the old Temple was a place destined also for prayer (comp. 1 Kings viii. 28 sqq.), yet in the Old Testament it is never called a house of prayer. There is, therefore, in this name an intimation that the sacrifices to be offered in the temple of the future will be spiritual sacrifices (1 Pet. ii. 5), the fruit of the lips that confess His name (Heb. xiii. 15). The clause: for My house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations does not assign a reason for what immediately precedes, but for the fundamental thought that the LORD will bring also the foreigners to His holy mountain. The Prophet would make prominent the universality of the salvation, and one easily detects also in כל־העמים a reference to iii. 2 sqq. and to xxv. 6 sqq. On the other hand Jesus Christ in Matth. xxi. 13 (Mark xi. 17; Luke xix. 43) lays the emphasis on the idea "house of prayer."

3. The Lord God——in the forest.—Vers. 8, 9. The initial words saith the Lord God, intimate something new and grand to be said. Now it is nothing new, nor is it anything exceeding grand beyond what we have had already, that Jehovah, in addition to the scattered of Israel, will gather the heathen, so that there may be one flock and one shepherd. For has not the Prophet hitherto often enough (comp. liv.), and even from ver. 3 on of our chapter, given expression to this? Has he not said plainly enough, ver. 7, that the LORD will bring the foreigners to His holy mountain and make them joyful in His house?

Why then this repetition? and why still more this solemn preface? The Prophet states, in ver. 9, whom the LORD will add to those already gathered. All meanings of this ver. 9 that would disjoin it from ver. 8, and connect it with what follows are unnatural. Some take כל־חיתו בּיער as accusative, and understand by it the flocks of Israel badly kept or grown wild; others, as the modern expositors, would take חיתו בּיער as a second vocative, which leaves the object the same, viz., the badly guarded Israel (ver. 10); others again, as STIER, etc., understand by the beasts of the field and forest especially the savage nations (in antithesis, therefore, it would seem to "the foreigners" as the civilized) that are also to be invited. But in all these explanations I find neither anything new, nor anything grand, nor any thought that is a fitting conclusion for the chain of thoughts preceding.

Did not the Prophet begin, from chap. liv. on, to describe how all will be new and wonderful in the new covenant? Israel, although judged and repudiated, shall suddenly see itself surrounded by a countless troop of children. One is no longer to be blessed by means of works of the law, but by believing acceptance (lv)! But of course obedience to God's command is not to cease (lvi. 1, 2). By these new conditions of life, however, entrance is permitted also to the heathen, and even the eunuchs may be fully qualified members of the community, which rests on a spiritual basis of life, and no longer on a merely natural basis. Therefore a higher, out and out spiritual order of nature, is held in prospect! Already in chap. lv. 12, 13, the Prophet afforded us a presentiment, that also the lower half of creation, the organic but not personal creation, viz., the vegetable world, will feel itself penetrated by this new spirit of life, the spirit of glorification. What wonder if he says the same here of the beasts! And is that a new thought with our Prophet? Has he not already, chap. xi. 6 sqq., declared, that the kingdom of the Messiah will fill the world with new, higher life-forces? Has he not in the same place especially declared, that even the nature of the beasts will change, that from enemies of man they will become their friends and play-mates (xi. 8 comp. with Hos. ii. 18, and Isa. lxv. 25)? I find in ver. 8, therefore a climax. To the chain of promise, that all foreigners, yea, even the eunuchs can have part in the new covenant, is added as the final link that also the brute world shall find admittance.

It should be noted that the LORD is described here as the great gatherer. Under the old covenant sin reigned, and consequently discontent and discord, through the whole world of nature and men. In the new covenant reign love and peace. The centrifugal tendency is replaced by a centripetal. Everything gathers to the common centre. But the LORD, who is this centre and effects this gathering, begins it with Israel. Then He gathers to Israel the heathen. Then He brings up the vegetable and brute world, that they, the groaning creation, may become regenerated and free from the bondage of destruction unto the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21). It is certainly not an accident, and is a strong support to our explanation, that the words מְקַבֵּץ and נִדְחֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל are taken from xi. 12, therefore out of the same chapter in which we first found the expression of the view that is the basis of our explanation here. For there it says: "And He will raise up a standard toward the nations and assemble the outcasts of Israel (נדחי ישׂראל) and gather (קִבֵּץ) the scattered of Judah from the four corners of the earth." Only in xi. 12 and lvi. 8 does the expression נדחי ישׂראל occur in Isaiah. It is found once beside in Ps. cxlvii. 2, which belongs to a later period. The word קִבֵּץ is used three times in our passage; first as a predicate of LORD, as the gatherer of the outcasts of Israel. Beside that principal passage, we learn from many passages of xl.—lxvi. the significance of this ingredient of the future (xl. 11; xliii. 5; xlix. 18; liv. 7; lx. 4; lxii. 10). The מְקַבֵּץ, then, who understands gathering and does it willingly, will gather still others to Israel, viz., to those gathered to Israel. One would suppose that what is further to be gathered must even be added to "outcasts of Israel." But the Prophet evidently distinguishes "the outcasts," and "those that are gathered." By the latter he means such as could by no means be designated as outcasts of Israel, because they never belonged to (the fleshly) Israel. He means by them the heathen of whom he has spoken, vers. 3, 6 sq. Of this it was indeed said ver. 7, that the LORD will bring them to His holy mountain. Therefore we detect two things in the words עליו לנקבציו; first, that the נִקְבָּצִים are no נִדָּחִים; that they nevertheless belong to Israel. For they belong to the spiritual Israel. After that, what is left that could be added to Israel, when, beside "the outcasts," the heathen, after qualifying as in ver. 6, have already become נִקְבָּצִים, "the gathered?" Then nothing is left but the impersonal creatures. And as already lv. 12, 13, the vegetable world was mentioned as interpenetrated by the new life-forces, nothing remains to us but the brute world, to be declared a partaker of the new life. Because the beasts of the earth are destined to partake of the new life, the bringing on of one half is described by beasts of the field, and of the other by beasts of the forest (see Text. and Gram.). Only in respect to the form of the expression does a change occur. Ver. 9 b states in what way the gathering will take place, viz., by extending an invitation to them. It is not necessary to supply an object to לאכל. The brutes are just invited to eat, to a meal. It is, mutatis mutandis, the same meal to which, xxv. 6, all nations are invited.

[The Author's interpretation of ver. 9, connecting it with the preceding context, has in its favor the marked division of the Masoretic text, in addition to its own ingenuity. But spite of His assertion to the contrary, that is much the more natural division that connects ver. 9 with what follows, as is proved by its having been so generally adopted, notwithstanding the Masoretic division. The Author supports his view chiefly by appeal to "saith the LORD God," as a preface that intimates that something new and grand, or grandly new, is to be said. But this inference may itself be questioned. Yet if it were justified, he himself undoes the force of his appeal by showing that, after all, what is said is not grandly new, seeing it has been said in effect before. The naturalness and propriety of the connection of ver. 9 with what follows may be illustrated by a reference to Jno. x. 10, 12. The relation of vers. 1-8 and 9-12, as coherent parts of one distinct chapter, may be illustrated by a reference to Matth. xxiv. 42-51. The Author's own exposition of the text of itself calls to mind this latter passage, as one that in its spirit is related to the revelation in our prophecy. But the Author actually brings the passages into relation: see below Hom. Hints, § 1. The propriety of throwing vers. 10-12 into one connected section with lvii. 1, 2, may therefore be questioned.—Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lvi. 1, 2. "Just because Christ has appeared, we ought not to suppose that now we may live as we please, but rather we ought to be the more diligent about righteousness and godly conversation. For therefore the saving grace of God has appeared and chastens us, that we should live chastened, righteous and godly (Tit. ii. 11)." Cramer.

2. On lvi. 2. Apart from the temporal coloring of this declaration, it may be remarked here, that the weekly day of rest is necessary, also, for us Christians as long as we are under the curse, Gen. iii. 17 sqq. It is one of the greatest and most important benefactions of God, that at the creation of time He at once gave us also the proper division of time. Less than six working days would interrupt too often the progress of human labors and encourage laziness; more than six working days in succession would use up human forces too soon. Six days' labor, then a day of rest, is just the right and in every respect healthful medium. That we Christians observe the first instead of the seventh day, has come about of itself, without any special higher ordinance. It is the victory that the second creation, as the beginning of the holy, blessed, everlasting life, must naturally have over the first creation as the beginning of a life made subject to sin, evil and death. For Sunday is the weekly Easter feast. The day of Christ's resurrection was also a creative day, and indeed a higher one than that of which the Sabbath reminds us. Therefore we ought to celebrate Sunday in a higher style. We, as much as the men of the old covenant, need rest for the body and rest for the soul. The soul should on this day wash off the dust and dirt, that have gathered through the week's work, by a cleansing, refreshing, strengthening bath in its heavenly life-element, that is offered in God's word. But it should do this in a truly spiritual, not in an outwardly legal way. Let it beware of getting out of the Scylla of Publicanism into the Charybdis of Pharisaism. Even the Old Testament Sabbath was a day of joy. So much the less is it becoming to make of the Christian Sabbath a day of gloomy, depressing asceticism. The Christian Sunday should be illumined with the joy and glory of Easter morning. But by this joy it should also at the same time be raised high away out, not only above all earthly plagues, but also above all bad, merely earthly joy. It should stand in the brightness of the transfiguration, and thus not merely imitate the light of Easter day, but also typify the light of the everlasting Sabbath.

[If Sunday is anywhere kept holy in the manner described in the last two of the foregoing sentences, there one might abstain from controversy concerning the grounds of its being so. But it is a fact now historical, that the day is nowhere greatly kept sacred, where its importance is urged on no better grounds than those given above. It is a strange proceeding to find a reason for the institution or need of the Sabbath in Gen. iii. 17 sqq., when God Himself gives as the reason His own resting on the seventh day, and that not from a work on which rested the blight of a curse. We assent to the statement that "six days' labor, then a day of rest, is just the right and healthful medium." But it is still true, that this rule could never be urged as of binding force on any other ground than that of revelation. Experience confirms it; but it could never do so in a way to make it an article of religion, any more than it could make the habit of early rising an article of religion. The reason for the institution of the Sabbath was God's resting. Making a day for man to rest like God rested, is itself a revelation of God's willingness to have men share his rest. To "enter his rest" is the chief, final goal of religion, both under the old and under the new covenant. The Sabbath, therefore, as typical of that rest, and (when we observe it) of our hope of sharing that rest, is the great distinctive and significant institution of the only true religion, i. e., the only religion that offers a true hope of immortality. As long as God's people have not yet entered into His rest, there is reason, and all the reason there ever was, for observing that day that is a type of His rest. When the rest itself is given, there will no longer remain a typical day to be kept. Just as there no longer remained any sacrifices for sin after the great Sacrifice was come, that all sacrifices for sin typified (Heb. x. 26). In Heb. iv. 1-11 the truth just stated is clearly revealed. And in vers. 8-10 it is put with a pointedness that expressly affirms the Sabbath to be an existing institution for the people of God under the new covenant, though this meaning is generally overlooked. But if the order of thought in Heb. iv. 1-11 is closely scrutinized, it will appear that, in vers. 8-10, Paul reminds his readers, that Joshua did not give the promised rest, which he appeals to as the only event of the past that might seem to be a realization of God's promise of rest. The proof that the rest was not then given is, that God afterwards spake of another day for giving it. As the consequence of the rest being yet future, Paul says, ver. 9: "Therefore there remaineth σαββατισμός (i. e., the observance of the Sabbath), to the people of God." And so it must "remain" as long as the watchword of Christians is: "Let us labor to enter into that rest" (Heb. iv. 10).—It is remarkable that the author, in his comment on lvi. 7, seems to find less "temporal coloring" in the expressions "burnt-offerings and sacrifices," and "mine altar," than in the mention of "keeping the Sabbath." To him the former give no impression of Jewish narrowness in Isaiah, while the latter seems so fitted to give this impression that the best he can offer is an indifferent apology. As he is but a representative of multitudes of Christians, including multitudes of eminent ones, it is a mournful evidence of how far the Christian church is from properly valuing the divine and priceless institution of the Holy Sabbath, and therefore how far we Gentiles and "foreigners" are from meeting the conditions of the blessings of the new covenant set forth in the prophecy before us.—TR.]

3. On lvi. 3–7. In the old covenant, only he was fully qualified as to principle [to be one of the covenant people] who was descended from Abraham through Isaac and Jacob. The natural basis of descent was at the same time the legal basis. Those who only from without grew into this natural and legal basis, must ever, in a certain degree, have regarded themselves as only guests received out of grace, that must properly yield and give place to the fully qualified, were the principles of the Theocracy carried out consistently. And might it not be expected that the triumph of the Theocracy would be attended with the most severely consistent carrying out of its principle? The right that descent from Abraham through Isaac and Jacob gave, involved, as does every right, a duty, viz., that of co-operating in preserving the natural basis. The extinction of the Twelve Tribes would have been the end of the Old Testament Theocracy. Hence the high significance of marriage, of generation, of posterity. To be childless or, still worse, to be incapable of begetting children, was a ban and curse that rested on a man, like a divine judgment that excluded him from living on and working on, and gave him absolutely to death.* What a consoling look, then, the Prophet takes here into the nature of the new covenant! There is no longer Greek nor Jew; their continued life and activity no longer depends on fleshly posterity. But in the new covenant Christ is all. Whoever is rooted and lives in him is a child of God, and hence, too, an heir of God and joint heir with Christ (Rom. viii. 17). He has his citizenship and everlasting life in Christ. His name lives on everlastingly, because he himself is everlasting.

4. On lvi. 5. These words were used by the Papists to commend celibacy. LUTHER remarks on this: "Propheta hic non versatur in laude virginitatis, sed consolatur steriles eunuchos, ne desperent de sua vocatione, et diserte dicit de eunuchis servantibus Sabbatum et tenentibus foedus divinum. Non ligitur agit de laude eunuchatus aut virginitatis, sed laude servantium mandata."

5. On lvi. 8, 9. There will one time be a new heaven and a new earth (lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; 2 Pet. iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1). Paul speaks of "the anxious expectation of the creature," and that it "will be delivered from the service of the perishable nature to the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 19, 21). "Behold, I make all things new," says He that sitteth on the throne (Rev xxi. 5). We must not, therefore, think it wonderful if the Prophet here speaks of the brute world and their relation to man becoming new. Are not, after all, the Cherubim types of what will become of the brute world (Ezek. i. 10)?

* [See note, p. 77.—TR.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lvi. 1, 2. This text may most appropriately be used for an Advent Sunday (comp. the Epistle of the I. Adv., Rom. xiii. 11–14, the Gospel of the second Luke xxi. 25–34, the Epistle of the third 1 Cor. iv. 1–5. and of the fourth Phil. iv. 4–7), or for one of the last Sundays after Trinity, when the look of the congregation is turned to the coming of the Lord to judgment. On such a day, in the sense of the parables of "the faithful and wise servant" (Matth. xxiv. 45 sqq.) or of the ten virgins (Matth. xxv. 1 sqq.), one might preach on The revelation of the Lord that we are to look for at the last day. I. When and how will this revelation take place? (ver. 1 b) 1.) As regards the time, we are to think of it as near; 2) As regards how, it will bring to light, a. the Salvation intended for us, b. the Righteousness of God. II. Under what conditions may we cheerfully anticipate this revelation? When we are found as servants that do the Lord's will. 1) What is the doing of such a servant (ver. 1 a, ver. 2, comp. Matth. xxiv. 46)? 2) How does one become such a servant? (by sincere repentance and living faith).

2. On lvi. 3–7. MISSIONARY SERMON. The Church of the Lord a house of prayer for all nations. I. A house of prayer, therefore 2) not a place for offering outward divine service, but 1) a place for worshipping in spirit and in truth (John iv. 24). II. For all nations. For 1) neither fleshly descent nor fleshly defect excludes; 2) only that is demanded which all men may perform: that one hold fast the covenant of the LORD, and choose what pleases Him (ver. 4).

3. On lvi. 3–7. We have here an example of what Peter says, Acts x. 34, 35, that with God there is no respect of persons, but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him. God proved that, even in the Old Covenant, since He commanded to receive also foreigners into His nation, if they sought Him. But especially in the New Testament has He called and gathered all heathen to His believing people Israel, and to the fellowship of Christ and of His salvation. Let a man be ever so bad, ever so poor and despised of men, still, if he become a believing Christian, he is of as much importance to God as the most superior person. And what this one has in God, Christ and His kingdom, with that same every believing Christian may comfort himself. Hence John writes of believers, they have their fellowship with them, the holy Apostles; and their fellowship is with the Father, and with Jesus Christ his Son (1 John i. 3)."

4. [On lvi. 6. "The conditions on which admission is had to the privileges of the people of God. (1.) They were to "join themselves to the LORD;" embrace the true faith and become a worshipper of the true God. (2.) This should be with a purpose to serve Him. (3.) They were to "love the name of the Lord," that is, to love Jehovah Himself. (4.) They were to keep His Sabbaths. (5.) They were to take hold of His covenant."—BARNES].

5. On lvi. 8, 9. Sin rends mankind, yea all nature asunder, puts them at enmity and scatters them. For by sin we all become egoists, and so lose both the tendency to the common centre, God, and also to those who revolve with us around the centre. God's love gathers again what has been scattered. Let us consider God's activity in gathering. 1) He gathers the outcast of Israel. 2) He gathers to these the heathen. 3) He brings also, in addition to these, the impersonal creatures, the plants (lv. 12, 13) and the brutes (xi. 6–8; lv. 25; Rom. viii. 19–23).

IX.—THE NINTH DISCOURSE.

Concluding Word: The Mournful Present, which will not be Prevented by the Approach of the Glorious Future. CHAPTER LVI. 10.—LVII. 21.

Isaiah is wont to set the present in the light of the future, in order to make an impression on it by the contrast. I appeal to chapters ii.–v., and to my interpretation of ii. 5. Jeremiah also imitates Isaiah in this (Jer. iii. 11–iv. 4). The sudden spring from the remotest, the glorious future into the mournful, immediate present that the Prophet makes between lvi. 9 and 10, need not therefore seem strange to us. It is to be admitted that the description of the bad shepherds, lvi. 10–12, can suit also the period of the Exile. That it at least fits Isaiah's contemporaries very well is undeniably plain from ch. xxviii. That in the exile, prophets of Jehovah were murdered (lvii. 1) simply for being such, is possible, but not probable, and not proved. That remnants of idolatry continued through the whole exile, is not only possible but also probable. However the time before and after the destruction of Jerusalem must be distinguished. But that all kinds of idolatry even Moloch worship, with its sacrifices of children (lvii. 5), still occurred in the Exile, is not probable and not proved. It is utterly inconceivable, or, as HENGSTENBERG says (Christol. II. p. 201, 2 edit.), "it has no meaning," that Israel even in exile sent to foreign kings for help (lvii. 9). The threat: because thou hast not laid to heart my silence מֵעוֹלָם, thy works shall be made manifest and thy idols be swept away (lvii. 11–13), certainly suits better the time before than the time after the Exile. For this reason even the opponents of the genuineness have been obliged to admit that the authorship of our section dates before the Exile (comp. KLEINERT, Echth. D. jes. Weiss. p. 305 sqq.; STIER in his Comm.; HENGSTENBERG, l. c.). They do so partly by forced interpretations; partly by assuming that the whole passage lvi. 10–lvii. 21 (EICHHORN), or at least lvi. 9–lvii. 11 (EWALD) is repeated "from older prophets." I am for this reason of the opinion (with KLEINERT, STIER, HENGSTENBERG) that the grounds already given are opposed to the idea that in writing our passage, too, Isaiah's view-point was that of the Exile (DEL.).

The section divides into three parts. In the First the Prophet contrasts the conduct and the fate of the bad and of the good shepherds of the present (lvi. 10; lvii. 2). In the Second he describes the mournful signs of the present, the idolatrous doings of the nation (lvii. 3–14). In the Third he returns to promising salvation, and announces that God's love will still bring salvation and healing to those that let themselves be healed (lvii. 15–21).

1. THE MOURNFUL PRESENT MARKED BY THE CONTRAST OF THE BAD AND GOOD SHEPHERDS. CHAPTERS LVI. 10—LVII. 2.

10 His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant,
They are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark;
[1]Sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber.
11 Yea, they are [2]greedy dogs which [3]can never have enough,
[a]And they are shepherds that cannot understand:
They all look to their own way,
Every one for his gain, [b]from his quarter.
12 Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine,
And we will fill ourselves with strong drink;
And to-morrow shall be as this day,
And much more abundant.
CHAPTER LVII. 1. THE righteous perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart:
And [4]merciful men are taken away, none considering
[c]That the righteous is taken away [5]from the evil to come.
2 [d]He shall [6]enter into peace:
They shall rest in their beds,
Each one walking [7]in his uprightness.

[1] Or, Dreaming, or, talking in their sleep.
[2] Heb. strong of appetite.
[3] Heb. know not to be satisfied.
[4] Heb. men of kindness, or, godliness.
[5] Or, from that which is evil.
[6] Or, go in peace.
[7] Or, before him.

[a] And they are shepherds! They know not how to distinguish.
[b] without exception.
[c] For.
[d] He enters into peace (while they rest on their beds) who walks straight before him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: lvi. 10. הזה. Verse 12. יתר מאד; lvii. 1. שם—על לב אנשי־חסר; lvii. 2. מִשְׁכָּב.

Ver. 10. The suffix in צֹפָו undoubtedly refers to Israel.

Ver. 11. The suffix in מקצהו is related to the ideal totality to which the אִישׁ belongs.

LVII. 1. I cannot approve the view that כי מפני ונר is an objective clause depending on מֵבִין. For how could then the wicked know that the pious by their death only escape the impending evil? And must it not then read, as Vitringa has said, לִפְנֵי or at least מִלִּפְנֵי? I believe that we must construe מִפְּנֵי as causal, as in countless instances beside.

Ver. 2. This verse is very difficult on grammatical and lexical grounds. For if one take הֹלֵךְ as the subject of יָבוֹא, then this insertion of a clause whose subject is identical with that of the principal clause, but expressed in the plural, is very violent, and, so far as I see, unexampled, notwithstanding the great freedom usual in Hebrew in respect to the change of person and number. It is also very questionable whether מִשְׁכָּב can mean "burying place," and whether נוּחַ with עַל can mean "rest in the grave." For מִשְׁכָּב is only twice beside this used of a bed prepared for a dead person. In 2 Chr. xvi. 14 it designates the bed of state on which king Asa was laid before his burial (משכב and קְבָרוֹת are expressly distinguished). Also in Ezek. xxxii. 25 there is prepared for Elam a משכב in the under-world, around about which are the קְבָרוֹת of his adherents. Thus it appears that משכב can indeed designate the place of repose of a dead person, but that is not then the grave in which he lies, but a distinguished elevated couch, on which he lies. But here nothing else is meant to be said of the righteous than that he, as one who has walked uprightly, finds rest in his grave. For this reason I am unable also to agree with the explanation, grammatically admissible, that treats יבוא שלום as a clause by itself, and הלך as the subject of ינוחו. Then the participle is regarded as collective: the upright walking, i. e., the total of those walking uprightly. But here על משכבותם remains an oddity. For this reason I am of the opinion, that ינוחו על מ׳ is to be treated as clause thrown in, expressive of the situation (comp. Jer. xiii. 21): "comes to peace—while they rest on their beds—who walks uprightly". In this way is made prominent the contrast between the fleshly rest on soft pillows (comp. lxvi. 10. שכבים אהבי לנום) that the bad shepherds enjoy, and the rest of everlasting peace of God enjoyed by the righteous whom the world persecutes (comp. Luke xvi. 22). It is true one looks for וְהֵמָּה before יָנוּחוּ. Still Vav. in such clauses is not unfrequently omitted (comp. e. g., Ps. lvii. 4; חֵרֵף שֹׁאֲפִי; Ewald, § 311, a), and the omission of הֵמָּה finds compensation in the striking prominence of the plural.——The plural משכבות is found beside here in Hos. vii. 14; Mic. ii. 1; Ps. cxlix. 5. It is also perhaps not unimportant to remark that this plural only occurs with עַל, and that both the singular and the plural with עַל never mean anything else than the bed on which the living repose. The passages with משכב in the singular with עַל: 2 Sam. iv. 11; xi. 2; xiii. 5; 1 Kings i. 47; Ps. iv. 5; xxxvi. 5; Job xxxiii. 19; Song of Sol. iii. 1. For the use of both sing. and plur. in Isaiah, see List.—נְכֹחַ is τὸ ἐναντίον, ex adverso positum, that which lies directly opposite, directly before a man. Hence הלך נכחו is he that goes the way lying directly before him. הלך with the accusative as in xxxiii. 15; l. 10.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet stands at the conclusion of the task he proposed for the second Ennead. He has pursued the word of the Servant of God through all its alternations to its glorious goal. From the light of the final glorification he turns his eye back and observes with pain the contrast between the glorious future and the mournful present. As we notice in chap. xlviii. 6 that the Prophet by no means becomes unconscious of the present in his contemplation of the future, so we see here, too, that he cannot avoid instituting a comparison between that hereafter and the now. The difference is so great, that one does not comprehend how from the now the hereafter can ever come to be. But nothing is impossible with God. Spite of the heinousness of the present, the word of the Lord stands fast, that the people of God (those of course excepted that persistently resist the drawings of the Spirit) shall come to the peace and refreshment on the mount of God. The Prophet describes first the heinousness of the present. His eye falls chiefly on those that ought to be leaders and exemplars to the nation in the good way. But these are blind watchmen, and dumb, lazy dogs (lvi. 10) and insatiably greedy. They are shepherds without knowledge, only keen for their own interest (lvi. 11), and carousers that each day carry on worse than the day before (lvi. 12). Where such men rule, of course the lot of the righteous is outwardly mournful; unregarded by the crowd they are borne away by the evil (lvii. 1). But happily for them! For while others on their luxurious pillows surrender themselves to a fatal repose, the righteous go in to everlasting peace (lvii. 2).

2. His watchmen——more abundant.—Lvi. 10–12. Although in general the transition here is sharp from the future to the immediate present, still the figure used in lvi. 9 prepares the transition in a very artistic way. For, although I do not think that there the Prophet summons the wild beasts to devour Israel, because they may easily do this on account of the bad watch that is kept, still I think it likely, that the Prophet, by the mention of the future of the beasts, is led to think of the beasts of the present, and of the way in which Israel is given over to them. צֹפִים (xxi. 5, 6; lii. 7), which means primarily "spies, sentinels on guard," we are to understand here as meaning those whose duty it is, on account of their office, to warn the community of evil, and with it to contend against wickedness. Such, first of all, are the prophets. But also the priests (Mal. ii. 7) and worldly superiors, in short all that are entrusted with the shepherd office (וְהֵמָּה רֹעִים lvi. 11) are included. But what sort of watchmen are those that cannot see? In the ordinary sense there are none such. But in a spiritual sense there are. For there are, alas, those spiritually blind, whose spiritual eye is plastered up, and who consequently "do not know," i. e., have no knowledge, no understanding of what they ought to know, יָדַע in this absolute sense we had already xliv. 9, 18: xlv. 20. Changing his figure, the Prophet further compares those bad shepherds to dogs that should watch the flock, and which though not blind, indeed, are yet dumb. But a protector that sees the enemy and gives no notice, is just as bad as one that does not see him at all (indeed worse subjectively). Thus the second figure intensifies the charge; for it adds a bad will to incapacity. Why they do not bark is said in the following words (added in the form of apposition): snarling in sleep, lying down, loving to slumber. הֹזִים, ἁπ. λεγ. seems to designate the sounds a dog utters in sleep, and therefore the meanings "to sleep, dream, snore, to be delirious" are ascribed to the word; comp. BOCHART, Hieroz. ed. Lips. I. p. 781 sqq. With the Arabs the dog passes for a sleepy beast (comp. HITZIG in loc.), while, on the contrary, in the Occident it is the type of watchfulness (see BOCHART, l. c.). The Prophet would say of the bad shepherds under all circumstances, that they cannot bark because they love their comfort and advantage beyond everything. Hence they get off nothing more than a snarl or a growl, such as a dog utters in slumber. BOCHART l. c. adduces several passages from the ancients that show that they regarded these sounds in sleep as a characteristic peculiarity of dogs. They are lazy, yet insatiably greedy dogs (עַזֵּי־נֶפֶשׁ strong in greed, v. 14; xxix. 8; lv. 2); they do not know what it is to be satisfied. And they are shepherds! adds the Prophet indignantly, with reference to "his watchmen," etc., ver. 10 init. Then, as is his manner, Isaiah proceeds, in what follows, to explain the figure: answering to the ignorance of what is enough, is a worse ignorance with respect to הָבִין, "to distinguish" (comp. the reverse of this xxxii. 4). They are strangers to true wisdom. They let selfishness essentially determine the direction of their efforts (comp. lviii. 6), and especially greediness for gain. בֶּצַע is "that cut off, the cutting, gain" (xxxiii. 15; lvii. 17), קָצֶה is the end in the sense of the periphery (comp. Gen. xix. 4; Jer. l. 26). Thus the idea is: from the utmost periphery in to the very centre every one of this fine fellowship turns only to gain. Accordingly they all do so without exception.

And what good does their money do them? Ver. 12 shows this by examples. Such a blind, dumb watchman, who can open eye and mouth well enough when it concerns his belly, calls out to the passer-by, or a visitor: Come ye, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with intoxicating drink (שֵׁכָר comp. on v. 11). This friendly host, however, does not invite to merely a short banquet, but, (answering to "they know not satiety" ver. 10), also to one that the following day will be continued in grander style. The words גדול וגו׳ are both a nearer definition and also intensify the meaning. The next day is to be like the first only as a drunken day in general, but distinguished as to species by being of a much higher quality. Who does not think here of what the Prophet says xxviii. 7 sqq. of the vice of drunkenness that invaded both Judah and Israel? At all events, this moral aberration agrees very well with the religious degeneracy spoken of in lvii. 3 sqq.

3. The righteous perish——uprightness, lvii. 1, 2. If lvi. 10–12 describes the doings of the bad shepherds, especially of false prophets, then by the righteous man here must be understood also a prophet. And אבד and נאסף cannot mean a natural death, for that would be much more an encouragement than a warning to the bad. Rather the context seems to me to demand that the mournful fate of the true and righteous servants of Jehovah be contrasted with the lazy, jovial doings of the dumb dogs. Therefore (with UMBREIT and others) I understand אבד and נאסף to denote a violent death. I cannot avoid the impression that the Prophet here alludes to circumstances that he sees quite near, and as perhaps personally threatening to himself. Of course, precise proof of this cannot be offered; and I will only offer the view as a conjecture. The flood of unbelief had only swelled to greater magnitude under the idolatrous Manasseh. The apostacy was universal. It was much as in the days of Elijah (1 Ki. xix. 10). It is also expressly said of Manasseh, that he shed very much innocent blood, and filled Jerusalem with it from one end to the other (2 Ki. xxi. 16); and tradition (handed down by JOSEPHUS, Antiq. X. 3, 1) refers that bloodshed especially to execution of numerous prophets. Even though Isaiah himself may not so have perished, and though the tradition to that effect be unfounded (see Introduction, pp. 3, 4), still Isaiah, while writing this, may have had this atrocious period in mind, and even have regarded it as threatening himself with destruction. That no man laid it to heart, if again a Jehovah-prophet was slain, is perfectly explained by the frequency of such events and by the apostacy being so universal and intense. The expression אנשי־חסד might in parallelism have a general meaning. Yet history justifies our construing it in a particular sense. חסד is "pietas, piety." באין מבין is said as בְּהִמָּצְאוֹ, lv. 6. On כי מפני וגו׳ see Text. and Gram. It was said before only, that the pious are taken away without any one regarding it. Now the reason of this is given. It is the רָעָה, the universally prevalent wickedness. That explains that the righteous are not only taken away, but that it is done without opposition, yea, even without causing any disturbance.

Ver. 2. But that is only a seeming misfortune for the righteous. In fact in this way he enters into peace, while they, the wicked, are fatally reposing on their beds of luxury (see Text. and Gram.).

2. THE MOURNFUL PRESENT MARKED BY THE IDOLATROUS DOINGS OF THE NATION. CHAPTER LVII. 3-14.

3 BUT draw near hither, ye sons of the sorceress,
The seed of the adulterer and [a]the whore.
4 Against whom do ye sport yourselves?
Against whom make ye a wide mouth,
And draw out the tongue?
Are ye not children of transgression, a [b]seed of falsehood,
5 Enflaming yourselves [1c]with idols
Under every green tree,
Slaying the children in the valleys
Under the cliffs of the rocks?
6 Among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion;
They, they are thy lot:
Even to them hast thou poured a drink offering.
Thou hast offered a meat offering,
[d]Should I receive comfort in these?
7 Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed:
Even thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice.
8 Behind the doors also and the posts hast thou set up thy remembrance:
[e]For thou hast discovered thyself to another than me,
And art gone up; thou hast enlarged thy bed,
[f]And [2]made thee a covenant with them;
Thou lovedst their bed [3]where thou sawest it.
9 And [4]thou wentest to the king with ointment,
And didst increase thy perfumes,
And didst send thy messengers far off,
And didst [g]debase thyself even unto hell.
10 Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way;
Yet saidst thou not, There is no hope:
Thou hast found the [5]life of thine hand;
Therefore thou wast not [h]grieved.
11 And of whom hast thou been afraid [i]or feared,
That thou hast lied,
And hast not remembered me, nor laid it to thy heart?
Have not I held my peace even of old,
And thou fearest me not?
12 I will declare thy righteousness,
And thy works; for they shall not profit thee.
13 When thou criest, let thy [j]companies deliver thee;
But the wind shall carry them all away;
[k]Vanity shall take them:
But he that putteth his trust in me
Shall possess the land,
And shall inherit my holy mountain;
14 [l]And shall say, Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way,
Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people.

[1] Or, among the oaks.
[2] Or, hewed it for thyself larger than theirs.
[3] Or, thou providest room.
[4] Or, thou respectedst the king.
[5] Or, living.

[a] and who thyself playest harlot.
[b] spurious seed.
[c] by means of the terebinths.
[d] Should I after this have pity.
[e] For the place by me thou madest empty.
[f] And madest terms for thee from them.
[g] thou didst descend to hell.
[h] sick.
[i] so that thou fearedst.
[j] collections of gods=pantheon.
[k] breath.
[l] And one shall say.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 4. ילדי־פשע—התענג and זרע שקר. Ver. 5. סְעִפֵי הַסְּלָעִים. Ver. 9. עד־מרחוק—שור.

Ver. 4. The form יַלְדֵי is found only in this place before Makkeph. Except this, יַלְדֵי three times without Makkeph: ii. 6; Exod. ii. 6; Hos. i. 2.

Ver. 5. The participles נחמים and שחטי are in apposition with and explanatory of 'ילדי פ and 'זרע ש. נֵחָמִים is part. Niph. from חמם.——The expression כל־עץ רענן, which occurs only here in Isaiah, is found beside Deut. xii. 2; 2 Kings xvi. 4; xvii. 10; 2 Chron. xxviii. 4; Jer. ii. 20; iii. 6, 13; Ezek. vi. 13.

Ver. 6. The clause בְּחַלְּקֵי־נחל חלקך is very difficult; and expositors differ very much about it. The LXX. connect the words בחלקי־נחל with what precedes (σφάζοντες τὰ τέκνα αὐτῶν ἐν ταῖς φάραγξιν ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν πετρῶν ἐν ταῖς μερίσι φάραγγος. Ἐκείνη σου ἡ μερίς, οὗτός σου ὁ κλῆρος). [The words ἐν ταῖς μερίσι φάραγγος are wanting in TISCHENDORF's 4th edition of the LXX. of 1860,—TR.], but that gives an intolerable tautology. VULG. in partibus torrentis pars tua; thus it takes חֲלָקֵי for חֶלְקֵי.——TARG. JONATAN: in laevibus locis ripae torrentis est pars tua.——SYRUS: sors tua et haereditas tua cum sorte torrentium erit. Thus he takes בְּ = cum, and likewise חֶלְקֵי־נ׳ — חֶלְקֵי־נחל; the double הֵם he takes as simply — et. Similarly, only still more freely, does the Arabic version in the London Polyglot translate: Sors illorum (scil. idolorum) erit portio vestra. One sees that these ancient versions were little exact in adhering to the original text. JEROME understands the "in partibus torrentis," to declare how "omnes montes, vales atque torrentes plenierant cultu daemonum," and the "pars tua, sors tua" denotes for him that the demons were to the Israelites what the LORD should have been, according to Deut. xxxii. 9; Ps. xlvii. 5; lxxiii. 26. Later expositors divide into five classes. Some take חַלְּקֵי also to be equal to חֶלְקֵי, which they understand variously, partly in a physical, partly in a spiritual sense. But all these views we must reject as grammatically unfounded. Others take חַלְּקֵי somehow in the sense of "laevitas, laeva, smoothness, smooth places," but construe חלקך in the sense of "punishment." According to this the sense would be: stoning with the smooth stones (RASCHI), drowning, casting down over smooth, slippery places into the deep (VITRINGA: Vos detrudemini in laevia vallis, i. e., in lubrica et salebrosa loca, quae quem in profunda vallis praecipitem agunt), the stony desert (COCCEJUS),—that is your well-merited portion. But it is manifest that חלקך and גורלך have here nothing to do with punishment, but continue to describe the sin. The third class of expositors construe חֶלְקֵךְ in the sense of "the right place, theatre." Then the meaning would be: in the smooth clefts of the rock, or in the bare places of the valleys, there is the place where thou carriest on thy iniquitous work (J. D. MICHAELIS, PAULUS, GESEN., Comment., RUECKERT, HITZIG, UMBREIT). But the following emphatic הֵם הֵם ו׳ and the second half of the verse show, that the mention here is not merely of the theatre of the idolatrous doings. A fourth class see in חלקי a designation of the idol images themselves. They derive the word from the Arabic chalaqa, efformavit, effinxit, so that the meaning would be: "in the images of the valley is thy portion," or "with the idols in the valley thou carriest on thy trade" (KOPPE in LOWTH's Isaiah, KNOBEL). But the root חָלַק in Hebrew never has this sense. Finally, the fifth class (LOWTH, ROSENM., GESEN. Thes., EWALD, DELITZSCH, SEINECKE, ROHLING, [J. A. ALEX.]) take חלקך in the spiritual sense in which Jehovah is called the portion of His people (comp. the places cited above, and Ps. cxix. 57; Josh. xxii. 25; Ps. xvi. 5, etc.) But חַלְּקֵי־נחל are smooth stones such as, according to a widespread custom of antiquity, were objects of divine worship. Very properly reference has been made to הֲמִשָּׁה חַלֻּקֵי אֲבָנִים מִן־הַנַּחַל 1 Sam. xvii. 40. FUERST, in the Concordance, puts our חַלְּקֵי with חֲלֻקֵי under one rubric, in that without further notice he points it חַלֻּקֵי. And indeed the two words differ only by one dot, and hence a copyist's error were not impossible. FUERST in his Lex. derives our חַלְּקֵי from חַלָּק, which would be an abnormal vocalization instead of חַלְּקֵי (OLSH., § 183, a). Now if one may neither read חֲלֻקֵי instead of חַלְּקֵי, nor yet take חַלְּקֵי for an abnormal stat. const. pl. from חֵלֶק, then we can only derive חַלְּקֵי either from חָלָק (xxx. 10) or from חֵלֶק. But the latter were likewise an unusual formation, for the connecting form of the plural must sound חֶלְקֵי, according the sole suffix forms in use (comp חֲלָקֶיךָ, חֶלְקֵיהֶם, חֶלְקָם Hos. v. 7). The Daghesh in ל would any way be Dag. dirimens. If then we derive our word from the adjective חָלָק "laevus, lubricus, smooth," then חלקי־נחל would be the smooth things of the valley. But, in view of the intentional paronomasia with חֶלְקֵךְ, we may further assume that by חַלְּקֵי the Prophet means nothing else than what is described in 1 Sam. xvii. 4, "smooth stones from the brook," in fact that חלקי־נחל is in the end nothing more than an abbreviation of חַלֻּקֵי אַבְנֵי הַנַּחַל, an abbreviation that of course would be understood only by one that had the passage of 1 Sam. in his mind.—בְּ before חַלְּקֵי is used as Josh. xxii. 25 אֵין־לָכֶם חֵלֶק בַּיהוָה.

Ver. 8. מֵאִתִּי גִּלִּית, as it seems to me, must be judged after the analogy of the expressions גָּלָה עַמִּי (v. 13), גָּלְתָה יְהוּדָה (Lam. i. 3), גָּלָה מָשׂוֹשׂ (xxiv. 11; comp. 1 Sam. iv. 21 sq.; Prov. xxvii. 25, etc.). For as גָּלָה originally means "to uncover, make bare," so that form of expression declares that by removal of the people, who as it were cover it, the land is uncovered, made bare. It is to be noticed, moreover, that אֶרֶץ itself is by metonymy used for the people (Judg. xviii. 30), and that also other things, e. g., the grass, can be described as uncovering their place by their removal. It is true that only Kal is used in this sense. But had the Prophet written גָּלִית then, according to the constant and frequent usage, one must have taken this in the sense of: "in exilium abiisti." But he would not say that. What is here spoken of, is no punitive ridding out of a place, but a very spontaneous, headstrong and willful making bare, empty. Hence the Prophet uses the Piel. Therefore I cannot approve of the other explanations that supply "the shame" or "the clothes," or that treat מִשְׁכָּבֵךְ as the common object of the three verbs (DELITZSCH).—— יתכרת־לך מהם (certainly not castrasti quosdam ex iis, GROTIUS) is properly without analogy; for 2 Chr. vii. 18 the person with whom the covenant is made is designated by לְ, in 1 Sam. xx. 16; xxii. 8 עִם is used. But these passages show that after כרת the בְּרִית may be omitted. The Prophet might then have written וַתִּכְרָת לָהֶם. But then the particular would be wanting, that Israel made demands, conditions which were to be fulfilled on the part of the other. One must, to be exact, translate: thou bargainedst, madest conditions for thee from those.——The words יד חזית are likewise without analogy. The explanations: thou descriest a place (to lie down),—where thou seest but a beckoning hand,—thou dividest a hand, i. e., thou dost destine a side of the couch for the lover (KNOBEL)—all of them contain an unsuitable clumsy thought. One looks for something that belongs to the משכב in the sense indicated, or that follows on it. And thus there is much to favor the view that sees in יָד an euphemism for the masculine member. Only analogies from other languages (see DELITZSCH) can be adduced, but considering the originality of our author this can be no obstacle. חָזָה then, like רָאָה, according to well known usage, stands for sentire, experiri (comp. Job viii. 17; xv. 17; xxiv. 1; Ps. lviii. 11). [J. A. ALEXANDER briefly dismisses the euphemistic view by saying: "the sense gratuitously put upon the phrase by DODERLEIN, and the praises given him for the discovery, are characteristic of neological aesthetics." His own comment is: "The most probable interpretation of the last words of the verse is that which gives יָד the same sense as in chap. lvi. 5" (viz., "a place"). Spite of the respectable commentators that approve of this euphemistic sense (EWALD, HITZIG cited by DELITZSCH who agrees), it should be rejected. DELITZSCH refers to Ezek. xvi. 26; xxiii. 20. But the coarse, plainness of the language there is ground enough for inferring that, did Isaiah mean to express the like here, he would use language as plain. It were just as reasonable to imagine the same significance for יָד in lvi. 5. There is actually no ground for doing so in either case. "Thou descriest a place (to lie down)" gives a good rendering. Comp. the clause אהבת—חזית with Job viii. 18, עַל־גַּל שָׁרָשָׁיו יְסֻבָּכוּ בֵּית אֲבָנִים יֶחֱזֶה.—TR.].

Ver. 10. נוֹאָשׁ is part. Niph. desperatus (Job vi. 26). The neuter only here and ii. 25; xviii. 12.

Ver. 11. דָּאַג is sollicitum esse and has primarily intransitive meaning (Jer. xvii. 8). In this sense it is conjoined with לְ (1 Sam. ix. 5; x. 2) or with מִן (Ps. xxxviii. 19; Jer. xlii. 16). In our text it is used transitively, as in Jer. xxxviii. 19, joined with the accusative.——The תִּירְאִי with the attached Vav consec., shows that the Prophet conceives of it as the consequence of דאג. The latter accordingly denotes the inward, religious dread, of which the outward evidences are only the consequence. כִּי before תכזבי is the causal "that" after questions.

Ver. 14. וְאָמַר is used impersonally as in xxv. 9; xlv. 24; lxv. 8.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In this section the Prophet describes the idolatrous, and hence adulterous doings that at the time of this prophecy were prevalent in the entire nation. He summons the nation to approach in order to hear his castigating words. He addresses them as posterity of adulterous parents (ver. 3). They had often scoffed at him. Hence he asks them: Who is he whom ye derided, and who are ye? Are ye not as bastards who would supplant the genuine offshoots (ver. 4)? And then he points out to them their untheocratic, bastard way, by enumerating facts. Ye carry on your idolatry under every green tree. Ye slay the children by the brooks and in rocky hollows (ver. 5). These places have become the holy and promised land to you. And, that every part of the worship of Jehovah may have its idolatrous counterpart, ye do not omit drink and meat offerings for the idols (ver. 6). Then by sacrifices ye have made the high mountains the scene of your adulterous worship of idols (ver. 7). Jehovah's mottoes, that should be in every house, are thrust into the corner. But ye do as a woman that forsakes the place at the side of her husband, and sets up a couch of lewdness in another place (ver. 8). And also by seeking aid from foreigners ye carry on an adulterous idolatry. For ye sent messengers with rich gifts to foreign kings, yea, ye have boasted even of alliances with hell (ver. 9). And ye were indefatigable in these doings; nothing availed to convince you of their vanity. Rather, as long as ye could stir, ye would never confess to sickness (ver. 10). How wrong such conduct was appears the more manifest, when one compares whom Israel feared and whom it did not fear. Yea, what sort of beings were those whom thou fearedst, whereas thou fearedst me no more, who so long kept silence spite of thy unfaithfulness? (ver. 11). But I will speak and make manifest your righteousness and your works. From that will be seen that ye have no claim to be helped (ver. 12). Then let your numerous idols help you. But the wind will carry them off. He, on the contrary, that trusts in me, will receive inheritance in the holy land and on the holy mountain (ver. 13). For these there will be a glorious return into the promised land (ver. 14).

2. But draw near——falsehood.—Vers. 3, 4. וְאַתֶּם strongly reminds one of that ואתם, xlviii. 6, which, according to our construction, is also to be understood as an address of the Prophet to the people living in his own time. Draw near hither is like a citation before the ruler, who proposes to hold up to the subject his guilt, and to announce the punishment (comp. xxxiv. 1; xlviii. 16; xli. 1, 5; הֵנָּה, as in 2 Sam. xx. 16, and often). The Israelites are addressed as sons of a sorceress (comp. on ii. 6). Witchcraft is only possible by reason of idolatrous superstition, because it would produce effects by supernatural powers that are not the powers of the true

God. The children of the witch are such as have not only a witch for mother, but have also themselves a witch nature. Thus the idolatrous inclination of the people is charged as something inherited (comp. on i. 4). What is here expressed in one notion is explained in the second half of the verse. For זרע מנאף is seed of the adulterer (comp. ז׳ מְרֵעִים, i. 4; xiv. 20; ז׳ קֹדֶשׁ, vi. 13; ז׳ שָׁקֶר, lvii. 4), thus the ancestors of the present generation are designated as adulterers in their relation to Jehovah, i. e., as idolaters. But that the present generation is adulterous, i. e., idolatrous, is expressed by the addition (וַתִּזְנֶה) [Eng. V. "and the whore"]. The view that this word is only the feminine of מנאף is disproved from the fact that the simple Vav copulative (וְזוֹנָה) would be used. Moreover, the mode of expression would be affected, and the addition superfluous. For from the view-point of polygamy, adultery is only possible with a married woman. Therefore in זרע מנאף is implied the representation, that the married woman had sinned with another man, i. e., with idols, and that therefore the present generation no longer has Jehovah for a father de facto, though de jure He may still pass for such. But וַתִּזְנֶה expresses that this generation, sprung from adultery, though recognized as legitimate, has itself committed adultery. As is well known, זָנָה stands very often for Israel's apostacy to idols (Exod. xxxiv. 15 sq.; Lev. xvii. 7; Num. xv. 39; Deut. xxxi. 16; Hos. ii. 6 sq.; Isa. i. 21, etc.).

In ver. 4 the Prophet charges the people with the audacious scoffing with which they persecuted the followers of Jehovah in general and himself, the worthy Prophet in particular. For the question על מי can, of course, in itself have a quantitative sense: are there then men at all, about whom ye make yourselves merry? But why might there not have been men, about whom even such a degenerate people might with a certain justice make themselves merry? For this reason we must take the question על מי in a qualitative sense as in xxxvii. 23. There it is asked: whom hast thou derided, etc.? Answer: the holy One of Israel. Thus here, also, the sense of qualis must be in the מי (comp. ver. 11, li. 12). The imperfects תתענגו, etc., denote that these derisions still continue. Here also we have that personal אַתֶּם, which makes so entirely the impression of immediate living presence. And if the contemporaries derided Jehovah's true followers and His prophets especially, who amongst them all was more exposed to the derision and deserved it less, than Isaiah. Hence there seems to me in this על־מי to be expressed the consciousness of personal worth and of outrage perpetrated by wounding it. התענג, "delectari aliquare, to delight one's self, to take pleasure from something," is found only here in a bad sense. Opening wide the mouth along with derisive laughter is mentioned also Ps. xxii. 8; xxxv. 21. Sticking out the tongue as a gesture of derision is not mentioned elsewhere in the Scripture. Expositors cite LIVY, VII. 10: linguam ab irrisu exserens. The point of the verse consists in the distinction between the one scoffed at and the scoffers. What the former is, is not said. But we guess it. What the latter are, the Prophet states with the words: are ye not children of sin (i. e., such whose own nature partakes of the sin of those that begot), a spurious seed? That is, I think that זרע שקר is the antithesis of זרע אֱמֶת (Jer. ii. 21). Then it is not a seed in which materially the species "lie." appears out of the sphere of the genus "sin;" but זרע שקר is a seed which any how formally is not what it pretends to be; i. e., a false, spurious seed. Thus the same is expressed as by זרע מנאף ver. 3.

3. Inflaming——yourselves comfort in these.—Vers. 5, 6. In what follows the Prophet enumerates all the sorts of idolatry by which the Israelites of his times proved themselves to be "children of sin" and "a spurious seed." אֵלִים here means terebinths and not "gods," as appears from the " כל־עץ (see on i. 29) that stands in parallelism. As a beautiful, shady tree, the terebinth played a great part in the idolatrous tree worship of the Hebrews (comp. Ezek. vi. 13; Hos. iv. 13). It enticed to idolatry. Hence it is said, that the idolatrous fervor, that was only too closely joined to fleshly voluptuousness, was kindled by the terebinths. But not only stately, shady terebinths, every green tree kindled the idolatrous desire. But worse still than the tree-worship, was the murderous Baal and Moloch worship, to which especially the poor children fell a sacrifice (comp. my remarks on Jer. xvii. 2). Although this horrible worship exacted the burning of children, still the word שָׁחַט is used in connection with it, beside other expressions referring to it (Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5; Ezek. xvi. 20, 21. At the same time it seems to me that the Prophet (who in what follows pursues the thought that Israel in a sacrilegious way transferred all parts of Jehovah's worship to its idolatrous worship), would here, by the choice of this word שחט, express the thought that the children were their עֹלוֹת. For the slaying of beasts destined for whole-burnt-offerings was expressed by שחט, whereas זָבַח was the specific word for the slaying of the שלמים (see on v. 7, 8). In the valleys, under the clifts of the rocks, thus not only in the vale of Hinnom, but elsewhere also, in forbidding rocky defiles, were those horrid sacrifices offered.

Ver. 6. Among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion. See Text. and Gram. By these smooth stones are any way to be understood the sacred anointed stones (Bayetilia). The earliest trace of this usage appears in Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxv. 14. But what was originally a simple act of consecration to serve for sacred remembrance, became gradually the substratum of an idolatrous worship, the stone worship (comp. Jer. iii. 9; Ezek. xx. 32). As the name βαίτυλος, βαιτύλια is of Phœnician origin, the view is not without foundation that this name is to be referred back to בֵּית־אֵל. Comp. [SMITH'S Dic. of the B. Art. Stones]; LEYRER in HERZ. R.-Encycl. XVI. p. 322; KURTZ, Hist. of the Old Covenant, I. § 75, 3; GRIMMEL, De lapidum cultu, Marburg, 1853. The baetylia were indeed stones smooth with oil. ARNOBIUS (Adver. Gentes I. 39) relates of the heathen period of his life: "Si quando conspexeram lubricatum lapidem et ex olivi unguine sordidatum, tanquam inesset vis praesens, adulabar, affabar et beneficia poscebam nihil sentiente de trunco." LOWTH cites at our text a passage from THEOPHRAST (to Autolykos I. 15) where it is said of a superstitious man: "Καὶ τῶν λιπαρῶν λίθων τῶν ἐν ταῖς τριόδοις παριὼν ἐκ τῆς ληκύθου ἔλαιον καταχεῖν καὶ ἐπὶ γόνατα πεσὼν καὶ προσκυνήσας ἀπαλλάττεσθαι." Comp. CLEMENT of Alex. Strom. VII. 843. Our passage indeed does not seem to speak of oily, smooth stones. But it appears that that worship, apart from the smoothing by oil, was only given to stones that by nature or art had a smooth surface. At least we could not suppose that Jacob chose a rough stone for his pillow. And our text favors the idea that one did not choose for adoration any sort of stone remarkable for size or form, but especially smooth stones. The emphatic הֵם הֵם these, these, refers to the stones as something that Israel in a shameful way made rivals of Jehovah. גּוֹרָל, properly lapillus, is, indeed, no where else so used that Jehovah Himself is called "the lot" of His people. But the word is chosen here because the Prophet intended an allusion to the notion "stone" contained in חלקי־נחל. The thought underlying also the second half of verse 6 is, that the idolatrous Israelites gave to their lumpish idols what was due to Jehovah alone. For here, too, the aping is rebuked, by which they transferred the various parts of Jehovah worship to the idol worship. For נֶסֶךְ drink offering, and מִנְחָה meat offering were essential parts of Jehovah's worship. The latter consisted of flour in various forms, with salt, olive oil and incense in addition (Lev. ii). The former represented the drinking suited to eating, and consisted only of wine (Exod. xxix. 40; Num. xv. 5 sqq.). הֶעֱלָה with the object מנחה = altari imposuit fertum occurs again lxvi. 3. How deeply the LORD feels the insult, is declared in the words: should I console myself (be quiet) concerning such? Niph. נִחַם with עַל denotes 1) to pity one's self, 2) to feel regret, sorrow, 3) to console one's self, to quiet one's self (2 Sam. xiii. 39; Jer. xxxi. 15; Ezek. xxxii. 31). A modification of the last meaning given is "to revenge one's self," which we had i. 24. The context shows that only the meaning given under 3) suits here.

4. Upon a lofty——sawest it.—Vers. 7, 8. In these two verses the Prophet shows how in idolatrous worship, Israel even (גם־שם עלית ver. 7) aped the peace offering, the זֶבַח שְׁלָמִים. And he joins with it, in a particularly marked way, the adulterous conduct of which it was thereby guilty. Why the Prophet connects the latter particular just with שְׁלָמִים may have this reason, that these sacrifices were always united with meals, and just these may have given occasion for abandonment to joviality and especially to fleshly debauchery, particularly when celebrated in the open air on mountain elevations. Hos. iv. 13 also mentions the offering of the idolatrous זֶבַח on mountain tops and connected with licentiousness. The expression הר־גבה ונשא is found so exactly only here; but comp. ii. 2; xxx. 25. שַׂמְתְּ מִשְׁכָּבֵךְ is a figurative expression for the act of idolatrous worship. It cannot be doubted that by לִזְבֹּחַ זֶבַח the Prophet means the Shelamim sacrifice. For the זבח was most closely joined with that. "For the Shelamim offering [peace offering] the Pentateuch also uses simply the expression זֶבַח, i. e., killing; indeed this word in the Pentateuch has only this narrower sense, as further the meal of the שלמים as often designated by the verb זבח. The reason of this mode of expression was, that, as in the burnt-offering, the peculiar feature was the bringing up of the entire sacrifice on to the altar, so the sacrificial meal belonged essentially to the peace offering. זֶבַח denotes the killing with reference to a meal that was to be held (comp. especially Lev. xvii. 3 sqq.; Deut. xii. 15); it is thus distinguished from שָׁחַט which has no such reference." (ŒHLER in HERZ., R.-Encycl. X. p. 637).

The initial words of ver. 8 have experienced a double explanation. The ancient expositors from JEROME down understand by זִכְרוֹן, remembrance, any sort of idolatrous emblem, especially the household gods, Lares. But first it is to be objected, that the expression is a strange one to denote that, and then to put behind the doors and the posts seems rather to describe contemptuous than honorable treatment. Hence modern expositors have justly understood זכרון to mean what in Deut. vi. 8; xi. 20, was prescribed to be written on the מְזוּזֹת and on the שְׁעָרִים, especially since in Exod. xiii. 9 a similar memorial is expressly called זִכָּרוֹן. Therefore we may justly regard our text as a reference to the passages of the Pentateuch just cited. The Prophet charges the Israelites with putting those memorials containing the principles of the Theocracy behind the posts and doors, instead of on them, of course to get those hated reminders as far out of sight as possible. This done, they shamelessly left vacant (see Text. and Gram.) the place at the side of their husband, like an adulterous wife, in order to betake themselves to the conch of a lover.—מאתי גלית states how the adulterous wife made empty the place at her husband's side; ותעלי, how she ascended to the elevation (ver. 7); הרחבת משכבך, how she made the lewd bed, i. e. broad, to give room for the lover. ותכרת־לך מהם (see Text. and Gram.), describes the coarseness of this relation. The shameless harlot demands her price. What it was is not said. Any way it was agreed to. For the text continues: thou lovedest their embrace (משכב frequent in this sense: Num. xxxi. 17, 18, 35; Judg. xxi. 11, 12, etc.).

5. And thou wentest—wast not grieved.—Vers. 9, 10. The Prophet has hitherto described what we may call the immediate worship of idols. Now he turns to what may be called the political or indirect idolatry of the Israelites. For when they turned to heathen nations for help, instead of relying on the LORD, that also was idolatry. And it was such not merely in the subtile sense of trusting in an arm of flesh (comp. Jer. xvii. 5, 6; Isa. xxx. 1 sq.; xxxi. 1–3; 2 Ki. xvi. 7), but also in the grosser sense, inasmuch as trusting in a heathen nation involved trusting in its gods (x. 10, 11; Jer. ii. 33, 36; Ezek. xxiii. 7, 30; Hos. xii. 1). If this is the correct understanding of the fundamental thought of our passage, it is clear that we are not to understand מֶלֶךְ as meaning an idol, as many expositors do. It is therefore neither Moloch (comp. viii. 21; Amos v. 26; Jer. xlix. 1, 3; Zeph. i. 5), nor Anamelech, the Chronos of the Sepharvaim (2 Kings xvii. 31), as HITZIG thinks, nor the Phœnician Baal (מֶלֶךְ בַּעַל) as KNOBEL says. It seems to me also incorrect to suppose it refers directly to the king of Assyria. For there is nowhere any trace of his having been directly "the king" for the Israelites. And one cannot appeal to xxx. 30 to show that he was, for there, according to the context (comp. ver. 31, אַשּׁוּר), only the Assyrian king can be thought of. Hence it seems to me that the Prophet would say: Israel has ever turned to him who, according to existing relations, was for the time the king, κατ' ἐξοχήν. Nearly like, but not identical, is the construction of SAADIA, who understands מלך as collective. Also the choice of the word שׁור seems to favor our constructions, for it means "circuire, to go about" (comp. שָׁרָה, the wandering about, for caravans, Ezek. xxvii. 25). בַּשֶּׁמֶן is "with oil." But it remains doubtful whether that means "as one anointed with oil" (in order to charm the senses, Ezek. xxiii. 40) or "with presents of oil and ointments." Grammatically either is allowable. Comp. for the former use, Gen. xxxii. 11. But I prefer the latter, because it cannot be said that Israel itself came to the king, but sent ambassadors to remote places. Rather, according to Isaiah's style, the latter is the explanation of the figure. The great rulers, now Assyria, now Egypt, lived far away. Did Israel perhaps send ambassadors further than that? Any way one may not press the significance of "oil and ointments." The simple meaning is, that Israel sent the noblest and costliest gifts of its land as presents. The olive tree grew nowhere so well as in Palestine; comp. LEYRER, HERZOG's Real-Enc. X. p. 547. One of the ingredients of the רִקֻּחִים (ἅπ. λεγ., otherwise רֹקַח), "ointments," perfumes, were בְּשָׂמִים, and Palestine was regarded as the exclusive home of the balsam shrub, ibid. I. 673. Chap. xxxix. 2 shows that costly oil and noble ointment belonged to the royal treasures. צִיר = "messenger," as in xviii. 2. But Israel's attempts to find helpers not only went far, but also deep. It is common to understand עַד־שְׁאוֹל to mean the humble gestures and words of those seeking help. But that were a bad and senseless hyperbole. I believe the Prophet by didst send thy messengers far off refers chiefly to chaps. xxviii.–xxxiii., and by thou wentest down to hell has especially in mind xxviii. 15, where the rulers of Jerusalem are made to say: "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement." The Hiph. השׁפיל, therefore, has not an ethical, but a local sense (comp. xxv. 12; xxvi. 5; Ps. cxiii. 6).

Ver. 10. Thus Israel had wearied itself with much running (דֶּרֶךְ is abstractum here: the going, running, as often, comp. 1 Kings xviii. 27 and chap. xlvii. 12; 1 Kings xix. 7); but did not learn to see the uselessness of its efforts. Rather, because the weak hand from time to time felt some life, Israel never came to feel sick, i. e. to know and feel its powerlessness in its complete reality.

6. And of whom hast thou——way of my people.—Vers. 11–14. Having thus described the idolatrous practices of the nation, the Prophet next asks for the reasons of it. These may be positive and negative: the idols may have advantages that Jehovah has not, and Jehovah may have defects that the idols are free from. I do not believe that אֶת־מִי refers to the heathen nations or their rulers, to whom Israel had looked for protection. For the whole context treats essentially of Israel's religious conduct, and here especially of the reasons Israel might have for preferring idols to Jehovah. And, indeed, according to our remark on ver. 9, the dreadfulness of a nation depended on the power of its gods. מִי therefore refers to the idols. It is to be taken in the same sense as in ver. 4. Indeed one may say that this אֶת־מִי stands in a certain antithetical relation to that עַל־מִי. For if עַל־מִי, ver. 4, relates primarily to the Prophet, still it refers indirectly also to Jehovah, because the Prophet is such a one only through Jehovah. Of whom wast thou apprehensive, and so wast afraid. See Text. and Gram. It might be thought that what could move Israel to unfaithfulness to its LORD must be very considerable, grand in power and glory, far superior to Jehovah. But is such the case? No. One might expect the Prophet to dwell here on the contemptible quality of idols, that is intimated only by כִּי. But what were the use? Has he not abundantly done so in the first Ennead? See xl. 18 sqq.; xli. 6 sq.; 21 sqq.; xlii. 17; xliii. 9 sqq.; xliv. 9 sqq.; xlv. 20; xlvi. 1 sqq.; xlvii. 12; xlviii. 3 sqq.—That thou liedst. The meaning of כִּזֵּב here appears from what follows. It denotes the unfaithfulness, covenant-breaking nature of Israel. For by its deeds it proved its words to be lying words (comp. Ps. lxxviii. 36 sq.). Apart from single covenants (Exod. xix. 8; xxiv. 3, 7; Deut. v. 27 sqq.; Josh. xxiv. 16, 24) the confession of Jehovah was the standing law in Israel. The sense is: What is the quality of those things that thou fearest, that (כִּי, see Text. and Gram.) thou couldest be seduced by them to break faith with thy God? But, from the antithesis to עַל־מִי, ver. 4, and from what the Prophet has already said of the idols, it is seen that Israel found no sufficient motive for apostacy in the nature of its idols. There is another motive, viz. the silence of Jehovah. This must have been of such a nature as to explain the absence of fear of Him who was with Israel. This appears from the apodosis; therefore thou fearest Me not.—Therefore we are not to understand a not-speaking, but a not-doing. The LORD had kept His peace, and indeed from very ancient time (ו before עולם = "and indeed," comp. xiii. 10; xxxii. 7; xliv. 28), He had looked on, spared, used forbearance. Of course this must be understood relatively, for single chastisements were not wanting. But in comparison with the language the LORD used in leading Israel into exile, all that had been before was silence. Thus the LORD speaks of such a silence with reference to Israel as He had before spoken of with reference to the Gentiles, xlii. 14. If one supposes the Prophet to speak from the stand-point of the Exile, it is verily not evident what so terrible happened to the wicked Israelites after the Exile, as to make all that happened before seem silence in comparison.

Ver. 12. I will declare.—In contrast with His former silence, the LORD says He will speak. He will declare the righteousness of Israel and its fruits, the works. The whole verse is ironically meant. First of all there is irony in אגיד. At first sight it seems as if the LORD presented the prospect of an imposing proclamation of the great, hitherto-ignored deserts of Israel. Second, one supposes on this account that by "righteousness" and "works" are to be understood the manifestations of an actually existing righteousness of Israel's. But in fact the LORD means that the unrighteousness, the malignity, of Israel shall, by a suitable judicial act, be pilloried before the whole world. Third, the expression: but they will not profit thee is an ironical meiosis. For what Israel has to show in fruits of righteousness is so much the opposite of true righteousness that no other fruit than destruction can come of it. It is seen that I do not follow the punctuation of the Masorets. I cannot therefore approve of the rendering: "and as regards thy handiwork (the idols), they will not profit thee (DELITZSCH, SEINECKE, ROHLING, WEBER). For 1) the brief words, ver. 12 b a, would be no suitable expression for the important thought that the LORD will bring Israel's sin to light by great judgments; 2) it were strange to say, ver. 12 b, of the idols: "they will not help thee," and then to continue, ver. 13: "when thou criest let them help thee."—Thus I believe that not till in ver. 13 is declared the incapacity of the heaps of idols (קִבּוּצִים, ἅπ. λεγ., properly "gatherings" in the sense of "pantheon").—["ABEN EZRA appears to understand the word generically, as denoting all that they could scrape together for their own security, including idols, armies and all other objects of reliance." J. A. ALEX. This comprehensive meaning would suit the reference of vers. 9, 10, which, spite of the Author's interpretation, that makes the main reference in the end to be to idols, certainly does not exclude reliance on foreign kings and their armies.—TR.]—The wind, yea, a breath will carry away the whole pantheon (HENGSTENBERG, DELITZSCH, comp. xli. 16, 29). On the other hand, those that put their trust in the LORD, even if the general calamity shall have carried them off into the Exile, will take possession of the holy hand and of the holy mountain as their inheritance. Hence return out of the Exile is the concluding thought, which is expressed in ver. 14 with great emphasis.

3. GOD'S LOVE SMITES AND HEALS THOSE THAT LET THEMSELVES BE HEALED.

CHAPTER LVII. 15–21.

15 For thus saith the high and lofty One
[a]That inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy;
I dwell in the high and holy place,
With him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit,
To revive the spirit of the humble,
And to revive the heart of the contrite ones.
16 For I will not contend for ever,
Neither will I be always wroth:
[b]For the spirit should fail before me,
And the souls which I have made.
17 For the iniquity of his covetousness [c]was I wroth,
And smote him: I hid me, and was wroth,
[d]And he went on [1]frowardly in the way of his heart.
18 I have seen his ways, and will heal him:
I will lead him also, and restore comforts,
Unto him [e]and to his mourners.

19 ¶I create the fruit of the lips;
Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near,
Saith the LORD; and I will heal him.
20 But the wicked are like the troubled sea,
When it cannot rest,
Whose waters cast up mire and dirt.
21 There is no peace, saith my God to the wicked.

[1] Heb. turning away.

[a] The One dwelling eternally. [b] For the spirit that goes out from me would pine away.
[c] am I angry, and smite him, in that being angry I hide myself. [d] But. [e] even.
[f] He that creates the noblest bloom of the lips.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 15. דַּכָּא as an adjective, comp. Ps. xxxiv. 19. Ver. 16. יַעֲטֹף frequent in the Psalms: lxi. 3; lxxiii. 6; lxxvii. 4; cvii. 5; cxlii. 4; cxliii. 4. Ver. 17. בֶּצַע, comp. Jer. vi. 13. Ver. 20. רֶפֶשׁ.

Ver. 17. הַסְתֵּר is the inf. absol. placed after, expressing the notion of what is constant, continuous; one might say here, expressive of the constant practice. Instead of ואקצף it would properly read וְקָצוֹף. But, as is well known, there occur many modifications in this sort of construction. Especially it happens not seldom that the inf. absol. changes in the last member into the finite verb or participle (comp. 2 Sam. xvi. 13; Gen. xxvi. 13; Jer. xli. 6; 2 Sam. xv. 30; xvi. 5, etc.). Therefore we translate: "and I smite him, in that I being angry hide myself." הסתר direct causative Hiph. = to make concealment, hiding.——The clause וילך שובב וגו׳ states the further consequence of the divine smiting. But for this is used the Vav consec. imperf., denoting, not a single, historical fact, but a manifestation constantly repeated, according to the usage that expresses aoristically what is yet something continuous. Comp. וַתְּזוּנֶה ver. 3; וַיִּגְרְשׁוּ ver. 20.——שׁוֹבָב comp. Jer. iii. 14, 22; concerning its distinction from שׁוֹבֵב see on Jerem. xxxi. 22.

Ver. 18. One may (according to the view in the comment below) understand ארפאהו de conatu, as the word is evidently used in Jer. vi. 14; viii. 11, which passages, also, on account of בֶּצַע in the foregoing verse, and on account of the double שָׁלוֹם, accord in sound with our text. The construction of ver. 18 is as in ver. 17 a. As there קצפתי is followed by ואכהו, so here ראיתי is followed by וארפאהו וגו׳.

Ver. 19. Instead of נוב the K'ri reads נִיב, because the only passage beside where the substantive occurs, Mal. i. 12, has נִיבוֹ. The singular suffix in רפאתיו is to be referred to the collective singulars רחוק and קרוב.

Ver. 20. As it does not read הַנִּרְגָּשׁ, we are not to regard this verbal form as a participle, but as the third pers. perf., and to supply אֲשֶׁר before it.——The words השקט לא יוכל are quoted Jer. xlix. 23. That in Jeremiah they are not original, appears from his using them as outward adornment, as embellishment of his discourse, whereas in our text they are organically grounded in the context.——רֶפֶשׁ, comp. רָפַס pedibus calcavit, turbavit. Concerning the Aorist וַיִּגְרְשׁוּ, comp. on וַיֵּלֶךְ ver. 17.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Prophet here gives a worthy conclusion to the Ennead whose centre is the humble Servant of God. He points us to the fact, that the ground of all salvation is the unity of highness and lowness in God that love mediates. For God is enthroned as the highest and absolutely holy Being in the highest majesty and glory, and yet at the same time He dwells with the wretched and contrite in order to give them new life (ver. 15). For He is angry for a while, but the foundation of His being is still love. Hence He cannot let the spirit, the soul of men, His own creatures, be destroyed (vers. 16). On account of sin, indeed, He smites a man. But when the man, not reformed by the outward chastisement, perseveres in his own chosen way (ver. 17), still He does not for this reason give him up. He now applies the opposite mode of treatment: He heals him, by working inwardly on his heart by gentle means, as far, of course, as there is the necessary receptivity for this healing treatment, that is, the capacity of being sorry for the ways of the past (ver. 18). In conclusion, the Prophet designates the announcement of this divine saving treatment as the flower of the word of prophecy (ver. 19), but which of course will not profit all. For the wicked, that are like the sea, which lashed by storms throws up dirty foam (ver. 20)—the wicked find no peace (ver. 21). We wonder to hear these profound, evangelical words from the mouth of the Old Testament Prophet. Were they perhaps written by a scholar of the beloved disciple and smuggled in here? And how artistically the Prophet recapitulates the fundamental thought of this section, and returns to the refrain with which he would conclude this as all three sections.

2. For thus saith——I have made.—Vers. 15-16. That ver. 15, and not ver. 14, begins the concluding word appears from the formula "For thus saith" which as a rule begins sections (lvi. 4; lii. 4; xlv. 18; xxxi. 4; xxi. 6, 16; xviii. 4, etc.), partly, too, from the divine title, which is wont to be employed at the head of sections (i. 24; x. 24; xxii. 15; xxx. 15, xlii. 5; xliii. 1, 14, 16; xliv. 6; xlv. 11, 18; xlviii. 17; xlix. 7, etc.). A third reason is, that the vers. 15-21 relate to a wider sphere than those that precede. For from lvi. 10 on, the Prophet had Israel in mind, while in this concluding word his gaze comprehends humanity entire.—First he describes the LORD in respect to His infinite exaltation. He calls Him first רם ונשׂא, an expression that occurs only vi. 1, and which describes that exaltation of God primarily according to its outward appearance. Thus he calls Him שֹׁכֵן עַד (i. e., not: He who inhabits eternity,—a representation incapable of accomplishment, but: who eternally sits enthroned, i. e., maintains His house, His place, thus also His dignity and honor eternally, can never like a man be driven out of it, ix. 5; xxx. 8; xxvi. 4; xlv. 17; lxiv. 8; lxv. 18). Third he designates Him as the One whose name is "The Holy One," sanctus. Thus one would think He was too holy to resort to fellowship with sinful men. But no! He declares of Himself: although I dwell on high (heaven is meant, the high place of God that overlooks all, comp. xxxiii. 5, and the modified expression ibid. ver. 16) and in the holy place (קָדוֹשׁ in the sense of קֹדֶשׁ as in Ps. xlvi. 5; lxv. 5; it is the upper sanctuary that is meant, Exod. xxv. 9, 40; xxvi. 30; Acts vii. 44; Heb. viii. 5), still I dwell also with him that is of a contrite and lowly spirit (Prov. xvi. 19; xxix. 23). What contrasts, therefore, God is capable of! He dwells at the same time in the highest and in the lowliest. But that is no contradiction. For the "lowly spirit" is also just a choice and worthy dwelling, yea the choicest of all, since it is a living, personal habitation. But it is so choice for the reason that the humble man surrenders himself wholly, adds nothing from his own, will only accept God and let himself be illuminated by Him. Thus God supplies what is wanting in him. For He makes His dwelling in him precisely for the purpose of filling spirit and heart (i. e., mind and soul, thinking and willing), of the humble and contrite with a new, fresh divine life (comp. Gal. ii. 20). It appears from "to revive the spirit" and "to revive the heart," that the Prophet means such humble souls as are also bowed down deep with sorrow. Hence, ver. 16, he can proceed with for I will not to eternity contend, nor be perpetually angry (comp. Ps. ciii. 9). God cannot do this for the reason, also, that else the whole being of men would be destroyed. For as a creature, man cannot in the long run endure the wrath of God. By continued smiting the spirit of man that "stands before God," i. e., as kindred with God, is capable (Matth. xviii. 10) of His presence and fellowship, and the soul that became נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים (Gen. ii. 7) by the inbreathing of the Spirit, must pine away and perish. In this way God would destroy His own work.

3. For the iniquity——his mourners.—Vers. 17, 18. The sorrows that God decrees are not blows of destruction (Lam. iii. 31–42). He is angry and chastises only on account of sin. But that sin is here made prominent which is in 1 Tim. vi. 10 called the root of all evil things, viz., the πλεονεξία (Col. iii. 5) or φιλαργυρία. It is here named metonymically, the thing striven for (בֶּצַע, "cutting, gain") being put for the striving. What guilt is so great that a man will not burden his conscience with it for the sake of gain? The perf. קָצַפְתִּי describes the anger as an actual foundation that the LORD feels in His heart. The consequence and expression of this anger is the smiting. But as it is not said וָאַכֵּהוּ but וְאַכֵּהוּ, we may not translate: and I smote, but: "and I smite." From this it appears, that the LORD has not in mind concrete, definite facts, as say His conduct toward the people Israel, but He describes here the conduct He observes everywhere and toward all men. Therefore we must translate: I am angry and I smite, in that being angry (see Text. and Gram.) I hide Myself. The clause but he went off rebelliously in the way of his heart, declares the further consequence of the divine smiting. The observation continually repeats itself, that the divine chastisement is disregarded by men. It was verified in the case of Israel as in that of the majority of mankind. Therefore the chastisement was of no avail. One would suppose then that the LORD must leave the contumacious man to his well deserved fate. But no! The forbearance, the patience, the compassionate love of God is without bounds. He sees (surveys) the ways of a man, their beginning, middle and end. He sees whither these ways lead. They lead to everlasting destruction. He cannot suffer this. Therefore He approaches a man not only outwardly by angry smiting (ver. 17 a), He also makes the attempt inwardly. He heals the man; self-evidently the man who lets himself be healed. For God lays His grace indeed as near a man as possible. But He never forces it on him. The manner of the healing is explained in the following words: and I will lead him, etc. God brings the man from the way of error on to the right way, and then extends to him what is needful to comfort and strengthen him. שַׁלֵּם נִחֻמִים is properly "to requite, compensate consolations," i. e., offer consolations as compensation. The ולאבליו joined on contains the plainest restriction of the וארפאהו. That is one must, with STIER, DELITZSCH et al., take וְ in the sense of "and indeed, viz." (comp. ver. 11). The LORD cannot guide all and refresh all with His consolations, but only those that are of a troubled spirit. They are therefore the same that in ver. 15 are called contrite and humble of spirit.

4. I create the fruit——the wicked.—Vers. 19–21. So much is certain, ver. 19 introduces the conclusion. The thought "peace" joins vers. 19–21 close to one another. But what of בורא ניב שפתים? Grammatically the words may be joined either with what precedes or with what follows. And as regards the sense, "sprout, fruit of the lips" does not necessarily mean only thanks and praise, although the words of our text are so understood, Heb. xiii. 15. In Prov. x. 31 wisdom is designated as the outgrowth of the mouth, in Prov. xii. 14; xiii. 2; xviii. 20 satiety with good generally is described as תְּבוּאַת שְׂפָתַיִם and פְּרִי פֶה. Therefore ניב שפתים may be the word of prophecy, either that before us or the word of prophecy in general. Now can one say, that the LORD extends comfort in that He creates thanks and praise? Not very well. At least in our context one looks for: in order to make (לִבְרֹא) thanksgiving, or "I create fruit of the lips, in that I extend comfort." But if by "fruit of the lips" one understands the prophetic word, then would be said, that the LORD heals, guides, comforts, in that He makes the fruit of the lips, i. e. of the prophetic lips. But that were a very forced and artificial manner of expression. For the LORD can after all only indirectly heal and comfort by making the Prophet speak divine words. It comes about directly only by means of the LORD's opening the hearts to give heed to what is spoken by His Spirit (Acts xvi. 14). Therefore it does not seem to me to be proper to connect בורא נ׳ ש׳ with what precedes. But if we connect it with what follows, the same reasons already given determine against the meaning "thanks and praise." Therefore if we refer it to the prophetic word, we must first of all not forget that these words are spoken with a certain emphasis. The expression though kindred, is still not the same in meaning as פְּרִי or תְּבוּאַת שְׂפָתַיִם. For ניב is not the usual word for "budding, sprouting" (the most usual are פֶּרַח or צֶמַח). It occurs only in poetry and only in four places, and, as remarked, is always used with a certain emphasis. For Ps. lxii. 11 it designates a vigorous sprouting, and the same also Ps. xcii. 15, which speaks of an impelling force effective even in old age. Prov. x. 31 would say, that the mouth of the righteous is gifted with the power to produce that which is noblest, wisdom. Zech. ix. 17, finally, also speaks of a power of production whose intensity is attested by the excellence of what it produces. So then I believe that here ניב ש׳ does not mean in general "offspring of the lips," but "splendid offspring, noble offspring." That is, the Prophet would say, that he regards the proclamation of peace and healing for those far and near as the highest and noblest flower of his prophecy. Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near, and I will heal him, saith the Lord, therewith creating the flower of the (prophetic) lips, i. e., in that He utters the highest and most glorious thing that He commissions His Prophet to proclaim. אָמַר יהוה stands elsewhere only at the end of the discourse (xxii. 14; xxxix. 6; xlv. 13; xlix. 5; liv. 1, 6, 8, 10; lix. 21; lxv. 7, 25; lxvi. 9, 20, 21, 23). Here it stands, as in ver. 21; xlviii. 22 (comp. אָמַר לִי xlv. 24; Jer. xxx. 3) as an insertion. The double שָׁלוֹם sounds solemn and emphatic (comp. xxvi. 3; Jer. vi. 14; viii. 11; 1 Chr. xii. 18). By the "far and near" I cannot understand "the Israelites scattered far and wide." How should the remote or nearer distance of the place of banishment from Palestine have any importance for the LORD? And if not for Him, then certainly they would have no importance for the believing Israelites. To give explanation on this point was not necessary for the "flower of prophecy." But it was important to declare, that also the heathen, that hitherto had been far off, were to come near and partake of the salvation of Israel (comp. xlii. 6; xlix. 6; lxv. 1; Hos. ii. 23, etc.). Thus Paul understood the passage (Eph. ii. 17). ורפאתיו connects with וארפאהו ver. 18, and shows that the LORD knows no salvation without healing. There is indeed no salvation for those not healed, the spiritually sick, the wicked (ver. 20, 21). Thus ורפאתיו mediates in an artistic way the connection between what precedes and what follows.

Ver. 20. The wicked are like the sea that is stirred up. The Prophet distinguishes two particulars. First the unrest of the sea. This is the effect of storms that do not allow the sea to rest. The other is the foam and mud that the sea throws out of its depths. The likings and cravings, the passions are the storms that stir up the human heart and let it have no rest. The wicked works are the foam and slime that then come to the surface and make manifest the uncleanness, the depravity, therefore the malady within. For it cannot rest: these words are quoted in Jer. xlix. 23, see Text. and Gram. [This verse recalls Jude 13, which may be an allusion to it.—TR.].

Ver. 21 gives the refrain-like conclusion of the Ennead which we had xlviii. 22. It does not come in abruptly as there, but is duly prepared. The only difference between this and xlviii. 22 is that here we have אלהי, while there it reads יהוה. In this "my God" is uttered the absolute reliability of what has been said. How could that be incorrect that was said to the Prophet by his God?

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lvi. 11. (Every one looks to his own way). "Potest intelligi de externis criminibus, sed magis placet, ut accipiatur de speciosis viis, in quibus ambulant hypocritae. Sic Franciscanus Francisci regulam sequitur, decalogum et evangelii doctrinam negligit tanquam rem vulgarem, quae ad vulgus pertineant."—LUTHER.

2. On lvi. 12. In the Alexandrian and Vatican texts of the LXX., the words from מִקְצֵהוּ ver. 11 to the end of ver. 12 are wanting, which even JEROME remarks on. He adds: "denique hos versiculos nullus ecclesiasticorum interpretum disseruit, sed quasi patentem in medio foveam transiliunt atque transmittunt."—That the Fathers, unacquainted as they were with Hebrew, pass the words by, is simply explained by the LXX. omitting them. JEROME, because he knew Hebrew, as he himself says, "added them ex hebraico." But why the Greek translator left them out is doubtful. THEODOTION (see Hexapla ORIG. ed. Montfaucon II., p. 179) has them.—"Ab hoc vitio (ebrietatis) abstinere debent pii ecclesiae ministri memores interdicti apostolici 1 Tim. iii. 2, 3, considerantes secum, nullam horulam ipsis esse adeo liberam ac vacuam, qua non ad officia functionis suis possint avocari."—FOERSTER.—"Let one point the rough figure for himself for the more delicate spiritual form also, quite as Matth. xxiv. 49; Eph. v. 18, and the like are meant. For there is a drunkenness and voluptuousness in all kinds of wine and intoxication, which only the eye of the Spirit beholds in many an honorable Bishop, General-superintendent or Superior-court-preacher. 3. On lvii. 1. "Against the heedlessness of the world, that regards the life and death of men alike. For because Pharaoh and Moses, Saul and Jonathan, Judas and Peter, must temporally die, the one as the other, they suppose it is as much to one as to the other. But on the contrary, one should lay it to heart when useful and pious men fall, because, first, one must miss them afterwards, especially their prayers by which they stand in the breach and run to the walls (Ezek. xxii. 30); second, because the destruction of such people is wont to be an evil omen of a great impending misfortune and change. [" It is a sign that God intends, war when He calls home His ambassadors."—M. HENRY]. Examples: When Noah turns his back on the world and shuts himself in the ark, the deluge comes (Gen. vii. 17). When Lot goes out of Sodom and Gomorrah, fire from heaven falls on them (Gen. xix. 24). When Joseph dies in Egypt, the bondage of the children of Israel begins, together with the murder of their infant boys (Exod. i. 8). When Hezekiah died, then followed the tyranny of Manasseh (2 Kings xx., xxi.) When Christ and His disciples were made way with, then began the destruction of Jerusalem."—CRAMER.—"Sicut ad Josiam dicit: tolleris, ne videant occuli tui hoc malum, etc. (2 Kings xxii. 18–20). *Sic excidio Hierosolymitano erepti sunt apostoli et reliqui Sancti. And hellish enemies, as little as human, can do them any harm."—" It is a misfortune for the whole country when distinguished and deserving people are taken out of the midst by temporal death. For them, indeed, it is well; but God have mercy on those that are left. For as in a great storm, when the heavens are overcast with clouds, the shepherd leads in the sheep, the husbandman hastily gathers his sheaves, the parents call in the children from the streets, so our dear God calls His dearest children together, that the calamity may not touch them." —CRAMER.—" The men of grace or mercy are receivers and distributers, thus also the mediators of the grace of God for their people; the men of grace, that atoningly represent the land by intercessions and conduct, postpone its judgment (Gen. xviii. 24; Ezek. xxii. 30)." STIER.—" The mere presence of an honest man is still a restraint on the unbridledness of blasphemers." G. MUELLER in STIER.

4. On lvii. 2. " Against the idle fancy of the fire of purgatory. For here it is said of those who have walked uprightly, not that they get into trouble, unrest, pain and torment, by which they must be purged; but that, with respect to their souls, they come to peace. But as to their bodies, they rest in their sleeping chamber. They are not on this account driven about; they seek also no mass or soul baths, as the Papists pretend."—CRAMER.

(Attributed to CORNELIUS GALLUS, the friend of VIRGIL).

5. On lvii. 4. It should be a wreath of honor to all faithful teachers and preachers, that they are regarded as monsters and are lampooned by the wise of this world. For if the great Prophet Isaiah in this passage, item, Jeremiah (Jer. xx. 8), Elijah (2 Kings ii. 24), Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxiii. 31), Job (Job xvii. 6), yea, even Christ Himself had to suffer this, what wonder is it if the scoffing birds sharpen their beaks on us and chatter like the storks?" 6. [On lvii. 8. " When a people forget God, the memorials of their apostacy will be found in every part of their habitations. The shrines of idol gods may not be there; the beautiful images of the Greek and Roman mythology, or the clumsy devices of less refined heathens may not be there; but the furniture, the style of living will reveal from 'behind every door and the posts" of the house that God is forgotten, and that they are influenced by other principles than a regard for His name. The sofa, the carpet, the chandelier, the centre-table, the instruments of music, the splendid mirror, may be of such workmanship as to show, as clearly as the image of a heathen god, that JEHOVAH is not honored in the dwelling, and that His law does not control the domestic arrangements." BARNES].

7. [On lvii. 10. " Thou art wearied——no hope. This is a striking illustration of the conduct of men in seeking happiness away from God. They wander from object to object; they become weary in the pursuit, yet they do not abandon it; they still cling to hope though often repulsed—and though the world gives them no permanent comfort—though wealth, ambition, gayety, and vice all fail in imparting the happiness which they sought, yet they do not give it up in despair. They still feel that it is to be found in some other way, than by the disagreeable necessity of returning to God, and they wander from object to object, and from land to land, and become exhausted in the pursuit, and still are not ready to say there is no hope, we give it up in despair, and we will now seek happiness in God." BARNES.

" NOTE.—Despair of happiness in the creature, and of satisfaction in the service of sin, is the first step toward a well-grounded hope of happiness in God, and a well-fixed resolution to keep to His service; and those are inexcusable who have had sensible convictions of the vanity of the creature, and yet will not be brought to say, 'There is no hope to be happy short of the Creator.'—NOTE.—Prosperity in sin (Thou hast found the life of thy hand) is a great bar to conversion from sin." M. HENRY].

8. On lvii. 11. " God keeps silence only for a while, but yet not for ever and continually, with respect to men's sins; but the longer He has kept silence, the harder He punishes afterwards."—STARKE.

9. On lvii. 12. "Tuam justitiam. Est emphasis in pronomine tuam. Quasi dicat: mea justitia firma et perpetua est, tua non item. . . . In calamitate nihil desperatius est justitiariis, cum secundis rebus nihil quoque iis sit confidentius.—LUTHER."

10. On lvii. 15 sq. " God has three sorts of dwellings: first in the highest, second in the sanctuary, third in humble hearts. The first dwelling is the universalis praesentia, the universal presence, by which He fills all (Jer. xxiii. 24); but there He is too high and incomprehensible for us. The other is gratiosa, the gracious presence, by which He lets Himself be found in the word and sacraments, and also comes finally to us and makes His dwelling in our hearts (Jno. xiv. 23)." 11. On lvii. 18. Here again we have one of those words in which Isaiah shows Himself to be the Evangelist of the Old Testament. For in the old covenant God does not yet heal men, else the new were superfluous. The law only effects knowledge of sin, but it does not give the power to overcome sin. One fancies here again that he hears the Apostle that wrote Rom. viii.

12. On lvii. 19-21. "The gospel is a sermon of peace to the heathen that were far off, and to the Jews that were near. For by it we both have access in one Spirit to the Father (Eph. ii. 18). But the wicked quakes all his life and what he hears terrifies him (Job xv. 20; Isa. xlviii. 22). And especially in conflicts, and notably in the last hour, and when they see God's judgment near, one sees this in them, that they not only therefore often spit out blasphemies, but that for great anguish they have laid hands on themselves. Examples: Saul, Ahithophel, Judas, Franciscus Spiera. For because such peace is not to be brought about with works, they must ever stick in anger, resentment, discontent and disfavor with and before God. And it is only pure folly to wish to give the terrified hearts rest by their own expiation, merit and self-elected holiness. Much less will there be rest if one teaches such people to doubt the forgiveness of sins." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lvi. 10-lvii. 2. These words may be used as the text of a sermon for a fast-day, or also for a synodical sermon. One might then regard the Prophet's words as a mirror, or as a measure whereby to measure the condition of the church (of the country, of the times). From this would then come 1) earnest warning to those that belong to the wicked here described, or who do not oppose their doings; 2) comfort for those that have "walked straight before them," for, though hated and persecuted by men, they shall still come to peace.

2. On lvii. 1, 2. These words (also "a Jewish formula solennis for the pious dead," STIER) have very often been used as texts for funeral discourses for celebrated men.

3. On lvii. 2. Those that have walked in their uprightness, i. e., who during their lives have served the LORD in a living faith, need not fear death. It is to them a bringer of joy. For it brings 1) eternal peace to their soul, 2) rest to their body in the chamber of the grave, till the day of the blessed resurrection.

4. On lvii. 3-10. A description of the coarse idolatry, to which in our day correspond only too many appearances of the modern and subtile heathenism. Only too many have sucked in with their mother's milk superstition and unbelief, which as a rule go together. As Ishmael, who was begotten after the flesh, mocked and persecuted Isaac that was born according to the promise (Gal. iv. 28 sqq.), so also now. The false seed, i. e., those that are not born of the Spirit of the church, although by their fleshly birth they belong to it, mock and persecute the genuine children of the church. With insatiable greed people run daily, but especially on the LORD's day, under all green trees, i. e., to the places of worldly pleasure-seeking, where the idols of the belly and of mammon are served! And how many children are from their earliest youth led away to the service of these idols! Are not thereby their immortal souls spiritually slain? And is not that, in the end, a worse sacrifice of children than that ancient sort? All that puts men in mind of the service of God, men get out of their sight (pious customs, Sunday, feast days, church acts, as baptism, marriage, burial), in order to be able to surrender themselves undisturbed and wholly to the modern idols. Men no longer seek their strength in the covenant with the LORD, but among men in associations of every kind. And, because that does not instantly reveal its ruinous effects, but often seems to have a good effect, men never weary of this conduct, but confirm themselves in it more and more.

5. On lvii. 12. Many men will not by any means believe that their good works are wholly insufficient to obtain the righteousness that is of avail with God. Now God will, indeed, not suffer to go unrewarded the cup of water that we give to the thirsty in the proper spirit (Matth. x. 42; Mark ix. 41). But could we point to ever so many such cups, still they do not suffice to pay our ten thousand talents (Matth. xviii. 24 sqq.). One must therefore remind his charge of the great reckoning that the LORD will one day have with us. In this 1) will be had a complete and perfectly correct investigation into our indebtedness and assets. 2) Then it will appear that our assets will be too defective to be of any use whatever against our indebtedness.

6. On lvii. 13, 14. It depends very much on the sort of spirit with which one turns to God for help. If one does it in order to make a trial also with the dear God, then one will certainly be denied. But if one does it because one knows no other helper, and wishes to know no other, then one may confidently count on being heard. How differently the answers sound that God gives to the cries for help that reach Him. 1) To the one it is said: let thy gatherings help thee. 2) But to the others is called out: a. make a road, clear the way, take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people; b. inherit the land, possess my holy mountain.

7. On lvii. 15, 16. "I know that these sayings speak especially of penitent sinners and aroused consciences; but I do not see why they may not with good right be applied also to other alarmed and anxious people. One has here to look also at the examples of the dear children of God who are presented to us in the Holy Scriptures full of fear and alarm. Think of Job (ix. 34; xiii. 21), David (Ps. xxv. 17; lv. 5 sqq.), Daniel (viii. 17 sq.), Paul (1 Cor. ii. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 5), yea, of Jesus Christ Himself (Matth. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv.

33; Luke xxii. 44). From this thou seest clearly, thou lover of God, but timid and frightened soul, that thou art not the first among the children of God, that suffer His terrors and must go about with an anxious heart. It is also therewith sufficiently shown that such an event is not a reminder of anger, but rather of the grace of the kind and gracious God."—SCRIVER.

8. On lvii. 15, 16. "A holy shudder goes through my soul when, in receiving Thy body and blood, I think of who they are to whom Thou so communicatest Thyself! C.—THE NEW CREATURE.

CHAPS. LVIII.—LXVI.

At the close of the second Ennead, the gaze of the Prophet had returned from the heights of prophecy to the practical necessities of his own time. In the third Ennead he renewedly mounts aloft to the heights of prophetic vision. Chapters lviii., lix. form, as it were, the ladder on which he ascends. He shows in them how the people must, by a sincere repentance, raise themselves out of the region of the flesh into the region of the spirit. After this introductory section, the Prophet, in the second discourse, chap. lx., lets the day of salvation dawn by the rising of a new sun that will prove to be a new, heavenly principle of life in the sphere both of nature and of personal life. The third discourse, chap. lxi. 1–lxiii. 6, shows us that the new principle of life will be represented by a personal centre. And in this personality, which, indeed, he beholds only as veiled, the Prophet distinguishes a three-fold official activity. He so speaks of it that we must recognize it as the bearer of a prophetic, priestly and kingly power and dignity. As for the object of this three-fold activity, it will be a double one. In a positive respect, there will be brought by that personal centre to the people Israel all-comprehending salvation, that shall find its concentrated expression in a new name. But negatively, it will be active as judge of the whole Gentile world, here represented by Edom. The fourth discourse, chaps. lxiii. 7–lxiv. implies another descent of the Prophet into the present. But this time it is not the actual, absolute present, but a relative present, viz., that of the Exile, into which he translates himself in thought. And, as out of this present, he makes the people pray the LORD, in a fervent prayer, that He who once showed Himself as the God of His people, would now also look down, yea, that He would come down with grand display of His power. The fifth discourse, finally, chaps. lxv., lxvi., is like a limited "yes" to the prayer offered in the foregoing discourse. For the prayer was respecting the deliverance of all Israel (lxiv. 7, 8). To this lxv. replies that neither all Israel will be saved, nor all Israel be lost. The righteousness of God will give to each his own (lxv. 1–16). The pious shall receive new life. For there shall be a new earth and a new heaven. And the new life that shall reign in these will be one that is inexhaustibly rich, spiritually exalted, in the highest degree intensive; it will also bear the character of the tenderest maternal love (lxv. 17; lxvi. 14). In conclusion, there follows, lxvi. 15–24, a panorama of the last time. Its acts of judgment the Prophet beholds together. The first act of the judgment is pre-supposed when, in ver. 19, it is said, that those that have escaped bring the salvation to the heathen; that the latter shall, as it were, bring back Israel as an offering to Jehovah, and that then all mankind shall be a new Israel on the highest pinnacle. So ends the book with an outlook on a new creation of a higher grade, whose reverse side is briefly indicated in the extended refrain, lxvi. 24, as a worm that never dies, and a fire that is unquenchable.

It must, in the third Ennead, first of all surprise one, that the number of the chapters in it no longer corresponds to the number of discourses, as is in general the case in both the Enneads that precede. For there are nine chapters, and yet only five discourses. Besides, we observe evident interpolations in various places [see Introd., p. 16 b]. Also, the division of verses is erroneous in several places (comp. the rem. on lxiii. 19 b—lxiv. 4 a). All this appears to me to indicate that the Prophet had not wrought out the last Ennead as perfectly as the two preceding. In the materials originating from him, there were doubtless nine discourses indicated for the third division. Hence the undeniable Isaianic character of much the greater part of these last nine chapters. [The Author's further inferences are substantially a repetition of what appears on pp. 16, 17 of the Introduction, where see.—Tr.]

I.—THE FIRST DISCOURSE.

Bridge from the Present to the Future, from Preaching Repentance to Preaching Glory. Chaps. LVIII., LIX.

This discourse connects closely with the concluding word of the foregoing Ennead. There the Prophet had descended from the heights of future glory to the level of the present. This present, with its sad moral condition, makes him doubtful whether the glorious images of the future that he beheld could be realized. But he is comforted: God's loving wisdom is able to heal a man, if only he does not harden his heart. The Prophet, then, in these chapters, proceeds from the level to which in lvii. he descended. But he mounts upward again. He builds a bridge for himself that shall conduct him again to those heights he has momentarily forsaken. This he does first, by repelling the charge of the people that God is unjust and denies to their deserving its suitable reward. God, he says, is not unjust, but your piety is good for nothing, for it is merely outward, and appears associated with deeds that are morally objectionable (lviii. 1-5). Then it is shown how true piety that pleases God must prove itself by actions (lviii. 6-14). Then in chap. lix. which, with chap. lviii., forms an organic whole, the Prophet first refutes the charge that God cannot help, and shows that the moral corruption of the people is to blame for their misfortune (lix. 1-8). This charge the people acknowledge to be founded, and make a sincere confession that promises genuine fruits (lix. 9-15 a). Upon this confession the Prophet promises again that Israel shall come to its right, to the possession of the theocratic salvation, and receives in conclusion the comforting assurance that the Spirit imparted to him will rule in Israel forever (lix. 15 b-21). This artistically constructed conclusion has a double sense. First it intimates that the new covenant which the God will conclude with Israel shall inaugurate a life in the Spirit, and indeed the same Spirit which is imparted to the Prophet, and which will instantly, from chap. lx. on, again raise him aloft to the heights of prophetic vision. Here the division of the chapter is not quite correct. The first chief part of the discourse comprises lviii. 1-lix. 8; the second lix. 9-21. The first part opposes charge to charge. In chap. lviii. the charge against Israel on account of false piety is opposed to the charge against God of unrighteousness. In lix. 1-8 the charge of moral corruption is opposed to the charge of inability. The second part contains first the people's confession of sin (lix. 9-15 a), and then the promise that Jehovah will, after their repentance, also help Israel to their rights, by which also the spirit of the Prophet is, as it were, set free, and rendered capable of a new flight.

1. CHARGE AGAINST CHARGE.

Chap. LVIII. 1—LIX. 8.

a. The complaint of the people against the unrighteousness of Jehovah, opposed by the charge of false piety. Chapter LVIII. 1-14.

1 Cry [1]aloud, spare not,
Lift up thy voice like a trumpet,
And show my people their transgression,
And the house of Jacob their sins.
2 Yet they seek me daily,
And delight to know my ways,[a]
As a nation that did righteousness,
And forsook not the ordinance of their God:[b]
They ask of me the ordinances of justice;
They take delight in [c]approaching to God.
3 Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?
Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge?

Behold, in the day of your fast ye [d]find pleasure,
And exact all your [3]labours.
4 Behold, ye fast for [b]strife and debate,
And to smite with the fist of wickedness:
[4]Ye [e]shall not fast as ye do this day,
To make your voice to be heard on high.
5 Is it such a fast that I have chosen?
[5]A day for a man to afflict his soul?
Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush,
And to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast,
And an acceptable day to the LORD?
6 Is not this the fast that I have chosen?
To loose the bands of wickedness,
To undo [f]the [6]heavy burdens,
And to let the [7]oppressed go free,
And that ye break every yoke?
7 Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry,
And that thou bring the poor [g]that are [8]cast out to thy house?
When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him;
And that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?
8 Then shall thy light break forth as the morning,
And thine [h]health shall spring forth speedily:
And thy righteousness shall go before thee;
The glory of the LORD [9]shall be thy rereward.
9 Then shalt thou call, and the LORD shall answer;
Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am.
If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke,
The putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;
10 And [i]if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry,
And satisfy the afflicted soul;
Then shall thy light rise in obscurity,
And thy darkness be as the noon day:
11 And the LORD shall guide thee continually,
And satisfy thy soul in [10]drought,
And [k]make fat thy bones:
And thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water,
Whose waters [11]fail not.
12 [l]And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places:
Thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations;
And thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach,
The restorer of paths [m]to dwell in.
13 If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath,
From doing thy [n]pleasure on my holy day;
And call the Sabbath a delight,
The holy of the LORD, honourable;
And shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways,
Nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words:
14 Then shalt thou delight thyself in the LORD;
And I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth,
And feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3. It is doubtful whether עַצְּבֵיכֶם means operas vestras (i. e., your laborers), or opera vestra. But since עָצֵב (on the abnormal doubling of the צ by Dagesh-forte derimens or separative see GREEN, § 24. b; 216, 2 a) never has a personal sense, but always means only labor, hard work, we must translate: and ye exact all your compulsory labor. נָגַשׂ is construed not only with the accusative of the person, but also with the accusative of the thing, as is shown by 2 Kings xxiii. 35. The double accusative joined with the word here shows that it is conceived of as verbum postulandi.

Ver. 5. It is not clear to me why DELITZSCH affirms that the לְ in הֲלָכֹף is not dependent on תִּקְרָא. Only the ablative of the gerund could be so expressed. But here no ablative gerund is in place. For one could not translate: num flectendo caput arundinis instar? But it is the pure dative of the remoter object, that numberless times stands after קָרָא in the sense of "calling, to give a name." לְ very often has a pretonic vowel before the monosyllabic infinitive that itself does not stand in the construct state (comp. Num. xxiv. 10; Amos vii. 4). The construction ושק ואפר יַצִּיעַ after the infinitive לָכֹף is a return from the subordinate to the principal form.

Ver. 6. Also in the last clause of this verse we notice the discourse returns after three infinitives to the principal form, to the imperfect.

Ver. 7. הֲלֹא at the beginning of the verse recapitulates the הֲלֹא ver. 6, and also represents the clause introduced by the latter (is not that a fast, that I choose?).——פָּרַס "to split, divide," (only again spoken of bread, Jer. xvi. 7, where לֶחֶם is to be supplied; used beside only with פַּרְסָה of beasts that cleave the hoof) occurs only here in Isaiah.——The word מְרוּדִים is difficult. It is found Lam. i. 7 meaning "a going astray, erratio." Lam. iii. 19 has the same word in the singular in the same sense. Both times the word is joined with עֳנִי, miseria, as in our text it is with עָנִי, miser. That it is so connected with one or other of these words in every instance of its use, is certainly no accident. It seems to indicate a proverbial mode of expression. Also it results that our word is really from the same root as that in Lam. If then the latter be from רוּד, errare, vagari, then our word must be from the same, and not from מָרַד rebellare. Now as there are no words ad. f. מָקוֹם (with further obscuration in the plural into u) or מָצוֹק, that would have both a substantive and adjective signification, we must, with MAURER, KNOBEL, et al., take מרוד as a substantive, which like e. g. מוֹרָא, מַלְאָךְ, etc., pass over from the abstract meaning to the concrete. Then מְרוּדִים would be not merely wanderings astray," but also "wanderers," as it were personified goings astray.

Ver. 10. הֵפִיק (in Isaiah occurs only פּוּק vacillare xxviii. 7) is "to make go out, promere, bring forth," in various senses, comp. Ps. cxl. 9; cxliv. 13, Prov. iii. 13; viii. 35; xii. 2; xviii. 22. It is still uncertain whether the root of our תפק is or is not identical with that of פקו xxviii. 7 and יָפִיק Jer. x. 4. The jussive form וְתָפֵק stands parallel with אִם־תָּסִיר in the foregoing conditional clause. We translate, not quite literally: "and sacrifice thy hunger to the hungry one" (comp. GESEN. and UMBREIT). Properly it should be rendered: "and draw forth (offer out of thy provision) to the hungry one that after which thy soul craves." The other translation is for the sake of brevity and pregnancy.

Ver. 11. By the imperf. with Vav consec. [copulat?] יחליץ appears as the consequence of וְהִשְׂבִּיעַ. חָלַץ is extraxit, subtraxit; חָלוּץ is extractus, "become loose, free from, expeditus." The Piel חִלֵּץ denotes "to draw off" (clothes), "to draw out" (a prisoner; thus to free). Hiph. occurs only here. As Kal has a transitive meaning (excepting in Hos v. 6), a Hiph. formed from it is hardly in place here. Already Archbishop SECKER, with whom LOWTH agrees, would on this account read וְעַצְמֹתֶךָ יַחֲלִיף (comp. xl. 29, 31; xli. 1). But חָלוּץ meaning "equipped, fighting men," is a word of such frequent occurrence, that the formation of a denominativum הֶחֱלִיץ, meaning "to make fit for war, active," is quite conceivable. I agree in this with DELITZSCH without regarding it necessary to assume a חָלַץ, "to be strong," for חֲלָצַיִם, lumbi.

Ver. 12. EWALD, et al., would read בֻּנּוּ. But, apart from only the Kal and Niph. of בָּנָה being used, this reading is needless, because nothing is gained by it either in respect to grammar or sense. Still I would not render מִמְּךָ by "a te oriundi," and treat it as implying the subject of בָּנוּ. But the latter carries its subject in itself; the third person plural of the personal pronoun (הֵם), for which we use the indefinite subject man, "one, they," is expressed by the afformative וּ.

Ver. 13. The expression הֵשִׁיב רֶגֶל מִן is found only here. Elsewhere we find: מָנַע ר' (Prov. i. 15), שָׁמַר ר' (Prov. iii. 26; Eccl. iv. 17), הֵסִיר ר' (Prov. iv. 27).——Expositors now justly give up supplying מִן before עֲשׂוֹת, which affords a forced construction, if not exactly an impossible one. עשות is in apposition with רגלך. The doing, dispatching business (חֵפֶץ see on ver. 3) is in fact the foot that desecrates the Sabbath. [Though the meaning "business," maintained for the word חֵפֶץ, be suitable for its use in later writers, there is no reason for so rendering it here or in ver. 3 or in the passages there cited from Isaiah. DELITZSCH says at ver. 3 of מָצָא חֵפֶץ: "In the face of ver. 13 this cannot have any other meaning than to stretch one's hand after occupation, to carry on business, to occupy one's-self with it,—חפץ combining the three meanings, application or affairs, striving, and trade or occupation." Translation of CLARK'S F. Theol. Lib. As at ver. 13 he adds nothing to corroborate the above appeal to that verse, it would seem that in some way the use of חפץ in connection with the Sabbath must self-evidently refer to business. That is, we may suppose, it is self-evident that it can't mean "pleasure." It is hard to resist the persuasion that such is actually the logical process of this interpretation. It is influenced by a state of religious life that has given up the Sabbath and will only recognize a Sunday. To those of different tradition it is not self-evident, that the right observance of the Sabbath does not call for self-renunciation in favor of God, even the renouncement of our own pleasures, that we may seek pleasure in what pleases God. To such, therefore, it seems perfectly obvious, as J. A. ALEX., says on (xliv. 28) that "the word (חפץ) has here its strict, original, and usual sense of inclination, will or pleasure, that which one delights in, chooses or desires; and the substitution of affair or business would be not only arbitrary but ridiculous."—TR.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Cry aloud——their sins.—Ver. 1. The Prophet still stands in the present; he is not soaring in the heights of prophetic vision. He never loses sight of the practical question: what must Israel do to be saved? Even in this last Ennead, where yet the inmost depths and the highest heights of the future salvation present themselves to his gaze, he does not forget to oppose the illusion, that every Israelite by his birth alone and nothing more has an expectancy of this salvation. On the contrary he says most emphatically, that the judgments of the LORD will fall on the unbelieving Israel just as on the unbelieving Gentile world (comp. especially lxv. 2 sqq.; lxvi. 4 sqq., 14 sqq.). The Prophet, therefore, does not idealize his nation. He sees it in its concrete reality, made up as it is of the God-fearing and the godless combined. But it deeply concerns him that as many as possible of the latter may be converted. He had concluded the second Ennead with such a descent to the sphere of practical necessity, and from that sphere also he addresses himself to the third and final cycle of discourse. One sees how important to the LORD this practical point of view is, from the way He summons the Prophet to give it effect; with the greatest emphasis, without timidity or sparing the Prophet must hold up to the people their sins. For without the knowledge of sin there is no return (שׁוּב), and without return there is no salvation. This exhortation, to hold up to the people their sins, is of the nature of a theme. For warning against sin and exhortation to repent is the undertone of all of chapts. lviii., lix.; and is similarly the serious, dark background in chapts. lxiv.–lxvi.

"Cry with throat," i. e., with chest-tones, with a full, strong sound (not with suppressed or whispered sound, comp. 1 Sam. i. 13). Farther, the Prophet is not to restrain (liv. 2), viz., his voice. He is therefore not to spare his voice, and accordingly not his hearers either. For a loud calling that penetrates marrow and bone, strains not only the crier but hearer also. The Prophet's cry should penetrate to the quick, therefore it is said to him he must lift up his voice like the Shophar. שׁופר interchanges Josh. vi. with קֶרֶן (comp. vers. 5 and 4, 6, 13). According to JOSEPHUS (Antiq. V., 6, 5, comp. Jud. vii. 16), the Shophar was a rams-horn (κριοῦ κέρας). JEROME, too, remarks on Hos. v. 8 concerning the Shophar: buccina pastoralis est et cornu recurvo efficitur, unde et graece κερατίνη appellatur." Comp. LEYRER, in HERZ., R. Enc. X., p. 131.

2. Yet they seek——to the LORD.—Vers. 2–5. I share the view of DELITZSCH, that ו before אותי is to be taken in an adversative, and not a causal sense. For the summons to hold up importunately to the people their sin, implies that they do not know their sin, that they hold themselves to be quite sinless. In contrast with this (indirectly expressed) opinion of themselves, stands what the people attempt with respect to God. God's ways seem incomprehensible to them. That is, they do not at all understand how the LORD can deal with them as He does. They think they deserve reward and praise, and yet must endure severe tribulation. דָּרַשׁ (comp. xxxi. 1) is ="to inquire, to find out by asking, to search out." They would know from the LORD how His treatment is to be understood. For such is the meaning of דעת דרכי יחפצון, which on its part is moreover explanatory of אותי ידרשון. But they do not stop with a verbal explanation. They demand a formal reply, i. e., they would have their pretended right assured to them by formal, judicial procedure. As a people that practice righteousness and has not forsaken the law (משפט=legal norm) of its God, they demand of Jehovah judicial processes of righteousness, i. e., an impartial judicial procedure. They appeal, as it were, from Jehovah to a higher, independent court, and demand that Jehovah shall appear before it. In the expression משפטי צדק "righteous judgments," there is thus an indirect charge that Jehovah's treatment of them had been unjust. An impartial tribunal shall decide, and before this Jehovah Himself should appear. Such is the meaning קרבת א׳ (substant. קִרְבָה again only Ps. lxxiii. 28). קָרַב is often used for appearing before judgment or before the lord and governor (xxxiv. 1; xli. 1, 5; xlviii. 16; lvii. 3; Mal. iii. 5).—Notice the full-sounding forms יְדְרֹשׁוּן, יֶחְפָּצוּן (the latter rhyme-like concluding the two halves of the verse). They paint the bold insolence displayed.

In ver. 3 the LORD lets the Israelites themselves produce their complaint. We have fasted and chastened ourselves. Such is the merit they urge. They ask why it is not acknowledged.—This passage has been urged as a proof that our book originated in the exile, because from Zech. vii. 3 sqq. (comp. viii. 19) it appears that in the Exile fasting in the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months came in vogue (comp. WIENER R. W., and HERZ. R. Enc. s. v. Fasten), whereas the Mosaic law prescribed fasting for only one day in the year, viz., the great day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 27–32). In this bragging about their fasting is found an indication of that extension that in the Exile was given to the rite of fasting. Even DELITZSCH will not be dissuaded of the idea that here we "have before us a picture out of the life of the exiles." But was that Isaiah's task, to give pictures from the life of the exiles?

In that passage of Zech. we are informed of an embassy, probably from Bethel, that made inquiry in Jerusalem, whether fasting in the fifth month was to be retained even after the return out of the Exile. Thereupon Zechariah receives a commission to answer the people that they might use their pleasure in this respect. For fasting as eating was indifferent to the LORD. What other divine service, better and more rational (Rom. xii. 1), Jehovah requires must be known to them from the words that Jehovah caused to be proclaimed by "the former prophets (נְבִיאִים הָרִאשֹׁנִים) when Jerusalem was inhabited and in prosperity, and the cities thereof round about her." And then follows vers. 9, 10, what sort of words of former prophets the LORD means: "Execute true judgment, and show mercy and compassions every man to his brother: and oppress not the widow, or the fatherless, the stranger nor the poor; and let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart." If it be asked what words of an older prophet Zechariah means, only our passage can be first thought of. Of course the agreement is not verbal; but neither is there any other passage that does agree verbally with that in Zechariah. And as regards the sense, our passage is the only one that in the same way as Zechariah exposes negatively the valuelessness of outward fasting and sets positively in antithesis to it the true λατρεία that is well-pleasing to God. "Did ye at all fast unto me?" the LORD asks in Zech. vii. 5. The idea of fasting here involves the idea of solemnising, honoring, sanctifying in the way of divine service, and on this depends the accusative suffix ("do ye then fast me"). Not my honor and my interest did ye seek in your fasting, is, then what the LORD says, Zech. vii. 5. And He says the same in our text, only more extendedly, in that He charges the Israelites with not having God at all in view or in their hearts when they fasted, since otherwise it were impossible for them at the same time to carry on all sorts of wickedness. And as regards the positive feature, our Prophet in vers. 6, 7, when he admonishes to let go the bound, to feed, entertain, clothe the poor, actually says what Zechariah (vii. 9, 10) says with his admonition to practise works of righteousness and love. Also the prophet Joel utters a similar thought (Joel ii. 12, 13). By the words "and with fasting, and with weeping and with mourning" followed by "and rend your heart and not your garments," he points out the difference between the true and the false λατρεία. Zechariah may also have thought of Ezek. xviii. 5 sqq. (although it by no means has for subject the contrast between true and false divine service) since that is the only place beside Zechariah where the expression מִשְׁפַּט אֱמֶת is found. But our passage has the most resemblance to that in Zechariah, partly because it speaks only of fasting and partly because it contrasts false and true fasting. There are some other particulars that favor the idea that Zechariah had our passage, and also others in chapts. xl., lxvi. in mind. Of inferior significance is the fact that the expression משפט אמת Zech. vii. 9, (in which we have recognized a connection with Ezek. xviii. 8), perhaps includes also a reminiscence of מִשְׁפְּטֵי־צֶדֶק, Isa. lviii. 2, which expression, beside here, is found only Ps. cxix. 7, 62, 106, 160, 164, in the form מִשְׁפְּטֵי צִדְקֶךָ. It is more important that in Zech. vii. 13 we have a very plain echo of Isa. l. 2; lxv. 12; lxvi. 4. For after Zechariah (vii. 9, 10) had quoted what "the former prophets" had demanded instead of the merely outward fasting, he proceeds in ver. 11, with the information that Israel did not heed the words of those prophets, and that thereby a great wrath came about on the Lord's part (vers. 11, 12). Then it is said further: "And it came to pass, that as He cried and they would not hear" (ver. 13). Now these words are the reproduction of a thought that in this form is peculiar to chapts. xl., lxvi. Thus in l. 2 we have the words: "Wherefore when I came was there no man, when I called was there none to answer?" Afterwards we read: "I called and ye did not answer, I spake and ye did not hear" (lxv. 12). Finally: "I called and there was none answering, I spake and they did not hear" (lxvi. 4). The same form of expression is found with modification only in Jeremiah and Zechariah beside. Thus in Jeremiah we read: "And I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called you, but ye answered not" (vii. 13); and again: "And thou shalt speak all these words unto them; but they will not hear thee; thou shalt also call unto them; but they will not answer thee" (vii. 27). Finally: "I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered" (xxxv. 17). Such are the Old Testament passages in which the said form of speech occurs applied to the people Israel. For it occurs already Job xix. 16, but there only in relation to Job and his servant. We expressly observe that we have to do here only with that form of expression, which to the calling of a superior opposes the not answering of an inferior, and not with the opposite where the superior refuses to answer the call of an inferior. Now it is possible that the expression was borrowed from Job xix. 16, and applied to the relation of Jehovah to Israel. Who did this first is the question. Any way the words in Zech. vii. 13 a, have most resemblance to Isa. lxv. 12, and lxvi. 4. Now as this kind of expression is found in Isaiah only l. 2; lxv. 12; lxvi. 4, the conclusion is very natural that Zechariah reckoned the author of Isa. xl.-lxiv. to the former prophets that prophesied in the time "when Jerusalem still sat and was quiet and its cities round about and the south, and the plain" (Zech. vii. 7). For evidently vers. 13, 14 are explanatory of what precedes. It is said wherein "the great wrath" consisted, of which ver. 12 spoke. And as the cause of this wrath was said to be that the Israelites would not hear "the law and the words which Jehovah Sabaoth sent by His Spirit by the hand of the former prophets," so, in ver. 13 a, the cause of the wrath is more nearly defined by a condensed statement of the contents of those former prophecies. The conclusion here presented is the judgment also of KUEPER Das Prophetenth, d. A. B. p. 291. Another proof of the same thing is, that the words: "made heavy their ears that they should not hear" (Zech. vii. 11), is a quotation of Isa. lix. 1. And it may be noted that the expression כָּבְדָה אֹזֶן in general occurs only in Isa. (vi. 10; lix. 1). From this whole investigation it results, that we have not to consider the words of Isa. lviii. 3 a, as the language of an exile, but of a contemporary of Isaiah.

Although only one fast day in the year was legally prescribed, still voluntary fast-days were allowed both for individuals, and for the whole community. And there are many texts to prove that such often occurred. Comp. Judg. xx. 26;

1 Sam. vii. 16; 2 Sam. i. 12; xii. 16 sqq.; 1 Kings xxi. 12; Joel i. 14; Jer. xxxvi. 6, 9; 2 Chron. xx. 3; Ezr. viii. 21; Ps. cix. 24, etc. It was just voluntary fasting that was likely to become the subject of work-righteous, Pharisaical boasting (Luke xviii. 12). עִנָּה נֶפֶשׁ is "to restrain, bow, repress the craving" for food. It is the expression by which the law itself designated the inward side of fasting (Lev. xvi. 31; xxiii. 27, 29, 32; Num. xxix. 7; xxx. 14; Ps. xxxv. 13). "Crucify the flesh," though not a literal rendering, is true to the sense; for נפשׁ is after all nothing else than the inner flesh, fleshly craving in the extended sense.

Ver. 3 b. To this proud, work-righteous speech of the people, in which they make the LORD, as it were, the defendant, the LORD Himself replies by pointing them away from worship in the letter to worship in spirit, and in truth (Jno. iv). First He exposes the hypocrisy of their way of fasting. Fasting ought to be a divine worship. Thus it implies a direction of the heart toward God. But how can devotion be thought of in those who, while they fast, turn their thoughts only to worldly profit, yea, to wrangling and unrighteousness. חֵפֶץ is that which a man delights in, not merely in the sense of transitory pleasure, but also in the more serious sense of business interest. In this sense it even stands parallel with בֶּצַע Job xxii. 3, comp. xxi. 21. In Isa. xliv. 23; liii. 10 we see plainly the transition from one to the other meaning. In our chapter ver. 13 the word occurs twice again in the sense of πρᾶγμα, negotium. In Eccl. iii. 1, 17; v. 7; viii. 6, it occurs in this sense, and each time the LXX. render it by πρᾶγμα. By the expression מָצָא before חפץ the Prophet purposes primarily a paronomasia with respect to צֹמְכֶם. But perhaps, too, מצא חפץ (to touch, take hold of a business, according to the fundamental meaning pertingere ad, assequi, comp. Job. xi. 7; Ps. xxi. 9; Isa. x. 10, 14) was a popular expression current in business life. The general sense of כל־עצביכם הנגשׂו is easily made out. The Prophet reproaches the Israelites with combining greedy exaction with their fasting. But עצביכם occasions difficulty, on which see Text. and Gram.

Ver. 4. But beside greedy harshness toward those under them, the Israelites combined with their fasting vexatious strife that degenerated into deeds of violence towards those of like condition. Fasting, instead of raising them up inwardly, made them moody to the degree that they give vent to their ill-humor by cudgelings. Thus their fasting exercised even a demoralizing influence. The consequence is that the prayer, which combined with such fasting they send toward heaven, is not heard. כַּיּוֹם cannot possibly (with HAHN) be taken in the sense of ὡς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ (Rom. xiii. 12, 13), ὡς τέκνα φωτός (Eph. v. 8). Also STIER ascribes too much to the expression when, following JARCHI, he takes it in the sense of "as becomes the day" (i. e., the day of atonement). כַּיּוֹם simply urges the present, silently implying a contrast with the past and future. That is, the Prophet will say nothing of the past and future. He only makes prominent: that Israel now, in the present moment, does not fast as it ought to (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 16; ix. 27; 1 Kings xxii. 5). It implies also the possibility of doing better in the future. In להשׁמיע the לְ denotes the intended effect: ye fast not so that (the intended effect, to bring your voice on high (lvii. 15; xxxiii. 5) to a hearing) can be attained. Fasting and praying go together, and fasting is intended to serve the prayer as an accompaniment that recommends it, as say, with reference to men, a present is joined to a petition to make it more effective (compare the texts cited above on voluntary fasting).

Ver. 5. The Prophet once more comprehends what has been said, in a question that calls for a negative response. Shall that (described vers. 3 b—4) be a fast that I choose, a day when a man afflicts his soul? We must not (with the VULG. LUTHER and many others refer הכזה 'וגו to what follows (numquid tale est jejunium quod elegi, per diem affligere hominem animam suam? VULG.). For the words יום ענות אדם נפשׁו are words of the law (Lev. xvi. 31; xxiii. 27, 32; Num. xxix. 7). One ought to fast so according to the law. Therefore the words יום ענות ו' are parallel with צום אבחרהו. It is indeed God's will that a man afflict his soul, i. e., his psychical lusts, that he crucify the flesh. That is wholesome and healthy. But would fasting combined with outrage, as described vers. 3 b—4, be really a wholesome crucifying of the flesh? This question must be answered with no. Moreover that is also to be called no fasting when one lays all stress on the outward, bodily exercise (the σωματικὴ γυμνασία 1 Tim. iv. 8) and at this price leaves the inward flesh wholly unmolested. The expression "sackcloth and ashes" occurs again only Dan. ix. 3; Esth. iv. 1, 3. Evidently Isaiah has also here been the source for later usage, for in general the language of Isa. xl.-lxvi. is not that of Daniel and Esther.

3. Is not this the fast —— thine own flesh.—Vers. 6, 7. It is well to observe that in these two verses, which would describe the fasting that is well-pleasing to God, the Prophet says nothing more of bodily mortification. He only names the works of righteousness toward the oppressed (ver. 6), and beneficence toward the poor and needy. But one must not understand that he positively rejects fasting. When he says: is not that a fasting I choose? he assumes that there will be fasting. What follows: to loose, etc., only says what should be combined with fasting, in contrast with the conduct of the Israelites in this respect. Nevertheless the Prophet lays the chief stress just on the works mentioned in vers. 6, 7. He assumes that the practice of these works also costs a sacrifice either of bodily substance, or of inward resignation and subduing uncharitable inclinations. He that subdues the flesh to the will in this wise, practises the true "afflicting of the soul." Notice how the Prophet is here quite on the road that reaches its highest elevation in the declarations of lxvi. 3. Also: that thou hide not thyself from thy flesh, is a trace of the broad, evangelical spirit that reigns in our passage. To the question: who is my neighbor? the answer is given here: every one who is of thy flesh. The answer does not run: every one who is of thy nation, or tribe (Luke x. 29 sqq.). Thus our Prophet here, too, rises far above theocratic narrowness. [Comp. Jas. i. 27].

4. Then shall thy light——to dwell in.—Vers. 8-12. The Prophet now gives a series of ten promises of glorious reward for those who will fulfil the command of the Lord in the right spirit. He strings them together like a necklace of pearls, yet so that, after the first four promises, he mentions again (ver. 9 b, and 10 a), the conditions, as one breaks the monotony of the string of pearls by an ornament of another form and color. The row of promises consists of four and six members, among which a certain parallelism and also a climax is observable. In vers. 8-9 a, the Prophet describes in some measure the pious man's course of life. Rising out of the obscurity of his previous way of life, the light of divine holiness and glory rises like the morning dawn for the pious man—בָּקַע "to split," Niph. "by splitting to press forth," (comp. xxxv. 6; lix. 5). Heretofore sick, he feels in himself the power of a new life, by which, as it were, new, healthy flesh grows on him, as on the dead bones Ezekiel saw (Ezek. xxxvii. 5 sq.). אֲרֻכָה is certainly derived most naturally from אָרַךְ longum esse, and denotes the new flesh that extends over the wound, by which, supplanting that which is dead, it fills up the gaps and restores the normal form of the member, (comp. Fleischer, in Del. Comm. p. 592, Anm.). The word is found only here in Isaiah, comp. Jer. viii. 22; xxx. 17; xxxiii. 6; 2 Chr. xxiv. 13; Neh. iv. 1. He that has come to the light, and that has become strong in health, moves along the course assigned him. This march resembles a triumphal procession. As before him that goes in triumph are borne or led along the signs of his victory, so the glory of the pious goes before him, i. e., his righteous works. But he does not on this account shine in the brightness of his own celebrity, for he that closes up and holds together (comp. lii. 12) the procession, and thus shows himself to be the power that controls all, is the glory of Jehovah. But where is the pious one, let his course of life be never so glorious, that does not need God? Therefore the Prophet comprehends all the rest together in the great, glorious right of petition of the pious one, which consists in this, that the pious may ask for everything, and never prays in vain (Matth. xxi. 22; Mark xi. 24; John xiv. 13 sq.). As has been remarked, the Prophet in ver. 9 b–10 a interrupts the chain of promises, in order to repeat the conditions. What he mentions as such is again the demand to forego every sort of lovelessness (ver. 9 b), and to practise every sort of love (ver. 10 a). As the first thing to be abstained from, he designates: not to rule tyrannically, but to take away yokes wherever they exist. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty (2 Cor. iii. 17), and love does no evil to its neighbor; it seeks not its own; it rejoices not in iniquity (1 Cor. xiii. 4 sqq.). There is here a certain climax: the Prophet evidently regards subjugation, tyranny, violence as the coarsest violation of the law of love. As a more refined transgression, he regards the pointing (שְׁלַח, inf.) with the finger. This, among western nations as well as among orientals, is a gesture of contempt, comp. Gesen. in loc. (infamis digitus, the middle finger; Pers. II. 33: rideto multum et digitum porrigito medium, Martial, II. 28, 2). According to Prov. vi. 13, pointing the finger appears also as a means of malignant denunciation and spiteful betrayal. Still more refined, but not better on that account, is the transgression of the law of love by sacrilegious discourse (comp. i. 13; x. 1; Ps. v. 6; vi. 9, etc.).—The demand to cease to do evil is followed by the demand to do good (ver. 10). And vice omnium it is demanded that the pious sacrifice his own hunger to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul. For I agree with Delitzsch in the opinion that נֶפֶשׁ can mean nothing else here than that after which the soul, i. e., here the hungry man's prompting for nourishment, craves. Hence it is going too far, when Stier et al., following Jerome, take נפשׁ in the sense of life and heart. For he that is hungry after our life, to him we would not owe it.

Ver. 11. In what now follows we have a second row of promises and made stronger. It is composed of six members, but in its fundamental thought it corresponds to the one of four members [that precedes]. For underlying it is the thought of a life-career, that begins with the morning and presses happily through conflicts of every sort. But in this succession of six members the issue is different. That is, it concludes with a perspective of an activity that is richly blessed, and extends its efficiency into the remotest times. The first promise of this series corresponds exactly to the beginning of the first series: liberation from the chains of darkness, rising of light and increase of it is promised in such measure, that even the obscurest parts of that darkness will have the brightness of midday. (Job xi. 17; Ps. xviii. 29; xxxvii. 6, etc.).—The second promise is indeed the shortest, but it is also the most important of all: the Lord will never withdraw His hand from the pious one; He will abide with him and guide him (lvii. 18) in all his ways. The third promise assumes that cross and conflict will, nevertheless, not be wanting to the pious one. For there will be also for him still צַחְצָחוֹת, i. e., hot places. Jerome translates: "implebit splendoribus animam tuam." Hahn follows this and translates: "and let thy soul be satisfied with brightness." It is true, the root צָחַח, צָחָה, in its fundamental meaning, "burning," involves the meaning of "gleaming" and of "drought." Hence on the one hand צַח, nitens, on the other hand צְחִיחָה (Ps. lxviii. 7) and צְחִיחִים (Neh. iv. 7) loca arida. But what is promised already, ver. 10 b, satisfies the requirements of light, and ver. 11 b. shows that the Prophet has in mind the refreshing element of water. He promises satiety from it in a two-fold gradation. First, the pious one shall want none, even in localities that for others are arid deserts. The soul, i. e., the need of water shall be richly satisfied, so that thereby the bones (thus the body itself) become fresh and powerful. But, and this is the fourth promise, the refreshing element shall be bestowed on the pious one in a still greater degree. That is to say, he shall himself become a well-watered garden; in fact, a richly flowing spring of water. Thus the pious one shall be an oasis in the desert, a lovely, green, fruitful garden, with a glorious spring that never goes dry. The expression גן רוה is found again only in Jer. xxxi. 12. מוצא מים is the place of issue, the flowing place for water (comp. xli. 18; Ps. cvii. 33, 35; 2 Chr. xxxii. 30). In general comp. i. 30; li. 3; Song of S. iv. 12.—The fifth promise extends to the pious one the prospect that he will be still beyond the period of his life a source of blessing, and indeed the cause of a glorious restoration: they shall build (see Text. and Gram.) from thee (מִמְּךָ designates the ideal originator) ancient waste places," means nothing else than: thou wilt be the author and spiritual director of such buildings by which ancient buildings that were destroyed shall be restored. The Prophet purposely does not say that it shall be just bodily children. Any way it will be children after the Spirit. Hence, also, in the second clause, just the second person sing. is used. It were incomprehensible why the children's building should be mentioned before that of the father. On the other hand, תְּקוֹמֵם explains to us the meaning of the בנו ממך. One is, indeed, tempted to do as STIER and others do, and refer the second clause to new buildings, since דור ודור, as a rule, points to the future, and since great men are wont not merely to restore, but also to found new institutions. But in lxi. 4, the Prophet repeats this expression with some modifications, and there, according to the context, only restoration can be meant. Added to this, קום in Pilel designates essentially "rising up again," and the predicates גֹּדֵר and מְשׁוֹבֵב equally refer to restoration. דור ודור (notice that it does not say לְדוֹר ו׳) is used of the past also in Deut. xxxii. 7; Ps. xc. 1.—The sixth promise extends to the pious one the prospect of honorable surnames, the praise of having deserved well of his country. A גֹּדֵר פֶּרֶץ is one that walls up (comp. Ezek. xxii. 30; 2 Kings xii. 13) what is shattered (פֶּרֶץ xxviii. 21; xxx 13), thus a repairer of human dwellings. But, in order to dwell comfortably in a land, men must be able to go to one another, commerce and intercourse must be possible. Hence the additional title restorer of the paths. לָשָׁבֶת, "to dwell in," is probably to be referred to both, since, in order to dwell, i. e., for comfortable and secure dwelling in a land, both are necessary, good dwellings and good roads. נְתִיבָה is a poetic word with no technical reference, and hence suitable for designating any sort of way (comp. LEYRER's article "Strassen in Palaestina," HERZ. R. Enc. XV. p. 157 sqq.).—One sees, especially from ver. 12, that the Prophet, who here still before the Exile preaches repentance to his nation, has yet always in mind the great future of restoration. So it is characteristic that, to the pious of his day, as a last and most glorious reward, he presents the prospect, that by him, too, shall be exercised blessed influences on Israel's reinstallation in its land.

5. If thou turn——hath spoken it.—Vers. 13, 14. Isaiah's contemporaries seem to have provoked the LORD especially by two things. First by an excess that was not demanded; that is by fasting much more than was commanded. They fancied that by this outward exercise they could bribe the LORD and wipe out scores with Him. But then they let themselves be caught in doing too little. They were as lax about keeping the Sabbath as they were strict about fasting. The Sabbath was Jehovah's day. Keeping it holy was a sure sign of fidelity to Jehovah, and easily tested. Thus the Prophet demands a right sanctification of the Sabbath as a condition of glorious, theocratic blessing (comp. lvi. 2). The doing or dispatching business (חֵפֶץ comp. on ver. 3 and Text. and G., where see TR.'s note) is just the foot whose tramp desecrates the holy ground of the Sabbath. From the mouths of those that did not heartily serve the LORD, one may often have heard utterances that the celebration of the Sabbath was a burden, that interfered with all business and occupation (Amos viii. 5). Opposed to this the Prophet demanded that men shall call the Sabbath a delight (ענג again only xiii. 22). It merits this name as the universal friend of man, that brings rest and refreshment to all that are weary and heavy-laden. But, as being holy to Jehovah, it deserves the name honorable (מְכֻבָּד to be highly honored). But the Israelites should practically honor it also by not doing their own ways, and not going about their trade and occupation (מעשׂות= far from making, without making or doing), by not doing their own business (see on ver. 3) and by not carrying on conversation. The expression דַּבֵּר דָּבָר is found again viii. 10. The sense differs with the context. In many passages it has no pregnant sense (comp. Gen. xli. 28; xliv. 18; 2 Kings v. 13; Job ii. 13; Prov. xxv. 11). But there are also passages where it has (Deut. xviii. 20; Isa. viii. 10; Jer. xxix. 23; xxxiv. 5; Ezek. xii. 25, 28; xiv. 9; 2 Sam. vii. 7). According to the Mosaic law, the Sabbath should be a day of joy (comp. OEHLER in HERZ. R. Enc. XIII. p. 199). Could it be exacted of all Israelites that on this day only weighty words should proceed from their mouth? Certainly not. But business conversation could properly be forbidden. On the Sabbath no business must be transacted, neither by works nor by words. Thus דָּבָר is here about the same as πρᾶγμα (comp. 1 Sam. xx. 2; Judg. xviii. 7, 18, etc.). Let the Israelite practically honor the Sabbath in this way and he will delight himself in Jehovah Himself. He will serve the LORD with inmost satisfaction, and the LORD on His part will bestow upon Him the highest honor and the highest enjoyment. I will cause thee to ride, I will feed thee are citations from Deut. xxxii. 13, comp. xxxiii. 29. To ride on the high places of the earth denotes exaltation above all other nations. Instead of "eating the heritage of Jacob thy father," the original text in Deuteronomy reads "eat the increase of the fields; and He (Jehovah) made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." These expressions are compressed in our text, and an expression used instead that recalls the promises given to the fathers in reference to the land of Canaan (Exod. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5, etc.). On "For the mouth of the Lord," etc., see on i. 20; xl. 5.

b) To the complaint of the people concerning Jehovah's inability is opposed the charge of moral corruption.

CHAPTER LIX. 1–8.

1 BEHOLD, the LORD's hand is not [a]shortened, that it cannot save;
Neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear:
2 But your iniquities have separated between you and your God
And your sins [1]have hid His face from you, that He will not hear.
3 For your hands are defiled with blood
And your fingers with iniquity;
Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue [b]hath muttered perverseness.
4 None [c]calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth:
They trust in vanity, and speak lies;
They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity.
5 They hatch [2d]cockatrice' eggs
And weave the spider's web:
He that eateth of their eggs dieth,
And [3]that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper.
6 Their webs shall not become garments,
Neither shall they cover themselves with their works
Their works are works of iniquity,
And the act of violence is in their hands.
7 Their feet run to evil,
And they make haste to shed innocent blood:
Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity;
Wasting and [4]destruction are in their paths.
8 The way of peace they know not;
And there is no [5]judgment in their [e]goings:
They have made them crooked paths:
Whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace.

[1] Or, have made him hide.
[2] Or, adders.
[3] Or, that which is sprinkled is as if there brake out a viper.
[4] Heb. breaking.
[5] Or, right.

[a] too short to save, too dull to hear.
[b] deviseth wickedness.
[c] appeals with justice, there is no one that would judge impartially.
[d] basilisk.
[e] tracks.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8. מבדילים direct causative Hiph. with בֵּין־לְ as e. g., in Gen. i. 6; Ezek. xxii. 26; xlii. 20.——הִסְתִּיר also direct causative Hiph.; comp. moreover, as regards the expression, liv. 8.

Ver. 3. The word נְגֹאֲל is found only here and Lam. iv. 14, where the words נְגֹאֲלוּ בַּדָּם are evidently taken from our text. The form נְגֹאֲל is irregular. The prefix נ denotes a Niphal form, whereas גֹּאַל appears as a Pual or passive of Poel. The root גָּאַל (kindred to גָּעַל fastidivit) occurs again in the sense of "impurum, profanum esse," in the Hiph. in lxiii. 3, on the other hand often in later writers: Zeph. iii. 1; Mal. i. 7, 12; Ezra ii. 62; Neh. vii. 64; Dan. i. 8.——Thus נְגֹאֲל is bad Hebrew both materially and formally. It seems to me that the expression was purposely taken by the Prophet from popular language, in order, by the bad word, to designate the more graphically the bad thing. The root, which originally belongs more to the Aramaic dialect, only penetrated into the Hebrew Scripture language at a later date, as the passages quoted show.——One may not render תהגה "to murmur," which would make nonsense where the same word occurs in Ps. xxxv. 28; lxxi. 24; Job xxvii. 4; Prov. viii. 9. The tongue (or palate) in all these passages is personified, and treated as the inner source of what the lips outwardly express aloud. GESENIUS (Thes. p. 364) quotes with approval the words of GUSSETIUS, that "הָגָה non reperitur cum parte magis extrinseca, nempe שָׂפָה, et sic aliquam servat intrinsecitatem." And that is correct. By הָגָה לָשׁוֹן the same thing is affirmed of the tongue that is elsewhere ascribed to it when it is said of it, that a high song of praise (רוֹמָם Ps. lxvi. 17), honey and milk (Song of Sol. iv. 11), malignity (Job xx. 12), pain and wickedness (Ps. x. 7) are under the tongue, or that pleasant doctrine is on the tongue (Prov. xxxi. 26), or that wickedness is in the tongue (Job vi. 30). All these expressions must be regarded as metaphors, because in all of them the outward, irrational organ is substituted for the inward rational organ.

Ver. 5. הַזּוּרֶה ἅπ. λεγ., comp. זֹרוּ i. 6, from זור "to press together;" it is a passive participial form, as e. g. סוּרָה, עוּל, with the rare feminine ending ה.

Ver. 8. נְתִי the totality of the ways, comp. e. g., xxii. 11; xxvii. 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Behold——not hear.—Vers. 1, 2. Ver. 1 implies a double reproach which Israel lets fall beside that in lii. 2, 3. In the latter they had reproached Him with injustice. Here they let it be understood that Jehovah either lacks the necessary strength of hand (קצרה יד־י comp. on l. 2) or else hearing. The expression כבדה אזן does not signify unwillingness to hear, but inability to hear, deafness, as in Gen. xlviii. 10 "the eyes of Israel were heavy from age" signifies the physical weakness of the eyes, wherefore it is added "he could not see." The expression כָּבֵד used of the ear occurs again only vi. 10; and in Zech. vii. 11 as a quotation from our text (comp. on lviii. 6 sqq.). In ver. 2 is given the real reason for Israel's mournful fate. It is their sins that raise a partition-wall between them and their God, and make Him hide His face from them so that He does not hear.

2. For your hands——not know peace.—Vers. 3–8. In this section the Prophet specifies the sins of Israel, showing that it is wholly penetrated by sin, and that the outward manifestation exactly corresponds to the corrupt interior. He first points to the hands spotted with blood. Then he says that guilt, offence clings to their fingers, by which he would only express, that this blood came not on their fingers by accident, but by actual trespass. He distributes the notion "blood-guiltiness" to the palms and fingers according to the law of parallelism. The lips speak lies loud and audibly, while the tongue devises wickedness, which is set in operation by means of the lies. There prevails here, too, the antithesis between what is outward and what is inward. In ver. 4 there underlies the same antithesis. I have no doubt that קרא בצדק designates the judicial invocatio (in jus vocare, καλεῖν ἐπὶ δίκην); so COCCEJUS, GESEN., MAURER, KNOBEL. For first, in this way the two clauses of the half of the verse most beautifully correspond. The first treats of the complainant, and the second of the fate his complaint has with the Judge. Moreover Job xiii. 22 seems to me to prove that the general sense "to call" may, according to the context, acquire the meaning of a forensic act, as that of the call proceeding from the complainant to appear at the bar of judgment and to justification. If we take קרא in the sense of κηρύσσειν, as DELITZSCH does ("no one gives public testimony with righteousness"), it would be giving too much meaning to קרא and to κηρύσσειν. If one were to take it with STIER in the sense "no one calls (appeals) to righteousness, raises his voice for it, i. e., in order to it and for it," that would be to attach too much meaning to the prefix בְּ. I translate: there is no one that appeals with righteousness, and there is no one that is judged with faithfulness (impartially). One could, as most do, translate נשפט also by "who conducts his cause." But the Niph. primarily means "to be judged" (Ps. ix. 20; xxxvii. 33; cix. 7); and this meaning seems to me to suit better here, since עָנָה (as in Job xiii. 28) would better answer to קרא in the sense denoted before, and נשפט does not mean "to defend one's self" but "to go to law, litigare," and thus includes the complainant. According to our meaning the complainant's aim at wrong is judged, but also the judges treat the cause with no fidelity or love of truth. אמונה answers here to the idea צֶדֶק as, e. g., Ps. xcvi. 13; Prov. xii. 17; 1 Sam. xxvi. 23 etc. Now where such things come to light, there must be something lacking within. There, instead of the living God, emptiness, vanity, nothingness must be the refuge in which trust is placed; there, too, lies must serve as indispensable aids (דבר־שוא see lviii. 9). In general the natural law is observed: as the seed, so the fruit. What is conceived within as the germ of the עָמָל (weary trouble with the secondary notion of what is baneful, a curse, especially in Eccl. i. 3; ii. 10 sqq., etc., comp. Job. v. 6, 7; Ps. vii. 17) comes to light in an aggravated form as אָוֶן (vanum, malum in the double sense of the word). The notion און is stronger than עָמָל, since it expresses more strongly both the idea of vanity, illusiveness, as well as that of moral wickedness. Moreover both conceptions (עמל and און) are often conjoined, not only in passages that more or less literally coincide with ours (Job xv. 35; Ps. vii. 15), but elsewhere also (Ps. x. 7; xc. 10; lv. 11.)

In vers. 5, 6, by a double image, the Prophet expresses the thought that the inward corruption of the people reveals itself outwardly by corresponding works. He compares the Israelites to poisonous serpents that produce poisonous eggs, and to poisonous spiders that draw out of their body a baneful web. In ver. 5 a the comparisons stand side by side in their general import. But ver. 5 b there is mentioned first a double destructive use of the basilisk's egg. Either one eats it, and dies of it; or the broken egg divides itself as an adder, i. e., lets slip out through the crack the poisonous adder, that is dangerous to the foot of him that treads on it (Gen. iii. 15). Thus the works of the Israelites are on the one hand positively ruinous, on the other hand they appear as useless, unreliable, consequently also as indirectly ruinous. That is, so far as the Israelites are thought of as spiders that produce a web, there their products prove useless for protecting garments. Consequently the conduct of the Israelites is altogether the product of an inward corruption, and in every respect, in part useless and thus indirectly pernicious (מעשי־און), in part directly and positively ruinous (פעל חמס).

Vers. 7 and 8 continue the effort to hold up to Israel the manifoldness of its sinful ways. It is as if the Prophet, having in ver. 6 spoken of the sinful works of the hands, would now describe the participation of the feet in these works. This he does by means of a citation. For the entire first half of ver. 7 is taken from Prov. i. 16 (as on the other hand Paul in Rom. iii. 15–17 gives a free citation of our vers. 7, 8 a). Also the words their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity are the more to be regarded as a reminiscence of Prov. vi. 18 since the expression מחשבות און occurs only in these two passages, and also the second half of Prov. vi. 18 is only a variation of the first half of chap. i. 16. In the last number of ver. 7 as also in ver. 8, the Prophet appears to have intended to show how Israel had by its sins polluted everything even that was called a way. Hence it is said at the close of ver. 7 that wasting and destruction (li. 19; lx. 18) is in their paths (מְסִלָּה the beaten road; notice the antithesis to שד ושבר); then ver. 8 דרך "the way" and מעגלות "the wagon tracks, orbitae," are described as devoid of peace and judgment, and the נתיבות "the footpaths" are made crooked by them (in their interest לָהֶם). "The way of peace" is an expression that occurs only here, and as a citation from this text in Luke i. 79 and Rom. iii. 17. Also in writing these clauses the Prophet had undoubtedly in mind passages in Proverbs like Prov. ii. 8, 9, 15. The concluding clause of ver. 8: whosoever goeth therein, etc., corresponds to the beginning of the verse, and is a sort of recapitulation of all that was said concerning the ways of the Israelites. That is, the result is that every one that goes thereon learns not to know peace (viz. practically, xlvii. 8; Jer. xx. 20).

2. THE TRANSITION UPWARD.

a) The transition from the Mournful Present to the Blessed Future by means of the Nation's Penitent Confession.

CHAP. LIX. 9–15 a.

9 Therefore is [a]judgment far from us,
Neither doth justice overtake us:
We wait for light, but behold obscurity;
For brightness, but we walk in darkness.
10 We grope for the wall like the blind,
And we grope as if we had no eyes:
We stumble at noonday as in the [b]night;
[c]We are in desolate places as dead men.
11 We roar all like bears,
And mourn sore like doves:
We look for [a]judgment, but there is none;
For salvation, but it is far off from us.
12 For our transgressions are multiplied before thee,
And our sins testify against us:
For our transgressions are with us;
And as for our iniquities, we know them.
13 In transgressing and lying against the LORD,
And departing away from our God,
Speaking oppression and revolt,
Conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood.
14 And [a]judgment is turned away backward,
And justice standeth afar off:
For truth is fallen in the street,
And equity cannot enter.
15 [a]Yea, truth faileth;
And he that departeth from evil [1]maketh himself a prey.

[1] Or, is accounted mad.

[a] right. [b] twilight. [c] Among the flourishing (with life) as the dead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

See List for the recurrence of the words: Ver. 9. אפלה—נגהה. Ver. 10. גשש, comp. משש.

Ver. 10. He parag. accented the first time, the second time unaccented, seems to me to be with reference to merely rhetorical effect, corresponding only to the outward difference between עורים and אין עינים (xl. 29). ——כנשף with the preposition omitted, comp. i. 25; v. 18, 29; x. 14; xxviii. 21.——אשמן is an adjective form from שמן pinguis fuit, like אכזר, אכזב, איתן. The Prophet could write בשמנים, but he coined a new word in order to intimate that he would have the word taken in more than the common, in an intensified sense. Judg. iii. 29 שמן is used parallel with איש־חיל: they smote ten thousand Moabites כל־שמן וכל־איש חיל. Also in Ps. lxxviii. 31 משמנים is placed in parallelism with בחורים (comp. Isa. x. 16). Since the words כמ' באשמנים as far as כשלנו stand in the same grammatical relation as בצהרים כנשף, and correspond to these words in parallelism, they must have an analogous sense. There lies in the former the same antithesis as in the latter. See Exeg. and Crit..

Ver. 12. ענתה בנו comp. iii. 9; and as regards the singular predicate with the plural subject comp. i. 6; xxxiv. 13; xxxv. 9.

Ver. 13. נסוג inf. absol. Niph. from סוג, comp. Zeph. i. 6.——הרו, הגו are inf. abss. Poel from הרה and הגה; they both occur only here. They are evidently meant for a paronomasia.

Ver. 14. The discourse returns to the verb. fin.

Ver. 15: משתולל, with reflexive-causal meaning; comp. Ps. lxxvi. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. From the present, whose contemplation he begins in chap. lviii., the Prophet would prepare a way for himself to behold the remote future. The sins and vices of the present, which he had to oppose to the people's charge of injustice on God's part, prevent the coming of the salvation to which the people had a certain right as to something promised. But these sins can be blotted out, a way to Israel's right to salvation can be made, if Israel repents. That will come about. Hence in the present section the Prophet describes the penitent Israel. That this repentance may appear spontaneous and real, he lets Israel itself speak. He was the more moved to do this, as he comprehends together relative and absolute present, and accordingly would include himself and his own time. With על־כן, "therefore" (ver. 9), the Israelites join on to the charge of the Prophet. They admit thereby that their sins are the cause of their sad condition, which they now proceed to describe (vers. 9–11). To this "therefore" corresponds the causal כי, "for," ver. 12: what they should know as the consequence of the Prophet's charges, that they now prove by a candid confession of sin (vers. 12-15 a). In direct contrast, therefore, with that bold statement, lviii. 2, 3, that Jehovah was unjust toward His people, Israel here confesses emphatically, in a double turn of discourse intertwined like a chain, and in connection with the mirror of its sins that the Prophet holds before it, lix. 2–8, that its wretchedness is the consequence of its sin (vers. 9–11), and its sin is the cause of its wretchedness (vers. 12–15 a).

2. Therefore——far off from us, vers. 9–11. With therefore begins a great and important turn in the discourse. Israel no longer boasts of its righteousness and innocence, as in lviii. 2, 3, but confesses that the Prophet was entirely right in his accusations, lix. 2–8; it confesses that on account of these sins its right is far from it. But what strange confession of sin is this when Israel says: On account of my sins I rightly do not receive my right; right is done me that I suffer wrong. Evidently there is implied here a double right. On the one hand there exists for Israel an absolute right, that is founded on its election to be a peculiar people, and on the promise given to the fathers and often repeated afterwards. This is the right (משפט) and the righteousness (צדקה) spoken of in vers. 9 and 11. By virtue of this right a wrong seems to have happened to Israel when it has been conquered, oppressed, carried off captive by the heathen. But such times of distress are only obscurations of right, i. e. transitory veilings of that right that stands immovable as the sun, occasioned by Israel's sin for the time being, that makes necessary the manifestations of God's relative right, i. e. transitory moments and periods of punishment. In ver. 9 now, the people confess that the present obscuration of its (absolute) right is not an absolute, but only a relative injustice, i. e. in relation to its present misbehaviour a well founded right. That Israel itself speaks, and that it is not solely the Prophet that declares of Israel that it has come to a right view, is evidently intended, so that Israel's confession of repentance may be heard from its own mouth, thus from the most reliable source, and also as a voluntary one.—The expression לא תשיגנו צדקה recalls the ברכות or קללות השיגך of Deut. xxviii. 2, 15. Comp. also Isa. xxxv. 10; li. 11. From ver. 9 b and on, this condition of Israel devoid of its right is described in figures. The people compare it to the situation of those that in darkness hope for light, and yet never see the hope fulfilled. Next they compare themselves in their helplessness and want of counsel to blind men that grope along by touching the wall. Further they compare themselves to the blind that stumble at midday as in the twilight; then to the dead, i. e. to the shades of the dead that move among the living, strengthless and without support, with tottering gait (comp. the ἀμενηνὰ κάρηνα or φῦλα ἀνθρώπων, Fr. v. Naegelsbach, Homer. Theol. VII., § 25). The word אשמנים, which occurs only here, can, in my opinion, only mean "the fat," i. e. those in vigorous life, in contrast with the unsubstantial shades. So also DELITZSCH, SEINECKE, ROHLING, etc. See Text. and Gram. The light of midday does not help the blind; he stumbles any way. It does not help the shade of a dead man to move about in the environment of men rejoicing in life; he totters and is unsteady just the same. One might say that then it ought to read כמתים כאשנים. But the intention of making the last member of the parallelism like the first prevails. The explanations: "as the dead in darkness, or in desolate places, or in fat regions," partly do not correspond to the parallelism, partly are ungrammatical. But one must now distinguish the substance from the image. What would the Prophet say by this figure? I am surprised that even DELITZSCH here follows in the steps of KNOBEL, and thinks he must find the Prophet's point of view in the last decade of the Exile, and that the meaning is: When, after his conquest over Croesus, Cyrus hesitated to march against Babylon, hope and fear unceasingly alternated in the souls of the Exiles. Verily, the Prophet's standpoint is one much higher, his circuit of vision a much broader one. He would here even pave the way to the distant views of chapters lx. sqq. The thing that hinders the appearance of the deeds of salvation there promised, is Israel's sin. Let the partition wall of sin be cleared away by knowledge of it and proper fruits of repentance, then can the LORD arise to put Israel in possession of its right. Wherever and whenever Israel truly recognizes its misery and the cause of it, it must so speak as is here represented. For there it must measure its situation by the measure of God's promises, and must ask itself: Am I what, as the people of God, I ought to be? Then it must see the imperfection and uncertainty of its situations—now high up, then deep down; at one time unrighteously dominated over, at another unrighteously dominating—and confess that Israel can only find its eternal, inalienable right in and with its God.

Ver. 11. Israel compares itself to bears growling for hunger (illustrative passages from the classics find in BOCHART, Hieroz. II., p. 134), and to doves that for like reason plaintively coo and sigh (ibid. II., p. 539 sq.). הָמָה and הָגָה are nearly related in sound and meaning. The first is used of the dove, Ezek. vii. 16; the latter is used also of the lion (xxvii. 8; xxxi. 4). We had it for the sighing of the dove already, xxxviii. 14. By comparing themselves to the growling of the bear and to the sighing of the dove, the Israelites let it be understood that both the strong and the weak, each in his way, make audible complaint concerning the prevailing distress.

3. For our transgressions——himself a prey, vers. 12–15 a. As already remarked, the כִּי, "for," that begins ver. 12, corresponds to the "therefore" that begins ver. 9. It is the same chain-like succession as that of e. g. li. 12, 13; liii. 4, 5, 12. "The people strike up the Widduj (the confession) that is marked by the rhyming inflexions anu and enu" (DELITZSCH).—The second כי, "for," in ver. 12 is not co-ordinate with the first, but subordinate. For Israel would not have been able to say: Our sins stand before thee and testify against us, had it not before owned to having such sins. The consciousness of its sinfulness betrayed in ver. 12 b was alone able to determine it to the declaration of ver. 12 a. In ver. 13 follows a specification of the sins of which Israel is conscious. The first and chief is apostacy from Jehovah, idolatry. It is characterized in a three fold way. We may understand פשע to denote the inward revolt against the LORD, כחש the denial of Him practised in words (בַּיהוה is to be referred to both, comp. i. 2; xliii. 27; then Hos. ix. 2; Jer. v. 12), נסוג וגו׳, the outward actual falling away by exchanging the worship of Jehovah for heathen worship. One may say that ver. 13 a treats of transgressions against the first table of the law, ver. 13 b of transgressions against the second. For ver. 13 b speaks of violations of the duties we owe our neighbors. דבר עשק וסרה is to carry on discourse (conversation, agreement) that aims at oppression of others and departure from the law. The expression דִּבֶּר־סָרָה, wherever else it occurs (Deut. xiii. 6; Jer. xxviii. 16; xxix. 32), is used only of the false doctrine of the false prophets. Thus here Isaiah would have principally in mind the seductive discourses of false prophets. In antithesis to הָרָה, concepit, הָגָה can here only mean "breathing forth," the proferre by means of speech.

Ver. 14. At first sight and by comparison with ver. 9, one is tempted to understand 14 a (with HITZIG and others) to refer again to the hindrance in the way of Israel having the right belonging to it in the theocratic sense (see above). But ver. 14 b conflicts with that; for there the fides publica is evidently spoken of that must underlie the administering of justice and all trade and conduct. Where fidelity wavers, and no one can any more believe and trust another; where all propriety and decorousness, all honestum is formally held aloof, excluded, put under the ban, there can be no mention of right and justice in the market (ברחוב, in foro); of course there fidelity must gradually be wholly missing (xxxiv. 16; xl. 26), while if any one only does not join in, would let the wickedness alone, he incurs the danger of being singled out for plunder.

b) The Prophet promises Jehovah's intervention and is encouraged to further announcements of salvation.

CHAPTER LIX. 15 b–21.

15 b And the LORD saw it,
And [1]it displeased him that there was no judgment.
16 And he saw that there was no man,
And [a]wondered that there was no intercessor:
Therefore his arm brought salvation unto him;
And his righteousness, it sustained him.
17 For he put on righteousness as a [b]breastplate,
And an helmet of salvation upon his head;
And he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing,
And was clad with zeal as a cloak.
18 According to their [2]deeds, accordingly he will repay,
Fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies;
To the islands he will repay recompence.
19 So shall they fear the name of the LORD from the west,
And his glory from the rising of the sun.
[c]When the enemy shall come in like a flood,
The spirit of the LORD shall [3]lift up a standard against him.
20 And the Redeemer shall come to Zion,
And unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the LORD.
21 As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the LORD;
My spirit that is upon thee,
And my words which I have put in thy mouth,
Shall not depart out of thy mouth,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the LORD,
From henceforth and forever.

[1] Heb. it was evil in his eyes. [2] Heb. recompences. [3] Or, put him to flight.
[a] was horrified. [b] coat of mail.
[c] For he will come as a pent up stream, which the breath of Jehovah drives.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18. כְּעַל . . . כְּעַל (comp. lxiii. 7) is a mixture of preposition and adverb, and in the context a confusio duarum constructionum. That is to say, the two modes of expression are mixed up, viz., כִּגְמֻלוֹת כֵּן יְשַׁלֵּם (instead of כִּגְמֻלוֹת כְּשִׁלֻּם, because, may be, the substantives from שָׁלֵם that mean retributio, שֶׁלֶם, שִׁלֵּם, שִׁלֻּם, שִׁלּוּמָה are all of them very rarely used) and עַל־גְּמֻלוֹת יְשַׁלֵּם.

Ver. 19. יִרְאוּ and not יִרְאוּ as KNOBEL would have. For although the latter = videbunt would also give a good meaning, still the former is the critically approved reading. See DELITZSCH.——The words רוּחַ יְ׳ נוֹסְסָה בוֹ recall xl. 7, where it reads רוּחַ יְ׳ נָשְׁבָה בּוֹ. Evidently these words hovered before the Prophet. But there vegetation is spoken of, which the breath of the LORD (conceived of as a hot wind) dries up. Here it speaks of a stream which the breath of the LORD does not dry up, but can only drive onwards. Hence the Prophet must choose another word than נָשְׁבָה. But he would choose one of like sound, for which נוֹסְסָה offered. This Pilel from נוּס does not elsewhere occur, indeed. But neither does the would-be Poel formed from נֵס occur. There is only a Hithp. הִתְנוֹסֵס (Zech. ix. 16; Ps. lx. 6, passages that themselves present great difficulty). But this Prophet, so mighty in language, could and dared to form a Pilel נוֹסֵס; and in taking it in a causative sense (= to produce flight, haste), and making בוֹ dependent on it, he proceeds quite in the spirit of the Hebrew language.——It seems to me beyond doubt that צַר (in pause צָר) is to be taken as = coarctatus. But it is not to be derived from צוּר ("oppressing stream," EWALD, KNOBEL, SEINECKE, ROHLING) but from צָרַר. There are in Hebrew many verbs in which the transitive and intransitive force are still together unseparated. צרר is one of them. Comp. צַר לִי Ps. xxxi. 10, etc.; מָקוֹם צָר Num. xxii. 26; Isa. xlix. 20; כֹּחַ צַר Prov. xxiv. 10, etc.——Against the explanation of כַּנָּהָר צָר that, with GESENIUS, MAURER, UMBREIT, DE-

LITZSCH, I hold to be correct, it may be objected from a grammatical point of view, that the disjunctive Pashta on נִדָּח calls for a substantive meaning for צָר, and that צר as an attribute of הנהר must also have the article. But the accent is only the Masoretic construction, and the omission of the article forms no very rare exception, which appears to me to be prompted in cases where the subject is rendered definite already by the comparison (comp., e. g., xl. 9).

Ver. 21. The use of אוֹתָם for אִתָּם, which we find in Jeremiah very much developed, is in Isaiah still in its beginnings. For in him both forms occur harshly together: liv. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The LORD can only reply to Israel's sincere confession of sin by the assurance of His grace. Therefore the Prophet declares that the LORD recognizes the complaint, that its right (ver. 9) has escaped from it, to be well founded (ver. 15 b, 16 a), and that He has prepared to help them to it. Therefore recompense will be given to the enemies of Israel (ver. 18). East and west shall be witnesses of the mighty displays of Jehovah's power, when He will come on like a stream that bursts its dams and is driven by a tempest beside, in order to bring deliverance to penitent Israel (vers. 19, 20). This promise of outward manifestation of salvation is followed by another more inward, and also comforting and encouraging for the Prophet himself, that the covenant of the LORD with Israel will be realized by the spirit that the LORD has laid on the Prophet continuing to operate forever in Israel. (ver. 21).

2. And the LORD saw it——saith the LORD.—Vers. 15 b–20. According to the prospect the Prophet held out, lviii. 9, so it comes to pass. There it says: if Israel will bring proper fruits of repentance, then it will call and the LORD will answer it; it will cry, and the LORD will say: here am I. In lix. 12–15 a Israel has made so hearty a confession, that the fruits of repentance demanded, lviii. 6 sqq., are to be expected with certainty. Instantly the LORD hears, and now also actually answers. He investigates the situation and owns with displeasure (יֵרַע בְּעֵ׳, comp. Gen. xxi. 11, etc., only here in Isa.) that Israel really has not its theocratic right. מִשְׁפָּט, ver. 15 b is thus to be construed as in ver. 9. Moreover, the LORD sees with dismay (יִשְׁתּוֹמֵם, comp. lxiii. 5) that no one is there. To the expression, אֵין אִישׁ, corresponds in parallism אֵין מַפְגִּיעַ. The former must therefore have a meaning analogous to and preparatory for the latter. We must therefore supply after אִישׁ the thought: "who is able to mediate such a thing, to bring it to rights". Comp. xli. 28; lxiii. 5. מַפְגִּיעַ is intercessor, comp. liii. 12; xlvii. 3.

Upon the knowledge of what is wanting follows instantly the actual intervention. It is successful, for the arm of the LORD (symbol of His omnipotence, xxxiii. 2; xl. 10; xlviii. 14, see List) affords him help, and the sure support of His purpose is the righteousness of his cause and of His will. Ver. 16 b is related to what follows, as a summary statement of the contents. Ver. 17 follows with specification in figurative expressions. Here Jehovah is portrayed arousing the several attributes and activities He needs in order to help His people to their right; and the awaking of the powers resident in Him is represented by the figure of His laying on the several pieces of military equipment. Comp. the application of our passage in Ephes. vi. 14, 17, and the Doct. and Eth., p. 644, § 10. Thus the righteousness just designated as the guaranty of success is compared to the coat of mail from which all darts of the enemy rebound. שִׁרְיָן only here in Isa.; comp. 1 Kings xxii. 34; 2 Chr. xviii. 33. The helmet, the defensive armor, that protects the head, the noblest and most prominent part of the body, guarantees therefore very properly the chief concern: deliverance, salvation, victory (יְשׁוּעָה, comp. Hab. iii. 8). The garments must denote that He means vengeance, and the מְעִיל (the long, woolen under garment, comp. lxi. 10) must represent the deep earnestness, the glowing zeal that animates Him. Ver. 18. Thus equipped, the LORD advances to the conflict. The object of it is righteous recompense to the enemies of Israel. The rage with which they have oppressed Israel, in general all that they have done to it (גְּמוּל, vocab. anceps, comp. iii. 11; lxvi. 6) shall be recompensed to them, especially to "the isles", the representatives of the heathen world. But they will fear the name of the LORD, i. e., His appearance, revelation, in the west and his glory in the east. מִן before מערב and מזרח of course designates to the Hebrew way of speaking the terminus a quo, whereas we must, in our manner of representing it, substitute the term. in quo. For the Hebrew would not say that they will fear the LORD from east and west hither, as if the appearance of the LORD were to be regarded as standing in the middle between east and west. But the Prophet stands in the middle, and he would only say that both those that present themselves to him from the east and those that meet his gaze from the west, from whatever side they come, will fear the LORD. On this well-known Hebrew mode of expression comp. xvii. 13; xxii. 3; xl. 15, etc. The expression, "fear the name of the LORD," is found, Deut. xxviii. 58, and on the ground of that passage in Ps. lxxxvi. 11; Neh. i. 11; probably also Mic. vi. 5, where יִרְאֶה שְׁמֶךָ is to be read, instead of יִרְאֶה שׁ׳; then, too, Ps. cii. 16, which is evidently a citation of our text, and confirms the reading יִירְאוּ; and Ps. lxi. 6; Mal. iii. 20.—And how should not the heathen fear the name of the LORD, seeing He comes as a compressed river! (On צר see Text and Gram.). What better image could the Prophet use to signify Jehovah's might, that for a time restrained itself to the point of apparent injustice toward Israel, only to break forth with the greater energy? He compares it to a stream which the dikes for a while crowd together, but which, when it makes a crevasse in the dikes, breaks away with so much the greater power, and irresistibly carries all before it, especially when its own weight is augmented by a driving wind. In this he expresses the thought that also underlies xl. 7, that the Spirit of the Lord, that also in the wind has one of its forms of manifestation, will exercise the activity suited to it, at the destruction of the world, as it did at the creation (Gen. i. 2; comp. Isa. iv. 4; xxviii. 6).—In ver. 20 the distinction between "Zion" and "the converted in Jacob" is due to the parallelism, and therefore we must not attach to this merely rhetorical distinction the weight of a logical distinction. On שבי פשע comp. i. 7, 27; v. 13; xxviii. 1.

3. As for me——forever, ver. 21. When we compare chap. lviii. with lx., we find in the former a very prosaic, practical, severe homily, which can only have been made for a (relative or absolute) present occasion. But in chap. lx. we again find the Prophet in a lofty flight, announcing the remote future. Chap. lix. forms the bridge to this in the manner designated above (comp. also in Doct. and Ethic., p. 644, § 11) When now lix. concludes with a declaration that promises to the Prophet the continuance of the charismatic gifts of the Spirit heretofore imparted to him, we will be right in regarding this declaration of our verse as the direct transition to the loftier style of prophecy that again begins in chap. lx. Still, of course, ver. 21 cannot be referred only to this assurance given to the Prophet; for the sound of the words of the verse shows that the Lord at the same time would crown the promise given to the people Israel from ver. 15 a and on. Thus this verse has a double character. This appears from the plural suffix in אוֹתָם, on the one hand, and on the other from the address to the Prophet. At the same time it is to be remarked, that ver. 21, in relation to what precedes, has a positive and inward character. Positive, because nothing more is said of the evil to be done to the enemies, but only the good to be to Israel is spoken of; inward, because what is said is not concerning victory and outward salvation, but concerning inward impartation of the Spirit. ואני is not = but I. For nothing is said before of what another would have done. Therefore it means "and I," but the emphasis is on the "I," and this is made prominent because something is to be promised that only God can do. At the same time there is in these words a reminder of the words spoken to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 4: "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee." But the covenant that the Lord here holds up to view is no longer one that promises great increase by means of a numerous posterity, as in that covenant with Abraham. This new covenant refers to the spiritual life, to a new spiritual communion with the Lord, to the worship of God in spirit and in truth.

One would not comprehend in what follows why the Lord does not say directly: I will put my Spirit upon them, etc., but says: My Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth (li. 16), shall not depart out of thy mouth, etc., if there were not just that double object indicated above. But would the Lord have promised to the Prophet so numerous a posterity, would he have declared the prophetic gift to be a matter of inheritance in his family? Certainly not. In contrast with Gen. xvii. 4 sqq., that also has much to say of "a seed after thee," but only in the sense of a numerous corporeal posterity, it is here promised to the Prophet that he should have many spiritual descendants; that therefore Israel, to the remotest generations, shall be a people filled with the Spirit, and people of God in the most exalted sense. The spirit-replenished posterity of the Prophet, and of the people Israel, generally merge together in one. From chap. lx. onwards it is evidenced at once that the Prophet has become no mere preacher of repentance, as might seem to be the case from chapts. lvii., lviii., lix. 1–8, but that the high prophetic gift is still in him that is able to behold with enraptured eye the glory of the remote future, and to proclaim it with eloquent tongue.

[On ver. 21 Delitzsch says: "The following prophecy is addressed to Israel, the 'servant of Jehovah,' which has been hitherto partially faithful and partially unfaithful, but which has now returned to fidelity, viz., the 'remnant of Israel,' which has been rescued through the medium of a general judgment upon the nations, and to which the great body of all who fear God, from east to west, attach themselves." Clark's For. Th. L. J. A. Alexander interprets it in the same way. He says: "The only natural antecedent of the pronoun them is the converts of apostacy in Jacob, to whom the promise in ver. 20 is limited. These, then, are suddenly addressed, or rather the discourse is turned to Israel himself as the progenitor, or as the ideal representative of his descendants, not considered merely as a nation, but as a church, and therefore including proselytes as well as natives, Gentiles as well as Jews, nay, believing Gentiles to the exclusion of the unbelieving Jews. This idea of the Israel of God, and of the prophecies, is too clearly stated in the Epistle to the Romans to be misapprehended or denied by any who admit the authority of the apostle. This interpretation is moreover not a mere incidental application of Old Testament expressions to another subject, but a protracted and repeated exposition of the mutual relations of the old and new economy, and of the natural and spiritual Israel. To this great body, considered as the Israel of God, the promise now before us is addressed, a promise of continued spiritual influence, exerted through the word and giving it effect. The phrase upon thee, here as elsewhere, implies influence from above, and has respect to the figure of the Spirit's descending and abiding on the object. The particular mention of the mouth cannot be explained as having reference merely to the reception of the word, in which case the ear would have been more appropriate. The true explanation seems to be that Israel is here, as in many other parts of this great prophecy, regarded not merely as a receiver, but as a dispenser of the truth." The Author's effort to include a personal address to the Prophet as well as to the spiritual Israel seems to have no more valuable effect than to prepare a transition to the lofty prophetic flight that begins with chap. lx. We can better dispense with the transition than accept the ideas brought in by that interpretation.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lviii. 2, 3. There are also to-day many men that hold up their good works to God (Luke xviii. 11 sqq.), and who, out aloud or silently, reproach Him for not adequately rewarding them for them. But one can distinguish here two classes: those that boast of having done works of undoubted moral worth; and such as found their pretensions essentially on works that are morally indifferent, as ceremonies of worship and the like. Of course there is a difference between these, for the former can, under some circumstances, really deserve praise; whereas the latter under all circumstances accomplish something more or less morally worthless, yea, possibly, as miserable hypocrites, directly provoke the wrath of God. But never has the creature the right to accuse God. It may be debated whether such accusation is more folly or wickedness. It is under all circumstances a presumptuous judgment. For, as long as we live, results are not assured, and we lack ability to see all. Only the day will make it clear what is the relation between God's doing and ours, and that He has not let the just recompense be wanting (i. 18; xliii. 26).

2. On lviii. 4 sqq. The Prophet finds fault with the fasting of the Jews in two respects. First, because they combined them with works of unrighteousness. Second, because they held the "bodily exercise" to be the chief thing. Perhaps in the Sermon on the mount our LORD had our text in mind when He said: "When ye fast, be not as the hypocrites of a sad countenance." Matt. vi. 11. He makes prominent one particular that probably hovered before our Prophet also. For it is possible that he saw in the "hanging the head" an artificial, affected, and so hypocritical expression of a piety that did not exist inwardly; although it is not absolutely necessary that this letting the head hang and making one's bed in sand and ashes took place with hypocritical intent. But our LORD expressly demands that one do not let appear the harassed, sickly look, that was the perhaps quite natural consequence of fasting. He says (ver. 17): "but thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head and wash thy face, that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father, which is in secret." One sees, therefore, that in the Sermon on the mount the LORD by no means rejects corporeal fasting. He only shows abhorrence of men's hypocritically abusing fasting for the gratification of pride. But the Prophet also does not reject fasting. But he would have corporeal fasting be the faithful expression of a simultaneous moral doing of penitent self-denial and compassionating love.

3. On lviii. 6-9. As the apostle James pressingly urges against dead works, that even Abraham's faith was in itself a grand moral act, so here, too, the Prophet insists on right works as opposed to false works. But neither declares essentially anything concerning the true ground and origin of the works that they mean, because the context of their discourses does not call for it. We are to supply this from passages that professedly speak to this point, which they silently take for granted, according to the measure of intelligence given to them. For even Isaiah knows right well that that which satisfies and strengthens is not to be obtained by one's own labor and effort (lv.).

4. On lviii. 7. "Flesh denotes here in this context something more still, which J. VON MUELLER has remarked: "The remembrance of universal brotherhood, and how we are all exposed to like things"—as ἄνθρωποι ὁμοιοπαθεῖς. Verily flesh has need of covering. When therefore thou seest the naked, then see and feel therein the need of thine own flesh, and do not, proudly selfish, conceal or cover only thyself with thy garment that belongs to the other as also being thy flesh." STIER.

5. On lviii. 7. Concerning the expression פָּרֹס לֶחֶם see Doctrinal and Ethical on Jer. xvi. 7.

6. [On lviii. 13, 14. "From the closing portion of this chapter we may derive the following important inferences respecting the Sabbath. (1.) It is to be of perpetual obligation. The whole chapter occurs in the midst of statements that relate to the times of the Messiah. There is no intimation that the Sabbath was to be abolished, but it is fairly implied that its observance was to be attended with most happy results in those future times. . . . (2.) We may see the manner in which the Sabbath is to be observed. In no place in the Bible is there a more full account of the proper mode of keeping that holy day. We are to refrain from ordinary travelling and employments; we are not to engage in doing our own pleasure; we are to regard it with delight, and to esteem it a day worthy to be honored. And we are to show respect to it by not performing our own ordinary works, or pursuing pleasures, or engaging in the common topics of conversation. In this description there occurs nothing of peculiar Jewish ceremony, and nothing which indicates that it is not to be observed in this manner at all times. Under the gospel assuredly, it is as proper to celebrate the Sabbath in this way as it was in the times of Isaiah, and God doubtless intended that it should be perpetually observed in this manner. (3.) Important benefits result from the right observance of the Sabbath. In the passage before us these are said to be, that they who thus observed it would find pleasure in Jehovah, and would be signally prospered and be safe. But those benefits are by no means confined to the Jewish people. It is as true now as it was then, and they who observe the Sabbath in a proper manner find happiness in the LORD —in His existence, perfections, promises, law, and in communion with Him—which is to be found no where else. . . And it is as true that the proper observance of the Sabbath contributes to the prosperity and safety of a nation now as it ever did among the Jewish people. It is not merely from the fact that God promises to bless the people who keep His holy day—though this is of more value to a nation than all its armies and fleets; but it is that there is in the institution itself much that tends to the welfare and prosperity of a country. . . . Any one may be convinced of this who will be at the pains to compare a neighborhood, a village, or a city where the Sabbath is not observed with one where it is; and the difference will convince him at once that society owes more to the Sabbath than to any single institution beside." BARNES.]

7. On lix. 2. "Quia quotidie apud nos crescit culpa, cur non et simul crescat poena?" AUGUSTINE. "The public sins are compared to a thick cloud, that sets itself between heaven and earth, and as it were hinders prayers from passing through (Lam. iii. 44)." STARKE. "There is great power in sin, for it separates God and us from one another." CRAMER. "There are times when the hand of the LORD lies long and heavy on His children. One feels that God has withdrawn from him and hidden His countenance. But one does not sufficiently investigate the cause. One seeks it in God, and it lies in us, who, by sins unacknowledged and not repented of, make it impossible to God to turn to us in grace." WEBER.

8. On lix. 3-8. The register of sins that Isaiah here holds up to the Jews is a mirror in which many a Christian, many a nation, many a time may recognize its own image. The Prophet declares here very plainly the poison nature, the serpent origin of sin. Sin is the poison that the old serpent knew how to bring into our nature. He that has stolen a taste of a product of this poison, as Eve did of the tree of knowledge, supposing that he will thereby receive some good, will go to ruin by it. But he that would be no lover of sin, but would stand forth as its opponent, may count upon it that the reptile will press its malignant fang in his heel, as was even held in prospect to the great trampler of the serpent's head Himself (Gen. iii. 15).

9. On lix. 9-15 a. Here is for once an honest and thorough confession of sins. Nothing is palliated here, nothing excused. It is freely confessed that Israel is itself to blame for all its wretchedness, and this guilt is acknowledged to be the consequence of the apostacy from Jehovah and of the workings of a depraved heart, whose malignant fruits have become manifest in words and works. Comp. Jer. iii. 21 sqq.—Here therefore is given a model for all who would know wherein true repentance must consist.

10. On lix. 15 b sqq. "Si tu recordaberis peccatorum tuorum, Dominus non recordabitur." AUGUSTINE. "God wonders that men let sin become so great and His righteousness so small." OETINGER in STIER.—It is a divine privilege to need no helper. With God there is no difference between willing and being able. With Him the being able follows the willing ad nutum. And there is nothing to which God, when He wills, has not also the right. We men, when we have the will and the power, are often without the right, and this takes the foundation from under our feet.—Ver. 17. This is the original source of the Apostle Paul's extended description of the spiritual armor, Ephes. vi. 14, 17. Also in 1 Thes. v. 8 there underlies the same representation of the equipment required by Christians. On the other hand God is conceived of as an equipped warrior, e. g., Ps. vii. 13, 14; xxxv. 2, 3. In Exod. xv. 4 He is directly called "a man of war."

11. On lix. 18-20. Regarding the time of the fulfilment of this prophecy, the honorable and thorough confession of sin in vers. 9-15 a, assumes the conclusion of the judgments against Israel and the conversion of the Gentiles. So Paul understood our passage, who cites it, Rom. xi. 26, to prove that only then will the Jews partake of the salvation when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in. Therefore the Prophet distinguishes three great periods of time. The first comprehends all the stages of time in which Israel will be impenitent, and hence deprived of its theocratic rights. This period will conclude with a condition wherein Israel's scale, as too light, hurries upwards to the highest elevation, while the scale of the Gentiles, by reason of its weight, will sink deep down. Just this situation will bring about the turning of the scale. Israel will repent; but those Gentiles and those Israelites that will not have repented will be overtaken by the judgment (vers. 18, 20 שבי פשע ביעקב). For neither the "fulness of the Gentiles," nor "all Israel" excludes there being still unconverted Gentiles and Jews. The third period is then the period of salvation, when the Goel ["Redeemer"] will come to Zion and raise up the covenant (ver. 21).

12. On lix. 21 "Does the Spirit of God remain, then does also His word; does the word remain, then preachers also remain; do preachers remain, then also hearers do; do hearers remain, then there remain also believers, and therefore the Christian church remains also, to which ever some still will be gathered out of the Jews (Rom. xi. 26)."——"Although in general God has promised that His word and Spirit shall not depart from the church of God, still no one must become so secure about that (comp. Jer. xviii. 18) as if it were impossible that this or that particular church (and even the Romish church is nothing more) could err." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lviii. 1. Penitential Sermon. The text teaches us two things: 1) What one ought to preach on a day of repentance [fast-day]; viz., hold up to the people their sins. 2) How one should preach: a. boldly, b. without sparing, loud as a trumpet.

2. On lviii. 2-9 This text contains the outlines of a popular theodicy. First we hear, vers. 2, 3 a, the popular complaint that the divine Providence that guides the affairs of the world is unjust, and that He is not fair to the claims of reward that each individual fancies he has. Then in vers. 3 b-9, we hear the divine justification. It consists of two parts. In the first part God shows that the claims of men are unfounded in two respects. First for this reason, because they do not do good purely, but along with the good have still room in their hearts for evil, consequently imagine that they can serve two masters (vers. 3 a., 4). Second, their claims are unfounded, because founded in the illusion that it is sufficient to fulfil the divine commands in a rude, outward manner. Thus men suppose, e. g., that they can satisfy the divine command to fast by harassing the body by hunger, and lying on sack-cloth and ashes (ver. 5). In the second part God shows what must be the nature of the performances that would satisfy the demand of His holiness, and give a claim on His righteousness for reward. That is to say, men must first of all, by practical repentance, make restoration for all injustice done by them, and make manifest by works of mercy their love to God and their neighbor (ver. 7). Then divine salvation and divine blessing will be constantly with them, and in every necessity their prayer for help will find certain hearing (vers. 8, 9 a).

3. [On lviii. 3. "Having gone about to put a cheat on God by their external services, here they go about to pick a quarrel with God for not being pleased with their services, as if He had not done justly or fairly by them." M. HENRY.]

4. [On lviii. 4. "Behold, you fast for strife and debate. When they proclaimed a fast to deprecate God's judgments, they pretended to search for those sins that provoked God to threaten them with His judgments, and under that pretence, perhaps, particular persons were falsely accused, as Naboth in the day of Jezebel's fast, 1 Kings xxi. 12. Or the contending parties among them upon those occasions were bitter and severe in their reflections one upon another, one side crying out, 'It is owing to you,' and the other, 'It is owing to you, that our deliverance is not wrought.' Thus, instead of judging themselves, which is the proper work of a fast-day, they condemned one another." M. HENRY.]

5. [On lviii. 5, 7. "Plain instructions given concerning the true nature of a religious fast. I. In general a fast is intended: (1.) For the honoring and pleasing of God (ver. 5, a fast that I have chosen, an acceptable day to the Lord). (2.) For the humbling and abasing of ourselves, Lev. xvi. 29. That must be done on a fast-day which is a real affliction to the soul, as far as it is unregenerate and unsanctified, though a real pleasure and advantage to the soul as far as it is itself. II. What will be acceptable to God and afflict our corrupt nature to its mortification. (1.) Negatively, what does neither of these. a. To look demure, put on a melancholy aspect and bow the head like a bulrush, Matth. vi. 16. Though that were well enough so far, Luke xviii. 13. b. It is not enough to mortify the body a little, while the body of sin is untouched. (2.) Positively. a. That we be just to those with whom we have dealt hardly (ver. 6). b. That we be charitable to those that stand in need of charity (ver. 7)." After M. HENRY.]

6. On lviii. 7. The compassionate love of the Samaritan. 1) What does it give? a. food, b. housing, c. clothing. 2) To whom does it give? To its flesh, i. e., to its neighbor in the sense of Luke x. 29 sqq.

7. On lviii. 9. "What if the LORD were to make us priests, and if He were to give us the light and righteousness that Aaron bore on his heart as often as he went in unto the LORD, and by which the LORD gave him answer when He inquired,—if He were to give all of us that in our hearts, who are priests of the new covenant? And assuredly I believe that He will also do this. What He has already promised by the Prophets, He will much more fulfil in us: Thou shalt call, and the LORD shall answer thee; when thou shalt cry, He will say: here I am." THOLUCK.

8. On lviii. 7-9. "O God, our great, sore, horrible blindness, that we so disregard such a glorious promise! To whom are we harsh, when we do not help poor people? Are they not our flesh and blood? As in heaven and earth there is no creature so nearly related to us, it ought to be our way: what we would that men should do to us in like case, that let us do to others. But there that detestable Satan holds our eyes, so that we withdraw from our own flesh and become tyrants and blood-hounds to our neighbors. But what do we accomplish by that? What do we enjoy? We load ourselves with God's disfavor, curse and all misfortune, who might otherwise have temporal and eternal blessing. For he that takes on him the distress of his neighbor, his light shall break forth like the morning dawn, i. e., he shall find consolation and help in time of need. His recovery shall progress rapidly, i. e., God will again bless him, and replace what he has given away. His righteousness shall go before him, i. e., he shall not only have a good name with every one, but God will shelter him from evil, and ward off from him temporal misfortune, as one may see that God wonderfully protects His own when common punishments go about. And the glory of the LORD will take him to itself, i. e., God will interest Himself for him, [as follows ver. 9]. Lo, of such great mercy as this does greed rob us, when we do not gladly and kindly help the poor!" VEIT DIETRICH.

9. [On lviii. 12. Thou shalt be called (and it shall be to thy honor) the repairer of the breach, the breach made by the enemy in the wall of a besieged city, which whoso has courage and dexterity to make up, or make good, gains great applause. Happy are those who make up the breach at which virtue is running out, and judgments are breaking in. M. HENRY].

10. On lix. 1, 2. It is often in human life as if heaven were shut up. No prayer seems to penetrate through to it. To all our cries, no answer. Then people murmur (viii. 21 sq.; Lam. iii. 39) and accuse God, as if He were lame or deaf. But they ought rather to seek the blame in themselves. There still exists a wall of partition between them and God, a guilt unatoned for, the sight of which still continuously provokes the anger of God, and hinders the appearance of His mercy (i. 15 sqq.; lxiv. 5 sqq.; Dan. ix. 5 sqq.: Prov. i. 24 sqq.). Hence Christians must be pointed to what they must guard against in seasons of long-continued visitation and what they should strive after at such times before all things. As they would avoid great harm to soul and body, they must beware of laying any blame on God, as if He were wanting in willingness or ability. Rather, by sincere repentance, their endeavor should be that heaven may be pure and clear, that their guilt may be forgiven for Christ's sake, and that, as children of God, with the testimony of the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii. 16) in their hearts, they may have free access to the heart of their heavenly Father.

11. On lix. 3-8. The description the Prophet gives here of the depraved moral condition of Israel is also a description of human sinfulness generally. And the Apostle Paul has adopted parts of it in the portrait he gives of the condition of the natural man (comp. Isa. lix. 7 with Rom. iii. 15). Therefore, where one would draw the picture of the natural man, he may make good use of this text.

12. [On lix. 13. Conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood. "They were words of falsehood, and yet they were said to be uttered from the heart, because though they differed from the real sentiments of the heart, and therefore were words of falsehood, yet they agreed with the malice and wickedness of the heart, and were the natural language of that; it was a double heart, Ps. xii. 2." M. HENRY.]

13. On lix. 15 b–21. One may preach on this text in times of great distress and conflict for the Church. The Lord the protection of His Church. 1) The distress of the Church does not remain concealed from Him, for He sees: a. that the Church encounters injustice (ver. 15 b), b. that no one on earth takes its part (ver. 16). 2) He stirs Himself (vers. 16 b–17 a, 19 b): a. to judgment against the enemy (vers. 17 b, 18), b. to salvation for the Church (ver. 17 helmet of salvation): a. with reference to its deliverance from outward distress (ver. 20), β. with reference to inward preservation and quickening of the Church (vers. 20 b, 21), c. to rescue the honor of His own name (ver. 19 a), because the Church is even His kingdom, the theatre for the realization of His decrees of salvation. Comp. Homil. Hints on xlix. 1–6.

14. [On lix. 16 sqq. "How sin abounded we have read, to our great amazement, in the former part of the chapter; how grace does much more abound we read in these verses. And as sin took occasion from the commandment to become more exceedingly sinful, so grace took occasion from the transgression to appear more exceedingly gracious." M. HENRY.]

II.—THE SECOND DISCOURSE.

The Rising of the heavenly Sun of life upon Jerusalem, and the new personal and natural life conditioned thereby.

CHAPTER LX.

The Prophet has returned from speaking of the present to treat of the last things. He sees a new Sun, the principle of new life, rise upon Jerusalem. Although this future, too, is depicted in colors belonging to the present time, yet we perceive from the matters which he specifies, that his discourse relates to the distant future. And, although the Prophet does not distinguish the times, we see that the fulfilment will take place gradually. We observe in respect to the influence of the Sun, which, according to vers. 1 and 2, is to rise upon Jerusalem, and advance from a glory which is more of a natural character to one which is more supernatural and heavenly. The chapter, however, does not divide itself into two, but into three sections, of which the first (vers. 1–9) has for its subject the gathering of all nations to the sun that rises upon Jerusalem; the second (vers. 10–17 a), the restoration of Jerusalem to outward glory; the third (vers. 17 b–22), this new life in its relation to God, and in its moral and spiritual manifestation. [We do not like such a division of this grand prophetic picture. Its parts cannot well be thus separated.—D. M.].

1. THE GATHERING OF THE NATIONS TO THE SUN THAT RISES UPON JERUSALEM. CHAPTER LX. 1–9.

1 ARISE, [1]shine; for thy light is come;
And the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee.
2 For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth,
And gross darkness the people:
And the LORD shall arise upon thee,
And his glory shall be seen upon thee.
3 And the Gentiles shall come to thy light,
And kings to the brightness of thy rising.
4 Lift up thine eyes round about, and see:
All they gather themselves together, they come to thee:
Thy sons shall come from far,
And thy daughters shall be [a]nursed at thy side.
5 Then thou shalt see, and [b]flow together,
And thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged;
Because the [2]abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee;
The [3]forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee.

6 The multitude of camels shall cover thee,
The [c]dromedaries of Midian and Ephah;
All they from Sheba shall come:
They shall bring gold and incense;
And they shall shew forth the praises of the LORD.
7 All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto thee,
The rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee:
They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar,
And I will glorify the house of my glory.
8 Who are these that fly as a cloud,
And as the doves to their [d]windows?
9 Surely the isles shall wait for me,
And the ships of Tarshish first,
To bring thy sons from far,
Their silver and their gold with them,
Unto the name of the LORD thy God,
And to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified thee.

[1] Or, be enlightened; for thy light cometh. [2] Or, noise of the sea shall be turned toward thee.
[3] Or, wealth.

[a] carried on the hip. [b] brighten up. [c] young camels. [d] lattices.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. DELITZSCH justly bids us mark that קוּמִי אוֹרִי are Trochees, and כִּי־בָא אוֹרֵךְ are Iambuses. Observe the change of vowels. All the Hebrew vowels are found in these five words in correspondence with the fulness of thoughts which these few words contain. How admirably is the language adapted to the subject! Does not this betoken that master of speech, Isaiah? [" What power of creative might lies in these two Trochees, Kumi, ori, which are, as it were, prolonged till what they say is done; and what a power of consolation lies in the two Iambuses ki-ba orech, which, as it were, stamp upon the action of Zion the seal of the divine action, and fit to the ἄρσις (raising up) its θέσις (foundation)! DELITZSCH.—D. M.].

Ver. 3. זֶרַח, ortus, is ἅπ. λεγ. as an appellative. As a proper name it is of frequent occurrence.

Ver. 4. תֵּאָמַנָה. Observe that the nun has no dagesh forte. (Comp. NAEGELSBACH'S Gr., §§ 5, 6).

Ver. 7. [" The verbal form יְשָׁרְתוּנֶךְ, which is repeated in ver. 10, has an abbreviated suffix without the tone, as xlvii. 10." DELITZSCH].

Ver. 9. פֵּאֲרָךְ, with a rarer suffix-form for פֵּאֲרֵךְ. See a like form in liv. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet sees in the distant future the restoration of Jerusalem, and its exaltation to unparalleled, supermundane and everlasting glory. But he sees blended together every thing that is in the future to produce this glory, from the first weak beginnings till the consummation in the heavenly Jerusalem. He sees at first night prevailing over the whole earth. But where Jerusalem is, he beholds a growing brightness as at the rising of the sun. He calls to Jerusalem to receive the glory which Jehovah is about to impart to her, and to let that glory unfold itself (vers. 1 and 2). Then he sees how this light emanating from Jerusalem attracts the Gentiles and their kings (ver. 3). He sees further how together with the heathen (and we may say, even in the heathen), Jerusalem's own children try to reach the mother city, and are aided in this effort by the heathen (ver. 4). With joy Jerusalem beholds these multitudes stream to her, and rejoices the more, that they come not with empty hands, but bring with them the choicest products of land and sea (ver. 5). Troops of camels will carry the gold and incense of the East (ver. 6); the flocks of the eastern nomadic lands will be acceptable as offerings on the altar of Jehovah (ver. 7). On the other hand, ships come from the distant West, laden with the precious things of lands beyond the seas, and are with their sails like to bright clouds, or doves on the wing (ver. 9). It is obvious that here again the Prophet draws the picture of the future with the colors of the present.

2. Arise, shine —— come unto thee.—Vers. 1-5. The image before the mind of the Prophet is a sunrise scene. Far and wide night still reigns, but grandly above all other heights of the earth towers mount Zion, which here, in accordance with ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1, appears as "established in the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills." And the Prophet beholds this highest mountain of the earth irradiated by the rising sun. Its summit glitters as if covered with celestial light. From this the Prophet knows that the dawn of the day of salvation for Jerusalem has arrived. He calls therefore to her encouragingly, קוּמִי. [" In Eph. v. 14 this first verse is combined in a paraphrastic form with li. 17; lii. 1, 2," KAY]. Jerusalem has now to lift up her head, because her redemption is nigh (comp. Luke xxi. 28); she is to raise herself from the depression and prostration in which her situation has hitherto kept her. Jerusalem shall become light, shall shine (אוֹרִי, the verb אוֹר in Isaiah only here, ver. 19, and xxvii. 11). But she is not to shine in her own light, but to let herself be enlightened by the higher light which rises on her. But this light is called "thy light," because Jerusalem and this light are adapted the one to the other. What sort of a light it is which shall rise upon Jerusalem, is told us in ver. 1 b. It is the glory of Jehovah. This light shall rise as an everlasting sun upon Jerusalem (comp. ver. 20; זָרַח is vox solennis of the rising of the sun, and occurs in Isaiah besides here only ver. 2 and lviii. 20). In ver. 2 the explanation is given why the sunrise referred to in ver. 1 b is a matter of such great importance, and why Jerusalem is so pressingly summoned to yield herself to the influence of this rising sun [Rather to shed forth the light which she has received from it. D. M.]. Jerusalem has herein the highest honor conferred on her that the Sun first rises upon her, that she is that point in the East from which the light is to spread over the countries shrouded in darkness. ["The Sun of suns is Jahve (Ps. lxxxiv. 12), the God who comes, lix. 20.... When this Sun rises on Zion she becomes altogether light, but not for herself alone, but for all mankind." DELITZSCH. D. M.]. עֲרָפֶל is found only here in Isaiah. We see from ver. 3 that the nations still in darkness are not inaccessible to the light. They have a longing for the light, [This is not said], and a susceptibility of receiving it. Nations and princes come to the heavenly light. The brightness of thy rising is the brightness of that which rises upon Jerusalem, according to ver. 2, the brightness of Jehovah. [But Zion made light in the LORD is represented as herself shining as a light in the world. Her rising can be described as the brightness of the sun when he goeth forth in his might, Jud. v. 31; 2 Sam. xxiii. 4. To regard "the brightness of thy rising," as meaning "the brightness of that which rises upon thee," is surely forced and unnatural, albeit the best interpreters acquiesce in this explanation. But the church, as irradiated by the divine glory, and reflecting it, has a light and brightness which is called her own, and which she sheds upon the world.—D. M.]. Not only the nations and princes of the heathen world hasten to Jerusalem. Along with them are other visitants, who are no foreigners in Jerusalem, but are children of the house. The scattered members of the Israelitish kingdom, conducted and attended with all honors by the Gentiles, will return to the holy home (comp. xi. 11 sqq.; xxv. 6 sqq.; xxvi. 2 sq.; xxvii. 13; Jer. iii. 18, see commentary on this place). ["Those who confine these prophecies to the Babylonish exile understand this as describing the agency of heathen states and sovereigns in the restoration. But in this, as in the parallel passages [xliii. 5–7; xlix. 18–23], there is, by a strange coincidence, no word or phrase implying restoration or return, but the image evidently is that of enlargement and accession; the children thus brought to Zion being not those whom she had lost, but such as she had never before known, as is evident from chap. xlix. 21. The event predicted is therefore neither the former restoration of the Jews, nor their future restoration." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. The words ver. 4 a, are repeated from xlix. 18. The gathering together (נִקְבְּצוּ) refers not only to separate individuals but according to places such as xi. 12; Hos. ii. 2, [E. V. Hos. i. 11] it refers especially to the re-union of Judah with Israel. Of the sons we are simply told that they come from a great distance, but the daughters are carefully carried. עַל־צַד is not = on the side, i. e., on the one arm or on the one shoulder (xlix. 22), but upon the hip; for it is still the custom in the Orient to carry the children astride on the hip. Such care as is bestowed on children, will be shown to the female members of the people (comp. lxvi. 12). אָמַן is here as xlix. 23 after the place in Numb. xi. 12, used to denote the nursing and tending of a child. But Jerusalem shall not only see her children come, she shall have the joy of seeing them come with full hands, furnished with all the magnificence and glory of the world. In ver. 5 the words וְנָהַרְתְּ to לְבָבֵךְ are to be taken as a sentence denoting a circumstance, put as a parenthesis, which expresses the emotion with which Jerusalem will see what has been depicted. The sentence setting forth the object כִּי יֵהָפֵךְ וגו׳ is, accordingly, dependent on תִּרְאִי, which, therefore, cannot possibly come from יָרֵא. [But it is better, with the E.V., to take כִּי as causal.—D. M.]. The verb נָהַר is not here that נָהַר which means "to stream" (ii. 2; Jer. xxxi. 12; li. 44), and which comes from נָהָר, a river. But it is a different word, related to נוּר, נֵר occurring as a verb besides only Ps. xxxiv. 6, but forming the stem of the substantives נְהָרָה (Job iii. 4) and מִנְהָרָה (Judg. vi. 2). The signification is to "shine," "to brighten up" (for joy). Joy makes the face shine, but the heart tremble (פָּחַד in this sense besides only Jer. xxxiii. 9). [HENDERSON renders this clause well: Thy heart shall throb and dilate. The idea of enlargement or expansion of the heart through joy is Semitic; but, as DELITZSCH points out, we have the opposite idea in angor, angustia.—D. M.]. The joy is called forth by Jerusalem seeing how the treasures of the sea (הָמוֹן as Ps. xxxvii. 16; Jer. iii. 23 in the sense of swarm and abundance of the most manifold products, comp. also ver. 14), and the wealth of the nations come to her. [The abundance of the sea denotes all precious things which the islands and maritime countries possess." DELITZSCH. D. M.]. עַל stands after יֵהָפֵךְ in the sense of אֶל (comp. on x. 3).

3. The multitude of camels——glorified thee.—Vers. 6–9. [A multitude of camels, without the definite article]. In these verses the Prophet describes how the treasures of the East (vers. 6 and 7) and of the West (vers. 8 and 9) are brought to Jerusalem. The eastern trading nations are indicated by a multitude of camels (שִׁפְעַת, comp. שֶׁפַע Deut. xxxiii. 19, in Isaiah only here) and young animals [בִּכְרֵי not drome- daries, which are not for carrying burdens, but for riding.—D. M.], from Midian and Ephah, which bring from Sheba gold and incense, (comp. on xliii. 23), the most valuable wares. Midian was a son of Abraham by Keturah, and the father of Ephah, Gen. xxv. 2, 4, comp. Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36; Judg. vii. שְׁבָא is Arabia felix (comp. 1 Kings x. 2; Jer. vi. 20; Job vi. 19; only here in Isaiah). These merchants at other times sought gain; now they have a nobler aim. They wish to honor Jehovah; they bring Him presents. This they declare in songs of praise (both בִּשֵּׂר and תְּהִלָּה are used by Isaiah only in chapters xl.-lxvi). The eastern pastoral tribes join the eastern trading tribes. Respecting Kedar comp. on xxi. 16 sqq.; xlii. 11. Kedar was the second, Nebaioth the eldest son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13. It is disputed whether Nebaioth is the progenitor of the Nabataei, i. e., of the northern or north-western Arabs (for Nabataea is the whole country between the Euphrates and the Red Sea). Comp. DELITZSCH on this place, and HERZOG, R.-Encycl., 1, p. 598, 2d Ed. שֵׁרֵת is a word which is often used of the ministry rendered by the priests to Jehovah (Numb. xviii. 2; Deut. xvii. 12; 1 Sam. ii. 11; iii. 1 et saepe). The flocks of Kedar and the rams of Nebaioth will therefore as עוֹלוֹת ascend the altar of Jehovah. [עַל־רָצוֹן] is translated in E. V., and by DR. NAEGELSBACH, with acceptance. But it signifies rather with pleasure, delight or good will, and is to be distinguished from the expression elsewhere used לְרָצוֹן which means to (the divine) acceptance, or with acceptance. So VITRINGA, HITZIG, HENDERSON, DELITZSCH. On this representation of the victims offering themselves willingly LOWTH remarks: "This gives a very elegant and poetical turn to the image. It was a general notion, that prevailed with sacrificers among the heathen, that the victim's being brought without reluctance to the altar was a good omen; and the contrary a bad one."—D. M.]. The great number and excellence of these offerings will conduce to the honor of the temple of the LORD. In vers. 8 and 9 the West appears upon the scene. They that like a cloud, or as doves to their enclosure skim over the sea, are ships with expanded sails. The sails spread out resemble a cloud, the velocity is compared with the swift flight of the dove (comp. Hos. xi. 11. BOCHART, Hieroz. II. p. 540 sqq.). The feminine ending in תְּעוּפֶינָה is caused by the feminine אֳנִיּוֹת. אֲרֻבָּה is opus reticulatum, net, interwoven work. The answer to the question, who are these, etc., is left to the reader. Every one perceives that it is ships that come from the west. But why those ships hasten with such speed to the holy land is explained in ver. 9. They are directed by inhabitants of the אִיִּים, which here as often (see the List), represent the islands and maritime countries of the west. These people hope in Jehovah. Among those ships the foremost (בָּרִאשֹׁנָה comp. Numb. x. 14; 1 Kings xx. 17; 1 Chron. xi. 6) are the ships of Tarshish (comp. ii. 16; xxiii. 1, 14). These, which are the largest, and come from the greatest distance, shall also be the first to bring Jerusalem's sons with their silver and gold to the place where the LORD makes known His name, i. e., reveals His nature, and is therefore honored as the Holy One of Israel (see the List). Jerusalem's glorification is also thereby intended. [The picture drawn in this section perplexes those who understand it of the literal restoration of the Jews, and of the future glory of the earthly Jerusalem. HESS, BAUMGARTEN and others argue from ver. 7 for the restoration of animal sacrifices. But DELITZSCH justly rejects this notion as utterly contrary to the Christian system. Animal sacrifice has been abolished by the Servant of Jehovah offering Himself once for all. The blood of the Crucified One has swept away the partition-wall of particularism and of ceremonial shadows. But if the victims and the altar here spoken of are not to be taken literally, why should we look for a material temple or construe literally the other traits in the picture? The whole description represents not the material Jerusalem, but the Church of God under images, which, to be consistently interpreted, cannot be taken in a gross, literal sense. We, Christians, are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God," etc., Heb. xii. 22.—D. M.].

2. THE RESTORATION OF JERUSALEM TO OUTWARD GLORY.

CHAPTER LX. 10–17 a.

10 And the [a]sons of strangers shall build up thy walls,
And their kings shall minister unto thee:
For in my wrath I smote thee,
But in my favor have I had mercy on thee.
11 Therefore thy gates shall be open continually;
They shall not be shut day nor night;
That men may bring unto thee the [1]forces of the Gentiles,
And [b]that their kings may be brought.

12 For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish;
Yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.
13 The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee,
The [c]fir tree, the [d]pine tree, and the [e]box together,
To beautify the place of my sanctuary;
And I will make the place of my feet glorious.
14 The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee;
And all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet;
And they shall call thee, The city of the LORD, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel.
15 Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated,
So that no man went through thee,
I will make thee an eternal excellency,
A joy of many generations.
16 Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles,
And shalt suck the breast of kings:
And thou shalt know that I the LORD am thy Saviour,
And thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.
17*a* For brass I will bring gold,
And for iron I will bring silver,
And for wood brass,
And for stones iron.

[1] Or, wealth.

[a] strangers. [b] and their kings as captives. [c] cypress.
[d] plane-tree. [e] sherbin-tree.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In what follows the Prophet depicts the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the commencement of a new glorious life in it. The foreign nations that destroyed the walls of the old Jerusalem, shall build the walls of the new (ver. 10). And its gates shall stand open day and night, for they are needed no more to keep off the enemy, but only to let in foes, if any there should be, as prisoners with their spoils (ver. 11). Should there be any nations who are not attracted by the light (ver. 3), but repelled by it, they will go to destruction (ver. 12). Jerusalem will then inwardly also be magnificently adorned, as it becomes the sanctuary of Jehovah (ver. 13). Then they whose fathers formerly oppressed Jerusalem, or who themselves had despised it, must humbly do it homage, and regard it as the city of God (ver. 14). Then will Jerusalem be no more forsaken, hated, and shunned; but it will shine in everlasting glory as the joy of all coming generations (ver. 15). All nations must bring their best and most precious things as tribute, as a sign that the God of Israel alone is the Almighty God who can help (ver. 16). And as a measure to estimate the future glory of Jerusalem, the Prophet further tells us that gold and silver will come in the place of brass and iron, and brass and iron in the place of wood and stone (ver. 17 a).

2. And the sons of strangers . . . and for stones iron (vers. 10–17 a). [The expression rendered in the E. V. Sons of strangers, is literally translated, Sons of strangeness or of a foreign country, i. e., foreigners, aliens.—D. M.]. In this section, too, the Prophet still paints with the colors of the present. Foreigners shall build Jerusalem's walls. Perhaps there is here a reminiscence of the time when Israel in Egypt had to erect buildings for Pharaoh (Ex. i. 11). In the second part of ver. 10 the Prophet thinks of the terrible days when Jerusalem's walls were destroyed by foreigners. This was done not only by Nebuchadnezzar, but at least partially by others also (comp. 2 Kings xiv. 13 sq.; 1 Kings xiv. 26). Great as was the wrath which destroyed Jerusalem's walls by the hands of foreigners, so great will be the favor which causes foreigners to rebuild them stronger and more beautiful than ever. A further contrast to the former evil times will be this, that it will be no longer necessary to shut the gates of Jerusalem, for there is no longer an enemy to fear; and there is no more night, which favors the works of darkness (vers. 19, 20, and Rev. xxi. 25). On the contrary, the only concern now will be to admit the spoil taken from enemies, and their princes that are led captive. That נהוגים is here to be taken in this sense is evident from a comparison of such places as 1 Sam. xxx. 2, 20; Isa. xx. 4. [DELITZSCH explains נהוגים as applied to these kings, that they are "led as captives by the church, irresistibly bound by her, i. e., inwardly subdued (comp. xlv. 14, with Ps. cxlix. 8), and suffer themselves, as prisoners of the church and of her God, to be led into the holy city in solemn procession of honor."—D. M.] Ver. 12, חָרֵב, properly to dry up, stands regularly of cities and countries, but is also transferred to nations (xxxvii. 18; Jer. l. 21, 27). [They who consider the literal Jerusalem to be the subject of this prophecy, and not the church of God, may ask themselves if utter destruction will really be the punishment of every nation and kingdom that will not serve the Jews. But it is not they that are born after the flesh that are heirs of these promises, but they who are Christ's, and so the true seed of Abraham, the Israel of God. (Gal. iii. 28, 29; iv. 26-31.) The Gentile Christians are not doomed to bondage. In Christ's church there is one flock and one Shepherd.—D. M.] Is the building of the temple spoken of in ver. 13? The answer to this question will decide the point whether the trees mentioned in ver. 13 are to serve for the building of the sanctuary, or for ornament to the holy city. But in ver. 13 there is no mention of the temple, but only of the place of the sanctuary. [But this expression implies a sanctuary.—D. M.] Further, we learn from lxvi. 1-3 that the new Jerusalem will have neither temple, nor the service that was performed in the temple (comp. Rev. xxi. 23). [But vide contra, ver. 7, and ii. 3.—D. M.] Thirdly, it must appear strange that there is no mention of the cedars of Lebanon, which formed the chief material in the building of the old temple. [But the sherbin tree is a species of cedar growing on Lebanon.—D. M.] The trees here named are cited from xli. 19, and, as there, are here mentioned only as representatives of magnificent vegetation. HITZIG's remark, too, is of weight, that according to ver. 17, wood will be excluded as building material. I therefore hold with HITZIG, EWALD, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH, that ver. 13 is to be understood of the glorious ornamental living trees that will grace Jerusalem. The glory of Lebanon, which expression occurs besides only xxxv. 2, is probably of the same import as "the choice and best of Lebanon" (Ezek. xxxi. 16). Luxuriant vegetation, glorious trees will beautify the place where the LORD, though He has no temple of stone there, has still the place of His gracious presence, and where His feet rest (elsewhere called הֲדֹם רַגְלָיו. as which the earth, lxvi., or the sanctuary with the ark of the covenant, 1 Chron. xxviii. 7; Ps. xc. 5, et saepe, is designated). [So, notwithstanding the Lord's declaration to the contrary, Jerusalem, artificially embellished, will still be the place where men ought to worship, though it shall have no material temple (John iv. 20-24). In the dogmatical and ethical remarks on lxvi. 19 sqq., our author truly says that Isaiah teaches that "instead of the local place of worship of the old covenant, the whole earth will be the temple of the LORD." We might quote Isaiah as teaching that there will be a temple and sacrifices, too, in the glorious Jerusalem of the future. See the mention of the going up of all nations to the house of the Lord in ii. 2, 3; see, too, in verse 7 of this chapter the mention of countless sacrifices ascending the altar of God. If, notwithstanding these statements, we are justified in holding, as Dr. NAEGELSBACH does, that there will in the Holy City of God be no external temple and no animal sacrifices, we may go further, and seek a spiritual sense for the description of the future outward glory of Jerusalem contained in this chapter. How natural it is to put Zion and Jerusalem for the church of God, whose centre Jerusalem was of old, is seen from the use of Rome for the Church of Rome, whose centre is in that city! We are never to forget that the Prophet paints the future with the colors of the present, and we should avoid playing fast and loose with symbolical language.—D. M.] אֲכַבֵּד, at the end of ver. 13, designedly corresponds to its initial word כְּבוֹד. As the picture mainly sets forth the contrasts between what once was and what shall be, we are told in verse 14 that the descendants of former oppressors and mockers will come submissively to do homage to Jerusalem. (שְׁחוֹחַ is infin. nominascens, and is to be taken as accus. modalis, or adverbialis (comp. EWALD, § 279, I. 2, 6). ["The עַל before כַּפּוֹת is not simply equivalent to at, but expresses downward motion, and may be translated down to. The act described is the oriental prostration as a sign of the deepest reverence.—ALEXANDER. Comp. Rev. iii. 9.—D. M.] When these worshippers at the same time call Jerusalem the City of Jehovah, Zion of the Holy One of Israel, they make thereby a confession of faith. They declare thereby that they hold the religious faith of Israel as the true one. They acknowledge, first, that the God of Israel justly bears the name יהוה; that He is, therefore, the true God; and, secondly, that Jerusalem justly calls herself the City of Jehovah, i. e., the place where God reveals Himself and is worshipped. In צִיּוֹן ק׳ י׳ the appellative signification of צִיּוֹן (צִיּוּן, ציון cippus, monumentum) comes to view. [?] Jerusalem stands as the great, glorious monument which proclaims to the world the Godhead of Jehovah. A further contrast (ver. 15) refers to the relation of Jehovah as husband of Jerusalem. [But Jerusalem is not depicted in ver. 15 as a wife forsaken and hated and avoided by God.—D. M.]. The Prophet in spirit sees Jerusalem so forsaken and desolate that she, as a deserted city, is trodden by no one, but avoided by all. אֵין עֹבֵר. Comp. xxxiii. 8; xxxiv. 10; Jer. ix. 9, 11; Ezek. xxxiii. 28 et saepe. [Whereas thou hast been, etc., is literally "Instead of thy being," etc.-D. M.]. As the opposite of this, Jerusalem shall be an eternal glory (גְּאוֹן, in the objective sense, as ii. 10, 19, 21; iv. 2; xiii. 19; xxiii. 9 et saepe), and joy of all coming generations (comp. xxiv. 11; Ps. xlviii. 3). The relation of child and servant is before the mind of the Prophet in ver. 16. Israel has in the present been obliged to be the ill-treated, plundered servant. Foreign conquerors and tyrants have impoverished it, have sucked it out to the very blood. In opposition to this, the promise is now made that foreign kings must regard Jerusalem as a new-born, carefully nursed, beloved child. This child will now suck their breasts. This is the explanation of the apparent incongruity of Jerusalem sucking the breasts of men, and not of women. [The language used forces us to interpret the whole prophecy allegorically.—D. M.] There lies at the same time this in the image, that the kings themselves will not be ill-treated slaves, but affectionate caretakers (xlix. 23). He who causes this wonderful change is Jehovah, whom Israel will thereby know as Saviour and Redeemer by reason of His love, and as the mighty One of Jacob by reason of His power. The second part of verse 16 is almost a literal repetition from xlix. 26. In ver. 17 a the Prophet has evidently before him what (1 Kings x. 18–29) is related of Solomon. Mark especially verses 21 and 27 of the passage referred to, where it is said that silver was then nothing accounted of, that Solomon made it as stones. For brass, etc., i. e., instead of brass, etc. ["The city will be massive, built entirely of metal, so that neither the elements nor enemies can destroy it. That the Prophet does not mean to be understood literally is apparent from the allegorical progress of the Prophecy."—DELITZSCH.—D. M.]

3. THE NEW LIFE OF JERUSALEM OF WHICH BOTH THE PEOPLE AND NATURE PARTAKE. CHAPTER LX. 17 b-22.

17*b* I will also make [a]thy officers peace,
And thine exactors righteousness.
18 Violence shall no more be heard in thy land,
Wasting nor destruction within thy borders;
But thou shalt call thy walls Salvation,
And thy gates Praise.
19 The sun shall be no more thy light by day;
Neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee:
But the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting light,
And thy God thy glory.
20 Thy sun shall no more go down;
Neither shall thy moon withdraw itself:
For the LORD shall be thine everlasting light,
And the days of thy mourning shall be ended.
21 Thy people also shall be all righteous:
They shall inherit the land for ever,
The [b]branch of my planting, the work of my hands,
That I may be glorified.
22 [c]A little one shall become a thousand,
And [d]a small one a strong nation:
I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

[a] peace thy magistracy, and righteousness thy rulers.
[b] shoot.
[c] The least.
[d] The smallest.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19. Although the Masoretes separate לנגה by means of zakeph gadol from what follows, and thereby intimate that they wish לנגה to be taken in the sense: "as regards brightness," this construction seems to me needlessly difficult.

Ver. 21. The reading of the Keri מַטָּעַי is to be preferred to that of the Kethib מַטָּעוֹ or מַטָּעָו, which is probably a mistake of the copyist.

Ver. 22. The feminine suffix is here to be taken in the neuter sense (comp. lix. 8; xxii. 11; xxvii. 4).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In this section the Prophet takes a loftier flight. The higher life which he promises is above all without sin, i. e., holy. Righteousness, peace and salvation will, therefore, characterize the life of the community (vers. 17 b, 18). But even the life of nature will receive a new, higher centre of life. For it will be no more the sun that sheds upon the earth light and heat, and thereby life, but God will Himself be the Sun that shines perpetually and unchangeably (vers. 19, 20). And because the people, being born again of a divine seed, will sin no more, they will also never lose their country, but possess it to eternity (ver. 21). They will also partake of the theocratic blessing of a numerous posterity in the highest degree (ver. 22). In the two last verses [and all throughout the chapter, D. M.] we see again how the Prophet represents spiritual, heavenly things with earthly colors.

2. I will also make——gates Praise.—Vers. 17 b, 18. The Prophet, who had hitherto depicted chiefly the external glory of the future Jerusalem, now describes more its inward state. The might of sin will be broken. Its reign comes to an end. Peace and righteousness have dominion. We have to inquire whether we have to take שלום and צדקה as the object or as the predicate. But more is contained in the declaration that peace and righteousness will bear rule than in the statement that the rulers will be peaceable and just people. For the latter might be substantially true, and yet much dissension and injustice be in the land. But when peace and righteousness are not only in the rulers but are themselves the rulers (GESENIUS, UMBREIT, STIER, DELITZSCH, etc.), then everything that could disturb peace and impede justice, is excluded. We shall have to take the term peace in its most extensive and highest sense, as comprehending the harmony of man with God, with himself, and with his fellow-creatures. Under righteousness we shall have to understand that complete righteousness which consists in the conformity of human willing and doing with the divine will. Righteousness and peace are related as cause and effect. For only when our willing is conformable to the divine, can the right harmony with God prevail in us and around us. We can recall here Ps. lxxxv. 11, where for restored Israel the hope is expressed that צדק ושלום will kiss each other in their land. Peace and righteousness are here poetically personified, which is a form of expression not rare in Isaiah (comp. xxii. 18; xxxii. 16 sq.; xlv. 8; lix. 14). ["פְּקֻדָּה properly means office, magistracy, government, here put for those who exercise it, like nobility, ministry and other terms in English. נגשים, which has commonly a bad sense, is here used for magistrates or rulers in general, for the purpose of suggesting that instead of tyrants or exactors they should now be under equitable government." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. Where righteousness and peace rule, nothing more will be heard of violence and wild devastation (שׁד ושׁבר as lix. 7; li. 19). On the latter part of ver. 18 comp. the remarks on xxvi. 1, which place is related to the one before us. ["The walls of the city of God will be impregnable—Salvation itself. Her gates (unlike those, which 'lamented and mourned' iii. 26) shall be filled with jubilant anthems; shall be mere Praise." Kay in the Bible Commentary. D. M.].

3. The sun shall be——in his time.—Vers. 19–22. Now we see clearly the meaning of that call, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee." The LORD shall be not only the Sun of the life of the spirit; He shall also be the Sun of the life of nature. The light of His divine δόξα will immediately shine through it. As moon and stars grow pale before the rising sun, so will the earthly sun grow pale (comp. xxiv. 23 with Commentary and the places of like purport iv. 5; xxx. 26) before the original Fountain of all light, with whom is no variableness (James i. 17), when He rises as the sun. We need now the lights of heaven (Gen. i. 14 sqq.), because the eternal Light is still hidden from us. We live here in faith, not in sight. The Apostle John employs this trait in the picture which he draws of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23, 25; xxii. 5. נֹגַהּ, ver. 19, corresponds to the preceding אור יומם. In xiii. 10; Joel ii. 10; iv. 15 נגה is also used of the brightness by night. Although there will be still a distinction in the times of the day, there will be no more darkness. As sun and moon will be no more the lights, but the LORD, the Prophet can also say to Jerusalem, Thy sun will set no more, thy moon will not wane (אָסַף of the drawing in, the withdrawal of the rays of light, whereby the waning and temporary disappearance of the moon are caused, comp. xvi. 10; Joel ii. 10; iv. 15). When this alternation of light and darkness in the life of nature is past, history will consist no more of days of joy and days of mourning. The days of mourning are entirely past (שָׁלֵם as 1 Kings vii. 51; ימי אבל comp. Gen. xxvii. 41; Deut. xxxiv. 8). The mourning-days of Israel consisted in this, that the people as a punishment for their sins were given into the hands of their enemies, and had their land taken from them. But when the people, through the unrestricted influence on their life of the new sun that has risen upon them, have become entirely holy and righteous, such judgments will never more be spoken of. They will possess their land for ever, like a garden of God, which contains no weeds to be rooted up, but only holy plants. [Some interpreters take ארץ in the sense of earth. xlix. 8 favors this wider sense of ארץ. Here as in xi. 1 נֵצֶר denotes a shoot rather than a branch. Observe, too, that מַטָּעַי is in the plural (Keri)—my plantings = "my creative acts of grace" (DELITZSCH). D. M.]. The work of my hands is an expression occurring xix. 25, where it is applied to the people of Assyria, when they shall be hereafter converted. Israel will therefore, as Assyria, be a people whose life is wrought by God, and will therefore conduce to the praise of God (lxi. 3). ["The dependence of God's people on Himself for the origin and sustentation of their spiritual life is forcibly expressed by the figure of a plant which He has planted, and by that of a work which He has wrought. Eph. ii. 10." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. Then too will that benedictio vere theocratica of a numerous progeny guaranteeing everlasting continuance be realized in the richest measure. The least one (the adjective with the article in the sense of the superlative), i. e., the one that is physically most insignificant, the weakest shall become a thousand, and the smallest one (the same in sense as קָטֹן) a strong people (comp. Micah iv. 7). We see in vers. 21, 22, how the Prophet again paints the future with the colors of the present. In this Old Testament shell we can discern the New Testament kernel of the κληρονομία αἰώνιος (Heb. ix. 15), and of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος (John iii. 15, 36 et saepe). The Prophet has foretold in this chapter great, wonderful, incredible things. [The LORD, therefore, at the close, solemnly guarantees their fulfilment. The last words form the seal of the prophecy. "His time" is="its time," not the time of the LORD. "Its time" is the time which the LORD has appointed, and which is known only to Him. When that time has arrived, He will hastily accomplish what has been foretold (xlvi. 11; xliii. 13: ix. 6).—D. M.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. [BARNES in his Notes quotes Pope's Messiah in which "some of the ideas in this chapter, descriptive of the glorious times of the Gospel, have been beautifully versified." COWPER in the last book of The Task delightfully expatiates on the same "fair theme." Justly does he exclaim regarding this prophetic picture:

> "O scenes surpassing fable, and yet true,
> Scenes of accomplished bliss! which who can see,
> Though but in distant prospect, and not feel
> His soul refresh'd with foretaste of the joy?"—D. M.]

2. On lx. 1. "Surge! Illuminare! sunt imperativi evangelici, quibus includitur atque promittitur auxilium divinum praesens ad obsequendum." SEB. SCHMID. "He whose dicere is facere speaks these words, He who with the word ταλιθὰ κοῦμι and Νεανίσκε, σοὶ λέγω, ἐγέρθητι (Mark v. 41; Luke vii. 14), raised up the dead girl, the deceased young man." LEIGH.

3. "The gracious light of Jehovah, which radiates gloriously in the manifestation of the Redeemer, fills, too, with the light of God the people among whom it shines. What once happened only to Moses upon the mount, when his face shone with heavenly splendor from his converse with the LORD, will now be imparted to the entire sanctified race." AXENFELD.

4. On lx. 1 sqq. The fulfilment of this prophecy takes place by successive stages. In the first place, it is manifest that the city of God here spoken of cannot be the earthly Jerusalem, which was doomed to destruction. But the prophecy has for its object the ἄνω Ἱερουσαλήμ, the Free, which is the mother of us all (Gal. iv. 26), which is elsewhere called the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22), or the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 2). The LORD and living centre of this heavenly Jerusalem appeared, indeed, in the earthly city, and made it the point whence the light emanated to enlighten the Gentiles. For in Jerusalem the Lord had to die (Luke xiii. 33) and to rise again; and from Jerusalem the preaching of repentance and forgiveness of sins in His name must begin (Luke xxiv. 47). But after the destruction of the earthly Jerusalem, and during the time of the Gentiles, when the holy place is trodden down (Rev. xi. 2), there is no other Jerusalem on earth than the church of the Lord, a poor and only provisional form of His kingdom, which, for the period between the first and second act of the judgment of the world (Matt. xxiv. 29), i. e. between the destruction of Jerusalem and the second coming of the Lord to effect the first resurrection (Rev. xx. 4 sqq.), has for its task in conflict with opposing forces, the calling, gathering and enlightening of the elect from all nations. But when the Lord shall have come again in visible glory, and shall have accomplished the first resurrection and the second act of the judgment of the world, then will those who are called hereto reign with Him a thousand years. During this time there will, according to Rev. xx. 9, be a holy city on earth which is called "the beloved city." . . . But when the third act of the judgment of the world, the second resurrection, and the general judgment shall be completed (Rev. xx. 11–15), then will the earth, with the heavenly bodies comprised in the system of which it forms a part, have become new (Rev. xxi. 1). Then will the holy city, the new Jerusalem (ibid ver. 2), the prototype, descend upon the earth, and then will our prophecy obtain its complete fulfilment (Rev. xxi. 10 sqq.).—[If the church of the LORD is now, as our author holds, the only Jerusalem on earth; if it can now truly be said to stand for the Jerusalem of prophecy, it may pari ratione, as a "glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing," represent Jerusalem in the future more glorious condition in which it is to appear according to prophecy. The church of the LORD as the heavenly Jerusalem will never be superseded by a material city. We Christians are come unto Mount Zion and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22). There is just as much reason to hold that there must now, in order to the fulfilment of prophecy, be a literal Jerusalem, the centre of attraction to God's chosen people, as that there must be such a city in any future period. Our author in the foregoing remarks disparages unduly the present dispensation. The church of the LORD is now more than a poor and provisional form of His kingdom. See 2 Cor. iii.; Luke vii. 28; x. 23, 24.—D. M.]

5. On lx. 10–16. Poor and unpretending as is the appearance of the church, like that of her Master when He was in the form of a Servant, yet is she constantly herein displaying her majesty that kings and nations must, when it is needful, serve her, whether willingly or reluctantly. The Roman emperors, after having for three centuries endeavored by every means to extirpate the church, must at last submit to her. But when people would not let the church advance, when they would injure her, or deprive her of her necessary freedom and independence, and make her serviceable to worldly aims, then they have inflicted the greatest harm on themselves. This is seen in the example of the Oriental church [and not in her alone] which, after she was made a dead state-church, could no longer resist the onset of Islam. This is seen in modern times in many a State, in which unnatural fetters are laid upon the church, whereby her credit, reputation and efficiency are undermined to the great detriment of the people and of the State.

6. On lx. 12. "The Roman pontiffs abuse this oracle of the Prophet to establish their tyranny over monarchs. In particular, it is recorded of Pius IV., that at the time of his election he caused a coin to be struck, on one side of which was his own image adorned with a triple crown, and on the other, these words of the Prophet were inscribed." FOERSTER. ["The idea of ver. 12 is, that no nation can flourish and long continue that does not obey the law of God, or where the true religion does not prevail, and the worship of the true God is not maintained. History is full of affecting illustrations of this. The ancient republics and kingdoms fell because they had not the true religion. The kingdoms of Babylon, Assyria, Macedonia and Egypt; the Roman empire, and all the ancient monarchies and republics, soon fell to ruin because they had not the salutary restraints of the true religion, and because they lacked the protection of the true God. France cast off the government of God in the first Revolution, and was drenched in blood. It is a maxim of universal truth that the nation, which does not admit the influence of the laws and the government of God, must be destroyed. No empire is strong enough to wage successful war with the great Jehovah; and sooner or later, notwithstanding all that human policy can do, corruption, sensuality, luxury, pride and far-spreading vice will expose a nation to the displeasure of God, and bring down the heavy arm of His vengeance." BARNES. D. M.].

7. On the whole chapter. "We have, as the church of believers, the first-fruits of this prophecy. But only in the holy people that has its centre in the new Jerusalem of the end [rather that forms the church of the future], shall we behold God's work, His manifestation and its effect on the nations in all its fulness. Let us rejoice over the first-fruits, and regard them as a pledge of the complete fulfilment of the word of the Prophet." WEBER.

8. On the whole chapter. ["Surely the strain of this evangelic prophecy rises higher than any temporal deliverance. Therefore we must rise to some more spiritual sense of it, not excluding the former. And that which some call divers senses of the same Scripture, is, indeed, but divers parts of one full sense. This Prophecy is, out of question, a most rich description of the kingdom of Christ under the Gospel. And in this sense, this invitation to arise and shine is mainly addressed to the mystical Jerusalem (comp. Eph. v. 14), yet not without some privilege to the literal Jerusalem beyond other people. They are first invited to arise and shine, because the sun arose first in their horizon. Christ came of the Jews, and came first to them. The Redeemer shall come to Zion, says our Prophet in the former chapter. But miserable Jerusalem knew not the day of her visitation, nor the things that concerned her peace, and therefore are they now hid from her eyes. She delighted to deceive herself with fancies of I know not what imaginary grandeur and outward glory, to which the promised Messiah should exalt her, and did, in that kind particularly, abuse this very prophecy; so doting upon a sense grossly literal, she forfeited the enjoyment of those spiritual blessings that are described." Archbp. LEIGHTON, who has two sermons (iv. and v.) on Isa. lx. 1. D. M.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lx. 1-6. "In Christ's appearing in our world there is a twofold call directed to us: 1) Arise; shine! 2) Lift up thine eyes to the Gentiles." FR. E. BAUER. "What a blessing the spread of the revealed word will bring to the heathen in respect to individuals, to families, to nations." TAUBE. "Zion, the great mother of nations in the midst of her children. 1) With her abundant maternal joys; 2) with her weighty maternal cares; 3) with her holy maternal duties." GEROK. "What should move us willingly and joyfully to obey the call addressed to the Christian church, 'Arise; shine?' 1) There are millions still in darkness; 2) that so blessed a light has arisen on us; 3) that God has promised that our efforts for those benighted millions shall not be in vain." WALTHER of St. Louis. [It is through the church that God operates on a dark and sinful world. The church, in order to fulfil her calling to be a light to the Gentiles, must herself shine in the glory of the Lord. "We will go with you; for we have heard that God is with you" (Zech. viii. 23),—this will hereafter be the language of them that are without to the people of God. The efficiency of the church depends on her holiness and spiritual prosperity. God blesses us to make us a blessing (Gen. xii. 2). See this thought set forth in the lxvii. Psalm.

"Heaven does with us as we with torches do;
Not light them for themselves."

—D. M.].

2. On lx. 1. ["What is the shining of the true church? Doth not a church then shine when church service is raised from a decent and primitive simplicity, and decorated with pompous ceremonies, with rich furniture and gaudy vestments? Is not the church then beautiful? Yes, indeed; but all the question is, whether this be the proper, genuine beauty or not; whether this be not strange fire, as the fire that Aaron's sons used, which became vain, and was taken as strange fire. Methinks it cannot be better decided than to refer it to St. John, in his book of the Revelation. We find there the description of two several women, the one riding in state, arrayed in purple, decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearl, chap. xvii.; the other, chap. xii., in rich attire too, but of another kind, clothed with the sun, and a crown of twelve stars on her head. The other's decorament was all earthly; this woman's is all celestial. What need has she to borrow light and beauty from precious stones, who is clothed with the sun, and crowned with stars? She wears no sublunary ornaments, but which is more noble, she treads upon them; the moon is under her feet. Now, if you know (as you do all, without doubt) which of these two is the spouse of Christ, you can easily resolve the question. The truth is, those things seem to deck religion, but they undo it. Observe where they are most used, and we shall find little or no substance of devotion under them; as we see in that apostate church of Rome. This painting is dishonorable for Christ's spouse, and, besides, it spoils her natural complexion. The superstitious use of torches and lights in the church by day is a kind of shining, but surely not that which is commanded here. No; it is an affront done both to the sun in the heaven and to the Sun of righteousness in the church." Abp. LEIGHTON.—D. M.]

3. On lx. 10-12. Since the kingdom of David was established on Mount Zion, and the LORD solemnly confirmed this choice (Ps. ii. 6), there is always, yea, there will be to eternity a holy Zion, or Jerusalem, as centre of the kingdom of God. But the LORD leads His Zion by strange ways. It passes through sin and death to sanctification and life. Let us consider the term Zion according to its earthly history. We distinguish a double form. We see the Old Testament Zion fall on account of its sins. The LORD smites it in His wrath. But it rises not in a material, but in a spiritual form, as the Christian church which serves God in spirit and in truth (John iv. 20 sqq.), and comprehends all nations. This Zion builds itself from the Gentiles. Strangers build its walls (ver. 10). The gates of these walls are not shut for all who are not circumcised in the flesh. But these gates are open day and night for all who are willing to receive the grace of God in Christ and to serve Him (ver. 11). The nations, who serve God in Christ, will be greatly blessed even in respect to earthly greatness and prosperity. For the spirit of Christianity will permeate with its quickening influence all natural factors. But where Christianity is not received, or where it is suffered to die out, there moral corruption and decay are the necessary result (ver. 12).

4. On lx. 10. "God's love is not extinguished because His wrath burns. Has the fire of His anger produced its effect, then the Sun of His grace rises again; for, says the Lord, 'I kill, and I make alive; I wound and I heal (Deut. xxxii. 39); in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor have I had mercy on thee.'"—Thol.

5. On lx. 17 b, 18, 21. "Above the voice, which tells us what we ought to be and are not, there sounds another in every human heart which gives a ray of hope that our iniquities shall not separate us from our God, and that we shall one day be what we ought to be. This foreboding voice of longing expectation, which, although weak and confused, sounds through the generations of men, has found in the Old Covenant its fulfilment. There clear, unmistakable voices speak of the time when 'a fountain shall be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness' (Zech. xiii. 1); of a time when it shall be said of the city of God on earth: 'Thy people shall be all righteous, and shall inherit the earth forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands that I may be glorified.'"—Tholuck.

6. On lx. 18–22. It is a great comfort in the present time when darkness covers the earth and thick darkness the people, to know that it will not always remain so. We are now only in an intermediate state. A time of light will come when God alone will be Sun, and that 1) for the intellectual and spiritual life of men (vers. 18, 21); 2) for the life of nature.

III.—THE THIRD DISCOURSE.

The Personal Centre of the Revelation of Salvation.

Chapters LXI., LXII. and LXIII. 1–6.

Great works are never accomplished without great men. After reading chapter lx., one involuntarily asks himself: Who will be the instrument in God's hand of performing this great work? This question is answered by the Prophet in the three chapters, LXI.–LXIII., in which he speaks of Him who will bring complete salvation to Israel, but will judge the heathen. Most modern interpreters (with the exception of Stier, Hengstenberg, Delitzsch, Rohling) are of opinion that the Prophet here speaks of himself. I approve in general of the reasons adduced by Delitzsch in favor of the view that the Saviour of Israel is the subject of the prophecy.—[Delitzsch alleges the following grounds in support of his view: 1) Nowhere has the Prophet hitherto spoken of himself as such in detail; rather he has, with the exception of the close of lvii. 21 (saith my God), purposely kept his own person in the background. 2) On the other hand, where another than Jehovah has spoken of the work to which he was called, and of what he had experienced in the fulfilment of his calling, xlix. 1 sqq.; l. 4 sqq., that person was the very Servant of Jehovah, of whom and to whom Jehovah speaks, xlii. 1 sqq.; lii. 13–liii., not the Prophet, but He who is destined to be the Mediator of a new covenant, to be a light to the Gentiles, and the Salvation of Jehovah for the whole world, and who by self-humiliation unto death ascends to this full glory of His calling. 3) Everything that the Prophet here says of himself is found in the picture of that Servant of Jehovah, who stands alone and unapproachable, highly exalted above the Prophet; He is endowed with the Spirit of Jehovah, xlii. 1; Jehovah has sent Him and with Him His Spirit, xlviii. 16 b; He has the tongue of the learned, to help the weary with words, l. 4; He spares and delivers those who are almost despairing and destroyed, the bruised reed and the dimly burning wick, in order, xlii. 7, "to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house,"—this is what above all He has in word and deed to do to His people, xlii. 7; xlix. 9. 4) After the Prophet has once so dramatically set forth the Servant of Jehovah of whom he prophesies, and has made Him appear as the speaker in xlix. 1 sqq.; l. 4 sqq. (and also xlviii. 16 b), we cannot suppose that he will now put himself in the foreground, and ascribe to himself such official attributes as he has made to be characteristic features of that unique Personage predicted by him."—D. M.]—To the reasons mentioned by Delitzsch, I add what Hengstenberg and Rohling have called attention to, that much which the speaker here says of himself is far too great to be ascribed to a mere man. The Prophet can indeed announce, but he cannot himself effect and bestow what he has announced. And if chapter lxiii., as cannot be denied, stands in closest connection with chaps. lxi. and lxii., is He, we ask, who there performs the negative side of the work of salvation, the Prophet? Does not the Prophet most clearly distinguish himself from Him, as the questioner from the person interrogated?

A.—THE POSITIVE SIDE OF THE REVELATION OF SALVATION.

CHAPTERS LXI. AND LXII.

1. A distant view of him who, as Prophet, King and Priest is the founder of Salvation.

CHAPTER LXI. 1-11.

1 THE Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me;
Because the LORD hath anointed me
To preach good tidings unto the meek;
He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted,
To proclaim liberty to the captives,
And [a]the opening of the prison to them that are bound;
2 To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD,
And the day of vengeance of our God;
To comfort all that mourn;
3 To [b]appoint unto them that mourn in Zion,
To give unto them beauty for ashes,
The oil of joy for mourning,
The garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;
That they might be called [c]trees of righteousness,
The planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified.
4 And they shall build the old wastes,
They shall raise up the former desolations,
And they shall repair the waste cities,
The desolations of many generations.
5 And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks,
And the [d]sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.
6 But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD:
Men shall call you the ministers of our God:
Ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles,
And in their glory shall ye [e]boast yourselves.
7 For your shame ye shall have double;
And for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion:
Therefore in their land they shall possess the double:
Everlasting joy shall be unto them.
8 For I the LORD love judgment,
I hate [f]robbery for burnt offering;
And I will [g]direct their work in truth,
And I will make an everlasting covenant with them.
9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles,
And their offspring among the people:
All that see them shall acknowledge them,
That they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.
10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD,
My soul shall be joyful in my God;
For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation,
He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness,
As a bridegroom [1]decketh himself with ornaments,
And as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.
11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud,
And as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth;
So the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise
To spring forth before all the nations.

[1] Heb. decketh as a priest.

[a] opening of the eyes. [b] put on. [c] terebinths. [d] aliens.
[e] enter, substitute yourselves. [f] robbery by iniquity. [g] give their reward.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. The expression פְּקַח־קוֹחַ is to be written as one word without Maqqeph; for there is in Hebrew no word קוֹחַ (on the form see Ewald, § 157, c). As פָּקַח is employed only of the opening of the eyes and ears, the LXX. in rendering τυφλοῖς ἀνάβλεψιν are in part right, inasmuch as even prisoners who sit in darkness and the shadow of death are brought by deliverance from prison to see again the light. However the Septuagint is wrong in taking the expression to mean healing of the blind.

Ver. 6. The ἅπ. λεγ. תִּתְיַמָּרוּ is either from מוּר—יָמַר (of which there is besides only the Hiphil הֵימִיר permutavit Jer. ii. 11), or from אָמַר—יָמַר (from which is the Hithpael הִתְאַמֵּר Ps. xciv. 4, extulit se). The former derivation seems to be the more appropriate, because הִתְאַמֵּר, Ps. xciv. 4, is evidently used in a bad sense.

Ver. 10. יַעְטָנִי (on account of the pause יְעָטַנִי) is, if correctly pointed, to be derived from יָעַט, which occurs only here, but is identical with עָטָה. תַּעְדֶּה is Kal as Hos. ii. 15; Jer. iv. 30; xxxi. 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The middle triad (chaps. lxi., lxii. and lxiii.) of the third Ennead (an aggregate consisting of nine) sets Him again before our eyes by whom the great salvation promised in chap. lx. is to be accomplished. Much of what the Prophet sees done by this great Personage whose name is withheld, bears a prophetic character, such as the bringing of glad tidings and comforting (ver. 1). But the setting free of the prisoners (ibid.), the proclaiming of the time of grace and of vengeance (ver. 2), and the real communication of ornament and joy for ashes and mourning (ver. 3), seem to indicate kingly might. Of like significance is the new order of things spoken of in vers. 4–7. In vers. 8, 9 Jehovah ratifies the work of His Servant by declaring of it, that it is conformable to justice, and that He intends to make an everlasting covenant with Israel, by which the Israelites shall be known by all nations as the people blessed by Him. Finally, He, who had spoken from vers. 1–7, speaks again. He rejoices that He is clothed with the garments of salvation, which make Him appear as priestly bridegroom in wonderful union with His bride, to whom His righteousness and glory are by a vital and organic relation communicated (vers. 10, 11). It almost seems as if the Prophet lets us have a glimpse of the three offices which have their common root in the unction of the Spirit.

2. The Spirit of the Lord GOD——shall be unto them.—Vers. 1–7. With the words, The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah is upon me, the Subject of the prophecy attributes to Himself what Jehovah xlii. 1 declared of His Servant, and what had been already, xi. 2, declared of the root of Jesse. [Three times in Isaiah is Messiah described as endued with the Spirit of the Lord. First the Prophet affirms this of Him, xi. 2, "the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him." Next, xlii. 1, Jehovah Himself declares of the Messiah: "I have put My Spirit upon Him." Here, lastly, One, whose appointed work marks Him as the Messiah, declares: "The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah is upon Me." Does not this parallelism speak in favor of the identity of person in all three passages? It serves, too, to mark the unity of the whole book. D. M.]. The speaker affirms that He has the Spirit of Jehovah, that all He speaks and does may be known to be wrought by God. The Spirit of the Lord is upon Him because (יַעַן comp. xxx. 12; lxv. 12; lxvi. 4) Jehovah has anointed Him. ["מָשַׁח אֹתִי is more emphatic than מְשָׁחַנִי. In the choice of the word מָשַׁח we may find an intimation that the Servant of Jehovah and the Messiah are one person." Delitzsch. "Anointing, whether it occurs as an outwardly performed symbolical action, or as a mere figure, is always used to designate the gifts of the Holy Ghost, comp. 1 Sam. x. 1; xvi. 13, 14; Dan. ix. 24. As the anointing is identical with the imparting of the Spirit, we cannot isolate the words: because the Lord has anointed me, but must closely connect them with all that follows. He has endued Me with His Spirit to preach good tidings, etc. Hengstenberg.—D. M.] בִּשֵּׂר occurs only in the second part of the book, and is rendered everywhere, with the exception of xli. 27, in the Septuagint by εὐαγγελίζω. It is here, as frequently, connected with the accusative of the person. עֲנָוִים is found further in Isaiah xi. 4; xxix. 19. ["עָנָו as עָנִי from עָנָה, to bow down; the latter is one bowed down through adversity, the former one inwardly bowed down, emptied of all self-confidence." Delitzsch. "עָנִי and עָנָו are never confounded. In this world of sin the meek are at the same time the suffering; and that especially here the meek are at the same time to be regarded as suffering, is shown by the glad tidings which stand in contrast to their misery. The עֲנָוִים, in opposition to the wicked, appear as the people of the Messiah in xi. 4 also." Hengstenberg.—D. M.]. The binding up of the broken-hearted can be conceived as wrought by words of consolation. [But comp. Ps. cxlvii. 3 where this work is ascribed to Jehovah as His own; and Vitringa truly remarks that the speaker here appears non praeco tantum, sed et dispensator of the rich blessings that are mentioned.—D. M.]. On the year of liberty comp. Lev. xxiii. 8 sqq. ["The proclaiming of perfect liberty to the bounden, and the year of acceptance with Jehovah, is a manifest allusion to the proclaiming of the year of Jubilee by sound of trumpet. This was a year of general release of debts and obligations, of bond men and women, of lands and possessions, which had been sold from the families and tribes to which they belonged. Our Saviour, by applying this text to Himself, Luke iv. 18, 19, a text so manifestly relating to the institution above-mentioned, plainly declares the typical design of that institution." LOWTH. "The Servant of God proclaims nothing which He does not at the same time bestow, as ver. 3 clearly shows." HENGSTENBERG —D. M.]. The expressions, captives and bound point to, first of all, Israel's deliverance from the Exile. For the Israelites in exile were indeed prisoners of war and captives. [But they were freed from the Babylonish exile before the mission of the Messiah. How then could He be sent to them?—D. M.]. The Prophet here comprehends in his view the whole time of salvation beginning with the liberation from exile. In all that the Prophet here says of the healing of the sick, of the freeing of prisoners, of the rejoicing of the sorrowful, or the honoring of the despised (ver. 7), and of the rebuilding of what was laid waste, he has evidently in his mind the getting rid of the misery of the old time, and the commencement of the new, glorious era. To this commencement he reckons also the time of the establishment of a new covenant (ver. 8). It is hard to say where he sees the boundary which marks the beginning of this time. It may not have been clearly perceived by him (1 Pet. i. 11). Yet comp. on lxii. 2. The expression שְׁנַת־רָצוֹן is not an official term, but a rhetorical variation for דּוֹר, and is intended to designate a time of glory and blessing such as that of the Messiah will be. It will have in its train a day of vengeance, one day of judgment, for wrath is short (comp. Ps. xxx. 6; Isa. x. 25; liv. 8, etc.), grace long. In xxxiv. 8; lxiii. 4 we have the same kind of representation; for "the year of recompenses or redemption" [my redeemed] is just the long time of grace granted to Israel. Chaps. lxi. and lxii. correspond to the year of grace, chap. lxiii. to the day of vengeance. In regard to the expression נָקָם see remarks on xxxiv. 8. [It is manifestly with allusion to the year of jubilee that the time of grace here predicted is called an acceptable year of the LORD, i. e., a year of favor or of grace. This allusion explains the employment here of the definite time year. The time of grace is elsewhere spoken of as a day: "In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee," comp. 2 Cor. vi. 2. The New Testament speaks, too, of the day of redemption and of days of vengeance, Luke xxi. 22; Eph. iv. 30. The time of wrath towards the church is a comparatively short time, and is frequently contrasted with God's everlasting mercy to her. But the day of vengeance here predicted has respect to obdurate enemies of the LORD, and on them God's wrath abideth, John iii. 36.—D. M.]. In Luke iv. 16 sqq. it is related that Jesus Christ read the commencement of this chapter in the synagogue of Nazareth, and declared Himself as the person by whom this prophecy is fulfilled. We see from this that He did not apply it merely to the deliverance from the Exile, and that He regarded it as a genuine prophecy given by God, and not as the work of a deceiver. ["Our Lord ended His reading in the synagogue at 'the acceptable year of the LORD' (Luke iv. 19); but at the close of His ministry (Luke xxi. 22) He spoke of the 'days of vengeance.'" KAY.—D. M.] They who mourn are Zion's mourners, ver. 3, and on them shall be put on, or to them shall be given (the Prophet substitutes the word תֵּת for שׂוּם because this word is applicable only to clothes) the head-ornament [E. V. beauty] for ashes. פְּאֵר is the name of the female turban (iii. 20) and of the priest's cap, Ex. xxxix. 28; Ezek. xliv. 18. Note the paronomasia here. Putting ashes on the head was a sign of mourning, 2 Sam. xiii. 19. The expression שֶׁמֶן שָׂשׂוֹן is found besides only in Ps. xlv. 5, in that Psalm which typically represents a King of Israel as a bridegroom, and which has manifold points of contact with our chapter. There shall be the oil of joy given instead of mourning, and a magnificent robe, as symbol of exaltation, instead of a heavy, oppressed spirit. [Dr. NAEGELSBACH takes תְּהִלָּה in the sense of glory, honor, in which view he follows DELITZSCH. ALEXANDER considers a garment of praise to be a garment which excites praise or admiration. But HENGSTENBERG best explains the meaning of these mourners having a garment of praise put on them as denoting that "they shall be clothed with praise, the praise of a divine goodness which has been manifested to them." Comp. Ps. cix. 18, He clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment.—D. M.] מַעֲטֵה, amictus, is found only here. The same remark applies to רוּחַ כֵּהָה (comp. xlii. 3). The Prophet proceeds now to speak of those who are blessed by Him whose work had been described. They shall be called, what they really are, Terebinths of righteousness. What this name signifies, the Prophet immediately explains in words repeated from lx. 21. ["The gifts of God, although described by material figures, are spiritual, inwardly efficacious, renewing and sanctifying the inner man, sap and strength and marrow and motive power of a new life. The church becomes thereby Terebinths of righteousness, i. e., possessors of a righteousness wrought by God, approved by God, in such force, constancy and fulness as Terebinths with their strong stems, their luxuriant verdure, their perennial [?] foliage—a planting of Jehovah to the end that He may get honor thereby." DELITZSCH. D. M.]. We see from ver. 4 that the Prophet is thinking of exiles who have returned to their own country. But here again he sees everything together which will in the future prove to be a return from exile; for he cannot possibly have before his mind only the return under Zerubbabel and Ezra, as this poor beginning in no way corresponds to the grandeur of the picture here drawn. Having reached their home the exiles will build again the places that have lain waste for an incalculably long time, and restore the ruins of the habitations built by their ancestors. Comp. lviii. 12 and xliv. 26. They will be assisted in this work by foreigners as their servants. For these will feed their flocks, and be their husbandmen and vinedressers, while they themselves shall be called Priests of Jehovah, ministers of our God. As a privileged, ruling caste they shall live on the wealth of the heathen, and in regard to honor and glory shall come into their place (תִּתְיַמָּרוּ). Israel appears here as the priestly nobility (comp. Ex. xix. 6), and the Gentiles as the misera contribuens plebs, that has to perform the hard work. When the Prophet, lxvi. 21, says of the Gentiles that Priests and Levites shall be taken from them also, he rises above his Old Testament stand-point, and speaks purely and entirely as the Evangelist of the Old Covenant. [The future conversion of Israel, instead of reducing the Gentiles to the condition of menials, will conduce exceedingly to their riches, Rom. xi. 12. Believing Gentiles can never be considered and treated as 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise,' Eph. ii. 12. On the contrary, they are 'fellow heirs and of the same body,' Eph. iii. 6. The Prophet is speaking here not of Israel after the flesh, but of the Israel of God (Gal. vi. 16), and does not contradict what he elsewhere states in regard to the equal privileges of converted Gentiles, xix. 24, 25; lxvi. 21 sqq. Even in connection with the new heavens and the new earth our Prophet speaks of the people of Jerusalem themselves planting vineyards and eating their fruit, lxv. 17–23, and so not confining themselves to the exercise of priestly functions. Literally understood, these places are mutually exclusive and contradictory. They must be taken figuratively. BARNES extracts the kernel from the shell in saying: "The whole idea is, that it would be a time of signal prosperity, a time when foreigners would embrace the true religion; and when the accession would be as great and important as if they were to come in among a people, and take the whole labor of attending their flocks and cultivating their fields." I append ABARBANEL's comment on vers. 5, 6. "He (the Prophet) mentions also that the LORD anointed him to announce to the Israelites that the nations shall be subjected unto them so that foreigners will stand and feed their flock, and aliens will cultivate their fields and vineyards, so that the children of Israel shall not be employed in any coarse work, but shall serve the glorious God with their law and prayer alone. Therefore he says: Ye shall be called Priests of the Lord, as if he would say, ye shall not feed flock, nor till the ground, but shall serve the Most High and be Priests of God and servants of the Most High, and so this will be your name. And that ye may have time for the service of the blessed God, ye shall eat the wealth of the Gentiles." D. M.]. Ver. 7 מִשְׁנֶה is plainly duplum, double. I do not think that we can understand this of twofold in land. This interpretation puts into the text something not contained in it. The direct antithesis of shame is honor. משנה can therefore mean nothing else than double compensation in honor for the lost honor, which is explained when Israel enters into the glory of the Gentiles. We have to supply תַּחַת before כְּלִמָּה as in many other cases. [We have here an enallage of persons, the second giving place to the third. DR. NAEGELSBACH renders: On their inheritance they shall sing for joy. But he admits that חֶלְקָם can be the accusative of the object as in Ps. li. 18, which is evidently the construction adopted by the translators of the E. V. D. M.]. Israel's land is not become larger, nor is the separate inheritance of individuals. But there are added to their own honor and to their own possession the wealth and honor of the heathen. Therefore the inheritance of each Israelite has become double, and therefore they shall have everlasting joy. If we consider what has been mentioned from ver. 3 b as the fruit of the agency of Him who speaks, we must say that the Israelites shall be called Terebinths of righteousness as a fruit of prophetic work. [He who produces trees of righteousness is more than a prophet.] But that they can build again their cities, make the heathen to be their servants, and live in prosperity and honor, has been brought about by their King.

3. For I the Lord——hath blessed.—Vers. 8, 9. These two verses confirm what the Accomplisher of the divine will set in prospect before the people of Israel from vers. 1–7. Jehovah Himself now speaks in order to sanction the word of His Anointed. Was such a sanction necessary, or does the person of Him who designated Himself, ver. 1, as the Anointed of Jehovah, pass over into the person of Jehovah Himself? I do not venture to decide. The latter would not be impossible. Comp. the remarks on ix. 5. Injustice and iniquitous robbery (עֹלָה=עַוְלָה lix. 3, here as Job v. 16; Ps. lviii. 3; lxiv. 7 with quiescent waw comp. Ps. xcii. 16), such as was perpetrated on Israel, challenges the justice of God. He makes good, then, for the past the injury which Israel suffered, while he renders to Israel uprightly and fairly (באמת comp. x. 20; xvi. 5; xxxviii. 3; xlviii. 1) the merited פְּעֻלָּה, i. e., labore partum, reward, indemnification, (Comp. xl. 10; xlix. 4; lxii. 11; lxv. 7), [Translate not: I will direct their work, E. V., but I will give their reward in truth], and makes for the future an everlasting covenant with them, which shall guarantee to them protection against such evil. I will make an everlasting covenant with them. Comp. Jer. xxxii. 40, where also the expressions נְטַעְתִּים, ver. 44 (comp. Isa. lxi. 3), and באמת are reminiscences from our place. The ninth verse speaks of one glorious result of that everlasting covenant: It unfolds its effects in such fulness and intensity, that a character (character indelebilis) is imprinted upon the Israelites which distinguishes them from all nations. They will bear the opposite of the mark of Cain, the sign of blessing on their forehead; כִּי הֵם וגו׳ is not causal, but states the object of יכירום (the subject of the dependent sentence is attracted by the governing verb, comp. iii. 10). "All that see them will know them that they are," etc., is for "all that see them will know that they are," etc. This everlasting covenant cannot possibly be any other than the "new covenant," spoken of in Jer. xxxi. 31 sqq. (comp. Heb. viii. 8, 13). We see, hence, that the Prophet has here in his eye the time following that of the old covenant, the time of the new covenant. ["The true application of this verse is to the Israel of God in its diffusion among all the nations of the earth, who shall be constrained by what they see of their spirit, character, and conduct, to acknowledge that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed. The glorious fulfilment of this promise in its original and proper sense, may be seen already in the influence exerted by the eloquent example of the missionary on the most ignorant and corrupted heathen, without waiting for the future restoration of the Jews to the land of their fathers."—ALEXANDER.—D. M.]

4. I will greatly rejoice——before all the nations. Vers. 10 and 11. The speaker here is the Servant of Jehovah; for who else could be compared at the same time with the priestly Bridegroom and with the bride? He expresses his holy joy in God, because Jehovah has clothed Him with garments of salvation, and covered Him with the robe of righteousness (comp. lix. 17). Garments of salvation are not such as signify salvation received, but such as cause salvation, for the Servant of Jehovah is the bringer of salvation, not the receiver of it, Redeemer, not redeemed. [Yet נוֹשָׁע is predicated of Him, Zech. ix. 9.—D. M.] How the garments of the Redeemer cause salvation, is shown by the צְדָקָה which follows the יֶשַׁע. The Redeemer covers those who are redeemed by Him with His garment. Because His garment is pure and holy and unexceptionable before God, all who present themselves before God in this garment appear righteous, and so are redeemed. Or is it, perhaps, more correct and more accordant with what follows (ver. 11) to say that the Lord's garment, as a living power, germinates and multiplies itself [?], and that, therefore, the wedding garment spoken of in Matth. xxii. 11 sqq., and the white robes of Rev. iii. 4, 5; iv. 4; vi. 11; vii. 9, 13, are, as it were, shoots from the living garment of the Saviour? The מְעִיל is not the outer garment, the שִׂמְלָה, but a tunica superior, "an over undergarment, or under overgarment" (LEYRER in HERZOG, R. Enc. vii., p 725), which was worn only by distinguished persons, such as kings and princes, and by the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 31 sqq.; Lev. viii. 7). Comp. the nearer description in JOSEPHUS Antiqq. III. 7, 4. In the second part of the verse some interpreters (HITZIG, HAHN), after the LXX. and Vulg., would take כִּהֵן simply in the sense of כּוֹנֵן or הֵכִין. But כִּהֵן nowhere has this meaning; and the expressions מְעִיל and פְּאֵר seem to indicate priestly ornament. פְּאֵר is not in itself the priestly covering of the head. But in two places it is brought into connection with the priestly head-ornament; Ex. xxxix. 28, and Ezek. xliv. 18. כִּהֵן is not =to act priestly, i. e., gloriously, with pomp, in the tropical sense; but it is "Sacerdotem agere, sacerdotio fungi." Whatever its radical, etymological signification may be, the word means in the Old Testament never anything but to act priestly, to attend to the priesthood. פְּאֵר stands in the accusative of modality, or of nearer definition: the bridegroom is priest, not in general, but in relation to his head-ornament. For this characterizes him as priest. The glorified Servant of God here spoken of, is compared with a priestly bridegroom, because He has purchased the bride by His priestly work, i. e., by the sacrifice which He offered for her (liii.), and because He still executes the office of a priest for her by intercession and blessing. But why the comparison with the bride with her ornaments on her? Why is not the comparison rather with a bridal pair?—What means this distinction of bride and bridegroom? It seems to me that this question can be answered from only one stand-point, and this one on which the Prophet himself cannot yet have consciously stood. There hovers over this whole chapter a sort of vail which was not raised till its fulfilment. The words of 1 Pet. i. 10, 11, are fully applicable to our Prophet in regard to this place. The fulfilment makes known to us that the LORD comprehends the bride with Himself as one. He is the Head, she is the body (Eph. i. 23). The life of Christ, His Spirit, His salvation, His righteousness, are in the church. Therefore is He who wears the garments of salvation and the robe of righteousness compared both with the priestly bridegroom and the bride. כַּלָּה recalls xlix. 18, as חָתָן recalls Ps. xix. 6. Under the כֵּלִים, the whole apparatus of female finery is to be understood (comp. Gen. xxiv. 53; (Deut. xxii. 5). Ver. 11 is and must remain enigmatical, if it is not taken, as it has been by us, as an explanation of the thought that the garments of righteousness and salvation, which the Servant of God wears, can, as a living principle, propagate themselves, and so become the ornament of the bride. Ver. 11 is therefore connected with ver. 10 by כִּי. I accordingly regard ver. 11 as explaining why He who compared Himself with the priestly bridegroom, compares Himself also with the bride. This can be done because the righteousness which the bridegroom as priest has acquired, and consequently the glory, too, which He has obtained, must appear in His body, the bride, just as the seed committed to the ground must appear in the field or in gardens. [Alongside of this explanation I place that of DELITZSCH: "The word in the mouth of the Servant of Jehovah is the seed, from which a grand thing unfolds itself before all the world. The field and soil (אֶרֶץ) of this development is the human race, the enclosed garden of the same is the church, and the grand thing itself is צְדָקָה, as the actual inward nature of His church, and תְּהִלָּה, glory, as its actual outward appearance. He who makes the seed to grow is Jahve, but the bearer of the seed is the Servant of Jahve, and to be permitted to scatter the seed of a future so full of grace and glory is the ground of His nuptial jubilation." While Christ and His bride the church are one, and while He does for her all our author states, more is evidently drawn from the similes in ver. 10 than they were intended to teach.—D. M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lxi. 1. The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me.—Old writers found in this statement the three persons of the Holy Trinity.

2. On lxi. 1. Because Jehovah has anointed me. It is beyond question that the Saviour had the triple office of Prophet, Priest and King. Nor can it be questioned that in the old covenant priests, kings and prophets were anointed, although we must say of the prophets, that they, in accordance with the peculiar nature of their office, were not anointed by men, but were anointed solely and immediately by God with the Holy Spirit. There is, then, a threefold theocratic office, and what is common to them all is the anointing. As each of the three offices has different duties, so different qualifications are needed for each. A different χρίσμα and therefore a different χάρισμα also is imparted to the Prophet, a different one to the priest, a different one to the king. This does not prevent a king from being also prophet, or a prophet from being also priest, or a priest from being also prophet in certain special cases. But He who has the anointing in full measure, who has the Spirit not merely ἐκ μέτρου (John iii. 34, comp. 1 Cor. xii. 27; Eph. iv. 7), but the whole Spirit, He is eo ipso King, Priest and Prophet, He is the משיח κατ' ἐξοχήν.

3. [On He hath sent me.—Christ when fulfilling His ministry delighted to speak of Himself as the sent of God. It is remarkable with what frequency He so describes Himself in the Gospel of John. In that Gospel He makes mention of the Father's sending Him about forty times. He always acted under a sense of His responsibility as commissioned by the Father. We can reason backwards, and establish the divine mission of Jesus Christ from His corresponding to the Servant of God here described, more perfectly than any person who has ever appeared in the world. Mark how every trait in the picture was fulfilled in Him.—D. M.].

4. [On to proclaim liberty to the captives.—"Whereas by the guilt of sin we are bound over to the justice of God, are His lawful captives, sold for sin till payment be made of that great debt, Christ lets us know that He has made satisfaction to divine justice for that debt, that His satisfaction is accepted, and if we will plead that, and depend upon it, and make ourselves over and all we have to Him, in a grateful sense of the kindness He has done us, we may by faith sue out our pardon, and take the comfort of it; there is, and shall be, no condemnation to us. And whereas by the power of sin in us we are bound under the power of Satan, sold under sin, Christ lets us know that He has conquered Satan, has destroyed him that had the power of death, and his work, and provided for us grace sufficient to enable us to shake off the yoke of sin, and to loose ourselves from those bands of our neck. The Son is ready by His Spirit to make us free." HENRY.—D. M.].

5. On lxi. 2 and 3. "The year of Jubilee in the prophecy Isa. lxi. 1–3, as whose fulfiller Christ presents Himself, Luke iv. 21, is regarded as a type of the Messianic time of salvation, in which, after all the conflicts of the kingdom of God are victoriously passed through, the discords of the world will lose themselves in the harmony of the divine life, and with the σαββατισμὸς of the people of God (Heb. iv. 9) the acts of history will be concluded." ŒHLER.

6. On lxi. 2. On this passage CLEMENT of Alexandria (Strom. I. 21) and other cotemporary fathers founded the view that Christ's public ministry lasted only one year, a view which GERH. JOH. VOSSIUS took up afterwards on other grounds.

7. [On ver. 2. The day of vengeance of our God.—"It is a great truth manifest everywhere that God's coming forth at any time to deliver His people is attended with vengeance on His foes. So it was in the destruction of Idumea—regarded as the general representative of the foes of God (xxxiv.–xxxv.); so it was in the deliverance from Egypt—involving the destruction of Pharaoh and his host; so in the destruction of Babylon and the deliverance of the captives there. So in like manner it was in the destruction of Jerusalem; and so it will be at the end of the world, (Matth. xxv. 31–46; 2 Thes. i. 7–10). The coming of the Redeemer to save His people involved heavy vengeance on the inhabitants of guilty Jerusalem, and His coming to judgment in the last day will involve the divine vengeance on all who have opposed and hated God." BARNES.—D. M.]

8. On lxi. 3. "Christ in coming to preach the Gospel confers many benefits: He binds up, He sets free, He opens, He comforts, He gladdens, He adorns, He anoints, He clothes. In Him we have every thing, so that we can say with Ambrosius: 'We have every thing in Christ, and Christ is every thing in us. Wilt thou that thy wounds be healed, He is the physician; art thou in a burning fever, He is the cool fountain of water; art thou burdened with sins, He is righteousness; dost thou need aid, He is strength; dost thou fear death, He is the life; dost thou desire heaven, He is the way; dost thou fear darkness, He is the light; dost thou crave nourishment, He is food. Therefore taste and see that the LORD is good. Blessed is the man who trusteth in Him (Ps. xxxiv. 9).'" CRAMER.

9. On lxi. 4. ["The setting up of Christianity in the world repaired the decays of natural religion, and raised up those desolations both of piety and honesty, which had been for many generations the reproach of mankind. An unsanctified soul is like a city that is broken down, and has no walls, like a house in ruins; but by the power of Christ's gospel and grace it is repaired, it is put in order again, and fitted to be an habitation of God through the Spirit. And they shall do this, they that are released out of captivity; for we are brought out of the house of bondage, that we may serve God, both in building up ourselves to His glory, and in helping to build up His church on earth." HENRY.—D. M.] When hereafter the city will be on earth in which there will be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain, in which, too, there will be no temple, for the Lord God Almighty is Himself its temple—then will the earth itself, which is the oldest ruin, be restored to what it originally was, to be the soil and ground which bears the tabernacle of God with men (Rev. xxi. 3).

10. On lxi. 5 and 6. Weber is of the opinion that the Israelites will fulfil the priestly office only in so far as it related to teaching, and that they will receive for this as fair compensation "the bodily services" of the Gentiles. But that the office of teachers is not here in question is shown by the words משרתי אלהינו. Teaching is not the essential function of the priesthood, but sacrificial and sacramental mediation. [We have not far to look to find the animal sacrifices (see lx. 7), if we find here a prophecy of the literal conversion of Israel after the flesh into a nation of priests. Ezekiel, however, tells us (xlv. 15, 16) that not even all the Levites, but only the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, should perform the proper functions of priests in the house of the LORD in that city whose name is Jehovah-Shammah. The New Testament and the providence of God have sufficiently shown that this prophecy was not designed to confer on the Jews a patent of nobility among the nations. In the exposition of vers. 5 and 6 we have pointed out its true interpretation. How the Jews understood this passage may be seen in EISENMENGER's Entdecktes Judenthum, Vol. II., p. 758 sqq. It will not be every nation that will be allowed the privilege of serving the Jews. Some will perish utterly. But every Jew will have two thousand eight hundred servants. And this number of servants is determined by Zech. viii. 23: "In those days it shall come to pass that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you." Now there are according to the Jews seventy nations, and ten men from each would make seven hundred, but as the garment of every Jew will have four wings (כנף, not skirts), each of which will be seized by a Gentile, it follows that four times seven hundred persons, i. e., two thousand eight hundred, will be the servants of one Jew. How so many could take hold of the garment of one man is not explained. But Peter, the Jewish Christian, may be supposed to have understood in what sense we should take the prophecies in Isaiah lx., lxi. Yet he would not suffer the Gentile Cornelius to bow down at the soles of his feet, and he thought that no human being should permit a fellow-man to do so. Acts x. 25, 26. And those words of his (Acts x. 34, 35), "God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him," should have prevented Christian expositors of the Old Testament from adopting the carnal interpretation of the Jews. Dr. Charles Hodge has truly said that in the didactic portions of the New Testament "there is no intimation that any one class of Christians, or Christians of any one nation or race, are to be exalted over their brethren; neither is there the slightest suggestion that the future kingdom of Christ is to be of earthly splendor. Not only are these expectations without any foundation in the teachings of the Apostles, but they are also inconsistent with the whole spirit of their instructions. . . . It is as much opposed to the spirit of the Gospel that pre-eminence in Christ's kingdom should be adjudged to any man or set of men on the ground of natural descent, as on the ground of superior stature, physical strength, or wealth."—D. M.].

11. On lxi. 9. "Omnis, qui viderit eos, prima fronte cognoscet, quia semen sit, cui benedixerit Dominus. Quis enim ex ordine vitae, mansuetudine, continentia, hospitalitate, cunctisque virtutibus non intelligat populum Dei?" HIERONYMUS.

12. On lxi. 11. ["So that the whole world is become Eden: reclaimed for ever out of the hand of the unrighteous spoiler. In this year of Jubilee the earth is restored to its proper heirs, the righteous seed. For all those weary ages of wrong, compensation shall be made. The Priestly King will re-consecrate shame-stricken men, and they shall now be 'kings and priests unto God.'" KAY, D. M.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lxi. 1-3. The announcement of the coming Saviour by Himself.—It tells 1) the Person who sends Him; 2) His equipment for His work; 3) the design of His mission. It is a) to promise and bestow all consolation for the godly; b) to announce judgment for the wicked.

2. [The Lord hath anointed me.—"Aaron was anointed to be high-priest by Moses (Exod. xl. 13; Lev. viii. 12). The LORD Himself has anointed Messiah Ps. xlv. 7, 'God thy God, hath anointed Thee.' So we know that when Jesus was baptized (amidst crowds who were confessing their sins, Matt. iii. 6, as on a great Day of Atonement), the heavens were 'rent' (Mark i. 10), as if the veil which separated God and man were torn asunder, and 'God anointed Him with the Holy Ghost' (Acts x. 38), declaring Him to be "His beloved Son, in whom He was well pleased." Shortly afterwards Jesus publicly applied this prophecy to Himself (Luke iv. 17); and then went forth to proclaim the world's Jubilee (Luke iv. 43; viii. 1)." KAY, D. M.].

3. On xli. 6, 7. The Spiritual Priesthood of Christians.—1) Their office (ministers of God), a) by spiritual sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5; Heb. xiii. 16); b) by interceding and blessing; 2) Their present shame; 3) Their future glorification.

4. On lxi. 9. How are Christians known among other men? 1) By their confession, which does not agree with that of the world; 2) By their walk, which differs most decidedly from that of the children of the world.

5. On lxi. 10, 11. The mutual relation between Christ and His Church.—1) Christ as the priestly bridegroom puts His Church in possession of righteousness and salvation; 2) The church, arrayed in her bridal ornament, brings forth righteousness and praise to the LORD.

CHAPTER LXII.

a) How the Redeemer is Himself the Finisher of this Salvation.

CHAPTER LXII. 1–5.

1 FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace,
And for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest,
Until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness,
And the salvation thereof as [4]a lamp that burneth.
2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness,
And all kings thy glory:
And thou shalt be called by a new name,
Which the mouth of the LORD shall name.
3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the LORD,
And a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.
4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken;
Neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate:
Aut thou shalt be called [1]Hephzi-bah,
And thy land [2]Beulah:
For the LORD delighteth in thee,
And thy land shall be married.
5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin,
So shall thy sons marry thee:
And [3]as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride,
So shall thy God rejoice over thee.

[1] That is, My delight is in her. [2] That is, Married. [3] Heb. with the joy of the bridegroom.
[4] a burning torch.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The speaker is the same in this as in the preceding chapter. Great things had been promised in the previous discourse. Will all be fulfilled? The Anointed of God declares most decidedly, appealing to His love to Jerusalem as the surest guarantee, that He will not rest till Jerusalem is exalted to the highest pitch of glory, and as the appropriate expression of this glory, a new name is promised to her (vers. 1 and 2). Jerusalem will then be the most beautiful royal ornament of the LORD her King (ver. 3). The times are past when country and city could become desolate. There will be a double relation between Jerusalem and Jehovah, which cannot be dissolved, because it rests on the deepest and truest love. Jehovah will have pleasure in Jerusalem as a bridegroom in his bride. Therefore Jerusalem cannot again be separated from Jehovah, or from her children (vers. 4 and 5).

2. For Zion's sake——rejoice over thee. (Vers. 1–5). We might almost have thought that the promise had reached its maximum at the close of chapter lxi., and that nothing greater could be added. But this is not the case. To our surprise we read, ver. 1, that the Messiah speaks of increasing effort which He will put forth to bring Jerusalem to the highest pinnacle of glory. We perceive from this that the accomplishment of salvation will take place gradually. That in chapter lxii. the speaker is not the Prophet, but the Messiah, I maintain, with STIER and DELITZSCH. [Here there is a mistake. DELITZSCH makes the speaker in this chapter to be Jehovah. I translate from his Commentary: "That Jehovah here speaks (LXX. TARGUM, GROTIUS, VITRINGA, LUZZATTO), is shown by ver. 6 a, and by the use of the word חָשָׁה, which is the expression commonly employed by Jehovah when He lets the existing condition of things continue without interposing (lxv. 6; lvii. 11; lxiv. 11; xlii. 14)."—D. M.] The later interpreters for the most part regard the words as an utterance of the Prophet. But how could he hope to see all stages of this salvation accomplished? And how could he appoint the watchers spoken of in ver. 6? For to regard these watchmen as pious worshippers of Jehovah whom the Prophet appointed to call to Jehovah even as incessantly as he himself does (ver. 1), is exegetical caprice. Intercessors, who by their supplications bring about the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem, are not watchers on the walls. For watchmen are set over something which already exists. Observe, too, the לְמַעַן, which significantly stands at the beginning of the discourse, and is repeated in the second member. God's Anointed rests not, out of love to Zion. In His love, therefore, lies the security that Zion will have her right, that the promise given her will be kept. Is a better guarantee conceivable? He will not rest till her righteousness breaks forth as brightness, namely, the full brightness of the clear day, and her salvation as a blazing torch. The one of these images is taken from the day, the other from the night. By day there is no clearer light than that which comes from the sun; by night no light shines more brightly than a blazing torch. נֹגַהּ is here used as l. 10; lx. 3, 19. Righteousness and salvation correspond to one another, as in lxi. 10; lix. 17; lvi. 1; li. 5, 6, 8, etc. When Israel's righteousness and salvation have attained their culmination, then they will shine so brightly that all nations and kings must see them. I do not think that there is any essential difference between salvation and glory. Glory is only the side of salvation which strikes the eyes, which is outwardly conspicuous (comp. lviii. 8). But when Israel has become new outwardly and inwardly, a new name is also appropriate for him. This new name represents, therefore, a new time, the time of which it is said: "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. xxi. 5). But only God Himself can appoint (נָקַב, to pierce, perforare, notare, only here in Isaiah) this new name, which exactly corresponds to the essential nature of Israel. We perceive from this trait that the Prophet does not think merely of the restoration by Cyrus (comp. Rev. ii. 17). How high the renovated Jerusalem will stand is seen from ver. 3. The crown is the ornament of a prince's head. When Jerusalem is Jehovah's glorious crown, it is the first, highest, most precious jewel which He possesses (comp. xxviii. 1, 5; Rev. xxi.). ["It has been thought by some that there is a want of congruity in representing the crown as in the hand, instead of its being upon the head; but it must be obvious, that with no propriety whatever could the church be spoken of as placed on the head of Jehovah. The language is designed to teach the high estimation in which Jerusalem shall be held by the Most High, and her perfect security under His protection." HENDERSON, who rightly substitutes for hand, in the second member of ver. 3, palm, or the open hand (כַּף).—D. M.] The love of Jehovah effects that Jerusalem can never more be called Forsaken, nor her land Desolate; that, on the contrary, the city must be called My-delight-in-her, and the land Married. Thou shalt be called, is equivalent to Thou shalt be. [The E. V. translates the two first names, and gives the original forms of the two last. This is a manifest inconsistency. Azubah and Shemamah are the Hebrew words which are respectively rendered Forsaken and Desolate. Azubah and Hephzibah occur as actual names; the former was that of the mother of Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 42), the latter was the name of the mother of Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 1). It is reasonable to suppose that the passage before us was written with allusion to the marriage of Hezekiah with Hephzibah, and that the imagery and form of expression here employed were suggested by that event. That marriage was evidently hailed with joy as full of promise. But Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah by Hephzibah, brought ruin on Judah. This passage, then, could hardly have been written after the death of Hezekiah. Professor PLUMPTRE pertinently asks: "At what period towards the close of the captivity would the mind of a later writer have turned to so disastrous a marriage, and so ill-omened a name as that of Hephzibah, as suggestive of hope and gladness?" —D. M.] The land shall be called בְּעוּלָה, i. e., Maritata. The holy land shall not be a virgin chosen by no man, nor a repudiated wife, nor a widow, but a wife living in the conjugal relation. And to this figure there shall correspond a double reality (ver. 5). [Instead of thy sons, LOWTH and many others would read thy builders, changing בָּנַיִךְ into בֹּנַיִךְ, and they consider the plural to be used for the singular, Jehovah being the builder of Jerusalem, who marries her. This alteration has been made to remove the seeming incongruity of sons marrying their mother. "The idea of the marriage of children with their mother is indeed incongruous, but not only is בָּעַל, a noble word, which in itself expresses only taking possession of, but, moreover, church and home are blended together in the prosopopœia." —DELITZSCH. The particles of comparison are to be supplied (GESEN. Gr. § 155, 2 h). A young man by marrying "wins for himself an inalienable right to have and to hold."—KAY.—D. M.]

b) How the Redeemer accomplishes the Salvation of Jerusalem by means of the watchmen whom he has appointed.

CHAPTER LXII. 6-9.

6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem,
Which shall never hold their peace [a]day nor night:
[1]Ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,
7 And give him no [2]rest, till he establish,
And till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.
8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength,
[3]Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies;

And [b]the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy [c]wine,
For the which thou hast laboured:
9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it,
And praise the LORD;
And they that have brought it together shall drink it
In the courts of my [d]holiness.

[1] Or, ye that are the LORD'S remembrancers. [2] Heb. silence. [3] Heb. If I give, etc.
[a] all the day and all the night. [b] strangers. [c] new wine. [d] sanctuary.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As the Redeemer had said of Himself (ver. 1) that He will not rest till Jerusalem has reached even the highest glory, so He declares here that He will also indirectly, and by means of others, contribute to the attainment of this high end, namely by means of watchmen, who shall do as He Himself: not rest nor be quiet till the end is reached. If these watchmen are to help to reach the goal, their labor takes place in the time which precedes the attainment of the end. And it is naturally assumed in regard to this time, that while it lasts there are still enemies who can hurt Jerusalem, and against whom one must be constantly on his guard. On the other hand, these watchmen are also to be remembrancers for Jehovah, appointed to remind Him incessantly that the work is not yet completed, that Jerusalem is not yet that which it is to be (vers. 6 and 7). But Jehovah gives with an oath the comforting assurance, that Israel shall never again be the prey of the enemy, but shall rejoice evermore undisturbed in communion with their God, and shall partake to His praise of the fruits of their land (vers. 8 and 9).

2. I have set——courts of my holiness—Vers. 6–9. We must here above all hold fast that the subject of הפקדתי must be the same as that of אחשה and אשקוט, ver. 1. It is therefore the Anointed of the LORD who here speaks. [The appointment of officers in the church is in the New Testament ascribed to both God and Christ, 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11.—D. M.]. When He, on the one hand, perceives the necessity of appointing watchmen on the walls of Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, has the power to do this, He must be the LORD of Jerusalem, and also in some sense absent from it. And when He charges these watchmen to cry to Jehovah continually, and to let Him have no rest till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth, it is clear that He regards Jehovah as still standing above Himself. [But it is the Prophet who here suddenly breaks in, and addresses the "LORD's remembrancers."—D. M.]. The Prophet, then, means to say that the Jerusalem restored according to chapter lxi. by the working of the Messiah will be a city well built, and well provided with walls, but will still have enemies to fear, and not yet be the immediate theatre of the might and glory of her LORD. For when her LORD and Bridegroom has appointed watchmen, who cry to God incessantly for her (as e. g., Moses Ex. xvii. 11 sqq., and Samuel 1 Sam. vii. 8 sqq.; viii. 6; xv. 11; xii. 16–23; Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1), this intimates not only the presence of enemies, but also His own absence. He still needs representatives who in His name and Spirit, and also in His place exercise the office of guardians and watchmen in two ways; while they, on the one hand, warn against enemies; on the other, pray to God without ceasing for protection and help. [These watchmen strikingly contrast with those described lvi. 10.—D. M.]. The Jerusalem that after the Exile was restored, had still, even after the rebuilding of its walls, enemies enough, against whom it needed guardians and watchmen even as much as intercessors. The Zion of the New Testament has also enemies of every kind, but has also guardians and watchmen (Eph. iv. 11 sqq.), who as Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 24 sqq.) have in their office to wrestle with God and men. For the Zion of the New Testament with all her superiority over that of the Old, has yet a still higher ideal which she strives after: the heavenly Jerusalem. [The rendering in the text of the E. V.: Ye that make mention of the Lord can plead in its favor prevailing usage. But the marginal rendering, Ye that are the Lord's remembrancers is supported by xliii. 26 where Jehovah speaks put me in remembrance and by the context, in which Zion's watchmen are commanded to importune Jehovah till He fulfil His promise by glorifying Jerusalem. The "הַמַּזְכִּירִים אֶת־" here addressed are thus exhibited as those who put Jehovah in remembrance. D. M.]. The prayer of these watchmen is answered. [The assurance that follows is intended rather to inspire them with confidence in prayer. D. M.]. Jehovah has sworn (the distinction between his right hand and the arm of his strength is merely rhetorical) that the still threatening enemies shall not hinder the peaceful prosperity of Jerusalem, nor her communion with her God. Here again the Prophet lays on Old Testament colors. He represents the enemy as a barbarous horde of Amalekites or Midianites, that makes an irruption into Palestine when the harvest is ripe, in order to carry it off (comp. Judges vi. 3; Deut. xxviii. 33). This shall not happen any more. The Israelites shall in the future enjoy the fruit of their labor undisturbed, thanking God alone for the same and giving Him the glory (Deut. xiv. 22–26). ["In the courts of my sanctuary cannot mean that the produce of the harvest will be consumed only there (which is inconceivable), but only signifies, with allusion to the legal ordinance respecting the second tithe which was to be consumed by the landed proprietor and his family, with the addition of the Levites and the poor, in the holy place 'before the LORD,' Deut. xiv. 22–27, that the partaking of the produce of the harvest will be consecrated by religious feasts. Thoughts of all Israel being then a nation of priests, and of all Jerusalem being a sanctuary, are not contained in this promise. It declares only this, that the enjoyment of the blessing of the harvest will henceforth be unimpaired, and will take place with grateful acknowledgment of the Giver, and so, because sanctified by thanksgiving. it will itself become a religious service. This is what Jehovah has sworn by His right hand, which He lifts up only to attest the truth, and by His mighty arm which irresistibly executes what He has promised." DELITZSCH. D. M.].

c) General survey of what is accomplished by the Redeemer.

CHAPTER LXII. 10-12.

10 Go through, go through the gates;
Prepare ye the way of the people;
Cast up, cast up the highway;
Gather out the stones;
Lift up a standard for the people.
11 Behold, the LORD hath proclaimed unto the end of the world,
Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh;
Behold, his reward is with him,
And his [1]work before him.
12 And they shall call them, [2]The holy people, The redeemed of the LORD:
And thou shalt be called, Sought out, A city not forsaken.

[1] recompense.

[2] people of the sanctuary.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet in these words again briefly states all that belongs to the positive saving work of the Redeemer. He begins, therefore, with the summons to prepare the way for those returning from the Exile, and on all sides to give the signal to set out (vers. 10, 11); for with the deliverance of Israel from the Babylonian exile, the time of salvation extending to the appearance of the New Jerusalem begins. The last and highest glory the Prophet at the close briefly characterizes by ideal names (ver. 12).

2. Pass through——not forsaken.—Vers. 10-12. The liberation of Israel from the Babylonian captivity is the beginning of redemption. Then the cry shall be heard: Go through the gates. These gates are not those of the cities of Palestine which are to be entered, but the gates of the Babylonian cities out of which they are to move; for this summons stands at the head, and after it comes the mention of the way which is to be prepared. The summons is, therefore, to be understood as xlviii. 20; lii. 11. פַּנּוּ and סֹלּוּ are repeated from lvii. 14. To whom are these imperatives addressed? To all, both Jews and Gentiles (comp. עַל הָעַמִּים at the close of ver. 10), who have to assist in making the return home practicable, easy and glorious. But we must not suppose that the summons must be literally carried out. Who built a highway (מְסִלָּה) for the Israelites when they came out of Egypt? Yet it is said in xi. 16 that for the remnant returning from Assyria there should be a highway like that on which Israel came out of Egypt. The expression is employed for rhetorical effect. סקלו מאבן means that where the way should be rough and stony, the stones should be removed. This is not to be literally understood, but to be taken generally of the removal of all obstacles (comp. lvii. 14 b). On the construction, comp. vii. 8; xvii. 1; Hos. ix. 12. But as the exiles are not all in one country, the chief land of the Exile, but are scattered in all regions of the world, the command is at the same time issued to give them all the signal to return home. ["Lift up a standard above the nations." This is the most accurate rendering, and is given by LUTHER, ALEXANDER and DELITZSCH. DR. NAEGELSBACH takes עַל in a loose sense as equivalent to אֶל or לְ, and supposes that the signals are to be set up for the nations that shall accompany Israel. D. M.]. That what is said in ver. 11 does not relate merely to a proclamation published in the realm of Cyrus (Ezra i. 1), is evident, because this call is to sound forth to the end of the earth. The dominion of Cyrus did not reach so far, but the Israelites were in exile to the ends of the earth. The message must therefore reach the most distant nations, and no Israelite, even though living alone among the heathen, shall be forgotten (comp. xi. 11; Jer. iii. 18; xvi. 14 sqq.). ["It has been made a question whether the pronoun his (in his reward, etc.), refers to Jehovah or to the nearest antecedent, Salvation; and if to the latter, whether that word is to be translated Saviour, as it is by LOWTH and in the ancient versions. This last is a question of mere form, and the other is of but little exegetical importance, since the Saviour or salvation meant is clearly represented elsewhere as identical with God Himself. The last clause is a repetition of xl. 10, and if ever the identity of thought, expression and connection served to indicate identity of subject, it is so in this case." ALEXANDER. This interpreter maintains that "the plain sense of the words, the context here, and the analogy of xl. 10, are all completely satisfied by the hypothesis that the Messiah (or Jehovah) is here described as coming to His people, bringing with Him a vast multitude of strangers, or new converts, the reward of His own labors, and at the same time the occasion of a vast enlargement to His Church." D. M.]. The names, ver. 12, are memorials of blessing, for Israel will certainly be that which it is called (comp. on xxxii. 5 sqq.). The expression עַם הַקֹּדֶשׁ occurs exactly no where else in the Old Testament. But compare Dan. xii. 7; vii. 27. The expression גְּאֻלֵי יהוה is found in Isaiah only here; further in Ps. cvii. 2 (comp. פְּדוּיֵי יי xxxv. 10; li. 11). Jerusalem shall be called Derushah, the Sought out (the city desired and beloved by all), and the antithesis is added in the expression לֹא נעזבה.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lxii. 1. "How could the eternal Word keep silence? Christ is never silent; let us, therefore, never be weary to hear and to learn His word." LEIGH. [Christ loved His church and gave Himself for it that He might sanctify and cleanse it, and that He might present it to Himself a glorious church. His Zion is very dear to Him, and He gives her the glory which the Father gave to Him (John xvii. 22). He never forgets her, never ceases to work for her good, and to intercede for her. What precious consolation we find in the declaration contained in this first verse, when it is regarded as coming from the mouth of Christ Himself! "We may sing upon certainty of success before-hand, even in our winter storm, in the expectation of a summer sun at the turn of the year. No created powers in Hell, or out of Hell, can mar the music of our Lord Jesus, nor spoil our song of joy. Let us then be glad, and rejoice in the salvation of our Lord; for faith had never yet cause to have wet cheeks, and hanging-down brows, or to droop or die.... If Christ were buried and rotten among the worms, we might have cause to look like dead folks, but 'the Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock.'" RUTHERFORD's Letters, clxxxii.—D. M.].

2. On lxii. 2 b. The new name is the correlative of the new creation. But only God Himself will appoint the new name. Only God the omniscient, the searcher of hearts, before whose eyes all things are naked and opened, is able to give this new name, for He only knows perfectly the inward nature of the new creature. When we read (Rev. ii. 17) that no one will know the new name but he who receives it, this cannot mean that no one will be acquainted with this name, that it will be a hidden, secret name, as, e. g., MACROBIUS (Saturn. III. 9) speaks of a secret name of the city of Rome with which even the most learned were unacquainted. For we read (Rev. xix. 12) that Christ has such a name written which no man knew, but He Himself. And this name is then mentioned, ver. 13. He is called: the Word of God. The sound of the name is known, but its deep significance no one understands but He who bears it. It follows that what we read in ver. 4 of this chapter cannot possibly be the new name referred to in ver. 2. For Hephzibah and Beulah are like Azubah (Forsaken) and Shemamah (Desolate). The former names come in the place of the latter. But Azubah and Shemamah were never actual names. And so Hephzibah and Beulah cannot be actual names. ["That שֵׁם is not to be understood of a mere name, but has special reference to state and character, is obvious from the common idiom by which anything is said to be called what it really is. See chap. i. 26." HENDERSON. Who can understand all that is contained in the name Hephzibah as applied by the LORD to His church? There is a mystery of grace and condescension in this significant name which we cannot fully comprehend. Only God Himself could give such a name to His church.—D. M.].

3. On lxii. 6 sq. "No one should venture to serve as a spiritual watchman who has not been set by Christ Himself on the walls of Jerusalem." LEIGH. ["God is so far from being displeased with our pressing importunity, as men commonly are, that He invites and encourages it, He bids us cry after Him. He bids us make pressing applications at the throne of grace, and give Him no rest, Luke xi. 5, 6. He suffers Himself not only to be reasoned with, but to be wrestled with." HENRY.—D. M.].

4. On lxii. 7. ["The public welfare and prosperity of God's Jerusalem is that which we should be most importunate for at the throne of grace; we should pray for the good of the church, 1) That it may be safe, that He would establish it, that the interests of the church may be firm, may be settled for the present, and secured to posterity. 2) That it may be great, may be a praise in the earth; that it may be praised, and that God may be praised for it. We must persevere in our prayers for mercy to the church till mercy comes; we must do as the Prophet's servant did, go yet seven times, till the promising cloud appear, 1 Kings xvii. 44. It is a good sign that God is coming to a people in ways of mercy, when He pours out a spirit of prayer upon them, and stirs them up to be fervent and constant in their intercessions." HENRY. The Lord's Remembrancers put God in remembrance of His own promises. As Jacob, Gen. xxxii.: Thou saidst. Comp. 2 Sam. vii. 25. This is their all-prevailing plea. Therefore they find in their heart to pray. 2 Sam. vii. 27.—D. M.]

5. On lxii. 9. ["Nothing is a more certain indication of liberty and prosperity than this—that every man may securely enjoy the avails of his own labor. In nothing is a state of liberty and order more distinguished from tyranny and anarchy than this. Nothing more certainly marks the advance of civilization; and nothing so much tends to encourage industry and to promote prosperity.... And as the tendency of true religion is to repress wars, and to establish order, and to diffuse just views of the rights of man, it everywhere promotes prosperity by producing the security that a man shall enjoy the avails of His own productive industry. Wherever the Christian religion prevails in its purity, there is seen the fulfilment of this prophecy; and the extension of that religion everywhere would promote universal industry, order and law."—BARNES.—D. M.]

6. On lxii. 10. "Every Christian teacher should let the imperatives that are found here sound daily in his ears and heart. For Christ has spoken them to him also. As often as a fit of slumber or laziness comes upon thee in the discharge of thy office, bethink thyself that Christ is standing behind thee and calling to thee: Go through, go through! Prepare the way, prepare the way! Lift up a standard!" LEIGH.

7. On. lxii. 11. "Adventus Christi vulgo triplex statuitur: humiliationis, sanctificationis, glorificationis." FOERSTER. Christ first came from above down to earth visible to all in the form of a servant. Secondly, He comes continually from above invisibly, by His Spirit in the word and sacrament that He may sanctify us. Thirdly, He will come again from above visible to all, not in the form of a servant, but in glory (Matt. xxv.). This three-fold coming of the Lord must be continually held before the church that the Bride may be ready when the Bridegroom comes.

8. On lxii. 12. ["None are to be called the redeemed of the Lord but those that are the holy people; the people of God's purchase is a holy nation. And they shall be called sought out; God shall seek them out, and find them wherever they are dispersed, eclipsed or lost in a crowd; men shall seek them out that they may join themselves to them, and not forsake them. It is good to associate with the holy people, that we may learn their ways, and with the redeemed of the Lord, that we may share in the blessings of the redemption." HENRY.—D. M.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lxii. 1-5. We have here an appropriate text for a sermon on the future prospects of the church. Mark 1) The foundation of the church's hope, 2) The object of that hope. The foundation is the love which the Lord bears to His church (ver. 1: For Zion's sake, vers. 4 b and 5). The object of hope is a. Redemption from long-prevailing evils (ver. 4 a); b. A new life (ver. 1 b, ver. 2 a, ver. 3); c. A new name (ver. 2 b).

2. On lxii. 6, 7. The duty and aim of Christian ministers. 1) Their duty: a. toward men; not to be silent with exhortations and warnings; b. toward God; not to be silent with intercessions (vers. 6 b and 7 a). 2) Their aim: that the church of the Lord be built up and perfected (ver. 7 b).

3. On lxii. 9. [This verse may properly be employed to form the basis of a discourse against the doctrine of the Communists, who would deprive others of the fruit of their industry.—D. M.]

4. On lxii. 10-12. "Three things are here contained: 1) An invitation to all to meet the Messiah who is about to appear; 2) The proclamation of His advent; 3) The fit designation of those who receive the Lord with joy." CARPZOV.

B. The negative side of the revelation of Salvation. The judgment on the heathen.

CHAPTER LXIII. 1-6.

1 WHO is this that cometh from Edom,
With dyed garments from Bozrah?
This that is [1]glorious in his apparel,
[2]Travelling in the greatness of his strength?
I that speak in righteousness,
Mighty to save.
2 Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel,
And thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine fat?
3 I have trodden the winepress alone:
And of the people there was none with me:
For I will tread them in mine anger,
And trample them in my fury;
And their [3]blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments,
And I will stain all my raiment.
4 For the day of vengeance is in mine heart,
And the year of my redeemed is come.
5 And I looked, and there was none to help;
And I wondered that there was none to uphold:
Therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me;
And my fury, it upheld me.

6 And I will tread down the people in mine anger,
And make them drunk in my fury,
And I will bring down their [c]strength to the earth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. [The Masoretic note marks as abnormal the Pattach in גַּת though the word is in Pause. But Pattach when pausal is commonly not lengthened in monosyllabic words. See Delitzsch in loc.—D. M.].

Ver. 3. יֵז apocopated future Kal from נָזָה, to sprinkle. אֶגְאָלְתִּי is, beside the Niphal נְגֹאֲלוּ, the only form of the verb גָּאַל, impurum esse, which occurs in Isaiah. It is a Hiphil form imitating the Aramaic, and has possibly been chosen in order to give to the thing a corresponding expression in bad Hebrew, in a word taken from the common language current in conversation.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Chapters lx.–lxiii. are most closely connected. In lx.–lxii. there was described the positive work of God's Anointed which brings blessing and salvation to Israel. Chapter lxiii. shows how He will accomplish the negative side of His mission by punishing the heathen. With dramatic effect the Prophet pictures a person of commanding appearance approaching from Edom in magnificent but blood-stained raiment. To the question who He is, the person asked replies that He is He to whom it belongs to hold judgment, and to bring salvation (ver. 1). And to the further question why His garment is so red, (ver. 2), He answers that He has trodden the wine-press alone, with no man of the nations with Him, (which He will requite by the execution of the same judgment on them), and thus He has soiled His garment (ver. 3). The hero comes therefore from executing judgment on Edom, and He sets forth in prospect a second judgment embracing all nations. This second judgment, which was only parenthetically mentioned in ver. 3, is treated of more fully in vers. 4-6. First, it is marked in ver. 4 as a long-purposed day of vengeance, with which at the same time a year of salvation will begin. Then it is again prominently stated, that the hero sees Himself isolated, but trusts notwithstanding in the strength of His own arm, and of His fury (ver. 5), and is confident that He will tread down the nations, and shed their vital juice (ver. 6).

2. Who is this that——to the earth.—Vers. 1–6. The Fathers (Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Origen, Ambrose, Augustine, etc.), apply this passage directly to the sufferings and ascension of Christ. Origen, in particular, and after Him Jerome and Theodoret put the question: Who is this that cometh, etc., into the mouth of the angels who guard the gates of heaven. Thereupon the foremost of the procession accompanying the Lord answer in the words of Ps. xxiv. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." Athanasius makes the question proceed from the mouth of fallen angels. Under Edom the Fathers understand the (red) earth. Another group of interpreters, with Luther at their head, understand under Edom the Synagogue of the Jews, under Bozrah "urbem munitam privilegiis divinis, i. e., Jerusalem. The blood is the blood of the Jews. The hero comes from inflicting judgment on Jerusalem. Calvin disputes any reference to Christ. He finds in the passage simply the announcement of a judgment on the Edomites which is still future. This view is more definitely set forth by Grotius and others, as they see here a prophecy of that devastation of Edom which was effected by Judas Maccabaeus (Maccab. v. 3 sqq. 65; 2 Maccab. x. 15 sqq. Jos. Antiqq. xii. 11, 12). Eichhorn and Koppe regard Nebuchadnezzar as the accomplisher of this threatening. Cocceius, and many others after him put a spiritual sense on the passage, and understand under "the trampling down" the "crucifixionem veteris hominis et abolitionem omnis impietatis per crucifixionem Christi." Vitringa, who here follows in general the rabbinical interpretation, understands under Bozrah Rome, and under Edom the countries subdued by the Romans. The "conculcare" he refers here as in chapter xxxiv. to the liberation of the Christians from the power of Rome. But he does not, as many others, think of the elevation of Christianity to be the religion of the State by Constantine, nor of the general judgment (Rev. xx. 11 sqq.), but of the extermination of Antichrist by the warrior who rides on the white horse, Rev. xix. 11 sqq. Among modern interpreters Gesenius, Hitzig, Umbreit, Beck, Seinecke, see in this prophecy a threatening against Edom expressed in the form of a vision representing an act of vengeance as completed; while Knobel, according to his peculiar way of judging, thinks that he can discern here the battle of Sardis (Herod. i. 80; Cyrop. vii. 1) depicted in prophetic colors. Stier is of the opinion that the one who is seen as coming is Christ, coming from the fulfilment of what is related Rev. xiv. 20; xix. 18, 21. Delitzsch finds the historical fulfilment of our prophecy in what befel the Edomites at the hands of the Maccabean princes and of Simon of Gerasa (Jos. Bell. jud. iv. 9, 7), while its final fulfilment is the destruction of Antichrist and his hosts (Rev. xix. 11 sqq.). [The destruction of Antichrist is regarded by Delitzsch simply as the New Testament counterpart to this piece.—D. M.]. The Catholic interpreters Rohling and Neteler do not exclude the historical fulfilment (through Simon of Gerasa; so Rohling), but yet regard as the fulfiller of our prophecy the Servant of Jehovah, who, according to chapter liii. should give His life as an offering for sin, and who is, on the other hand, the destroyer of Antichrist, and is thus sprinkled both with His own blood and that of others. [DR. NAEGELSBACH regards the victory of Amaziah, king of Judah, over the Edomites (2 Chron. xxv. 5-12) as furnishing the historical foundation for this prophecy. Amaziah returning from the slaughter of the Edomites is the type of the Anointed of the LORD who here appears as redeeming Israel by executing judgment on Israel's enemies. But this is an opinion which is quite peculiar to our Author, and which no one before him has ventured to express. It is strange that any one should think of finding in this glorious Conqueror, who comes travelling in the greatness of His strength, who speaks in righteousness and is mighty to save, the antitype of that Amaziah who set up for worship the gods of the vanquished Edomites, and was afterwards completely overcome by Joash, king of Israel. Edom is a representative people. It is not an emblematic name of the great world-power, in its violence and tyranny, for which Babylon is made to stand. But Edom, the inveterate enemy of Israel, and occupying a bad pre-eminence in hatred against Israel, is the representative of the world that hates the people of God. So DELITZSCH, who remarks the emblematizing tendency which Isaiah here, as in chaps. xxi.-xxii. 14, manifests. The name Edom is made an emblem of its future doom. The apparel of Jehovah, the avenger, is seen to be אָדֹם, red, with the blood of Edom. The name Bozrah, too, readily suggests בָּצַר, to gather the vintage of grapes. The image of treading grapes is here used to picture the Lord's crushing of the inhabitants of Bozrah, who are as the vintage in the wine-press. We cannot study the picture without recognizing the emblematic significance of the names Edom and Bozrah. The question arises: Are we, in the interpretation of this prophecy, to think of Judas Maccabeus, Hyrcanus, and Simon of Gerasa, or even of the proper Edomites? The answer depends on the way in which we must answer another question. Did Judas, or either of the other Jewish chiefs mentioned, return in triumph from the Idumean city Bozrah specified by Isaiah? Of this there is no evidence. LOWTH has called attention to a very important point which, in his view, excludes from this prophecy Judas Maccabeus, and even the Idumeans properly so called. "The Idumea of the Prophet's time was quite a different country from that which Judas conquered. For during the Babylonish captivity the Nabatheans had driven the Edomites out of their country, who upon that took possession of the southern parts of Judea, and settled themselves there; that is, in the country of the whole tribe of Simeon, and in half of that of Judah. And the metropolis of the Edomites, and of the country which Judas took, was Hebron, 1 Mac. v. 63, not Botsra" (Bozrah). This consideration is fatal to all attempts of the literalizing school to interpret this prophecy.—D. M.]. The question, Who is this? is purely rhetorical. The Prophet well knows who He is whom he sees. The question is put to awaken and direct our attention to Him who is seen coming by the Prophet. (Comp. lx. 8; Cant. iii. 6). Many are inclined to understand חמוץ בגדים not of the color of blood, but of the red (purple) color of the garments, as kings and warriors frequently wore red garments (comp. KNOBEL on this place; Judges viii. 26; JUSTIN xx. 3), and, as they say, the soiling with blood would be incompatible with הָדוּר. But it is just the being sprinkled with blood which is the most prominent and important mark in the appearance of the hero; and while this doubtless stains His garments it is glorious to Himself. Bozrah (comp. xxxiv. 6; Amos i. 12) was after Petra one of the most important cities of Edom (comp. Jer. xlix. 13, 22). It lay north of Petra. Beside this Edomite Bozrah, there was a city of this name in Moabitis (Jer. xlviii. 24), and another in Auranitis, which latter is not mentioned in the Holy Scriptures (see Comment. on Jer. xlviii. 24). The Prophet has of the Edomite cities made mention of Bozrah, because בָּצְרָה (although the name of the city probably denotes Septum, munimentum) on account of the signification vindemiavit belonging to the verb from which it is derived, admirably suits the comparison with a treader of the wine-press. מֵאֱדוֹם as מִבָּצְרָה depends on בָּא. Observe the gradation. In the first member the Prophet mentions simply the coming from Edom, then he specifies the red garments in the second member, and then in the third, which begins with a repetition of זֶה, he speaks of the glorious apparel and the proud bearing. ["הָדוּר properly means swollen, inflated, but is here metaphorically used in the sense of adorned, or, as VITRINGA thinks, terrible, inspiring awe." ALEXANDER.—D. M.]. I take צֹעֶה in the sense of resupinus. The root occurs five times in the Old Testament, and has the signification of bending, inclining. It here characterizes one who protrudes the breast, and proudly throws back the head. [DELITZSCH agrees with VITRINGA in understanding צֹעֶה to mean se huc illuc motitans.—D.M.]. To the question מי זה וגו׳ the Person seen Himself answers. His answer is first of a general character. He does not mention at first the act of judgment which He has just executed on Edom, but, as if He would remove the impression that He is a worldly prince given to deeds of violence, who, as a beast of prey, unjustly makes an incursion for plunder and slaughter, He declares His nature in general to be that of One who works righteousness and salvation. He says מְדַבֵּר not דִּבַּרְתִּי. By this participle He designates as His permanent property the speaking, i. e., acting, transacting in righteousness. The context requires us to understand דִּבֵּר not of the mere speaking or teaching with words which should have righteousness for their subject, or should be spoken in righteousness. But דִּבֵּר בִּצְדָקָה relates here to a judicial speaking or transacting. [Better DELITZSCH, who compares xlii. 6; xlv. 13: "He speaks in righteousness, while He in the zeal of His holiness threatens judgment to oppressors, and promises salvation to the oppressed, and also carries out by His power what He threatens and promises." Comp. further xlv. 23; lix. 16, which places show that the speaker is no one less than

Jehovah. HENDERSON justly remarks that the name The WORD given to the Warrior, Rev. xix. 13, exactly corresponds to מְדַבֵּר, by which He here characterizes Himself. The description, too, Rev. xix. 13, "He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood" is manifestly drawn from this place in Isaiah. The LOGOS is faithful and true (Rev. xix. 11). He is One who speaks in righteousness. It is unwarranted to say with Dr. NAEGELSBACH that I that speak in righteousness marks the hero's relation to His enemies as a strict judge; and that the words mighty to save tell what He is for Israel.—D. M.]. רַב is not to be confounded with רָב propugnator, xix. 20. After the hero has answered the question who is this? more in the sense of qualis? than of quis? the Prophet further inquires: Why is it red in thine apparel? The לְ intimates that the redness is not something inherent in the raiment, but something that has come to it from without. This is more clearly expressed by the second part of ver. 2. The spots that have arisen through spurting recall to mind the dress of one who treads in the wine-press (דרך with בְּ as lix. 8). It is not yet intimated that these are spots of blood. The pith of the matter is ingeniously and gradually reached. ["It is a slight but effective stroke in this fine picture, that the first verse seems to speak of the stranger as still at a distance, whereas in the second He has come so near as to be addressed directly." ALEXANDER.—D. M.]. The hero accepts the comparison drawn from treading in the wine-press. It is true, says He, I have in a certain sense trodden in the wine-vat, and that alone, by Myself. פּוּרָה (from פּוּר = פָּרַר, fregit, only here and Hag. ii. 16) is synonymous with גַּת, but is to be distinguished from יֶקֶב (comp. on v. 2; xvi. 10), for גַּת or פּוּרָה is the upper vat, out of which the juice flows off into the lower trough or יֶקֶב, from which it is drawn (comp. LEYRER in HERZ. R.-Enc. VII. p. 509). The hero, therefore, compares the bloody judgment which He has executed on Edom with treading in the wine-press. He falls back on an older prophetic utterance, Joel iv. 13; while John had both these passages before him; in Rev. xiv. 14–20 chiefly the words of Joel; but in Rev. xix. 13–15 chiefly this passage of Isaiah. The hero whom the Prophet beholds, states emphatically that He trod the wine-press alone, as of the nations there was not a man with Him. The statement indicates the universal antichristian spirit of the nations. ["When He adds 'that of the nations there was no one with Him,' it follows that the wine-vat was so great that He could have used the co-operation of whole nations. And when He continues: And I trod them in mine anger, etc., the riddle in this declaration is explained. To the people themselves the knife has been applied. They were cut off as grape-clusters and cast into the wine-vat."—DELITZSCH. The reader can judge whether the lofty terms of this prediction are satisfied by the exposition of HENDERSON, which I subjoin: "When the victor declares that none [no man] of the peoples or nations rendered Him any assistance in the attack on Edom, he refers to the fact, that vengeance had not been taken upon that nation, as it had been upon Tyre, Moab, Egypt, etc., through foreign intervention. Identifying the Jews under the Maccabees and Hyrcanus with Himself, by whom they were employed as native instruments, He vindicates the glory of the deed from all aid obtained from an extraneous source." But it would be difficult to suppose Jehovah identifying Himself with Simon of Gerasa and his lawless followers who inflicted the sorest judgment on the Edomites. Besides, עַמִּים, peoples in general (see ver. 6), and not the Edomites only are the objects of God's crushing judgment. We append here DELITZSCH'S remarks on vers. 5, 6: "The meaning is that no one, in conscious willingness to assist the God of judgment and salvation in His purpose, associated himself with Him. The church devoted to Him was the object of redemption; the mass of those alienated from God was the object of judgment. He saw Himself alone; neither human co-operation, nor the natural course of things aided the execution of His design; therefore He renounced human assistance, and interrupted the natural course of things by a wonderful deed of His own."—DELITZSCH. D. M.]. The words ואדרכם to על-בגדי are to be taken as a parenthesis. The guilt of the nations, of whom no one was with Him, presses so forcibly on the mind of the speaker that He, immediately interrupting His speech, sees Himself compelled to declare their punishment also. Because they, when He trod the wine-press in Edom, were not to be found on His side, He will tread and trample them to pieces, so that their juice squirts upon His clothes. [But the assumption of this parenthesis is very unnatural. Many interpreters, as HENDERSON and DELITZSCH, translate And I trod them in my anger and trampled them in my fury, etc. On the whole this is the easiest construction which regards the future tense as used for the past in this animated discourse. Comp. וָאַבִּיט, etc., in ver. 5. D. M.]. נֵצַח, from נָצַח = נָזָה, fudit, therefore effusum, humor, succus, only here and ver. 6: the word is chosen, because not merely the blood, but also other fluids, especially the matter of the brain, are to be denoted. Ver. 4. [If we render ver. 3 in the past tense, then we must consistently employ the past tense in ver. 4. For a day of vengeance (was) in my heart, etc.] We have in ver. 4 a repetition of words in lxi. 2 a [comp. also xxxiv. 8]. But the clauses are transposed, and instead of רָצוֹן we have the word that does not elsewhere occur, גְּאוּלִים. [Dr. NAEGELSB. takes manifestly גְּאוּלַי, as many other interpreters do, in the sense of my redemptions, making an abstract noun of the plural of the passive participle. But the obvious and natural rendering is that of the E.V., my redeemed. There is a year appointed for the redeemed of Jehovah, comp. lxii. 12. D. M.] Vers. 5, 6. It will happen again as it did in the day of Edom. The LORD will see none of the peoples of the world on His side. He expresses this thought twice in parallel members, and the second time emphasizes it by saying that He will perceive His standing alone with astonishment. For there is only a little flock that will follow Him (vi. 13). Many are called, but few chosen. The astonishment which is ascribed to the LORD is an anthropopathic expression which has only rhetorical significance. Comp. lix. 16. The second part of ver. 5 passes over into the language of narration. The expression אֲשַׁכְּרֵם (the Targum and some codd. and editions read אֲשַׁבְּרֵם, which is appropriate, but unnecessary, and insufficiently attested) involves a bold turn of thought: the judged are not only objects, but also vessels of wrath; they are not merely grapes that spurt their juice, but are themselves full of the wine of the wrath of God (comp. xxix. 9; xlix. 26; li. 21).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lxiii. 1–6. Till the time of CALVIN it was the prevailing opinion that the treader in the wine-press is Christ, not as judging the nations, but as Himself suffering death, and by His death depriving the devil of his power. "Christ, as He contends mightily in His suffering, and after His suffering triumphs gloriously," was regarded as the theme of this prophecy. The blood on His garment was accordingly to be understood of the blood of demons. JEROME remarks on I have trodden the wine-press alone: "Neque enim angelus, aut archangelus, throni, dominationes, aut ulla coelestium potestatum humanum corpus assumsit et pro nobis passus est et conculcavit adversarias fortitudines atque contrivit." But the blood of the demons is to be understood τροπικῶς. A synopsis of the old expositions of the passage in this sense is found in a dissertation by LEYRER on this place, published in 1648. (It is reprinted in Exercitationum philologico-historicarum fasces quinque by THOMAS CRENIUS, Ludg. Bat., 1697 and 1700). CALVIN pronounces this interpretation a perversion of Scripture ("hoc caput violenter torserunt in Christum"). His view was adopted especially by Reformed interpreters, as WOLFG. MUSCULUS, ABR. SCULTETUS (Idea concionum in Jes. hab. p. 844), VITRINGA and others. VITRINGA makes these points prominent. "The hero is not set forth as suffering, but as acting, not as sprinkled with His own blood, but with the blood of enemies, not as satisfying the justice of God for sins, but as executing the justice of God in punishing enemies." However, even Lutheran theologians, as JOH. TARNOV (in the Exercitt. bibl. Libri 4, ROSTOCK, 1627, p. 118, Num de Christo patiente hic agatur), and the anonymous author of a Disputatio de Victore Idumaeorum Jes. lxiii. maintained substantially the view of CALVIN. Since the old interpreters, as FOERSTER says, applied the place ὁμοθυμαδόν to the passion of Christ, we can understand how Isa. lxiii. was a very favorite Lesson in Holy Week.

2. "The prophecy which is here directed against Edom is to be regarded as a prophecy of the judgment which will befall the antichristian, persecuting world in the last days. On this account the Seer of the New Testament, John, has described the Lord as coming to judge the world after the model of Isa. lxiii. (Rev. xix)."—WEBER.

3. On lxiii. 3. "When at other times the Lord holds judgment, nations who will execute it stand at His disposal. He 'hisses for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.' He calls the mighty of Egypt and Babylon to serve Him (vii. 18, 19). Why is no people ready to help Him in His judgment on Edom? This is a hint that the judgment on Edom must be at the same time that judgment in which the Lord judges all nations. Only in this way can we understand that none of them can here help Him, as they themselves are all objects of the judgment."—WEBER.

4. HECTOR PINTUS says, in his Commentary, on this passage: "Non sine causa dicit: non est vir mecum, ne scilicet excludat Mariam virginem, quae usque ad mortem ei comes fuit, et cui gladius doloris cor pertransivit." This reminds one of what the Jansenist, ANTOINE ARNAUD, in the treatise "Difficultés proposées à Mr. Steyaert, etc.: Cologne. 1691," relates of various preachers who publicly declared, that if the foolish virgins instead of saying, "Domine, domine aperi nobis," had said, "Domina aperi nobis," they certainly would have found an open door.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

On lxiii. 1–6. [Messiah is the conqueror of Edom, as Balaam of old predicted (Numb. xxiv. 17, 18). Not till He raises up the fallen tabernacle of David, is possession in the highest sense taken of Edom and of all the heathen (Amos ix. 11, 12. As we understand the Lord's work of destruction depicted in Ps. cx. 5, 6, so must we understand the judgment on Edom here described. Who are the enemies that Messiah is commissioned to subdue? How does He destroy His foes? This last question admits of a two-fold answer.—D. M.].

2. On lxiii. 1–6. When Christ was suffering in Gethsemane, was bleeding before Pilate and dying on the cross, He did not look like a Judge and Conqueror. And yet He was such. Just then it was that He took from the devil his might (Heb. ii. 14), and spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly (Col. ii. 15). It is only on the basis of this judgment, which He the one seemingly judged, performed upon the cross, that He will be hereafter able to hold the last judgment in His state of exaltation.

3. On lxiii. 1–6. "Our text bids us 1) To look to the Man of Sorrows, who redeemed us; 2) To contemplate in faith the great work which He has accomplished for us; 3) For this to render to Him the thank-offering which we owe Him."—ZIETHE, Manch. Gaben. und Ein Geist, 1870. [It is strange that an eminent modern preacher should so misrepresent the teaching of this passage. If we wish to lead men to contemplate Christ as the Man of Sorrows, by whose blood we are redeemed, we should choose a passage of Scripture that exhibits Him in this character. But it is either culpable ignorance, or something worse, to affirm that the Scripture before us contains the lessons set forth in the above-mentioned heads of a sermon.—D. M.].

IV.—THE FOURTH DISCOURSE.

The Prophet in Spirit puts Himself in the Place of the Exiled Church, and bears its Cause in Prayer before the Lord.

CHAPTERS LXIII. 7—LXIV. 11.

Chapters lx.-lxiii. 6, are like a prophetic high plateau, which the Prophet, by means of chapters lviii. and lix. has ascended out of his own time. In this fourth discourse he comes down again to the present time, that is to say, to a time relatively present, to that of the people in exile. He transports himself entirely into this time, as if he were passing through it, and sets before the LORD the temporal and spiritual need of the people living in exile. He does this by first taking a retrospect of the past, and showing what the LORD formerly was to the people (lxiii. 7-14). Then he entreats the LORD as the Father of His people to look upon them (lxiii. 15-19); then he prays that the LORD, for their complete deliverance, would visibly come to them with a grand manifestation of His divine majesty (lxiv).

1. RETROSPECT OF WHAT THE LORD FORMERLY WAS TO THE PEOPLE.
CHAPTER LXIII. 7-14.

7 I will mention the loving-kindnesses of the LORD,
And the praises of the LORD,
According to all that the LORD hath bestowed on us,
And the great goodness toward the house of Israel,
Which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies,
And according to the multitude of his loving-kindnesses.
8 For he said, Surely they are my people,
Children that will not lie:
So he was their Saviour.
9 In all their affliction he was afflicted,
And the angel of his presence saved them:
In his love and in his pity he redeemed them;
And he bare them, and carried them all the days of old.
10 But they rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit:
Therefore he was turned to be their enemy,
And he fought against them.
11 [a]Then he remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying,
Where is he that [b]brought them up out of the sea with the [1]shepherd of his flock?
Where is he that put his holy Spirit within him?
12 [c]That led them by the right hand of Moses with his glorious arm,
Dividing the water before them,
To make himself an everlasting name?
13 That led them through the deep, as an horse in the wilderness,
That they should not stumble.
14 As a beast goeth down into the valley,
The Spirit of the LORD caused him to rest:
So didst thou lead thy people,
To make thyself a glorious name.

[1] Or, shepherds.

[a] Then his people remembered the old days of Moses. [b] brought up out of the sea the shepherd of his flock.
[c] that put at the right hand of Moses his glorious arm.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 7. The words עַל כֹּל אֲשֶׁר־גְּמָלָנוּ are to be taken as one term, to which כְּ, in the sense of secundum, is prefixed. עַל stands in a causal sense [כְּעַל is = uti par est propter]. רַב־טוּב is to be regarded as the object dependent on אַזְכִּיר rather than as dependent on כְּ in כְּעַל.

Ver. 9. Instead of the Kethibh לֹא we must with the K'ri read לוֹ, as לֹא, however it may be explained, does not yield an appropriate sense [?]. Some take צָר for צַר in pause, either in the passive sense: in all their affliction there was (to them) no distress (צַר as, e. g., xxv. 4; xxvi. 16, comp. pressi non oppressi), or in the active sense — oppressor, adversary (ver. 18; lxiv. 1; l. 24; lx. 10, et saepe). Both these views are set forth under the most manifold modifications (comp. STIER). But whichever of the two constructions we choose, there is an abruptness in the expression. We should expect לָהֶם, or, if צָר should refer to Jehovah, the pronoun הוּא is wanting: In all their affliction He was not an oppressor. It is better, therefore, to follow the K'ri, although all the old versions support לֹא. Our place belongs, then, to the fifteen, or according to another enumeration (comp. on ix. 2 and xlix. 5) eighteen places, in which according to the opinion of the Masoretes לוֹ is to be read instead לֹא. DRECHSLER is certainly right when he remarks (on ix. 2) that the unusual position of לוֹ, which was originally in the text, caused it to be altered into לֹא which was more current and sounded more familiar in such a position. [But this is a confession that instead of לוֹ צָר we should find צַר לוֹ if לוֹ were the original reading. We dislike departing from the textual reading when it is supported by all ancient versions. In order to get the meaning "He was afflicted," we must not only alter the negative לֹא into לוֹ, but must also suppose an abnormal collocation of the words. Add to these considerations that צַר לוֹ does not mean simply, "he was afflicted, or grieved," but "he was reduced to a strait, was ἐν ἀπορίᾳ," (Kay). This could not be predicated of Jehovah; though it could be said of Him anthropopathically, as in Judges x. 16, that God's soul was grieved. But there the expression is quite different in the original. If we take צָר in the sense of adversary: "In all their affliction He (God) was not an adversary to them," the absence of לָהֶם need not so much surprise us, as it occurs in the close of the preceding verse, where God is declared to have been a Saviour לָהֶם. The proof that God was not an adversary to them is given in the next clause, when it is said: and the angel of his presence saved them, etc. Kay justly remarks that God was the reverse of an adversary to Israel. "His heaviest chastisements were sent with the view of frustrating the designs of their worst enemies, and were removed as soon as that work was accomplished." —D. M.].

Ver. 11. הַמַּעֲלֵם is not grammatically quite normal. ["The suffix refers to the forefathers, and the participle has both the article and suffix because it is not to be conceived as a noun, nor as the expression of a finished act (ὁ ἀναγαγών), but is to be thought as possessing continued verbal force (GES. Gr., § 135, 2), and is to be construed as an imperfect: ille qui sursum ducebat, educebat; on this account the suffix has the accusative or objective form em as Ps. lxviii. 28, not am, comp. Job xl. 19; Ps. ciii. 4." DELITZSCH.—D. M.]. I am inclined, with DE ROSSI, to believe that הַמַּעֲלֶה (which is found in one very old codex cited by KENNICOTT, and in two of DE ROSSI'S, one of which is very accurate), is the right reading. The LXX., Peshito and the Arabic version in the London Polyglott, favor this reading. [But there is here no necessity for correcting the text.—D. M.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The prayer commences with a historical retrospect. For, as the suppliant intends to entreat new grace from God, he gives this prayer an appropriate foundation by first of all making mention of the former mercies of Jehovah. He, therefore, begins, vers. 7 and 8, by recalling the election of the people, and the glorious succor rendered to them in what might be called the time of their birth and childhood (ver. 9). The whole time from the deliverance out of Egyptian bondage to the Babylonish exile is comprehended in the brief words of ver. 10, the first part of which indicates the various apostasies of the people, and the last part the punishments which they suffered. Out of the depths of the last and greatest of these, the punishment of the Exile, there arises, vers. 11 to 14, a melancholy sigh and the question; where is He now who saved Israel from the first, the Egyptian captivity, so wonderfully by the hand of Moses?

2. I will mention —— loving-kindnesses.—Ver. 7. The aim of this verse is to gain in the manifestations of favor in the past a foundation for the supplication in regard to the future. On חֶסֶד (see the List). תְּהִלּוֹת stands here as frequently (comp. Deut. xxvi. 19) as abstract for the concrete: laudationes for res laudatae, res laudabiliter gestae. [There is no reason for departing from the proper meaning of the term—praises. D. M.]. כְּעַל occurs only here and lix. 18. We must take טוּב in the abstract signification benignitas (comp. Ps. xxv. 7; xxxi. 20 et saepe), although the following relative sentence seems at first sight rather to recommend the concrete signification "bona, optima dona" (comp. Jer. xxxi. 12, 14). But against this view is the connection of טוּב with בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל by the simple preposition לְ. טוּב is, therefore, God's goodness, kindness, benevolence which springs from His love which is merciful (i. e., moved by the sight of distress), and gracious (i. e., which does not punish according to desert).

3. For he said——fought against them.—Vers. 8-10. The first manifestation of the divine goodness spoken of in ver. 7 is introduced by ויאמר. The Vav in ויאמר makes a connection, not with the historical facts just referred to, but with the loving disposition in God. In brief, emphatic, words the Prophet describes the founding of the covenant relation between Jehovah and Israel. Jehovah formed it of Himself by His free purpose of election. He declared Israel to be His people κατ' ἐξοχήν. אך has here, too, (comp. xiv. 15; xxxiv. 14, 15) on the basis of its restrictive signification, a strongly affirmative force. The LORD in declaring Israel to be His people does this with the hope that this His confidence will be perceived and justified. לא ישקרו refers, therefore, to the hope of fidelity, of obedience. (They will not deceive, disappoint this hope). And in this hope Jehovah became Israel's מושיע, i. e., Deliverer, Saviour (comp. xix. 20; xliii. 11; xlv. 15, 21; xlvii. 15; lix. 26; lx. 10). [This eighth verse is literally rendered "Only my people are they; children will not lie, or prove false; and He was to them a Saviour." The Prophet tells us that the LORD said this. We may look, then, in the books of Moses for language employed by the LORD of which this is a fair representation. That Israel is God's chosen people is often declared in the Pentateuch. In Deut. xiv. 1, 2 they are called both children and the LORD's people. Comp. Deut. vii. 6 sqq., et saepe. But the LORD never states regarding Israel that they are children that will not lie. On the contrary He testifies of them, Deut. xxxii. 20 that they are "children in whom is no faith." The LORD said to the children of Israel: "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my commandments, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." Ex. xix. 5, 6. But we look in vain in the Pentateuch for any declaration in which the LORD expresses the confident expectation that Israel would prove faithful to the covenant. So far from doing this, God foretells that Israel would prove unfaithful. We must, then, take the words children will not lie, prohibitively and as expressing what is required of children, and not the LORD's expectation; children shall not lie. The sentiment that Israel, as being God's children, ought not to act perfidiously, is expressed Deut. xxxii. 6. Comp. Deut. xvii. 16, 17 where we have as here לא with the third person of the future to express not what a king of Israel would not do, but what he ought not to do. The last clause should be strictly rendered and He was to them a Saviour.—There is no need, then, of assuming here a very strong example of anthropopathism in which God declares Himself disappointed. D. M.]. From ver. 9 we see that the suppliant has first of all in view that most ancient, glorious deliverance which was vouchsafed to the people in Egypt in the commencement of their history. We have, therefore, to refer בכל-צרתם to the oppression of the people by Pharaoh. And of this oppression it is said that it was one which the LORD Himself felt. [Rather, In all their oppression He was not an oppressor. See under Textual and Grammatical.—D. M.]. That under this affliction the sufferings of the Israelites in Egypt are to be understood, is shown by the following sentence. For by "the angel of His face" who saved them, the suppliant evidently intends מלאך יהוה, by whom the redemption of the people from Egyptian slavery was effected. The expression מלאך פניו refers immediately to Ex. xxxiii. 14, 15, where to the request of Moses that the LORD would let him know whom He intends to send with them (vers. 12, 13), the answer is given פָּנַי יֵלֵכוּ. Moses thereupon rejoins: "If פָּנֶיךָ (thy face) go not, carry us not up hence." It is impossible to discuss fully here the exceedingly difficult question of the מלאך יהוה. I refer to LANGE's thorough exposition on Gen. xii. 1 sqq. In reference to the chief question, whether the מלאך י׳ is to be regarded as a created angel, or as a precursory and partial manifestation of the Logos corresponding to the Old Testament standpoint, I would only briefly remark: 1) When Paul, 1 Cor. x. 4, regards the rock out of which Moses struck water, and which remained fixed and immovable, and did not accompany them, as a symbol of "the Spiritual Rock that followed them" of which he says: "that Rock was Christ," we must still more assume that he saw a manifestation of Christ in the angel of the face, of whom it is further said, Ex. xxiii. 21: my name is in Him; בְּקִרְבּוֹ. 2) Further, in Heb. iii. 1 Jesus is called the Apostle and high-priest of our profession. The word ἀπόστολος cannot but be in that place which is pervaded by typological ideas a translation of the Hebrew מַלְאָךְ. The author of the epistle to the Hebrews designedly avoided the use of the word ἄγγελος, because he wished to point to the man Jesus and to His human official life, i. e., to the fidelity which He displayed in it. He means to say: If He, who was so much higher than Moses, inasmuch as the Lord and Son of the house is higher than the house itself, was faithful, this exalted pattern must impel you also to fidelity. Plainly, then, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews likewise saw in the angel of the LORD a manifestation of Christ. 3) With these considerations agree the expressions פָּנִים and שְׁמִי בְּקִרְבּוֹ. For the face is the external side which is outwardly visible. Thus in Hebrew the surface of the earth and of the heaven, etc., is called פָּנִים, because the surface is that which may be seen outwardly and — we may add—is that which sees. He now, who is called God's פָּנִים, must therefore be He by whom God both sees and is seen. The latter is in not a few places of the New Testament most clearly declared regarding the Son of God. See Matt. xi. 27; John i. 18 (comp. vi. 46; 1 John iv. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 16); John xii. 45; xiv. 9. But the other idea also, that God sees through Him who is His פָּנִים, face, appears from this, that not only is creation effected by Him, but also the conservation of things created (Col. i. 16, 17), the visitation, sustentation, direction and redemption of the world. And in this Mediator is the name of God. For what God is, expresses itself in Him. We should not know that God is, and what God is, if the Mediator did not reveal it. But in the Old Covenant this face of God has not become manifest in His full equality with God, and yet at the same time in His distinction from Him. The knowledge of this mystery was reserved for the New Covenant. Nevertheless the light of the relation of the Trinity breaks through even in the Old Testament in traces here and there. In the form of an angel and under the name of angel He appears in the Old Covenant, who in the New has appeared as the Son of man. There was for Him in the Old Covenant no other form of manifestation. But He is so characterized that we can distinguish Him readily from common angels. This is, in brief, my unpretending view of this subject. אהבה is the positive, fundamental notion, חמלה (only here in Isaiah, comp. Gen. xix. 16) is the negative, accessory notion. For it denotes forbearance, refraining from the right of punishing (comp. ix. 18; xxx. 14). The sentence וינטלם וגו' seems to state that this bearing and carrying maternal love of God lasted not merely during the period of the deliverance from Egypt, but during the whole time that, from the standpoint of the Prophet, belonged to the days long gone by. This is seen from ver. 10 sqq., where the so oft-repeated, alternating relation of apostasy, punishment and return to God is comprehensively depicted. For during the whole time which passed between the Egyptian and the Babylonian captivity, what in vers. 10 sqq. is described was repeated. מרו and עִצְּבוּ have both רוח for their object (comp. iii. 8 and Eph. iv. 30). They were rebellious against and grieved the Holy Spirit by resisting the drawings of His grace and by offending His holy nature with doing evil. The expression רוח קדש occurs in the Old Testament besides here and ver. 11 only further in Ps. li. 13. The adjective קָדוֹשׁ is never joined with רוּחַ. The necessary consequence of resisting the Holy Spirit is that the LORD too is changed into an adversary of him who resists Him. הוא stands emphatically before נלחם־בם: How dreadful it is to have Him as an adversary!

4. Then He remembered —— glorious name, vers. 11–14. Jehovah's being their enemy brought so many evils on the people that they out of the depths of the last and greatest distress long earnestly for the restoration of the old friendship. The question: Where is He that brought them up? etc., can come only from the mouth of the people. For this reason the subject of ויזכר can only be עַמּוֹ, not Moses or the indefinite "they" (German man). The people remembered the old days of Moses, i. e. the days when Moses led the people and procured for them the wonderful manifestations of the favor of God. The accumulation of substantives in the genitive characterizes the language of Isaiah; at all events, this form of expression occurs in no book of the Old Testament so frequently and in such intensity as in Isaiah. Comp. xviii. 1, where two words follow in the construct state. There are three such words in xiii. 4; xxviii. 1; four in x. 12; five in xxi. 17. Comp. EWALD, § 291 a.—[DR. NAEGELSBACH (see under Text. and Gram.) would drop the suffix in המעלם, and would render: "Where is He that brought up out of the sea the shepherd of His flock?" The sea here is the Nile, and the shepherd, Moses; and the fact referred to, the deliverance of Moses when an infant from drowning. But this view is exposed to obvious and insuperable objections. DELITZSCH refers the suffix in המעלם to the forefathers of Israel, takes אֵת as=una cum, and is disposed to read רֹעֵי, which is strongly attested, instead of the singular. By the shepherds of the flock he understands Moses and Aaron with Miriam, Ps. lxxvii. 21; Micah vi. 4. If we, with the E. V., regard God as the subject of "remembered," then it is better, with KAY, to put a full stop at "people," and omit the word "saying," and regard the appeal that follows as made by the Prophet in the people's name. It is unsuitable to put it in the mouth of Jehovah. Against making עַמּוֹ the subject of ויזכר, the remoteness of its position is an obvious objection. Such an asyndeton as that in מֹשֶׁה עַמּוֹ is of frequent occurrence, and, on the whole, the rendering of the E. V., if we only strike out the supplied word saying, is the most obvious and natural.—D. M.] God gave Moses His Holy Spirit, and with Him the gift to perform miracles, and to lead and teach the people (comp. Num. xi. 17).—[But the suffix in בקרבו refers to עַם, the people, and not to Moses alone.—D. M.]—The beginning of ver. 12 is literally rendered: who made the arm of His glory to go at the right hand of Moses. The most remarkable effect of this was the dividing of the water before them, the Israelites (properly away from the face of them, so that the waters went out of the way). HITZIG, UMBREIT, KNOBEL, understand the words of the water from the rock (Ex. xvii. 5 sqq.). But this event, as belonging to a later time, could not well be placed before the passage through the Red Sea. Moreover, בקע is especially employed of this dividing of the waves of the sea, Ex. xiv. 21; Ps. lxxviii. 13; Neh. ix. 11. These great and wonderful deeds of God had the design to make known, first to the people of Israel, and then to other nations also, the name of Jehovah, i. e. the nature of that God who is called Jehovah; and thus to bring them to the knowledge of His exclusive Godhead (Neh. ix. 10; Isa. lv. 13; ver. 14). The depths, ver. 13, are plainly the depths of the Red Sea (not of the Jordan, as KNOBEL thinks).—[This is clear from comparing Ps. cvi. 9.—D. M.]—One might suppose that Israel would have trodden with trembling, uncertain steps the strange way over the bottom of the sea on which human foot was never set, with the walls of the standing waters on the right hand and on the left. But it was not so. Rapidly and surely, as the desert horse goes over the flat, smooth desert, without tottering, so did they march over that strange, perilous road. The Israelites are the subject of יכשלו. The image of the cattle descending into the valley is very appropriate for marking the arrival of the Israelites in the promised land after the journeying in the desert. For the dry, stony deserts through which Israel had to march were really higher than the fertile regions watered by the Nile and the Jordan. It seems to me, too, that the Prophet here thinks of the herds of Nomades that must cross a mountain range or a plateau in order to reach regions rich in pasture. Just so the Spirit of the Lord, who by means of the leaders directed the march of Israel, brought the people to rest. The Prophet could justly designate the arrival of Israel in Palestine after the long journeying as an attaining to rest. The same thing had been said before (Deut. xii. 9; Josh. i. 13; xxi. 44; xxii. 4; xxiii. 1; Ps. xcv. 11; comp. Heb. iii. 11, 18; iv. 1, 3, 9). The last sentence of ver. 14 is a recapitulation. כֵּן refers to all that goes before, and the words to make thyself a glorious name declare that the design of the Lord was not merely to confer a benefit on the Israelites of that time, but to prepare the way for the knowledge and acknowledgment of His name among all nations and to all times (ver. 12).

2. PRAYER THAT THE LORD MIGHT LOOK UPON THEM AND REMOVE SIN AND ITS PUNISHMENT.

Chap. LXIII. 15–19*a*. (19)

15 Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory:
Where is thy zeal and thy strength,
[1]The sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me?
[a]Are they restrained?
16 Doubtless thou art our father,
[b]Though Abraham be ignorant of us,
And Israel acknowledge us not:
Thou, O Lord, art our father, [2]our redeemer;
Thy name is from everlasting.
17 O Lord, [c]why hast thou made us to err from thy ways,
And hardened our heart from thy fear?
Return for thy servants' sake,
[d]The tribes of thine inheritance.
18 The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while:
Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary.
19 [e]We are thine:
Thou never barest rule over them:
[3]They were not called by thy name.

[1] Or, the multitude. [2] Or, our redeemer from everlasting is thy name.
[3] Or, thy name was not called upon them.

[a] they are restrained. [b] because. [c] Why dost thou make us err. [d] to the tribes.
[e] We have become as those over whom thou never barest rule, on whom thy name was not called.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 16. ["According to the accents the words גֹּאֲלֵנוּ מֵעוֹלָם are connected together. The more correct accentuation would be גֹּאֲלֵנוּ Tifha, מֵעוֹלָם Mercha. From remote antiquity Jahve had acted toward Israel in such a way that the latter could call him גֹּאֲלֵנוּ. What takes place in the present time is so different as to put faith to a hard trial. Translate: Our Redeemer is from ancient time thy name." Delitzsch.—D. M.].

Ver. 18. בּוֹסְסוּ, Pilel from בּוּס (ver. 6; xiv. 19, 25) is to tread down, καταπατεῖν, and includes the idea of profaning and defiling.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. After laying the foundation for His prayer by the retrospect of what Jehovah had been of old to His people, the suppliant now passes over to the entreaty that the Lord would graciously look down from heaven on the present distress, and not restrain His love and might (ver. 15). He still remains the Father of the people, after Abraham and Israel, who had been long ago removed by death, have become strangers to them so far as rendering actual aid is concerned (ver. 16). With great boldness the Lord is expostulated with for permitting the people to go astray and to become hardened, and He is called upon to change His conduct towards His elect people

(ver. 17). The complaint is made to Him that the people had possessed only for a short time the land promised to them as an inheritance for ever, while the centre of the land, the Sanctuary, which alone gives the country its value, had been trodden down by their enemies (ver. 18), so that Israel is now situated as if Jehovah had never been their LORD, and His name had never been called upon them (ver. 19 a).

2. Look down from heaven——restrained.—Ver. 15. רְאֵה more frequently follows than precedes הַבֵּט. The LORD has to look down from heaven, for thither He has as it were retired. He is no more to be found in His earthly sanctuary, but only in His heavenly. [But compare Deut. xxvi. 15; Ps. cxv. 3. The prayer is rather founded on the acknowledged truth, "The LORD looketh from heaven. . . . . From the place of His habitation He looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth." Ps. xxxiii. 13, 14. D. M.]. Solomon had said in his dedicatory prayer (1 Kings viii. 13 comp. 2 Chron. vi. 2) "I have built thee a house to dwell in (בֵּית זְבֻל)." To this passage the suppliant seems to allude, when he asks the LORD to look down from the habitation of His holiness and glory. For the earthly בֵּית זְבֻל is destroyed. The word זְבֻל is found only here in Isaiah. Once more the suppliant returns to what he misses. He asks again with אַיֵּה: Where is thy zeal and thy mighty deeds? The zeal of Jehovah is twofold: against His people, so far they make common cause with those who hate the LORD. For then they have the LORD who is a zealous God (Ex. xx. 5; Deut. iv. 24; v. 9) against them. But the zeal of Jehovah is also active for His people, against the enemies of the theocracy (comp. ix. 6; xxvi. 11; xxxvii. 32; xlii. 13; lix. 17). The expression הֲמוֹן מֵעִים, strepitus viscerum, as image of the emotion of compassion, of commiseratio, is found in the form of a substantive only here, but the verbal expression occurs, xvi. 11; Jer. xxxi. 20; xlviii. 30. In אֵלַי observe the change of number. הִתְאַפָּק, se cohibere, comp. xlii. 14; lxiv. 11.

3. Doubtless thou——everlasting.—Ver. 16. [The E. V. departs in two instances in this verse from the proper signification of כִּי, rendering it in the first, doubtless, and in the second, though. In both cases its strict sense of for, because, can be retained, as is done by DR. NAEGELSBACH. But we prefer taking the second כִּי as = when, which in this connection does not differ much from though. D. M.]. Ver. 16 declares the reason why Israel entreats the LORD to be pleased to look upon their need and to manifest His power and love on them. Jehovah alone is the true Father of Israel. They have indeed also human progenitors who stand in high honor and authority; Abraham (comp. li. 2) as their remote, and Israel, the strong contender with God (Gen. xxxii. 28), their immediate ancestor. But these are men, are long dead, and incapable from their present abode outside this world, to take knowledge (הִכִּיר dignovit, lxi. 9) of Israel's lot; not to say that they could not possibly interpose to render them active support. [This is not very satisfactory, though the view of VITRINGA, DELITZSCH and the best interpreters. But if we take the second כִּי in the common sense of when, and translate "For thou art our Father when Abraham does not know us, and Israel does not recognize us," then the idea would be that natural affection and regard would cease rather than that God's paternal love should fail, or His covenant of adoption be annulled. Such a sense is very appropriate. See Ps. xxvii. 10. Comp. CALVIN on our passage. KAY remarks, "This verse and lxiv. 8 are the only places in the Old Testament where the address Our Father is used in prayer. The Spirit of adoption was not yet given (Gal. iv. 4-6)." D. M.].

4. O Lord, why hast thou——thy name. Vers. 17-19 a. JEROME understands the words of ver. 17 as an utterance of the apostate Jews. As Paul in the Epistles to the Corinthians addresses pious and ungodly persons, so here both the pious and the ungodly speak to God. These latter are said here, "movere Domino quaestionem, et suam culpam referre in Deum." JEROME, however, vindicates God, and says that in reality God is not the cause of error and hardness of heart, but that error and obduracy are only mediately occasioned by His patience, while He does not chastise offenders. THEODORET makes the Jews here directly reproach God with having by His patience incurred the guilt of their delinquencies. OECOLAMPADIUS regards this passage as having a double sense. As an utterance of the ungodly it contains actual blasphemy (blasphema inter precandum dicunt: suam culpam in Deum transcribunt), while in the mouth of the godly it expresses only the painful confession that they, after the withdrawal of the divine grace and help, could not but go astray. CALVIN disputes all softening of the language by the assumption of foreknowledge or permission. But he makes a distinction. He distinguishes between an indirect or negative hardening (rite excoecare, indurare, inclinare dicitur, quibus facultatem videndi, parendi, recte exsequendi adimit), and a direct or positive (when He per Satanam et consilia reproborum destinat, quo visum est, et voluntates excitat et conatus firmat). As instances of the latter kind he cites Pharaoh (Ex. iv. 21; vii. 3; x. i., etc.), and Sihon the king of the Amorites (Deut. ii. 30). For the first-mentioned kind he appeals to Ezek. vii. 26; Ps. cvii. 40; Job xii. 20, 24. and to the passage before us (comp. Institutio II., 4, 3 sq.). Whether that indirect hardening, of which CALVIN speaks, is essentially different from the permissive, may be doubted. I therefore believe that all those interpreters—and they form the majority—who understand this passage of the divine permission, mean nothing else than what CALVIN intends by that former kind of hardening. For the cessatio directionis divinae, the ablatio spiritus, the sublatio luminis is just nothing else than that procedure of God by which He makes sin possible, or permits it. LUTHER, in particular, belongs to those who explain our place in the permissive sense, and with his fine feeling he is able, without doing violence to the words, to remove what causes offence from them. He says: "Sunt verba ardentis affectus. Ah, Domine, quare sinis nos sic errare? Nos hunc affectum non intelligimus, quare privative accipiemus, ut sit sententia: quia nolumus audire tuum verbum, permisisti nos errare et peccare; sicut fit, peccatum peccati est poena." And certainly in the mouth of the suppliant church ver. 17 can never be taken as a blasphemous reproach. But the church in the deepest sorrow, and during a momentary eclipse of the future prospect before her, feels herself driven to put this question, Why? Not as if she would say that there exists no reason, or only a bad one, but simply to intimate that she does not perceive the reason, that here the providence of God appears to her dark, inexplicable. The church mourns because the Lord has not hindered her going astray, her hardening in evil, which exists not indeed in all, but in many of her members. She thinks that He, the Almighty, could have done it, if He had wished. That He has not willed it is to her inconceivable. She does not even see how this, her partial apostasy must, on the whole, co-operate to the realization of God's gracious counsel. The statement in this verse is in harmony with vi. 9, 10, and with xxix. 10; xlv. 7. [But in xlv. 7 the evil which God creates is physical evil or pain, the opposite of peace.—D. M.]. For here, as there, God is apparently designated as the author of evil, while yet God can never will evil as such. But when men do not will the good, then they must at last will the evil. It becomes a necessity in the way of punishment, in order that they may be thoroughly acquainted with it, and be thereby healed (see on vi. 9 sq. and xxix. 10). As an unauthorised weakening of the genuine meaning of this place I must regard it when SEB. SCHMIDT and GROTIUS understand the words de futuro: Why shall it then come to this, that we go astray and harden ourselves in idolatry? The imperfects (futures) תתענו and תקשיח can only be taken to mean an action not yet finished, and therefore only in the sense of the enduring present. If we ask what sin the Prophet specially has in view when he speaks of erring and hardening, we must say that this erring and hardening can take place in all forms of sin, but that, in the end, all these evil fruits have a common root, namely, the sin against the first (second) commandment, idolatry. We must, of course, think here not only of gross, but also of refined idolatry. The Rabbinical commentators are of the opinion that the Prophet has here in view, doubt, despair and unbelief as the consequences of the long duration of the Exile. This is quite possible, if we think not merely of the Babylonish Captivity, but also, and specially, of the present exile that still continues. But the look of the Prophet is primarily directed to the Babylonian exile, and regarding it we must say that it became to many Jews an occasion even of visible apostacy from Jehovah and of gross idolatry. קָשַׁח (certainly hardened from קָשָׁה) occurs besides here only in Job xxxix. 16, where it has the signification "to regard or treat harshly." מִן before יראתך has here a negative force, and the sentence expresses a consequence, so as not to fear thee. Comp. lxii. 10; lix. 1, 2 et saepe. While the Prophet sees the LORD, as it were, engaged in a woful work, the work namely of judicially hardening ever more the mass of Israel after the flesh, he becomes anxious for Israel as a body. If this continues, what shall become of the elect people? Who will be able to withstand the current of inward and outward corruption? Therefore he entreats the LORD not to continue to act in this way, but to reverse the course He is pursuing. The Prophet has very probably Num. x. 36 before his mind in using the word שׁוּב. Accordingly, as the verb is intransitive, we have to regard שִׁבְטֵי נ׳, not as in apposition to עֲבָדֶיךָ, but as the accusative of place dependent on שׁוּב. Then we obtain the idea that the Prophet conceives the erring and hardening spoken of as caused by the LORD turning away from Israel, and leaving them to their fate. He is here besought, in opposition to this, to return to the tribes of His inheritance, and that for His servants' sake. Who are these servants? They can only be those who faithfully serve the LORD in distinction from those who err and harden themselves. But the Prophet means by these servants not merely those who in the present time have remained faithful, but all faithful servants of Jehovah of all times. He thinks especially of the patriarchs who first received the promises. It is for the sake of all His faithful servants that the LORD does not entirely reject Israel. That Israel here bears the designation the tribes of thine inheritance is doubtless because the Prophet wishes thereby to point to Jehovah's election of Israel to be His סְגֻלָּה (Ex. xix. 5; Deut. vii. 6 et saepe), His specially dear to Him and inalienable inheritance (xix. 25; xlvii. 6). To the complaint of the decay of religious life (ver. 17) there is added (vers. 18, 19 a) a complaint regarding the mournful external relations, the fruit of that internal decay. The subject of יָרְשׁוּ can only be עם-קרשך. If we take צרינו as subject, as many do, we must then take לַמִּצְעָר in a signification which it has not. For מִצְעָר (besides here Gen. xix. 20; Job viii. 7; Ps. xlii. 7; 2 Chron. xxiv. 24) is the harder form of מִזְעָר, which latter occurs in no other Old Testament writer than Isaiah, who has it in x. 25; xxix. 17; xvi. 14; xxiv. 6. The signification is everywhere paulum, a little. The word is synonymous with מְעַט, which word in all these places of Isaiah (with exception of the last-mentioned, xxiv. 6,) is joined to מזער. If now we take צרינו as subject, we must take למצער in the sense of propemodum, parum abest quin, almost, nearly, as COCCEIUS, LUTHER and STIER do. But then the form should be כִּמְצְעָר after the analogy of כִּמְעַט. Further, למצער can neither be = כצער without לְ (LXX.) nor = nullo pretio, sine labore (JEROME). למצער can only be a particle of time, and mean for a short time. Many are inclined to regard מקרשך as the common object of ירשו and בוססו, while they take מקרש either as a designation of the whole land, or of the temple alone. But the whole land is never called מקרש, and the expression ירש cannot well be employed of the temple. We must, too, in that case refer למצער to both sentences. For it stands as emphatically at the beginning as כקרשך stands at the close. I, therefore, agree with DELITZSCH in taking ירשׁו absolutely, and in understanding as its object the land. This object could be easily omitted, as ירשׁ is used countless times both of the taking of the holy land into possession, and of the holding of it in possession. The word, too, is often employed absolutely: Deut. ii. 24, 31; Gen. xxi. 10; 2 Sam. xiv. 7; Mic. i. 15, et saepe. Although למצער is a rhetorical hyperbole, it is yet justified, inasmuch as, if the LORD does not hear the prayer contained in ver. 17 b, the time during which Israel possessed the land would be short in comparison with the following permanent exclusion from its possession. The treading down of the Sanctuary is regarded as the dissolving of the bond of connection between Israel and his God. Israel stands, therefore, now as a people over which Jehovah has never ruled. It is no more distinguished in anything from the heathen nations. Before מעולם, which must be connected with what follows, אשׁר is to be supplied. According to our way of speaking כּאשׁר would be required. [In the E. V. the important word thine is arbitrarily supplied. Dr. NAEGELSBACH's rendering is here to be preferred: We are become as those over whom thou never barest rule, (or didst not rule from ancient time), on whom thy name was never called.—D. M.]. That Israel has been, as it were, marked with the name of Jehovah, and thus distinguished from all nations, is always set forth as one of its greatest privileges (comp. Deut. xxviii. 10; 2 Chron. vii. 14; Jer. xiv. 9, et saepe. Comp. Isa. xliii. 7; lxv. 1). [The first verse of chap. lxiv. in the E. V. forms the latter part of ver. 19 of the preceding chapter in the Hebrew text. It is convenient in the Commentary to adhere to the division of chapters and verses observed in the Hebrew Bible. Accordingly, what stands in the English Bible as the first verse of chap lxiv. appears in the Commentary as the conclusion of lxiii. 19. And in conformity with this arrangement chap. lxiv., instead of twelve, has only eleven verses.—D. M.].

3. PRAYER THAT THE LORD WOULD VISIBLY INTERVENE, AND SO PROVE HIMSELF TO BE, AS OF OLD, THE GOD AND FATHER OF ISRAEL.

CHAPTER LXIII. 19 b to LXIV. 11. (LXIV. 1–12).

CHAP. LXIII. 19 b. Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens,
That thou wouldest come down,
That the mountains might flow down at thy presence,

CHAP. LXIV. 1. As when [1a]the melting fire burneth,
The fire causeth the waters to boil,
To make thy name known to thine adversaries,
That the nations may tremble at thy presence!
2 [b]When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for,
Thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence.
3 For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear,
Neither hath the eye [2]seen, O God, beside thee,
What he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.
4 Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness,
[c]Those that remember thee in thy ways:
Behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned:
[d]In those is continuance, and we shall be saved.
5 But we are all [e]as an unclean thing,
And all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags:
And we all do fade as a leaf;
And our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.
6 And there is none that calleth upon thy name,
That stirreth up himself to take hold of thee:
For thou hast hid thy face from us,
And hast [3]consumed us, [4]because of our iniquities.
7 But now, O LORD, thou art our father;
We are the clay, and thou our potter;
And we all are the work of thy hand.
8 Be not wroth very sore, O LORD,
Neither remember iniquity for ever:
Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people.

9 Thy holy cities are a wilderness,
Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation.
10 Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee,
Is burned up with fire:
And all our pleasant things are laid waste.
11 Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things, O Lord?
Wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?

[1] Heb. the fire of meltings. [2] Or, seen a God beside thee, which doeth so for him, etc. [3] Heb. melted.
[4] Heb. by the hand of.

[a] As fire kindles brushwood. [b] When thou dost terrible deeds which we did not expect,—that thou wouldest come down, that mountains might flow down before thee! [c] In thy ways they remember thee. [d] for a long time it is so; and shall we be saved? [e] We were all as the unclean (person), etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19 b. Regarding the division into chapters, there can be no doubt that what follows from lxiii. 19 b is closely connected with what precedes. There is no reason for beginning a new chapter here. It would be appropriate to make the chapter begin at lxiii. 15. But it is quite awkward to commence the chapter with בְּקָרַעְתָּ. With עֲלֵיהֶם, lxiii. 19 a, the verse ought properly to close.—[Delitzsch, while he condemns the beginning of a new chapter with בְּקָרַעְתָּ, defends the Masoretic division of verses, and maintains that lxiii. 19 b could not be united with lxiv. 1, for the verse thus formed would be beyond measure overladen. This sigh, too, belongs really to 19 a, as it arises out of the depths of the complaint there expressed.—D. M.]—נָזֹלּוּ is probably a mongrel form from נָזַלּוּ and יִזֹּלּוּ. For from זָלַל, to shake, comes the perfect Niphal נָזַלּוּ. But the Prophet wished to speak not merely of a shaking, but also of a dissolving, a flowing down of the mountains (comp. Ps. xlvi. 7 [6]). For this purpose he availed himself of the freedom allowed in forming the Niphal of verbs, ע״ע. The Niphal of these verbs can be inflected, as if its normal third person masculine were an independent stem. Thus we have נְסַבָּה, Ezek. xli. 7; נָזֹלּוּ, Judges v. 5, as if these were forms of the Kal, נָזַל, נָסַב. There occur, moreover, Niphal forms which suppose a Kal perfect e or o, from which they are formed: נְסַבָּה, Ezek. xxvi. 2; נָבֹא, Amos iii. 11; נָגֹלּוּ, Isa. xxxiv. 4, etc. In this way נָזֹלּוּ has arisen, and the occasion of its formation seems to have been the endeavor to unite the significations of the stems זָלַל and נָזַל. The one of these stems has given the consonants and the vocalisation of the first syllable, the other, the vocalization of the second syllable (comp. Olshausen, § 263, 6, p. 592).—[It is hard to imagine that the Prophet intended by the irregular form which he employed to unite in it both the meaning of זָלַל, to shake, and that of נָזַל, to flow. Most modern interpreters prefer to assume as the stem זָלַל.—D. M.]

Ver. 4. The combination שָׂשׂ וְעֹשֵׂה צֶדֶק is manifestly formed in the genuine style of Isaiah for the sake of the alliteration.—[There is here no example of alliteration.—D. M.]—This combination is grammatically admissible according to the usage which allows us to add to a verb a nearer specification by means of a second verb in the same verbal form and connected by wav (comp. Job vi. 9; 2 Sam. vii. 29; Deut. v. 19, et saepe).

Ver. 5. וַתְּבֻל is, it appears to me, Hiphil from בָּלָה, marcuit, absumtus, confectus est.—[Delitzsch regards it as the Hiphil from בָּלַל, or from נָבַל = נבול.—D. M.]—The Hiphil is directly causative, to produce withering, i. e. to wither away.

Ver. 6. ותמוגנו is Kal, which is here exceptionally used in a transitive signification (comp. on בָּעֲרָה קָרַחַ, ver. 1). בְּיַד marks the terminus in quem, and recalls Gen. xiv. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In violent agitation the suppliant expresses the wish that God would put an end to all this misery by a visible and grand manifestation of His might and majesty, that He would come down upon the earth, so that all His enemies must flee trembling before Him (lxiii. 19 b–lxiv. 2). And Jehovah can do this, for He alone has proved Himself by deeds to be the living God to those who hope in Him (vers. 3, 4 a). God's procedure hitherto, in ever visiting Israel with repeated punishment, has been of no avail. Israel has not reformed thereby, but has only sunk deeper in impurity, corruption and decay (vers. 4 b–6). But Jehovah is Israel's Father. Israel is the clay in His hand, and He is the Potter. Is not Israel then, such as it is, properly His work? (ver 7) [?] Let it please Him, then, not to exercise wrath to the utmost degree, but to consider that Israel is His people (ver. 8). All the cities of the holy land lie waste and desolate, even Zion and Jerusalem (ver. 9). The temple is burnt down, and all places in which Israel once delighted are ruins (ver. 10). Can Jehovah endure this? Can He be silent at it, and only continue to afflict His people? (ver. 11).

2. Oh, that thou wouldest rend——thy ways.—lxiii. 19 b–lxiv. 4 a. At the head of the preceding paragraph (lxiii. 15–19 a) we read the prayer that the Lord would graciously look down from heaven on the misery of His people (ver. 15). How needful it is that He should do this is then shown by various negative and positive reasons. The suppliant is now not satisfied with a mere looking down. He has come to know (ver. 17 sqq.) how great the gulf is which separates Israel inwardly and outwardly from its God. Inwardly, a great part of the nation has gone astray from Jehovah, and is even confirmed, hardened in this apostasy: externally, the people have been expelled from the land of their inheritance and from their sanctuary. The suppliant now thinks that in order to heal all these evils, there is needed a grand and signal manifestation of the divine majesty which should strike down all unbelief and annihilate all opposition. He desires, therefore, that God would rend the heaven, remove as it were the curtain which now conceals Him from the bodily eye, and thus makes unbelief and its consequences possible. Something is here asked, which is far more than the bowing of the heaven and coming down which is described in Ps. xviii. 10 as having taken place, and which is implored in Ps. cxliv. 5. In these places by the bowing of the heaven and coming down only a manifestation by means of a tempest is denoted, while Isaiah here prays that Jehovah would show Himself in His terrible majesty, as according to Ezek. i. 1 He did really show Himself to His prophet. לוא comp. on xlviii. 18. The perfect after לוא depicts impatience. The rending of the heaven and coming down is set forth not as something merely possible, but as something in regard to which merely the wish is expressed that it may have already happened. In what way the Prophet pictures to himself the occurrence indicated by נזלו, he explains in lxiv. 1 by two comparisons. He supposes the δόξα which surrounds the Lord as consuming fire penetrating the mountains, though these are properly not combustible, and kindling them as easily and rapidly as fire ignites a fagot, yea, dissolving them despite their hardness and consistency into a boiling, seething mass, just as fire causes liquid water to boil (comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 15: xcvii. 5). קָדַח stands in Deut. xxxii. 22; Jer. xv. 14 in an intransitive sense, but in the parallel passage Jer. xvii. 4, and in Isaiah l. 11, it is transitive. בָּעָה, too, which from the radical meaning "ebullire" has, on the one hand, the signification of hot desire, longing, asking (xxi. 12 bis), on the other, that of blowing one's self up, swelling (xxx. 13), possesses both a transitive and an intransitive power, as is the case with so many Hebrew verbal stems. הֲמָסִים, ἁπ. λεγ., which the LXX. render by κηρός, wax, and the Vulgate by tabescere, was perceived by De Dieu and Schultens to be related to the Arabic hams and haschim (dry herb, dry, brittle wood). It denotes sarmenta, dry wood of the vine or of branches, brushwood. [Instead of "as when the melting fire burneth (E. V.), translate as fire kindles brushwood." D. M.]. The aim of this indubitable manifestation of Jehovah is that He may make His name (i. e., the knowledge of His being comprised in word) known to his enemies, i. e., to all those who stray from Him and harden themselves in this alienation (ver. 17), whether they are Israelites or heathen. The Prophet evidently hopes that this manifestation as demonstratio ad oculos will compel all Israelites, who hitherto did not believe the instruction given to them (because its evidence was not palpable enough) to know and acknowledge their God. If, however, there should be some among the גוים, who, notwithstanding this revelation apparent to the senses, should not be disposed to believe, these must at least flee vanquished and incapable of resistance. On מפניך comp. on lxiii. 12. בעשותך וגו׳ in ver. 2 is dependent on להודיע. The knowledge of the name of God will be imparted to men, so far as this rending and coming down is a deed, not merely an instruction by word. This is a thought quite after Isaiah's manner, as may be seen from comparing xxvi. 8–10, the remarks on which passage may be consulted. After the statement of the design to make thy name known, etc., the manner of doing this is also declared: in thy doing terrible things etc. [Not: When thou didst terrible, etc.—E. V.]. And then there is mention again made of the visible event which should precede the making known of Jehovah's name to His adversaries. For at the close of verse 2 we have a repetition of the conclusion of lxiii. 19 (Oh, that) thou wouldest come down, etc. [Not, as in the E. V.: Thou camest down, etc.]. By this recurrence of the same words the verses lxiii 19 b –lxiv. 2 are shown to form logically and rhetorically an inseparable whole. The words of the third verse [fourth in E. V.] stand manifestly in a causal relation to what precedes. The Prophet had expressed the bold wish that the Lord might no longer remain concealed, but might visibly display His Godhead. Can this happen? Imaginary gods cannot, indeed, comply with such a requirement. But Jehovah is no fictitious god. He is the true, the living God. And He alone has shown Himself as such from the beginning. For from primeval time men have not seen nor heard a God beside Jehovah who showed Himself by living deed to him who hopes in Him. I take ו before מעולם in a causal sense = and truly, as we had it frequently already (e. g., xxiv. 5; xxxviii. 17; xxxix. 1, comp. with 2 Kings xx. 12). That אלהים is to be taken as the accusative, and not as the vocative, is clear, because neither in itself nor in this connection is it a suitable thought to say: None but Thou, O God, has seen and heard what Thou wilt do to those who hope in Thee. For it is self-evident that no one previously saw and heard what God intends. And what, too, is intended by this strange sentence in this connection? And how explain the change of person in יעשה? It is objected that האזין is not in other cases followed by the accusative. But this is not the case. האזין has frequently, when in the parallelism שָׁמַע corresponds to it, the accusative after it (Gen. iv. 23; Job xxxiii. 1), and we may say that in the passage before us האזינו is subordinated to the שמעו as a merely rhetorical repetition, and forms one idea with it. Even if the construction of האזין with the accusative could not in any way be justified, this would not signify. For the accusative אלהים can also depend on the verb ראתה alone as the nearest verb. Delitzsch rightly remarks: "We cannot in chapters xl.–lxvi. hear the words אלהים זולתך preceded by a negation, without at once receiving the impression that Jahve's [Jehovah's] exclusive Godhead is attested (xlv. 5, 21)." יעשה stands in a pregnant sense, as in Ps. xxii. 32; xxxvii. 5; lii.

11; Jer. xiv. 7; Dan. viii. 24; xi. 17, 28, 30. The God, who from the beginning has proved Himself to be a real, living God by working, i. e., by such indubitable proofs in deeds as only a real, living power could show—this God can also do that which the Prophet (lxiii. 19 b-lxiv. 2) with such intense ardor desires to see. I, too, believe that Paul freely quotes this passage in 1 Cor. ii. 9. But I think, on account of the words "καὶ ἐπὶ καρδίαν ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἀνέβη," that the place lxv. 17 was also before the Apostle's mind. [Paul's quotation of this place is seen to be appropriate when we reflect that the Object perceived by no ear, seen by no eye, is, as DELITZSCH puts it, not God in Himself, but the God who acts for His people, who justifies their waiting on Him.—D. M.]. What the Prophet had intimated by the one word יַעֲשֶׂה, he expands in the first part of verse 4. פָּגַע is a strong expression, and is intended to denote a friendly impingere, but one which is right sensibly felt, an occursus which leaves no doubt as to the reality of the person who meets us, though He should be invisible. פָּגַע stands with the accusative in the general sense of meeting (Ex. v. 20; xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. x. 5; Amos v. 19; comp. Ex. v. 3; Isa. xlvii. 3). The LORD meets in a way that is perceptible to Him who loves righteousness and practises it, i. e., does it with joy. ["He who rejoices and works righteousness is one in whom joy and doing right are united. The expression is therefore equivalent to rejoices to do righteousness. But it is, perhaps, more correct, with HOFMANN, to take צֶדֶק as the object of both verbs: Such as let what is right be their joy and their work; for שׂוּשׂ (שִׂישׂ), though it cannot immediately (see viii. 6; xxxv. 1), can mediately, as here and lxv. 18, be joined with the accusative of the object."—DELITZSCH.—D. M.]. As the Prophet, in lxiv. 4 b passes over to a new, specifically different thought, הֵן אַתָּה must begin a new verse.

3. Behold, thou art wroth——us away. Vers. 4 b-6. With these words the Prophet sets that procedure which the LORD had hitherto pursued over against that which he himself so ardently longs for as certainly leading to the desired end. Hitherto the LORD has been wroth. Although individuals might experience the assisting grace of their God, yet, on the whole, His conduct toward His people was characterized by anger. And what was the result? Was Israel thereby reformed? No. The old sin ever succeeded punishment. Sin, punishment, and sin again, that has been the whole history of Israel from the beginning. This is, in my judgment, the meaning of the words בָּהֶם עוֹלָם. Thus קָצַפְתָּ retains its full force as a perfect, and וַנֶּחֱטָא retains unimpaired the signification of an aoristic imperfect. בָּהֶם has a neuter force: in (with, during) these (things) which are indicated by thou wast angry, and we sinned, is (contained, elapsed) an עוֹלָם, i. e., an eternity, a period of incalculable duration. The writer means the עוֹלָם so often spoken of previously (lxiii. 9, 11, 16, 19; lxiv. 3): the past of the people of Israel. Its history was really since the journeying in the wilderness an uninterrupted series of transgressions and punishments. It cannot be objected that הָעוֹלָם would be required. For the Prophet will not press the idea "time past," or even "the past of the Israelitish people." He just wishes to say that an eternity has passed in such an alternation of things. That בָּהֶם can be used thus indefinitely, is beyond doubt (comp. xxxviii. 16; Ezek. xxxiii. 18; Jer. xviii. 13, etc.). So, in the main, DELITZSCH. But he translates: "In this state we have been already long." It appears to me, that in order to express this, the Prophet would have written כְּעוֹלָם. I, too, take וְנִוָּשֵׁעַ as a question (comp., e. g., Ezek. xx. 31). If punishing and correcting have already lasted for an eternity without good result, can this be the right way to save Israel? [This question is hardly becoming. And such correction is really God's successful way of turning Israel from their sins (comp. xxvii. 9; Hos. v. 15, etc.). If under בָּהֶם we understand God's wrath and Israel's sin, then we must take ונושע as a question, which looks a somewhat arbitrary construction. The translators of the English version evidently regarded בָּהֶם as referring to בדרכיך in the preceding hemistich. This view is still held by many interpreters, and it is, perhaps, on the whole entitled to the preference. Adopting it ALEXANDER thus paraphrases this verse: "Although Thou hast cast off Israel as a nation, Thou hast nevertheless met or favorably answered every one rejoicing to do righteousness, and in Thy ways or future dispensations such shall still remember and acknowledge Thee: Thou hast been angry, and with cause, for we have sinned; but in them, Thy purposed dispensations, there is perpetuity, and we shall be saved." —D. M.] That the discipline hitherto applied has not been of any help is shown by the Prophet still more in detail in what follows. Very far from being healed and sanctified, the whole people became rather as a man rendered unclean by leprosy, who must be expelled from human society (Lev. xiii. 44 sqq.). The people, therefore, that had become unclean through the leprosy of sin, must as one man be cast out of the holy land into exile. The same thing is declared under another image. The moral habitus of the people (their righteousness, i. e., juste facta, xxxiii. 15; xlv. 24) is compared with a menstruous garment (עִדִּים, ἅπ. λεγ. from עֵדָּה, counted time), whose touch makes unclean. But moral pollution deprives people of firmness and strength. Therefore the suppliant further acknowledges that they are withered as a leaf. But leaves when they are dry and fall off, become the prey of the wind. Thus iniquities (עֲוֹנֵנוּ is defectively written plural for עֲוֹנֵינוּ, ver. 6; Jer. xiv. 7; Dan. ix. 13) have mediately swept the people into exile with the irresistible force of a tempest. And in exile the mass of the people have not been improved. Although, as this prayer itself proves, the stem is not quite dead (vi. 13), it may yet be said, if we consider the great mass of the people, that there is no one who calls upon the name of the LORD, no one who would have roused himself as a man to make the necessary moral effort to take fast hold of Jehovah. [God's hiding his face stood in a causal relation to the absence of prayer on the part of the people. The neglect of calling on Jehovah's name and the want of importunity in prayer are traced to the withdrawal of the divine favor and to the abandonment of the people to the consequences of their sins.—D. M.]

4. But now, O Lord——very sore.—Vers. 7–11. וְעַתָּה is emphatic, ver. 7. It is as if he would say: "Our condition is very dreadful. The worst is to be feared. But now, Thou art our Father. Therefore there is still hope." With אבינו he returns to the thought which he had already expressed, lxiii. 16. ["Instead of relying upon any supposed merits of their own, they appeal to their own dependence upon God as a reason why He should have mercy upon them. The paternity ascribed to God is not that of natural creation in the case of individuals, but the creation of the church or chosen people, and of Israel as a spiritual and ideal person. The figure of the potter and the clay, implying absolute authority and power, is used twice before (xxix. 6; xlv. 9), and is one of the connecting links between this book and the acknowledged Isaiah." ALEXANDER.—D. M.] On the double declaration that the LORD is not only Father, but also Potter, the prayer, ver. 8, is founded that He would not be wroth very sore, nor remember iniquity forever, but rather consider that all Israel is His people. This short emphatic exclamation הן הבט-נא עמך כלנו forms plainly the highest point of the prayer, and here it could accordingly come to an end. [?] I regard it as possible that the verses 9–11 have been inserted by an Israelite living in the Exile, to whom the sad condition of the holy land, of the holy city and of the holy house seemed to be for God and Israel the thing most unendurable.

We could thus explain the singularly vivid and exact description of the state in which the home of the exiles was at the time here supposed. For certainly the words of vers. 9 and 10 do not sound as those of one who viewed the things from a distance, but as the words of one who saw them most closely. [Here our author's arbitrary theory of prophecy misleads him, comp. Introduction, foot-note, pp. 17, 18. DR. NAEGELSBACH has himself told us in the heading of this fourth discourse, lxiii. 7.–lxiv. 11, that "the Prophet transports himself in spirit into the situation of the church of the Exile." He lives in spirit in the Exile, and speaks of the misery prevailing in it as if he were an immediate eye-witness. This is in accordance with the custom of the Prophet. That condition of things which Isaiah by prophetic anticipation here describes as existing, is clearly predicted by his cotemporary Micah (iii. 12). It was after the Prophet had described the treading down of the sanctuary (lxiii. 18) that he exclaimed, Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens and come down, etc.; and it is strange that vers. 9 and 10 should not be considered by our author as a most appropriate close to the prayer, and that these verses should be regarded by him as the language of carnal Israel, and as an interpolation by a later hand.—D. M.]. Thy holy cities are the cities of the land. קדש is to be taken in an abstract sense: urbes tuae sanctitatis, thy holy cities (comp. Ps. lxxviii. 54; Zech. ii. 16). Zion is here the mount Zion, the seat of the kingdom, the political centre of the theocracy; Jerusalem is the entire holy city, the national centre. There is added in ver. 10 the religious centre, the temple. ["The people call it house of our holiness and our glory; Jahve's holiness and glory have in the temple transplanted, as it were, heaven on the earth (comp. lxiii. 15 with lx. 7), and this earthly dwelling-place of God is Israel's possession, and thereby Israel's קדש and תפארת. The relative sentence tells what sacred historical recollections are attached to it. אֲשֶׁר is here = אֲשֶׁר שָׁם, where, as Gen. xxxix. 20; Numb. xx. 13 et saepe" DELITZSCH.—D. M.]. שְׂרֵפַת אֵשׁ is found only here. But comp. Isa. ix. 4. כֹּל with the predicate in the singular is uncommon; this usus loquendi does not occur elsewhere in Isaiah (comp. Ew. Gr. § 317 c; Prov. xvi. 2; Ezek. xxxi. 15). We shall not err if we understand under our pleasant things, in opposition to the previously mentioned sacred localities, the buildings in private possession. [DELITZSCH holds that the parallelism leads us under pleasant things to think of objects connected with the worship of God in which the people had a holy joy.—D. M.]. The singular חָרְבָּה is found in Isaiah only here (see the List). The expression הָיָה לְחָרְבָּה occurs no where else in Isaiah. But it is found frequently in Jeremiah, and in Ezekiel xxxviii. 8. After the Prophet had set this sad picture before the LORD, he closes with the question, whether the LORD can in such circumstances restrain himself (xlii. 14; lxiii. 15) be silent (xlii. 14; lvii. 11; lxii. 1, 6; lxv. 6) and so let His people be oppressed to the utmost (comp. xl. 27 sqq.)?

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lxiii. 7. ["God does good because He is good; what He bestows upon us must be run up to the original, it is according to His mercies, not according to our merits, and according to the multitude of His loving-kindnesses, which can never be spent. Thus we should magnify God's goodness, and speak honorably of it, not only when we plead it (as David Ps. li. 1), but when we praise it." HENRY. D. M.].

2. On lxiii. 9. The angel of the face or presence belongs to "the deep things of God" (1 Cor. ii. 10). It is not right to imagine that a certain and exhaustive knowledge is possible in reference to these things. The humility which becomes even science, imposes on it the duty to write everywhere a non liquet, where, through the nature of things, limits are placed to human knowledge. Not to regard these limitations is the manner of the pseudo-scientific, immodest scholasticism. What, therefore, we have said regarding the angel of the face makes no higher pretension than that of a modest hypothesis. [Comp. in HENGSTENBERG'S Christology, Vol. I: The Angel of the Lord in the books of Moses and in the book of Joshua.—D. M.].

3. On lxiii. 10. "There are two ways in which the Holy Ghost is offended or vexed. One way is of a less dreadful nature. It is when a man takes from the Holy Spirit the opportunity to work in the soul for its joy, as He is wont to communicate to it His gracious influence and His gracious operations. When such is the case, then as an offended friend when He perceives that no heed is given to most of His counsels, the Holy Spirit is grieved, and, although reluctantly, ceases for a time to advise the stubborn, ut carendo discat quantum peccaverit. Of this kind of grieving Paul speaks Eph. iv. 30. It can be committed by the godly and the elect. But the Holy Spirit can be offended and vexed in a gross and flagitious way, when one not only does not believe and follow Him, but also obstinately resists Him, despises all His counsel, reviles and blasphemes Him, will none of His reproof (Prov. i. 24, 25), gives the lie to His truth, and so speaks against the sun. . . This the Scripture calls ἀντιπίπτειν (Acts vii. 51), ἐνυβρίζειν (Heb. x. 29), βλασφημεῖν (Matt. xii. 31), θεομαχεῖν (Acts v. 39). Let us, therefore, not grieve the Holy Spirit with evil desires, words and deeds, that we may be able on the future day of redemption to show that seal uninjured with which we were sealed on that day of our redemption when we were regenerated. To this end let us assiduously breathe forth the prayers of David Ps. cxliii. 10; li. 12–14." LEIGH.

4. On lxiii. 10. [They rebelled and vexed His Holy Spirit. This statement implies the personality of the Holy Ghost, or the Spirit of God's holiness. He is represented as a person whom we can grieve. We have in this passage clear indications of the doctrine of the Trinity. In ver. 9 we have the Angel of God's face, and in ver. 10 we have the Spirit of His holiness, both clearly distinguished from God the fountain of their being.—D. M.].

5. On lxiii. 11. "Faith asks after God and so does unbelief, but in different ways. Both put the question, Where? Faith does it to seek God in time of need, and to tell Him trustfully of His old kindnesses. Unbelief does it to tempt God, to deny Him, to lead others into temptation, and to make them doubt regarding the divine presence and providence. Therefore it asks: "Where is the God of judgment" (Mal. ii. 17)? "Where is now thy God" (Ps. xlii. 4. 11; lxxix. 10; cxv. 2)? If you, as the praying Church here does, ask in the former manner diligently after God, you will be preserved from the other kind of asking." LEIGH.

6. On lxiii. 15. "Meritum meum miseratio Domini. Non sum meriti inops, quando ille miserationum Dominus non defuerit, et si misericordiae Domini multae, multus ego sum in meritis." AUGUSTINE.

7. On lxiii. 16. "We can from this sentence [?] cogently refute the doctrine of the invocation of the Saints. For the Saints know nothing of us, and are not personally acquainted with us, much less can they know the concerns of our hearts, or hear our cry, for they are not omnipresent. If it be alleged that God makes matters known to them and that they then pray for us, what a round-about business this would be! It would justify the prayer said to have been made by a simple man: "Ah Lord God! tell it, I beseech thee, to the blessed Mary that I have told thee to tell it again to her, that she should tell thee that I have wished to say to her by so many Ave Marias and Pater Nosters, that she should say to thee to be pleased to be gracious unto me." MEYER, de Rosariis. cap. III., thes. V., p. 52). With how much more brevity and efficacy do we pray with the penitent publican: God be merciful to me, a sinner!" LEIGH.

8. On lxiii. 17. "There is no more heinous sin than to accuse God of being the cause of our sin. Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God (James i. 13; Ps. v. 5; Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. xcii. 16). He commands what is good, forbids and punishes what is evil. How then could He be the cause of it? But when He punishes sin with sin, i. e., when He at last withdraws from the sinner His grace that has been persistently despised, then He acts as a righteous Judge who inflicts the judgment of hardening the heart on those who wilfully resist His Spirit." LEIGH.

9. On lxiv. ["This chapter is a model of affectionate and earnest entreaty for the divine interposition in the day of calamity. With such tender and affectionate earnestness may we learn to plead with God! Thus may all His people learn to approach Him as a Father; thus feel that they have the inestimable privilege in the times of trial of making known their wants to the High and Holy One. Thus when calamity presses on us; when as individuals or families we are afflicted; or when our country or the church is suffering under long trials, may we go to God, and humbly confess our sins, and urge His promises, and take hold of His strength, and plead with Him to interpose. Thus pleading, He will hear us; thus presenting our cause, He will interpose to save us." BARNES. D. M.].

10. On lxiv. 3, 4 a. [4, 5 a]. The God who appeared to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, called Moses, and led by him the people of Israel out of Egypt, who chose Joshua, Samuel, David and others to be His servants and glorified Himself by them, this God alone has shown Himself to be the true and living God, and we can hope from Him that He will yet do more, and manifest Himself still more signally.

11. On lxiv. 4 [5]. ["Note what God expects from us in order to our having communion with Him. First, We must make conscience of doing our duty in everything, we must work righteousness, must do that which is good, and which the Lord our God requires of us, and must do it well. Secondly, We must be cheerful in doing our duty; we must rejoice and work righteousness, must delight ourselves in God and His law, must be pleasant in His service and sing at our work. God loves a cheerful giver, a cheerful worshipper; we must serve the Lord with gladness. Thirdly, We must conform ourselves to all the methods of His providence concerning us, and be suitably affected with them; must remember Him in His ways, in all the ways wherein He walks, whether He walks towards us, or walks contrary to us; we must mind Him, and make mention of Him, with thanksgiving, when His ways are ways of mercy, for in a day of prosperity we must be joyful, with patience and submission when He contends with us, for in a day of adversity we must consider." HENRY. D. M.].

12. On lxiv. 7 [8]. ["This whole verse is an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God. It expresses the feeling which all have when under conviction of sin, and when they are sensible that they are exposed to the divine displeasure for their transgressions. Then they feel that if they are to be saved, it must be by the mere Sovereignty of God; and they implore His interposition to 'mould and guide them at His will.' It may be added, that it is only when sinners have this feeling that they hope for relief; and then they will feel that if they are lost, it will be right; if saved, it will be because God moulds them as the potter does the clay." BARNES. D. M.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lxiii. 7. Text for a Thanksgiving Sermon. What is our duty after that the Lord has shown us great loving-kindness? 1) To remember what He has done to us. 2) To be mindful of what we ought to render to Him for the same.

2. On lxiii. 8-17. The history of the people of Israel a mirror in which we too may perceive the history of our relation to God. 1) God is to us from the beginning a loving and faithful Father (vers. 8, 9). 2) We repay His love with ingratitude, as Israel did (ver. 10 a). 3) God punishes us for this as He punished Israel (ver. 10 b). 4) God receives us again to His favor when we, as Israel, call on Him in penitence (vers. 11-17).

On lxiii. 7-17. "If God in Christ has become our Father, He remains our Father to all eternity. 1) He is our Father in Christ. 2) He abides faithful even when we waver. 3) When we have fallen, His arms still stand open to receive us." DEICHERT in Manch. G. u. ein Geist, 1868, page 65.

4. On lxiv. 5-7. Joh. Ben. Carpzov has a sermon on this text, in which he treats of righteousness, and shows 1) justitiam salvantem, i. e., the righteousness with which one enters the kingdom of heaven; 2) justitiam damnantem, i. e., the righteousness with which a man enters the fire of hell; 3) justitiam testantem, i. e., the righteousness by which a man testifies that he has attained the true righteousness.

5. On lxiv. 6-9. "Let us hear from our text an earnest and affecting confession of sin, and at the same time consider 1) the doctrine of repentance; 2) the comfort of forgiveness which believers receive."—EICHHORN.

6. On lxiv. 6. (We all do fade, etc.) "These are very instructive words, from which we learn what a noxious plant sin is, and what fruit it brings forth. First, says he, we fade as a leaf. This means that sin brings with it the curse of God, and deprives us of His blessing both for the body and the soul, so that the heart is dissatisfied and distressed. Then it robs us of the highest treasure, confidence in the grace of God. For sin and an evil conscience awaken dread of God. As it is impossible to call upon God aright without faith and a sure persuasion of His aid, it follows that sin hinders prayer also, and thus robs us of the highest comfort. When men have no faith and cannot pray, then the awful punishment comes upon them, that God hides His face and leaves them to pine in their sins. For they cannot help themselves, and have lost the consolation and protection which they need in life."—VEIT DIET.

V.—THE FIFTH DISCOURSE.

The Death and Life-bringing End-Period.

CHAPS. LXV.—LXVI.

These two chapters are closely connected. They form one discourse. Their commencement is obviously related to the preceding prayer, in which the people had been regarded as a unity without distinguishing between the godly and the wicked. In chap. lxv. it is shown that Israel will neither be entirely saved (vers. 1-7), nor entirely cast off (vers. 8-12). The true and righteous God will act according to the rule "suum cuique" (vers. 13-16). The Prophet then describes the salvation destined for the godly as new life. He depicts it, lxv. 17-25, from its outward side, and, lxvi. 1-3 a, from its inward side. I must regard the verses lxvi. 3 b-6 as an interpolation. [But see the exposition.—D. M.] In lxvi. 7-9 the Prophet describes the new life in a quite peculiar relation. He shows the wonderfully intensive power with which the new life will unfold itself, and find its realization in posterity that cannot be numbered. The fundamental, ethical character of the new order of life, which will express itself both in the relation of the redeemed to one another, and in the relation of the LORD Himself to the redeemed, shall be maternal love (lxvi. 10-14). In conclusion, the Prophet draws another comprehensive picture of the time of the end, in which he first views collectively all its elements of judgment, and then shows how the distinction between Israel and the Gentile world will cease, and the entire human race will be one new Israel, raised to a higher elevation (lxvi. 15-24).

1. NOT ALL ISRAEL SHALL BE SAVED.

Chapter LXV. 1-7.

1 I am sought of them that asked not for me;
I am found of them that sought me not:
I said, Behold me, behold me,
Unto a nation that was not called by my name.
2 I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people,
Which walketh in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts;
3 A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face;
That sacrificeth in gardens,
And burneth incense [1]upon altars of brick,
4 Which remain among the graves,
And lodge in the [a]monuments,
Which eat swine's flesh,
And [b][2]broth of abominable things is in their vessels;
5 Which say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me;
For [c]I am holier than thou.
These are a smoke in my [3]nose,
A fire that burneth all the day.
6 Behold, it is written before me:
I will not keep silence, [d]but will recompense,
Even recompense into their bosom,
7 Your iniquities, and the iniquities of your fathers together, saith the Lord,
Which have burned incense upon the mountains,
And blasphemed me upon the hills:
[e]Therefore will I measure their former work into their bosom.

[1] Heb. upon bricks, [2] Or, pieces. [3] Or, anger.

[a] secret places. [b] their dishes are a mixture of abominations. [c] I am holy to thee. [d] unless I have recompensed.
[e] And first I will measure what they have deserved into their bosom.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. The dative after the passive נדרשׁ stands here as Ezek. xiv. 3; xx. 3, 31; xxxvi. 37, according to a well-known usus loquendi. אשׁר is to be supplied before לא. [Ges., Gr., § 123, 3.] The Pual of קֹרָא is of not unfrequent occurrence in the latter part of Isaiah, xlviii. 8, 12; lviii. 12; lxi. 3; lxii. 2. Ver. 6. ושׁלמתי has the accent on the final syllable on account of the future signification, to distinguish it from the first שׁלמתי, which has the accent on the penult.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Chaps. lxv. and lxvi. are a Yes—but [an affirmative answer with qualifications] to the prayer of the church. For that prayer shall assuredly be heard, but quite otherwise than she imagines [?]. First of all the Lord makes a distinction, which was not made in the prayer, between the persons, according to their religious and moral condition. The prayer takes the people as an undistinguished unity in what is good as in what is bad. The good are not excepted where the transgression of the people is spoken of (lxiii. 10, 17; lxiv. 4, 5, 6), and where deliverance and salvation are spoken of, the evil are not excepted (lxiii. 16; liv. 7, 8). [It is not the case that the prayer altogether ignores the distinction between the good and the bad in the community. This distinction is prominently made in the latter part of lxiii. 17: Return for thy servants' sake to the tribes of thine inheritance (amended translation). Jehovah's answer is exactly conformable to this prayer. Comp. lxv. 8 sq.: So will I do for my servants' sakes. When the prayer speaks of the whole nation being God's people, the reference is to the original relation established between them and God. The prayer distinctly declares that it is for those that wait for Him that God acts, and that it is he who rejoiceth and worketh righteousness whom God meets, lxiv. 4, 5. Moreover, this prayer, which the church is supposed to utter, testifies, notwithstanding its strong confession of prevalent and general ungodliness, to the existence of a faithful, praying remnant. Dr. NAEGELSBACH fails to appreciate the prayer that precedes chap. lxv., and attributes to it defects and blemishes which it does not really contain.—D. M.]. In chap. lxv. there is a sharp line of separation drawn between the servants of Jehovah who have sought Him (vers. 8–10, 13 sqq.), and the persons who have forsaken Him (ver. 11 sqq.) But it is not the intention of the LORD that Israel should be reduced by the exclusion of the ungodly to a little flock, and that the old patriarchal promise of an innumerable progeny should find but a scanty realization in the glorious time of salvation. In the Messianic time Israel shall be not only blessed and glorious, but also numerous (comp. Ezek. xxxvi. 37). Just think of places such as xlix. 13 sqq.; liv. 1 sqq.; lx. 4 sqq.! But the LORD will take the members of His redeemed church not merely out of Israel. He takes them out of all nations. For, connection with the church of the redeemed is no longer dependent on natural descent from Abraham and circumcision in the flesh, but on being born of God and circumcision of the heart. [We give here Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER's analysis of this section:. "The great enigma of Israel's simultaneous loss and gain is solved by a prediction of the calling of the Gentiles, ver. 1. This is connected with the obstinate unfaithfulness of the chosen people, ver. 2. They are represented, under the two main aspects of their character at different periods, as gross idolaters and as Pharisaical bigots, vers. 3–5. Their casting off was not occasioned by the sins of one generation, but of many, vers. 6, 7. But even in this rejected race there was a chosen remnant, in whom the promises shall be fulfilled, vers. 8–10."—D. M.].

2. I am sought——called by my name. Ver. 1. The Apostle Paul understands ver. 1 of the Gentiles while he adheres to the Septuagint, with a transposition of the clauses (Rom. x. 20). The Jewish commentators (with exception of Chiquitilla or Gecatilia, comp. ROSENMUELLER Schol. in loc.) and most modern interpreters refer the words to the unbelieving Jews. Only HENDEWERK, who supposes the Persians specifically to be here meant, STIER and VON HOFMANN are exceptions. I agree with these latter. For 1) if ver. 1 is to refer to the Jews, then נמצאתי. נדרשתי must signify: quaerendum, inveniendum me obtuli, and not "I let Myself be asked for, be found," which signification the Niphal undoubtedly has in Ezek. xiv. 3; xx. 3, 31; xxxvi. 37 (Niph. tolerativum). For, in fact, the Jews have not sought the LORD, and therefore have not asked for and found Him. If then we would take the verbs נדרשתי and נמצאתי in the sense in which נדרש occurs in the places quoted from Ezekiel, that would be affirmed regarding the Jews in the place before us which was not true of them. We must then take נדרש and נמצא in the sense of quaerendum, inveniendum me obtuli, or in the sense "I was capable of being asked for, capable of being found;" but this sense the perfect Niphal cannot bear. In reference to נדרש, an examination of the places in Ezekiel makes this clear. But in reference to נמצא appeal is made to Isa. lv. 6. There it is said: Seek the Lord בְּהִמָּצְאוֹ which may be rendered while he may be found.—For everything which is found, may be found. But does it follow that נמצא can mean "to be capable of being found" to the exclusion of the signification "to be actually found?" But that must be the case if ver. 1 is to be referred to the Jews. 2) גוי לא קֹרָא בשמי is appropriately applied only to Gentiles, as even DELITZSCH confesses. [DELITZSCH also calls attention to the use of גוֹי (comp. lv. 5) in ver. 1 and of עָם in ver. 2, as indicating that ver. 1 relates to the Gentiles and ver. 2 to the Jews.—D. M.]. With the words הנני הנני the LORD wishes to declare that He offers Himself lovingly and pressingly to the nation hitherto strangers to Him (comp. lviii. 9).

3. I have spread out——their bosom.—Vers 2–7. In opposition to what the LORD will be in fact to the Gentiles we are told in these verses what the LORD wished to be to Israel, but was not on account of the stubbornness of this people. With infinite, compassionate love the LORD spread out His hands to Israel כל־היום (comp. ver. 5; xxviii. 24; li. 13; lii. 5; lxii. 6), i. e., continually. He would gladly have enclosed them in His arms as dear children (פרש see the List.). But they were a refractory people. He calls them עָם not גוֹי as, ver. 1, the Gentiles; but they were עם סורר. How they proved refractory is declared in what follows. They pursued evil, perverse ways, and this was the necessary consequence of their following, not the thoughts of Jehovah, but only their own thoughts (comp. lv. 7; lix. 7; Jer. xviii. 12). But not only by omitting to do what the LORD desired, did they offend Him, but also by defiant and open (על־פני, comp. Job i. 11; vi. 28; xxi. 31, probably, too, alluding to Ex. xx. 3) doing of that which is contrary to the chief commandment of the theocracy, by gross idolatry which they practised, while they sacrificed in gardens or groves (comp. on i. 29; lxvi. 17), and burnt incense on altars which, contrary to the law, were built of bricks. According to the Mosaic law only an altar of earth or of unhewn stones [or of wooden boards overlaid with brass] was allowed (Ex. xx. 24 sqq.; xxvii. 1 sqq.; xxx. 1 sqq.). The bricks recall Babylon, the land of lateres cocti from ancient time (Gen. xi. 3). Another form of their idolatry consisted in their frequenting groves and other kept (i. e., secret, not easily accessible) places, where they even passed the night in order to obtain mantic revelations through the demons, or through the spirits of the dead, a thing which was strictly forbidden in the law (Deut. xviii. 11; comp. Isa. viii. 19). Even JEROME and THEODORET have so understood this place. JEROME says: . . "Sedens . . vel habitans in sepulchris et in delubris idolorum dormiens, ubi stratis pellibus hostiarum incubare soliti erant, ut somniis futura cognoscerent." Other passages from ancient authors regarding this usage are given by ROSENMUELLER, in loc. It seems to me less appropriate to think of purificatory offerings presented for the dead (inferiae, februationes, VITRINGA), as these offerings and not require a lengthened sitting or passing the night in sepulchral caves. נְצוּרִים are loca abscondita, as xlviii. 6 נְצֻרוֹת res absconditae, as נָצַר easily obtains the signification of hiding from the signification custodire, observare (comp. Prov. vii. 10). The swine which divides the hoof, but does not chew the cud, is according to the law unclean, and durst not be eaten (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 18). Quamdiu stetit Judaeorum respublica, in Judaea nulli erant sues," says BOCHART (Hieroz. I. p. 804, comp. Luke xv. 11; viii. 26, 32). It is doubtful whether in our place the common or the ritual use of swine's flesh (at the sacrificial meal) is spoken of. Both are possible. Where swine are eaten, there they can also be used in sacrifice, and where they are sacrificed, there they are also eaten. In lxvi. 17, too, both profane and sacred uses can be promiscuously spoken of. That among many heathen nations of antiquity swine were offered in sacrifice has been sufficiently proved by SPENCER (De legg. Hebr. p. 137), BOCHART (Hieroz. II. p. 381 sqq.), SAUBERT (De sacrificiis veterum cap. 23, p. 572 sqq.); MOVERS (Phoen. I. p. 218 sqq.). That the Babylonians sacrificed and ate swine seems to be implied in what is here said [?], but is not confirmed by other testimonies (comp. DELITZSCH in loc.). פְּרַק from פָּרַק to rend, to tear in pieces (comp. Gen. xxvii. 40; Ps. vii. 3 et saepe) is ἅπ. λεγ. The signification must be that which is torn to pieces, broken. [GESENIUS assigns to the word the meaning of broth, soup, which is so called from the fragments or crumbs of bread on which the broth is poured.—D. M.]. פִּגּוּל is res foeda, abominabilis, abomination (comp. Lev. vii. 18; xix. 7; Ezek. iv. 14). Broken bits (a ragout, a medley) of abominations are their dishes. The expression is metonymical [synecdochical, comp. Jer. xxiv. 2]. The K'ri reads מְרַק, which, according to Judges vi. 19, 20, must mean broth. But the alteration is not needed. In ver. 5 the Prophet alludes to idolatrous rites of purification or sanctification which were not sanctioned by the law. They were probably connected with the celebration of mysteries. One recalls appropriately here the word of HORACE odi profanum vulgus et arceo. [HENDERSON thinks the class here described to be entirely different from the idolaters spoken of in vers. 3, 4. "Having specified the sins for which the Jews were notorious, during what may be called the idolatrous period of their history, Jehovah now portrays their character during the self-righteous period, or that which succeeded the return from the captivity—including Pharisaism, Talmudism, and modern Judaism." Comp. Isa. lviii. 1-3; Luke xviii. 11; Rom. x. 3.—D. M.]. קְרַב אֵלֶיךָ recalls expressions such as we find xlix. 20; Gen. xix. 9, 3, 2; Prov. ix. 4. 16. ["The literal translation is approach to thyself, which implies removal from the speaker. The E. V., stand by thyself suggests the idea of standing alone, whereas all that is expressed by the Hebrew phrase is the act of standing away from the speaker, for which LOWTH has found the idiomatic equivalent keep to thyself." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. נָגַשׁ stands only here with בְּ, probably because there lies in the word the idea of an approach that would be offensive, disturbing. קְדַשְׁתִּיךָ is one of the rare cases in which the verbal suffix has the signification of the dative (comp. xliv. 21). [I am holy to thee, i. e., unapproachable.—DEL.]. If the words which we read from ver. 3 b, to ver. 5 a, really portray such idolatry as the exiles committed in Babylon, we must regard them as an interpolation. For the description is so particular that it could proceed from no one but an eye-witness. [Here again our author would alter the text to make it conform to his theory of the nature of prophecy. It was such idolatry as is here described that brought on the Jews the punishment of the Exile. Comp. Isa. i. 29; lvii. 3-8. The Babylonish captivity had the effect of making them turn with abhorrence from such gross idolatry.—D. M]. By means of a strong figurative expression the LORD makes known how much those idolatrous practices call for His retributive justice. He describes those sinners as the prey of an unquenchable fire (comp. lxvi. 24), whose smoke ascends perpetually before Him (see similar images ix. 18; x. 17; xxx. 27). In order to prove that He is in terrible earnest with the threatening in ver. 5 b, the LORD attests in ver. 6 that it is written before Him. He does not mean that the sin of those idolaters is recorded before Him, for what is recorded is stated in what goes before and follows. But immediately before and after, mention is made not of sin, but of punishment. The LORD intends to say: it is not merely decreed, but recorded, set down in a document (Job xiii. 26; Jer. xxii. 30), that I will not be silent till I have recompensed. שִׁלַּמְתִּי assures that the recompense will not remain intention but will become fact. עַל־חֵיקָם comp. Jer. xxxii. 18; Ps. lxxix. 12 (Luke vi. 38). These are the only other places in which the expression occurs in the Old Testament. In them אֶל is found instead of עַל, as in the K'ri on ver. 7. These two particles are frequently substituted the one for the other (comp. on x. 3). It is worthy of remark that Jeremiah (xxxii. 18) had this place manifestly in his mind. The quick change of person sounds very hard. Ver. 6 closes with their bosom; and ver. 7 in reference to the same persons proceeds to say your iniquities, in the second person. [The form of the address shows that עֲוֹנֹתֵיכֶם וגו׳, ver. 7 a, is not governed by שִׁלַּמְתִּי but by an אֲשַׁלֵּם, which is easily understood from it." DELITZSCH.). וּמַדֹּתִי וגו׳ connects itself with שִׁלַּמְתִּי ו׳ ver. 6, so that the words עֲוֹנֹתֵיכֶם to חֵרְפוּנִי appear as a parenthesis. פְּעֻלָּתָם רִאשֹׁנָה cannot mean: what they have first deserved, their first, earliest guilt.–For why should the LORD punish only this? But if the meaning was intended to be: their total guilt from the beginning, why do we not read כְּרֵאשִׁית, or some similar expression? רִאשֹׁנָה can therefore only be an adverb, and signify primum. The Prophet has the people of the Exile in his eye. The people suffering the Exile endure in it only the beginning of the punishment for the national guilt. This punishment extends beyond it. And the people redeemed from exile still suffer under it. The first restoration from the captivity was a poor one. Israel was never after the Exile again independent. And on the first exile a second still worse followed. For the second destruction by the Romans was total, while the first by Nebuchadnezzar was only partial. After the first exile the Israelites could organize themselves again according to their law. After the second this could no more be done. This thought lies also at the basis of the passage Jer. xvi. 18 (comp. my remarks on this place), which manifestly depends on the one before us.

2. NOT ALL ISRAEL SHALL BE CAST OFF.

CHAPTER LXV. 8-12.

8 Thus saith the LORD,
As the new wine is found in the cluster,
And one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it:
So will I do for my servants' sakes,
That I may not destroy them all.
9 And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob,
And out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains:
And mine elect shall inherit it,
And my servants shall dwell there.
10 And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks,
And the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in,
For my people that have sought me.
11 [a]But ye are they that forsake the LORD,
That forget my holy mountain,
That prepare a table for that [b1]troop,
And that [c]furnish the drink-offering unto that [2]number.
12 Therefore will I number you to the sword,
And ye shall all bow down to the slaughter:
Because when I called, ye did not answer;
When I spake, ye did not hear:
But did evil before mine eyes,
And did choose that wherein I delighted not.

[1] Gad. [2] Meni.

[a] But ye who forsake Jehovah. [b] Gad. [c] fill for the goddess of fortune a mingled drink.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This section stands to the one which precedes it in the same relation (lxv. 1-7) in which this latter stands to the prayer in lxiii. and lxiv. For as the Prophet in lxv. 1 sqq. opposes the expectation [?] that all Israel will be saved (lxiv. 7, 8), so lxv. 8 sqq. repels the opposite error that all Israel will be cast off. This opinion might have been drawn from lxv. 2 sqq. For there Israel is quite generally designated as a rebellious people to which the LORD spreads out His hands in vain, that provokes Him by defiant idolatry, and therefore will have to bear the whole burden of the guilt accumulated from their fathers. It might accordingly be supposed that Israel should be entirely cast off, and their place taken by the Gentiles (lxv. 1). This misunderstanding the Prophet here combats. He compares Israel with a cluster of grapes on which many berries may be rotten. Is the whole cluster, therefore, cast away? No! much of the blessing of God is still therein. So for His servants' sake the LORD will not destroy all Israel (ver. 8). He will yet cause to come forth from the remnant a race that will consist of the elect of the LORD, and that will possess the holy land (ver. 9). This will be fertile in all its parts and be fitted for excellent pasture (ver. 10). But they who forget the LORD and set their heart on the false gods of the land of the Exile (ver. 11) shall for their disobedience be extirpated (ver. 12).

2. Thus saith the Lord——sought me.—Vers. 8-10. The image does not appear to me to be correctly explained when the intended antitheses are supposed to be: only stalk and husks should be destroyed, not the berries; or, only the degenerate vine or vineyard (v. 4; xviii. 5) is to be destroyed, not the grapes. For who needs to be told that he should not treat the berries as the stalk and husk, or that he should spare the grapes but destroy the vine or vineyard? Whence are grape-clusters to be had if the latter are destroyed? It seems to me that the Prophet has in his mind a bunch of grapes on which together with many bad and rotten berries, there are some good ones. One is tempted to throw away such a cluster entirely. The Prophet forbids this. ["The image really presented by the Prophet, as VITRINGA clearly shows, and most later writers have admitted, is that of a good cluster, in which juice is found, while others are unripe or rotten."—ALEXANDER. הַתִּירוֹשׁ has the article which the Hebrew was wont to employ in comparisons. See GES. Gr. § 109. Note 1.—D. M.]. There is a blessing in it seems to be taken in a double sense: 1) Even the smallest quantity of the noble fruit is valuable and not to be despised; 2) God can bless even the smallest quantity, i. e., He can multiply it (John vi. 9, 12). [The simple, obvious meaning is: A blessing is in the cluster, because new wine, which was considered a blessing (Judges ix. 13; Isa. lxii. 8), is in it.—D. M.]. וְאָמַר is used as xxv. 9; xlv. 24; lvii. 14. For His servants' sake the Lord will not entirely destroy Israel. For these are the true Israelites. They prove that Israel is capable and worthy to continue to exist. There shall, therefore, seed (posterity) yet proceed out of Israel, that shall possess the mountains of Canaan (comp. xiv. 25, and in a wider sense xlix. 11). This shall be a holy seed (vi. 13). For only the elect of the Lord shall possess it (the land, ארץ, which is ideally contained in הרי), and His servants shall dwell therein. ["My mountains is supposed by VITRINGA to denote Mount Zion and Moriah, or Jerusalem as built upon them; but the later writers more correctly suppose it to describe the whole of Palestine, as being an uneven, hilly country. See the same use of the plural in xiv. 25, and the analogous phrase, mountains of Israel, repeatedly employed by Ezekiel (xxxvi. 1, 8; xxxviii. 8). . . . The adverb at the end of the sentence properly means thither, and is never perhaps put for there, except in cases where a change of place is previously mentioned or implied."—ALEXANDER.—D. M.] Ver. 10. The land shall be fertile and glorious. Sharon shall be pasture for sheep, the valley of Achor a pasture for black cattle. Sharon is the well-known fertile plain in the west of Palestine, stretching from Caesarea northwards to Carmel (comp. on xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2). Achor is the valley in the east of the tribe of Judah, in which, according to Josh. vii. 24–26, Achan was stoned. This valley is further mentioned only in Josh. xv. 7; Hos. ii. 17. It must have been a stony place, for according to Josh. vii. 25 sq., there were there stones enough to stone Achan, together with all belonging to him, and to raise up a great heap of stones. In Hos. ii. 17 [E. V. 15] it is said that the valley of Achor will be unto converted and restored Israel a door of hope. This means: When Israel, returning from the Exile, shall pass through the valley of Achor, it shall be to them no more a monument of the wrath of God, which it formerly was, with its heap of stones and its stony ground; but even this valley shall be to them a door of hope, for the place shall be altered. There shall be seen in it the traces of the blessing which, according to vers. 20 sqq., shall be spread over the whole land. Then, according to this passage, the valley of Achor shall become a fertile pasture, even more fertile than Sharon, for sheep are content with much poorer pasture than neat-cattle (comp. HERZOG) R. Enc. VI., p. 150; Si tibi lanitium curae, fuge pabula laeta. VIRGIL Georg. III., 384).

3. But ye are they——delighted not. Vers. 11, 12. What in verse 8 had been denied in reference to all Israel is here affirmed in reference to a part. The wicked Israelites shall certainly perish. These are described as those that forsake Jehovah (comp. on i. 28. The expression occurs further only i. 24, 28), that forget the holy mountain of Jehovah. The writer has here evidently exiles in his eye, who in a heathen land were seduced to worship the local gods of the heathen, and so forgot the worship that prevailed in their own country, and the place where their fathers worshipped God. Such forgetting must often have happened in the Exile, and have been for the faithful Israelites a subject of great grief and vexation. We see this from Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6 [?]. In what follows the Prophet specifies more particularly the idolatry of those apostates, while he describes them as those who "prepare a table for Gad, and fill for Meni mixed drink." The Prophet here speaks of a cultus of which there is no mention in the history of the people before the Exile. He has evidently in his mind the so-called lectisternia. That these lectisternia were observed by the Babylonians is proved from Baruch vi. 26, and from Bel and the Dragon, ver. 11 sqq. What HERODOTUS (I. 181) relates of the golden table, which stood in the highest room of the temple-tower beside the κλίνη μεγάλη εὖ ἐστρωμένη, seems to have reference to such a lectisternium (comp. LEYRER in HERZ. R. E. xiii., p. 470). As an appellative noun, גַּד means fortune, good luck. As the name of a divinity, it denotes the star of fortune, of which the Babylonians had two, Jupiter and Venus (comp. DUNCKER Gesch. des Alterth., Vol. I., p. 117; PLUTARCH de Is. et Osir, § 48). The Arabs named the former "Great Fortune," and the latter "Little Fortune." Many are disposed to connect מְנִי, which is found only here, with Μήν, Μήνη, and to understand it of the moon (comp. especially KNOBEL in loc.). The matter is not yet decided. מִמְסָךְ (comp. Prov. xxiii. 30, and in reference to the verb, Isaiah v. 22; xix. 14) is mixed wine, spiced wine (see on v. 22). With allusion to the name מְנִי, the Lord threatens these sinners that He will number (liii. 12) them to the sword, and they all must bow down (x. 4; xliv. 1, 2,) to be slaughtered, because they did not answer to the call of the Lord, yea, did not even hearken to His word, but did that which the Lord regarded as evil, and chose what displeased Him. For recurring expressions see lxvi. 4; lvi. 4. The expression עשה הרע בעיני י׳ occurs first in Numb. xxxii. 13, then frequently in Deut., Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chron. It is found once in the Psalms (li. 6), three times in Jeremiah (vii. 30; xviii. 10; xxxii. 30). It occurs in Isaiah only here and lxvi. 4 (comp. xxxviii. 3). What was remarked in regard to vers. 3 b–5 a applies to vers. 11 and 12. If they portray an idolatry specifically Babylonian which the Jews practised in exile, the verses are an interpolation. [DELITZSCH, who is inclined to identify גַּד with Jupiter, confesses that it is only from this place in Isaiah that we know that Gad was worshipped by the Babylonians. The Babylonian Pantheon, in RAWLINSON'S Monarchies, does not contain this name. The application of the name Meni is admitted to be doubtful. We could as easily connect the worship and the divinities mentioned here with Egypt, Syria, or Arabia, as with Babylonia. The Jews that fled to Egypt had their Lectisternia there (Jer. xliv. 17-19), and the destruction with which Isaiah threatens the apostates that he has in mind, is denounced by Jeremiah against the idolatrous Jews in Egypt. Jer. xliv. 12-14. Moreover, the Jews had their Lectisternia in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem before the captivity (Jer. vii. 17, 18.) But suppose that the worship here described by Isaiah could be proved to be distinctively and exclusively Babylonian, must the real Isaiah be supposed to be ignorant of it? Knowing the disposition of the Jews to follow the ways of the heathen around them, he could anticipate, even without Divine inspiration, that many of the captive Jews would practise the peculiar religious rites of the Babylonians. Even an anti-supernaturalist could defend the genuineness of vers. 11, 12; much more one who believes that a true Prophet of God could utter a definite prediction. We may add that verse 13 supposes the sins mentioned in vers. 11, 12 as the ground of the threatening which it contains, and cannot be connected immediately with ver. 10. HENDERSON, who thinks that the terms in ver. 11 may have been borrowed from the nomenclature of idolaters, takes Gad as meaning Fortune and Meni Fate, and applies the passage to the impenitent and worldly Jews of the restoration, who had no god but riches, and regarded human affairs as governed by fortune.—D. M.].

3. THE TRUE AND RIGHTEOUS GOD GIVES TO EVERY ONE HIS OWN.

CHAPTER LXV. 13-16.

13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD, [Jehovah]
Behold, my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry:
Behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty:
Behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed:
14 Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart,
But ye shall cry for sorrow of heart,
And shall howl for [1]vexation of spirit.
15 And ye shall leave your name for [a]a curse unto my chosen:
For the Lord GOD [Jehovah] shall slay thee,
And call his servants by another name:
16 That he who blesseth himself in the earth
Shall bless himself in the [b]God of truth;
And he that sweareth in the earth
Shall swear by the God of truth;
Because the former troubles are forgotten,
And because they are hid from mine eyes.

[1] Heb. breaking.

[a] an oath. [b] the God of Amen.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. ["On the ground of the renewed mention of the offence there is a fresh announcement of punishment, and the different lot of the servants of Jahve, and of those who despised Him, is expressed in five clauses and antithetic clauses."—DEL.] The servants of Jehovah will eat, drink, rejoice (comp. xxv. 6 sqq.; lv. 1; lvi. 9), the wicked will do the opposite of all this (vers. 13, 14). The name of the wicked will only remain to serve the servants of Jehovah for an oath; they themselves will be dead, and the LORD will give His servants another name (ver. 15). Then will both the promises and the threatenings of Jehovah be fulfilled. Jehovah will have proved Himself as the true One. He who blesses himself and he who swears, will do this henceforward only in the name of this true God. All tribulation of the former time shall be forgotten, and shall have disappeared (ver. 16).

2. Therefore, thus saith——mine eyes. Vers. 13-16. ["These verses merely carry out the general threatening of the one preceding, in a series of poetical antitheses, where hunger, thirst, disgrace and anguish take the place of sword and slaughter, and determine these to be symbolical or emblematic terms." ALEXANDER.—D. M.] מִטּוּב לֵב recalls מִטּוּב לֵבָב, Deut. xxviii.

47. The expression does not elsewhere occur. The adjectival construction is found 1 Kings viii. 66; 2 Chron. vii. 10; Esth. 1. 10; v. 9; Prov. xv. 15. The expression כאב לב (comp. xvii. 11; Prov. xiv. 13) occurs only here. שֵׁבֶר רוּחַ, too, occurs only here (comp. Ps. li. 19). The punishment of the wicked shall not cease with the termination of a wretched life; after death it shall be continued in a memory laden with a curse. This last point the Prophet mentions first as the climax of the punishment, and only parenthetically introduces the threatening of destruction. The threatening: Ye shall leave your name for an oath, supposes the death of those threatened. This matter the Prophet afterwards refers to as a thing of only minor importance. For all men must die. But in the words, the Lord God shall slay thee, there is intimated a death which should be a marked expression of the Divine displeasure. וְ before הֱמִיתְךָ is to be taken as causal. The sudden change of number need no more surprise us than the sudden change of person elsewhere. Comp. Isa. i. 23; v. 23, 26; xvii. 10; xix. 25; xxix. 13. The singular may perhaps be here employed for a rhetorical reason. It renders the speech more concise and emphatic. The wicked will be destroyed so that nothing will remain of them but a name on which a curse rests. To such a degree will they appear as objects of the curse, that one in swearing will believe that he cannot take a stronger oath than by invoking on himself the curse of those wicked persons, in case of being guilty of falsehood (comp. Numb. v. 21; Jer. xxix. 22; Ps. cii. 9). One name originally united the wicked and the godly. For they were both called Israelites. Can the elect of the LORD continue to bear the name which, after the judgments of God, has become accursed? No. The LORD will therefore give His servants another name. He does not say: A new name, as lxii. 2, but another name. The Prophet's look surveys rapidly the whole period which embraces thousands of years, from the beginning till the completion of redemption, i. e., from the end of the Exile till the last day. He sees how in this period the separation between the enemies and the friends of Jehovah is accomplished, but he does not distinguish the stages of time, but all events which he beholds present themselves to him on one and the same plane. He sees only a decrease of the 'Ισραὴλ σαρκικός; he sees this carnal Israel endure great pain and distress—a judgment of God resting on it, in consequence of which it appears as accursed. Further, the Prophet beholds a people of God, with another name, in the place of the old Israel. Is not the new covenant, that should come in the place of the old, in this way intimated? It seems to me that JEROME is not altogether wrong in regard to the main point, when he says: "Nomen autem novum sive aliud nullum est, nisi quod ex Christi nomine derivatur, ut nequaquam vocetur populus Dei Jacob et Juda et Israel et Ephraim et Joseph, sed Christianus." ["According to the usage of the prophecies the promise of another name imports a different character and state, and in this sense the promise has been fully verified. But in addition to this general fulfilment, which no one calls in question, it is matter of history that the Jewish commonwealth or nation is destroyed; that the name of Jew has been for centuries a bye-word and a formula of execration, and that they who have succeeded to the spiritual honors of this once favored race, although they claim historical identity therewith, have never borne its name, but another, which from its very nature could have no existence until Christ had come, and which in the common parlance of the Christian world is treated as the opposite of Jew." ALEXANDER.—D. M.]. The destruction of the wicked supposes as corresponding to it the salvation of the godly. Through both the veracity of God is attested. Is Jehovah shown to be true by the history of the world, then no one naturally will think of uttering an oath or benediction by another God than by Him. אֲשֶׁר is therefore = quare, quapropter, or in a demonstrative sense = so that (comp. Gen. xiii. 16; Deut. iii. 24; xxviii. 27, 51, et saepe). התברך with בְּ stands here as Jer. iv. 2, which place seems to refer to ours. The expression אלהי אמן occurs only here. ["A remarkable expression; lit. "the God of Amen,"—of what is firm and true. Vulg. in Deo Amen. The God to whom that quality of covenant-keeping truth essentially belongs, is He in whom all shall bless themselves. A comparison of Gen. xxii. 18 and Ps. lxxii. 17 with the present verse shows that 'the Seed of Abraham' and 'the Son of David' are to be identified with this God of truth:—a mystery completely realized in Him who is the 'Amen, the Faithful and True Witness' (Rev. iii. 14; comp. xix. 11). In Him 'all the promises of God are . . . Amen' (2 Cor. i. 20"). KAY.—D. M.]. When all promises are fulfilled, then, too, all troubles must necessarily be past. For the promises of God have respect not to partial, limited, but to full, complete salvation. In the time, then, when men will swear and bless by none other than the true and veracious God, all troubles will end, so that men will know no more what trouble is. But not only this. There could still be danger of new troubles. But this will not be, for God Himself will with His all-seeing eye perceive no where the trace of a trouble. כִּי־וְכִי is = because—and because (Gen. xxxiii. 11; Josh. x. 2; 1 Sam. xix. 4).

4. THE NEW LIFE IN ITS OUTWARD MANIFESTATION.

Chapter LXV. 17-25.

17 For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth:
And the former shall not be remembered, nor [1]come into mind.
18 But be ye glad and rejoice for ever [a]in that which I create:
For, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing,
And her people a joy.
19 And I will rejoice in Jerusalem,
And joy in my people:
And the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her,
Nor the voice of crying.
20 There shall be no more [b]thence an infant of days,
Nor an old man that hath not filled his days:
For the [c]child shall die an hundred years old;
But the sinner being an hundred years old [d]shall be accursed.
21 And they shall build houses, and inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.
22 They shall not build, and another inhabit;
They shall not plant, and another eat:
For as the days of a tree are the days of my people,
And mine elect [e2]shall long enjoy the work of their hands.
23 They shall not labour in vain,
Nor bring forth for [f]trouble;
For they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord,
And their offspring with them.
24 And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer;
And while they are yet speaking, I will hear.
25 The wolf and the lamb shall feed together,
And the lion shall eat straw like the [g]bullock:
And dust shall be the serpent's meat.
They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain,
Saith the Lord.

[1] Heb. come upon the heart. [2] Heb. shall make them continue long, or, shall wear out.

[a] because I create it. [b] there a suckling that counts only days. [c] boy.
[d] will be considered accursed. [e] wear out. [f] quick passing away. [g] ox or cow.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet had previously declared that mighty changes would take place in consequence of severe judgments on the one hand, and of glorious saving grace on the other. Here he states that the Lord will create a new heaven and a new earth which will entirely efface the remembrance of the old (ver. 17). For this new glorious creation will cause such joy that it will make the misery of the old world to be quite forgotten. Jerusalem and its people will be nothing but joy, and the Lord, too, will only rejoice over His people. Among the people of God nothing more will be heard of mourning and lamentation (ver. 19). The vital force of mankind will then appear undiminished (vers. 20, 21). Death will no longer prevent a man from enjoying the fruits of his labor. None will labor in vain, or beget children for speedy death, for all will be a blessed race (ver. 23); and if they have anything to ask from the Lord, their prayer will be immediately answered (ver. 24). There will be a renovation even of the animal world. It will be in harmony with the spirit of peace and love which will prevail in the entire new creation (ver. 25).

2. For, behold, I create——crying.—Vers. 17–19. The Prophet manifestly distinguishes stadia in the accomplishment of salvation, although he says nothing of their relative times. Objects which are represented in one perspective on different planes, so that those in the background can be seen through the intervening spaces of those on the foreground, appear to be on one plane to him who regards them at a distance. We can here also distinguish three really distinct stadia, although the Prophet in no way indicates a difference of time. The first stadium he describes vers. 9, 10. He there speaks of again taking possession of the holy land. This was first accomplished by the return from Exile. He brings us, vers. 13–16, to another stadium. In it he sees the wicked and the godly together; but he perceives the godless Israel judged and cursed, and the elect that are saved from the judgment called by another name. We enter on the third stadium ver. 17. In it everything becomes new. A new higher life pervades the whole of nature. To this highest stadium the preceding are related as organic preparation. This is the meaning of the כִּי in the beginning of ver. 17. [The Prophet had said at the close of ver. 16 that the former evils had entirely passed away. "That they had passed away he establishes by joining, as in ix. 3–5, one כִּי to another, vers. 17–19." Del.—D. M.]. By ראשׁנות many understand merely tempora superiora, the former evil times, others, only the old heaven and the old earth. But why should not both be intended by it? Would it be possible to remember the old earth and the old heaven, and not at the same time think of the times passed on the one and under the other? The Prophet certainly does not mean to say that people will have lost their memory in the new world. But his meaning is only this, that all misery and distress of the old world will be so completely got rid of that the images of the same will no more present themselves as a disturbing element in the happiness of the new world. עלה על לב is = come to mind, to be suggested. Comp. Jer. iii. 16, which place is of similar import with the one before us, and seems to be formed after it. The expression is found only in Isaiah and Jeremiah (Jer. iii. 16; vii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii. 35; xliv. 21). The words, ver. 18, Be ye glad and rejoice agree admirably with our explanation of ver. 17 b. The servants of God shall not suffer their happiness to be disturbed by gloomy recollections, but they shall enjoy it to the full and uninterruptedly. Why should they not do this? Is it not a creation of the Lord? And all that the Lord creates is good (Gen. i. 31). Neither שׂושׂ nor גִּיל are ever construed with the accusative of the object. אֲשֶׁר is therefore to be taken as causal = because. The Prophet then repeats emphatically: for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and its people a joy. גִּילָה and מָשׂוֹשׂ are abstracts to be taken as concretes. This form of expression is particularly emphatic (lx. 17; xi. 10; xiii. 9, et saepe; Ps. cxx. 2, 7, et saepe). Jerusalem shall be nothing but rejoicing, its people nothing but joy. But more than that! Not only shall Jerusalem rejoice with its people. The Lord Himself will rejoice over Jerusalem and its people; which supposes on the part of the latter a state of perfect righteousness, such a renovation, in short, as (ver. 17) is promised to the heaven and the earth (lxii. 5). Where there is no more sin, there is no more trouble, and where there is no more trouble, there is no more pain (comp. xxv. 8; xxxv. 10; li. 11; Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4).

3. There shall be no more——saith the Lord.—Vers. 20–25. In what follows the Prophet gives examples of the state of things in the new world. The illustrations given are to serve as a measure for estimating the new relations. מִשָּׁם is not = from then. For שָׁם is never used in regard to time. [The examples given by Gesenius of שָׁם in the sense of then do not bear examination. The particle is not used of time in Hebrew as it is in Arabic.—D. M.]. מִן marks in Hebrew the terminus unde, which according to the usage of the language is found where we employ the terminus ubi. שָׁם refers to Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Thence will no suckling ever appear (comp. lix. 19; xl. 15) who will be only days old (comp. e. g., Gen. xxiv. 55), or an old man who has not reached the normal measure of human age. [Alexander, following Kimchi, supposes there shall be no more from thence to mean there shall be no more taken away thence, or carried thence to burial. But הָיָה means properly to come into existence, and we are to understand the statement thus: there shall no suckling thence arise or come into being who shall live only some days, whose age shall be counted by days.—D. M.]. What follows, strictly taken, contradicts what has been said. For if no one, not even an old man, falls short of the normal measure, then no one can die as a boy. [But the Prophet does not say that no one, not even an old man, falls short of the normal measure, in the former part of ver. 20. When one who dies at the age of a hundred years is counted a boy, and when a sinner who dies a hundred years old is regarded as prematurely cut off by the judgment of God, this is no contradiction of the declaration that the suckling's age will not be reckoned by days, and that old men will fill up the measure of their days. For the hundred years old sinner will not be included in the category of old men. There is no need then of adopting the forced construction proposed by Dr. Naegelsbach to get rid of an imaginary contradiction. The examples here given he holds to be unreal and only supposed by way of illustration. If it were possible that there should still be sinners, one of them, who should be punished with death when a hundred years old, would be regarded as cursed by God, and forever excluded from mercy. And if one of a hundred years should die a natural death, (supposing such a case, which from what has been said cannot really occur), he would be only a boy at his death.—D. M.]. There is clear reference here to the Mosaic law which promises long life and a numerous posterity to the godly, and, on the contrary, threatens shortening of life and speedy extinction of name to the wicked (Ex. xx. 5, 6, 12; xxiii. 26). That the Prophet here at the same time thinks of the longevity of the [antediluvian] patriarchs is very probable. The thought of a return of this longevity is not unbiblical. It is expressed in Rev. xx. 4 [?]. The form חוֹטֶא with Segol is as if from חָטָה. The longevity which, ver. 20, is promised to the servants of God, shall as a secondary consequence, have also the good effect that the curse of fruitless cultivation, planting and begetting, with which the wicked are threatened by the law (Lev. xxvi. 16; Deut. xxviii. 30 sqq.), will be removed from the people of God (comp. lxii. 8, 9; Jer. xxxi. 5; Amos ix. 14, 15). That men shall build houses and not dwell therein, and plant vineyards and not enjoy them, is threatened as a curse Deut. xxviii. 30. These curses will be transformed into the corresponding blessings in consequence of longevity; for the people of God shall live as long as trees (comp. Ps. xcii. 13 sqq.). ["Some trees, such as the oak, the terebinth, and the banyan, reach the age of a thousand years." HENDERSON. The cedars of Lebanon that are still found there "may be fairly presumed to have existed in Biblical times." (ROYLE). בלה means not only to use, but to use up, consume (DEL.).—D. M.]. Ver. 23 a alludes to Lev. xxvi. 16, 20; for לריק and בהלה are borrowed from the two places. ["The sense of sudden destruction given to בהלה by some modern writers, is a mere conjecture from the context. . . . The Hebrew word properly denotes extreme agitation and alarm, and the meaning of the clause is that they shall not bring forth children merely to be the subjects of distressing solicitude." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. The meaning of "זרע ברוכי" is plainly not a posterity that springs from those blessed of the LORD, but a posterity, a seed which consists of those who are blessed. Comp. on i. 4). [This is not so plain as it is affirmed to be. And ALEXANDER is right in saying that it adds greatly to the strength of the expression if we take it to mean that they are themselves the offspring of those blessed of God, and thus give זרע its usual sense. D. M.]. אתם is not to be regarded as merely marking addition to, but as denoting simultaneous, common enjoyment. It includes the idea that the children will enjoy these things not after the parents, but with the parents. But if notwithstanding the abundance of blessing that surrounds them, any trouble or the lack of any good thing should be felt, they have only to bring their concern in prayer to the LORD. The answer will be given even before the request is expressed, or at latest, while he that prays is yet speaking (comp. lviii. 9; xxx. 19). Ver. 25 adds an eschatological feature which is abridged from xi. 6–9. I cannot avoid the impression that these words are an awkward addition, and are not of one piece with what precedes. Have we here again to mark the hand of him who has retouched in various ways the original work of the Prophet in these last chapters? [DELITZSCH declares that those who affirm that the speaker in ver. 25 is one later than Isaiah, because this verse is only loosely attached to what precedes, make an assertion which is unfair and untrue. As in chapter xi. so here, the picture of the new time closes with the peace in the world of nature, which in chapters xl.–lxvi., just as in chapters i.–xxxix., appears as standing in the closest mutual relation to man. The repetition of what was already uttered in chapter xi. speaks in favor of unity of authorship DR. NAEGELSBACH, following KNOBEL, urges the substitution of כאחד for יחדו as marking the hand of a later writer. But כאחד is more than יחדו, together. It means as one, and is a perfectly simple and natural Hebrew form. No argument can be drawn from its appearing besides only in such late books as 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Ecclesiastes. יחדו also occurs in Nehemiah. We have, too, כאיש אחד in early books, in Judg. xx. 8; 1 Sam. xi. 7. This phase is essentially one with the expression in our text, and cannot be referred to the later Hebrew, though it occurs in Ezra iii. 1 and Neh. viii. 1, as well as in Judges and 1 Samuel. We find also in our verse the stronger expression טלה, a young lamb, substituted for the word כבש, a well-grown lamb, which is used in xi. 6. There is, then, no valid reason for suspecting here an addition by a later hand. See KAY in loc. "Most of the modern writers construe נחש as a nominative absolute, as for the serpent, dust (shall be) his food. A more obvious construction is to repeat the verb shall eat, and consider dust and food as in apposition. . . . "The sense seems to be that, in accordance with his ancient doom, he shall be rendered harmless, robbed of his favorite nutriment, and made to bite the dust at the feet of his conqueror (Gen. iii. 15; Rom. xvi. 20; 1 John iii. 8)."—ALEXANDER. Isaiah, in writing "Dust shall be the serpent's meat," has evidently Micah vii. 17 before him: "They shall lick the dust like a serpent." This borrowing from Micah is characteristic of Isaiah, and attests the genuineness of this passage. DELITZSCH, at the close of this chapter, asks when the state of things shall be realized that is here depicted, when the antediluvian length of life shall return, and man and the lower animals shall be in harmony and peace? He replies that it is absurd to refer this prophecy to the state of final blessedness, as it supposes a continued mixture of righteous and sinful men, and only a limitation of the power of death, not its complete destruction by the fulfilment of the promise in xxv. 8 a. But is this state to follow the creation of new heavens and a new earth mentioned in ver. 17? And what have we to understand by the creation of new heavens and a new earth here spoken of? On these questions see under Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 10.—D. M.]

5. THE NEW LIFE IN ITS INWARD RELATIONS.

Chapter LXVI. 1–3 a.

1 Thus saith the Lord,
The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool:
[a]Where is the house that ye build unto me?
And [b]where is the place of my rest?
2 For all those things hath mine hand made,
And all those things [c]have been, saith the Lord:
But to this man will I look,
Even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit,
And trembleth at my word.
3 a He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man;
He that sacrificeth a [1]lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck;
He that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood;
He that [2]burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol.

[1] Or, kid. [2] Heb. maketh a memorial of.
[a] What. [b] what. [c] began to be.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet continues to describe the condition of things which is to be expected in the time of the end when there will be a new heaven and a new earth. Here he has respect more to the inward life, as in lxv. 17 sqq. he had depicted the renovation of the life of nature. What he here declares is to be regarded only as a measure to help us to estimate what will take place. The question, it is true, "What house will ye build me, and what shall be the place of my rest?" appears primarily to have practical application to those returning home from Exile, while it looks as if this question interdicted them from building a temple in Jerusalem. But this cannot possibly have been the design of the Prophet. For that the Lord desired for that time the erection of a temple is proved most clearly by such places as xliv. 28; lvi. 7; lx. 7; Ezra i. 2–4; Hag. i. and ii. This, then, must be the meaning of the words, that the external temple is at all times a thing of minor importance, and that hereafter, in the time of the new heaven and the new earth, the external temple will exist no longer (ver. 1). For all that the Lord has made belongs to Him. If He needed a house, the whole vast world would be at His command. But He does not dwell in temples built by human hands. In the hearts of the afflicted, contrite and obedient He will make His spiritual dwelling (ver. 2). And as He needs no temple, so He needs no external ceremonial worship. In the time when all things will be new, every act of the old, external, ceremonial worship must rather be regarded as an offence against the spirit of the new aeon (ver. 3 a).

2. Thus saith the Lord——an idol.—Vers. 1–3 a. The Prophet begins by setting forth the infinite greatness and majesty of God by means of a figure used elsewhere in holy Scripture. For we read that the heaven is God's throne also in Ps. xi. 4; ciii. 19; Matth. v. 34; xxiii. 22. That the earth is his footstool is directly stated only here and Matth. v. 35, which latter place is based on the one before us. But the thought is indirectly contained in those places where the holy mountain or the temple is named the footstool of God: Ps. xcix. 5, comp. ver. 9; cxxxii. 7; Lam. ii. 1; 1 Chron. xxviii. 2. With this view of the greatness and majesty of God the idea of an earthly habitation for God stands in contradiction, if God is conceived as a local god like the heathen divinities, and the temple is a space that encloses Him. This is a view from which even the Israelites (comp., e. g., the prophet Jonah) could not get free. Even the Christian martyr Stephen had to protest against this vain imagination (Acts vii. 48 sqq.), and in doing so he appeals to our place (comp. Acts xvii. 24 sq.). But the idea of a temple did not contradict God's infinity, when the temple was regarded as a place in which God was present only partially and repraesentativo modo, with a shining forth of His glory. The Rabbis call this effulgence of the absolute glory the Shekinah, and appeal to passages such as Ex. xxv. 21 sq.; Lev. xvi. 2; xxvi. 11 sqq.; Numb. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4, etc. Solomon, too, was fully conscious that the heaven and heaven of heavens could not contain God, much less a house built on the earth (1 Kings viii. 27). He therefore did not think of building a place for the Deity which should enclose Him in His totality. Our Prophet, in asking the question, "What house will ye build?" has manifestly the returning exiles before his mind,* and while he

* ["From the whole strain of the prophecy and particularly from vers. 3-5, it seems probable that it refers to the time when the temple which Herod had reared was finishing; when the nation was full of pride, self-righteousness and hypocrisy, and when all sacrifices were about to be superseded by the one great sacrifice which the Messiah was about to make of Himself for the sins of the world." Barnes.—D. M.]

rejects an external temple and temple-worship, he has in view the remotest end of the time of salvation, the time of the new heaven and new earth, when, according to Rev. xxi. 22, there shall be no temple. The form of a question is intentionally chosen in the sentence אי־זה בית וגו׳. For it makes known that the LORD declares an earthly place to be insufficient to be a habitation for His Godhead, without directly forbidding the erection of such a habitation. Such a prohibition He could not possibly design to make. For, in fact, He plainly disclosed to the returning exiles His will that His house should be rebuilt in Jerusalem (comp. the close of chap. xliv.; Ezra i. 2 sqq.; Hag. i. 2 sqq.). There is no indication that the rebuilding of the temple and the re-institution of the Mosaic cultus were hindered by the place before us. Doubtless there was found in ver. 1 b merely the thought that there is no place which, as a dwelling, corresponds in the least degree to the greatness of God, and that the Prophet warns against such rude childish notions as formerly were entertained in Israel, that Jehovah really dwells in the most holy place of the temple as a man dwells in his house. The thought would readily suggest itself when this passage would be considered, that the new temple was not intended to be a place to contain God, but only to be the restoration of the old place where God revealed Himself. מְנוּחָה is = place of rest, Ps. cxxxii. 14. The second question is literally rendered: what place is my resting place? I will not undertake to decide whether it was also seen that the look of the Prophet is here directed also to the time of the end. But we can have no doubt on this point. For it is undeniable that all through chapters lxv. and lxvi. even the remotest time of the end is present to the spirit of the Prophet. And in this last time there will really, according to Rev. xxi. 22, be no temple. For God is then inwardly and outwardly ever present to all. He is then Himself their temple. The Prophet assigns as reasons for the questions which he puts: First, God has heaven for His throne, the earth for His footstool. Secondly, he declares that God has made all these, that all have arisen through His almighty "Let there be." He evidently alludes to the word of the Creator in Gen. i., יְהִי. He thus lets it be known that God, if He wished, could build Himself a temple. For what would that be for Him who made "all these," heaven and earth? And thirdly and lastly, he tells why God does not do this, although He could do it. He needs no temple. Hearts that feel their misery, that with contrition (comp. xvi. 7; Prov. xv. 13; xvii. 22; xviii. 14) are conscious of their sin, and humbly hearken to His word (חָרֵד, comp. Judg. vii. 3; 1 Sam. iv. 13; Ezra ix. 4; x. 3. עַל for אֶל, comp. ver. 5; lx. 5; x. 3) are the temple which He most desires and values. On these He looks, these He regards and loves, and in these He will dwell. And because He is in them, they also are in Him. They are His temple, and He is their temple. While I cannot believe that the Prophet in vers. 1-2 absolutely repels the design of the returning Israelites to build God a temple, still less can I believe that he in ver. 3 a declares only to those estranged from God that the LORD will accept no religious services from them. Where is it by a single syllable intimated that ver. 3 is addressed solely to those estranged from God?—[See the words immediately following ver. 3 b and ver. 4.—D. M.]—DELITZSCH indeed affirms that the sentence: "He who slays in the new Jerusalem an ox in sacrifice is like one who slays a man," could not possibly be contained in the Old Testament. If under the "new Jerusalem" he means the city rebuilt by the exiles on their return, I admit that DELITZSCH is perfectly right. But distingue tempora et concordabit Scriptura! The Prophet does not distinguish the times. He surveys the whole time of salvation from the end of the Exile to the αἰὼν μέλλων at one view, and in this space of time he perceives really a temple and sacrificial worship; but he declares both to be insufficient. He utters no absolute prohibition; but he declares most unambiguously that this temple must disappear and give place to a better. And when this shall have happened, then (this the Prophet sees quite clearly, as it is also self-evident), an animal sacrifice will be an abomination. He who in the Christian church would present an ox or a sheep as a sin-offering—would he not commit a crime, which in its way would be as great as if a Jew should present a sacrifice of a man or of a dog? Would he not thus despise the blood of the Lamb of God? If in chaps. lvi. and lx. and also in our chapter, vers. 6 and 20 sqq., a temple and sacrificial worship are still spoken of, are we to suppose that the old temple of stone, with its material, bloody offerings, is intended? Verily chaps. liii. and lv. testify that the Prophet knew of an infinitely better offering and of an infinitely better way of appropriating salvation. Even Jeremiah can speak of a time in which the ark of the covenant will be no more thought of (Jer. iii. 16). And Isaiah emphatically testifies that the religious conception of the Israelites of his time will be superseded by one infinitely higher (lv. 8 sqq.). I cannot therefore agree with those who propose this explanation: "He who with a disposition unholy and estranged from God offers an ox, a sheep, etc., is like one who kills a man, etc." For in the time present to the mind of the Prophet every animal sacrifice will be a crimen laesae majestatis. Still less is that explanation to be approved which HAHN, not after the example of GESENIUS, whom he misunderstands, but after the example of LOWTH, adopts: "He who slays an ox kills at the same time a man," etc. According to it the Prophet is supposed to censure those who, while they offer sacrifice to the LORD in His sanctuary, outside of it commit all possible abominations; a course of conduct which is reproved by Ezekiel xxiii. 39, and in the New Testament by our LORD, Matt. xxiii. 14. We have here sentences containing comparisons in which the figure and the thing compared are put in the relation of subject and predicate, whereby they are not absolutely, but yet relatively, identified. The offerer of an ox is a manslayer, i. e. he is, viewed as to his religious worth, a manslayer. He stands before God on the same level with one who now should offer a human sacrifice. For according to the context the Prophet does not mean to compare animal sacrifices in the time of the end with every kind of offence, but with offerings which would be abominable in the present time. Human sacrifices in general are not expressly forbidden in the law. Implicitly they are prohibited by all the places of the law which command Israel to shun all the abominations of the heathen (comp. Ex. xxiii. 24; Lev. xviii. 3, et saepe). But the offering of children, such as was practised in the worship of Baal, is in various places most strictly prohibited (comp. Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 2 sqq.; Deut. xii. 31, et saepe). Regarding the custom of sacrificing dogs practised by the Carians, Lacedaemonians, Macedonians and other Greeks, see BOCHART, Hieroz. I., p. 798 sqq., ed Lips. עֹרֵף is part. act. Kal. from עָרַף, verb. denom. from עֹרֶף, the neck (comp. Ex. xiii. 13; Deut. xxi. 4, 7; Hos. x. 2). It means to break the neck.—In the clause מעלה מנחה ד׳ ח׳ we have in order to complete the sentence simply to repeat מעלה before דם (comp. lvii. 6). On the offering of swine, comp. on lxv. 4. Dogs and swine are in the Scriptures, as in profane authors, often joined together (comp. Matt. vii. 6; 2 Pet. ii. 22; 1 Kings xxi. 19; xxii. 38 in several codices of the LXX.; HORATII, Epist. I. 2, 26; II. 2, 75). אַזְכִּיר stands only here as direct causative Hiphil in the sense of to make an אַזְכָּרָה, to offer as אַזְכָּרָה. אָוֶן is taken by most interpreters correctly in the sense of vanum, i. e. idolum (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 23; Hos. x. 8; xii. 12), for this particular meaning corresponds better to the context than the general one of iniquitas, scelus, wickedness (LUTHER).

6. PUNISHMENT TO THE WICKED! REWARD TO THE FAITHFUL.

CHAP. LXVI. 3 b–6.

3 b [a]Yea, they have chosen their own ways,
And their soul delighteth in their abominations.
4 [b]I also will choose their [1c]delusions,
And will bring their fears upon them;
Because when I called, none did answer;
When I spake, they did not hear:
But they did evil before mine eyes,
And chose that in which I delighted not.
5 Hear the word of the LORD, ye that tremble at his word;
Your brethren that hated you,
That cast you out for my name's sake, said,
[d]Let the LORD be glorified:
But he shall appear to your joy,
[e]And they shall be ashamed.
6 A voice of [f]noise from the city,
A voice from the temple,
A voice of the LORD that rendereth recompence to his enemies.

[1] Or, devices.

[a] As they have chosen. [b] So I also will choose. [c] vexations.
[d] Let Jehovah be glorified that we may see your joy! [e] But. [f] tumult.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. There were among the exiles in Babylon not a few who forsook Jehovah and forgot His holy mountain (lxv. 11). These looked upon the theocracy as a played-out game. Jehovah had not protected them against the gods of Babylon. To these, therefore, they now attached themselves. Between such persons and the faithful Israelites there existed naturally a hostile relation. The apostates mocked those who remained faithful, while the latter abhorred the others as shameful apostates, and threatened them with the wrath of Jehovah. We repeatedly find traces of this enmity in chaps. lxv. and lxvi. It appears that one of those who remained faithful used every opportunity which he could find in chapters lxv. and lxvi., in order to attach to the words of the Prophet a commination against the abhorred apostates [!]. If we must discard the opinion that the Prophet in ver. 3 a rejects only the sacrifices of the wicked, we cannot avoid perceiving that a wide chasm exists between ver. 3 a and b. For ver. 3 a relates to the glorious time of the end. Yea, the highest elevation of its spiritual life is indicated by these words. But vers. 3 b–6 bring us back into the particular relations of the Exile.—[DR. NAEGELSBACH accordingly condemns vers. 3 b–6 as an interpolation. The interpolator we are asked to regard as a faithful servant of Jehovah. But assuredly he was not one "who trembled at Jehovah's word," else he would have shrunk with horror from corrupting that holy word. Even the Pharisees did not venture to alter the text of Scripture to make it support their views. The apostates, too, whom the interpolator is supposed to threaten, having openly renounced the worship of Jehovah, would pay no regard to the fictitious or real utterances of His Prophet. Were the transition in ver. 3 a –3 b sqq. as abrupt as our author supposes, from the time of the end to concrete existing relations, such a transition could not be pronounced unparalleled. Look, e. g. at the surroundings of the glorious promise respecting the abolition of death contained in Hos. xiii. 14. Shall we say that what follows that promise is to be rejected as spurious? But the want of coherence, of which our author here complains, is only imaginary. If we adopt the view of ver. 3 a taken by DELITZSCH and others "that not the temple-offerings in themselves are rejected, but the offerings of those whose heart is divided between Jahve and the false gods, and who refuse Him the offering which is most dear to Him (Ps. li. 19; comp. l. 23)," then there is no difficulty in perceiving the coherence of the words that follow. But if we should (as I believe DR. NAEGELSBACH rightly does) regard the Prophet as here predicting the future abolition of the temple-service under a more glorious dispensation, we should be at no loss to perceive the coherence of vers. 3 b, 4 with such a prediction. The language can be aptly applied to those Jews who obstinately refused to obey the revealed will of God, and persisted in practising rites which were superseded by the establishment of the new and better economy. This is the view taken by many interpreters who, in order to justify it, do not find it necessary to condemn the Hebrew text as interpolated. HENDERSON, e. g., looks upon ver. 3 a "as teaching the absolute unlawfulness of sacrifices under the Christian dispensation. When the Jews are converted to the faith of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, they must acquiesce in the doctrine taught in the ninth and tenth chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that the one offering which He presented on the cross forever set aside all the animal sacrifices and oblations which had been appointed by the law of Moses. Any attempt to revive the practice is here declared to be upon a par with the cruel and abominable customs of the heathen, who offered human sacrifices and such animals as the ancient people of God were taught to hold in abomination." And he finds what follows ver. 3 b to have this connection with the aforesaid teaching: "In retribution of the unbelieving and rebellious persistence of the Jews in endeavoring to establish the old ritual, Jehovah threatens them with condign punishment: while such of them as may render themselves obnoxious to their brethren by receiving the doctrines of the Gospel on the subject, have a gracious promise of divine approbation and protection given to them." In no case, then, is there any necessity for supposing the hand of an interpolator to have been here at work. Strange would be the course taken by this assumed interpolator! The sentiments which he utters do not look like those of one who would recklessly alter the sacred text, and give out his own words for those of Jehovah. See especially ver. 5 where the writer addresses those who tremble at God's word. Can we suppose that he was, while using this language, corrupting the word of God and making his own additions to it? The character of this passage strongly attests its genuineness. We have to add that vers. 3 b, 4, should not have been separated from what precedes, as the close connection between the two parts has been pointed out.—D. M.]

2. Yea, they have chosen——delighted not, vers. 3 b–4. גם־גם are related as et-et, tamquam (comp. Gen. xxiv. 25; Jer. li. 12, et saepe). דֶּרֶךְ stands here, as often (comp. Amos viii. 14; Ps. cxxxix. 24), in the signification of the religious bent. שִׁקּוּץ is likewise used frequently of the abominations of idolatry (comp. 1 Kings xi. 5, 7; Jer. vii. 30, et saepe). The word is found only here in Isaiah. תעלול (in which word the signification of the Hithpael הִתְעַלֵּל with בְּ following (comp. Jud. xix. 25) is reflected) is ἀπ. λεγ.—[This is an error. The word occurs in Isa. iii. 4 in the plural as here. There it means the petulances, the puerilities of boys. Here it retains the kindred notion of annoyances, vexations. The occurrence of this peculiar word here and in iii. 4 speaks in favor of identity of authorship. The rendering of the E. V. delusions, in the sense of childish, wayward follies, may be defended. These childish delusions would mock and disappoint those who entertained them. God could be said to choose their delusions by allowing them in His providence, and causing the people to eat the fruit of them. Their fears, מְגוּרֹת, may be taken as what is feared by them, or, with DELITZSCH, situations, conditions, which inspire dread. The latter part of ver. 4 from because DR. NAEGELSBACH regards as a needless repetition from lxv. 12; but ALEXANDER rightly judges that the repetition serves not only to connect the passages as parts of an unbroken composition, but also to identify the subjects of discourse in the two places.—D. M.]

3. Hear the word——His enemies, vers. 5, 6. These words are a consolation for the faithful adherents of Jehovah, who tremble at His word. The verb נִדָּה occurs only in Piel, and is found only here and Amos vi. 3. In later Hebrew the word is employed of removal, exclusion from the community, or excommunication (comp. Luke vi. 22; John ix. 22; xii. 42; xvi. 2). The Rabbis use the word נִדּוּי to denote the lowest of the three grades of excommunication (comp. BUXTORF, Lex. Chal., p. 1303). The Masoretes connect למען שמי with what follows, because they could not conceive, or would not admit that an Israelite was ever put out of the community for the sake of the name of Jehovah. But this is what the forsakers of Jehovah did in the Exile where they had the power [?]. And they scoffingly called out to the excommunicated: "Let Jehovah be (appear as) glorious (comp. Job xiv. 21; Ezek. xxvii. 25), and we will (in consequence) behold with delight your joy." They thus mock the LORD and their brethren, regarding whom they do not think that they will experience the joy of seeing their hopes fulfilled. But this scoffing misses the mark. Not those who are scoffed at, but the scoffers will be put to shame.—[BARNES, ALEXANDER and KAY think with VITRINGA that in this verse we are brought down to New Testament times. VITRINGA applies it "to the rejection of the first Christian converts by the unbelieving Jews: Hear the word (or promise) of Jehovah, ye that wait for it with trembling confidence: your brethren (the unconverted Jews) who hate you and cast you out for my name's sake, have said (in so doing): 'Jehovah will be glorious (or glorify Himself on your behalf no doubt), and we shall witness your salvation' (a bitter irony like that in v. 19); but they (who thus speak) shall themselves be confounded (by beholding what they now consider so incredible). The phrase those hating you may be compared with John xv. 18; xvii. 14; Matt. x. 22; 1 Thess. ii. 14; and casting you out with John xvi. 2; and Matt. xviii. 17: for my name's sake, with Matt. xxiv. 9; John xv. 21." ALEXANDER. And they shall be ashamed. "How true this has been of the Jews who persecuted the early Christians! How entirely were they confounded and overwhelmed! God established permanently the persecuted; He scattered the persecutors to the ends of the earth." BARNES. Ver. 6. "The Hebrew word שָׁאוֹן is never applied elsewhere to a joyful cry or a cry of lamentation, but to the tumult of war, the rushing sound of armies and the shock of battle, in which sense it is repeatedly employed by Isaiah. The enemies here mentioned must of course be those who had just been described as the despisers and persecutors of the brethren. The description cannot without violence be understood of foreign or external enemies." ALEXANDER. BARNES observes here: "1) that it is recompense taken on those who had cast out their brethren (ver. 5). 2) It is vengeance taken within the city, and on the internal, not the external enemies. 3) It is vengeance taken in the midst of this tumult. All this is a striking description of the scene when the city and temple were taken by the Roman armies; and it seems to me that it is to be regarded as descriptive of that event. It was the vengeance which was to precede the glorious triumph of truth and of the cause of the true religion."—D. M.]

7. THE WONDERFUL PRODUCTIVE POWER OF THE NEW PRINCIPLE OF LIFE.

CHAPTER LXVI. 7-9.

7 Before she travailed, she brought forth;
Before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child.
8 Who hath heard such a thing?
Who hath seen such things?
[a]Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day?
Or shall a nation be born at once?
For as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.
9 Shall I bring to the birth, and not [1]cause to bring forth? saith the LORD:
[b]Shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb? saith thy God.

[1] Or, beget.

[a] Shall a land be born in one day?

[b] Shall I make to bear and restrain?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. With wonderful rapidity Zion will be surrounded by the blessing of numerous children (ver. 7). In other cases a long time is needed for a land to be peopled, for a family to expand into a nation. But in the case of Zion this will happen with incredible quickness (ver. 8). Such is the power inherent in that new principle of life which Jehovah cannot possibly in a forced and artificial way restrain (ver. 9).—[Our author speaks of a new principle of life and its wonderful power. The Prophet, however, makes no mention of this new principle of life, but of the working of Jehovah Himself.—D. M.]

2. Before she travailed —— saith thy God, vers. 7-9.—[While the immediately preceding verses speak of judgment falling on the disobedient and rebellious mass of the people, we learn here how the Israel of God shall receive a sudden and unexampled enlargement. VITRINGA sees here a prophecy of the vocation of the Gentiles and of their accession to the Church, while the unbelieving Jews are cast off.—D. M.]—We have here in the main the same thought which the Prophet had expressed, xlix. 18 sqq.; liv. 1 sqq.; lx. 4 sqq. Here he makes specially prominent the rapidity and suddenness with which, contrary to the ordinary laws of nature, Zion will be enlarged, and this he does most ingeniously and in a manner characteristic of Isaiah. הִמְלִיט, to let slip away, is used as Piel xxxiv. 15 (comp. Job xxi. 10). זָכָר must in this connection be primarily chosen to intimate that the birth takes place easily and quickly, though the child is a male. For male children are wont to be larger and stronger; hence their birth is attended with more difficulty. But it is just as certain that the Prophet does not think of the birth of a single child in a literal sense. In ver. 8 he puts בָּנֶיהָ for זָכָר. He means, therefore, that זָכָר should be taken collectively, and at the same time wishes to indicate that this collective birth is a male child strong and vigorous. This seems to be the meaning put upon our place in Rev. xii. 5, which latter passage evidently refers to the one before us. However erroneous it would be to apply this solely to the birth of Christ, it would in my opinion be equally one-sided to exclude the latter. For does not the whole New Testament blessing of abundance of children begin with the birth of Christ? Without the birth of Christ this blessing could not be realized. "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," the Prophet had said ix. 5. And to this child is promised "increase of government," consequently, a populous and mighty kingdom,—this child, with what belongs to it, is it not a male, strong child? I look upon it as possible that the Prophet had here before him his earlier utterance ix. 5. [This view is in accordance with the Targum: "Before distress cometh upon her, she shall be redeemed: and before trembling cometh upon her, as travail upon a woman with child, her king shall be revealed."—D. M.]. Such a case never before occurred that a land (אֶרֶץ must denote here both land and people, the idea of the people being predominant, and hence the word is used as a masculine, comp. on xiv. 17) or nation suddenly, all at once arose. ["The causative sense given to יוּחַל in the English and some other versions is not approved by the later lexicographers, who make it a simple passive." ALEXANDER.]. How comes it that in the case of Zion, travailing and bringing forth her children coincided? Everything was well arranged beforehand for the birth. The time was fulfilled. The proper moment had come. Peter's speech on the day of Pentecost and the conversion of the three thousand are facts in which the rapidity of that process of bringing forth is mirrored. And when such an astonishing and rapid success is founded in the nature of the case, can the LORD interfere to check and restrain? This is the meaning of ver. 8. [DR. NAEGELSBACH interprets the first part of ver. 9 by describing the process of parturition with a particularity which some would think hardly in accordance with good taste. It is sufficient to give the explanation of GESENIUS in his Lexicon: "Shall I cause to break open (the womb), and not cause to bring forth?" D. M.]. The second hemistich of ver. 9 repeats according to the law of the Parallelismus membrorum the same thought in another form. עָצַר is often used of the closing of the uterus, i. e., of the barrenness of a woman. But here it is not the making unfruitful, but the hindering of the birth that is spoken of. It is, therefore, better to take עָצַר in the sense of cohibere, retinere, in which it occurs frequently elsewhere (comp. e. g., Judges xiii. 15, 16). [The words of HEZEKIAH are here almost taken up xxxvii. 3. "Shall that long and painful national history not have for its issue the birth of a true Israel?" KAY. "The meaning of the whole is, that God designed the great and sudden increase of His Church; that the plan was long laid; and that having done this, He would not abandon it, but would certainly effect His designs." BARNES. D. M.]. In regard to the alternating יֹאמַר וגו׳ and אָמַר א׳ in ver. 9, I refer in general to the remarks on xl. 1. In the place before us, the Prophet has certainly no other reason for the change than a rhetorical one.

8. THE MATERNAL CHARACTER OF THE NEW ORDER OF LIFE.

CHAPTER LXVI. 10-14.

10 Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad [a]with her, all ye that love her:
Rejoice for joy with her, all ye that mourn for her:
11 That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;
That ye may [b]milk out, and be delighted with the [1c] abundance of her glory
12 For thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river,
And the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream:
Then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon [d]her sides,
And be dandled upon her knees.
13 [e]As one whom his mother comforteth,
So will I comfort you;
And ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.
14 And when ye see this, your heart shall rejoice,
And your bones shall flourish like [f]an herb:

And the hand of the LORD shall be known [a]toward his servants,
And his indignation [b]toward his enemies.

[1] Or, brightness.

[a] over her. [b] suck. [c] bosom. [d] the hip. [e] As a man. [f] fresh grass. [g] on. [h] on.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10. גִּיל with בְּ of the object is the common construction, comp. lxv. 19; Prov. xxiv. 17. שִׂישׂוּ מָשׂוֹשׂ. On this connection of a verb with a substantive instead of the infinitive absolute comp. xxii. 17, 18; xxiv. 19, 22; xlii. 17.

Ver. 12. The Masoretes take כְּבוֹד גּוֹיִם as the object of both clauses. and consequently נָהָר שָׁלוֹם = a river which is peace, a peaceful river. But this is artificial. שִׁעֲשַׁע is Pulpal from שָׁעַע. The word is one which is used especially by Isaiah. It is found besides here vi. 10; xi. 8; xxix. 9 (bis).

Ver. 14. There should properly be a כִּי before יַד־יְהוָה. But the thrice-repeated conjunction Vav in the preceding part of the verse, as it were, governed the flow of speech, and carried it over the syntax. Therefore וְנוֹדְעָה stands as resumption of רְאִיתֶם, which is for רְאִיתֶם כִּי. I therefore take וְשָׂשׂ to תִּפְרַחְנָה as a parenthesis which is intended to declare by what emotions that "seeing" will be accompanied. [But it is much easier, with the E. V., to supply the pronoun this or it, meaning the fulfilment of the promise, after רְאִיתֶם, and then there will be no need of assuming a break in the sentence and a parenthesis.—D. M.]. In the clause יַד י׳ אֶת־ע׳ we have to take אֶת as a preposition, while before אֹיְבָיו it marks the accusative. [In the E. V. וְזָעַם is regarded as a noun. But the noun would have Pattach under its first syllable. The verb governs the accusative.—D. M.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. After all that has been said, all the friends of Jerusalem, who had before mourned over her, are now justly called upon to rejoice over her (ver. 10), and gloriously to participate in her happiness (ver. 11). For the LORD will turn to her peace and all glory in abundance; the Israelites will be treated with the tenderest care (ver. 12). The LORD Himself will comfort them with a mother's love (ver. 13). Then they shall have joy, and the LORD's hand will be manifest on them; but His enemies will be made to feel the indignation of the LORD (ver. 14).

2. Rejoice ye——His enemies.—Vers. 10–14. The joy at Jerusalem's prosperity is also the condition of participation in that prosperity. For he who has not mourned with Jerusalem and does not rejoice with her will not be regarded as her child, and is not suffered to satiate himself with delight on her maternal breast. This is, I think, the meaning of לְמַעַן ver. 11. ["Jerusalem is thought of as a mother, and the rich consolation (not in word but in deed) which she receives (li. 3) as the milk which comes into her breasts (שֹׁד as lx. 16), with which she now nourishes her children abundantly." DEL.]. The image of suckling to designate the most loving and assiduous care, has been already before us xlix. 23; lx. 16. We should rather expect the consolations of her breast; but the putting of שֹׁד first is the effect of the idea of sucking being before the mind of the writer. ["Suck and be satisfied, milk out and enjoy yourselves, may be regarded as examples of hendiadys, meaning suck to satiety, and milk out with delight; but no such change in the form of translation is required or admissible." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. The word זִיז, which stands parallel with שֹׁד, is found besides here only Ps. l. 11; lxxx. 14. Its signification is still disputed. Some take זיז = צִיץ in the signification micare, emicare, and hence זִיז = lac ex ubere radiatim defluens (SCHROEDER, GESEN.). [So GESEN. in Thes.; but in Lexicon he gives the meaning, full breast. D. M.]. But the signification of shining forth, belongs essentially to צוּץ, צִיץ, whence צִיץ, a shining plate, a flower, a glittering feather. זִיז, on the contrary, denotes according to the meaning of its root, which occurs in Syriac, though not in Hebrew, id quod movetur, that which moves itself to and fro. Hence זִיז, Ps. l. 11; lxxx. 14, the beasts that move about on the field. Hence here, too, זִיז is synonymous with mamma, the breast that moves this way and that. So DELITZSCH. [DELITZSCH assigns to זִיז the meaning abundance (Ueberschwang) as the E. V., does, and, moreover, he expressly states that the parallelism does not force us to give to the word the signification of teats, dugs. See his comment. in loc. 2 Ed. D. M.]. The joy to which the Prophet, ver. 10, summons the friends of Jerusalem is well-founded. For the LORD Himself declares that He will extend (direct) to Jerusalem peace, the highest of all inward blessings, as a river (comp. xlviii. 18; viii. 7), and as a torrent (נַחַל, Arabic Wadi, comp. xxx. 28) the glory of the Gentiles, which comprehends all desirable outward things (comp. xvi. 14; xvii. 4; xxi. 16; xxxv. 2). And because the Prophet has here before his mind the image of maternal love and solicitude on the one hand, and on the other that of a child's wants, he adds here, and ye shall suck. Herewith he points back to ver. 11, where he had designated Jerusalem as the source of consolations. Here he tells us that the spring of that spring will be the LORD. But that maternal care is not restricted to the affording of nourishment. The children shall also be faithfully carried (עַל־צַד on the hip, after the common oriental custom, lx. 4). They will also be lovingly played with, caressed, and rocked on the knees. The LORD here again ascribes to Himself maternal love and maternal conduct (comp. xlii. 14; xlvi. 3 sq.; xlix. 15). Is the term אִישׁ to be pressed? I believe that it ought, for it contains a fine climax. A mother who comforts her child is an affecting image. But a mother's love is still more gloriously displayed when it shows itself to be strong enough to raise up again the son, the strong man, who is bowed down by misfortune. ["The E. V. here dilutes a man to one. The same liberty is taken by many other versions. But comp. Gen. xxiv. 67; Judges xvii. 2; 1 Kings xix. 19, 20, and the affecting scenes between Thetis and Achilles in the Iliad."—ALEXANDER. "The Prophet now thinks of the people as one man. Before he had thought of them as children. Israel is as a man returned from a foreign country, escaped from bondage, full of sad recollections, which are wholly obliterated in the maternal arms of divine love yonder in Jerusalem, the dear home, which even in a strange land was the home of their thoughts."—DELITZSCH. "The in Jerusalem suggests the only means by which these blessings are to be secured, viz., a union of affection and of interest with the Israel of God to whom alone they are promised." ALEXANDER.—D. M.]. The beginning of ver. 14 recalls lx. 5. In this place, too, the meaning of the Prophet is, that what Jerusalem shall see is the manifestation of the power of Jehovah on His friends and foes. For the aim and scope of all divine training is that God may be known from all nature and history as the supreme good (comp. xli. 20; xlii. 12 sqq.; xliii. 10 sqq.; xlv. 3 sqq. et saepe). The heart, the centre of life, shall rejoice, the bones, the parts forming the periphery, will shoot as young grass, i. e., they will feel themselves excited to fresh, vigorous manifestation of life (comp. xliv. 4; lviii. 11; lxi. 3). [The latter part of the verse is "in accordance with the Prophet's constant practice of presenting the salvation of God's people as coincident and simultaneous with the destruction of His enemies." ALEXANDER.—D. M.].

9. GENERAL PICTURE OF THE TIME OF THE END AS THE TIME OF JUDGMENT TO LIFE AND TO DEATH.

CHAPTER LXVI. 15-24.

15 For, behold, the LORD will come with fire,
And with his chariots like a whirlwind,
To render his anger with fury,
And his rebuke with flames of fire.
16 [a]For by fire aud by his sword
Will the LORD plead with all flesh:
And the slain of the LORD shall be many.
17 They that sanctify themselves and purify themselves [b]in the gardens,
[1]Behind one tree in the midst,
Eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse,
Shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.
18 [c]For I know their works and their thoughts:
It shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues;
And they shall come, and see my glory.
19 And I will set a sign among them,
And I will send those that escape of them unto the nations,
To Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow,
To Tubal and Javan, to the isles afar off,
That have not heard my [d]fame,
Neither have seen my glory;
And they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.
20 And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the LORD
Out of all nations
Upon horses, and in chariots, and in [2]litters,
And upon mules, and upon [3]swift beasts,
To my holy mountain [4]Jerusalem, saith the LORD,
As the children of Israel bring an offering
In a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.
21 [e]And I will also take of them
For priests and for Levites, saith the LORD.

22 For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make,
Shall remain before me, saith the LORD,
So shall your seed and your name remain.
23 And it shall come to pass, that [1,3]from one new moon to another,
And from one Sabbath to another,
Shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the LORD.
24 And they shall go forth, and look
Upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me:
For their worm shall not die,
Neither shall their fire be quenched;
And they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

[1] Or, one after another. [2] Or, coaches.
[3] Heb. from new moon to his new moon, and from Sabbath to his Sabbath.

[a] For by fire Jehovah contends and by his sword with all flesh. [b] for the gardens behind one in the midst.
[c] But I——their works and their thoughts——it is come that they gather all nations, etc.
[d] report. [e] dromedaries. [f] to Jerusalem.
[g] And also of them will I take to (as an addition to) the priests, to the Levites.
[h] monthly at new moon, and weekly on the Sabbath.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15. The words וכסופה מרכבתיו occur exactly as here Jer. iv. 13. There, too, they stand as second subject of the verb יַעֲלֶה, which is first in order. Jeremiah quotes there Hab. i. 8 also. מֶרְכָּבָה is never used by Jeremiah elsewhere; he employs the word רֶכֶב (xvii. 25; xxii. 4; xlvi. 9; xlvii. 3; l. 37; li. 21). But Isaiah uses מרכבה three times, namely ii. 7; xxii. 18, in addition to the present case. סוּפָה, too, is never elsewhere used by Jeremiah. He employs always instead of it סַעַר (xxiii. 19; xxv. 32; xxx. 23) and סְעָרָה (xxiii. 19; xxx. 23). But Isaiah has סופה five times, including the present place, v. 28; xvii. 13; xxi. 1; xxix. 6. On these grounds we can maintain that the words in Jeremiah are a quotation from the place before us.

Ver. 16. אֵת is not the sign of the accusative, but a preposition as 1 Sam. xii. 7; Jer. ii. 35; Ezek. xvii. 20; xx. 35 sq.; xxxviii. 22; Jer. xxv. 31. This last place recalls forcibly the one before us.

Ver. 17. I hold this verse to be interpolated by the same hand which inserted lxiv. 9 sqq.; lxv. 3-5, 11; lxvi. 3 b-6. My reasons are, 1) The special mention of the Israelites who had apostatized to heathenism is not at all necessary in this connection. For vers. 15 and 16 speak of the general judgment extending to all flesh (ver. 16). For what purpose then this particular specification of a single class of men? [Criticism of this kind is not worthy of our author. We might apply it to establish the spuriousness of the greater part of the discourse recorded in Matt. xxv. 31-46. There, too, is an account of the judgment of all nations. Yet only a class of persons guilty of a particular sin of omission is condemned by the Judge. It is enough to say that our LORD and the Prophet had their reasons for particularly specifying a certain class of men as the objects of divine judgment.—D. M.]. 2) This verse, as lxv. 3, 11, contains clear allusion to foreign, in particular, to Babylonian heathenism. Such an allusion is suspicious. It cannot be explained from the stand-point of Isaiah. For Isaiah sees into the distant future, it is true, but he does not see as a person standing near. He does not distinguish specific, individual features. [In his remarks on lxv. 4 DR. NAEGELSBACH admits that there is no evidence outside the book of Isaiah that the Babylonians either offered swine in sacrifice, or used them for food. There is really nothing mentioned in this verse which can be proved to be specifically Babylonian. The gardens were connected with idolatrous worship practised by the Israelites at home. See Isa. i. 29. The statement that the Prophet could not foresee the practices here mentioned depends on the erroneous theory of prophecy which DR. NAEGELSBACH has adopted, and which is animadverted on in the Introduction, pp. 17, 18, foot-note.—D. M.]. 3) The words are very appropriate in the mouth of an exile who thought that he must apply particularly to the renegades of his time the threatening of judgment contained in vers. 15 and 16. [But the words are quite appropriate in the mouth of the Prophet Isaiah, and we are not warranted to assume that these forms of idolatry were practised by the exiles in Babylon. Unless Isaiah is supposed to testify to this fact, we have no evidence of it. In the Babylonian Captivity the people were cured of their propensity to gross idolatry.—D. M.]. 4) The singular phrase אחר אחד בתוך clearly betrays a foreign, later hand; and the manifest corruption of the text in the beginning of ver. 18 is also to be regarded as an indication of changes in the original text. [The occurrence of the singular phrase referred to is no sign of the hand of an interpolator, who would rather be careful to avoid saying what would be obscure and ambiguous. An interpolator, too, who understood Hebrew, would hardly have left the difficulty complained of in the beginning of ver. 18.—D. M.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet here, too, represents the future under the forms of the present. He sets forth its leading features, and again brings together what is homogeneous without regard to intervening spaces of time. He begins, vers. 15, 16, and 18, by describing the judgment of retribution on the wicked. [On ver. 17 see under Text. and Gram.]. The Prophet surveys together the beginning and end of the judgment. As we see from ver. 19, the beginning of the judgment of the world is for him the judgment on Israel. He, therefore, vers. 19 sqq., tells what shall take place after the destruction of the visible theocracy. He beholds a sign set in Israel. We clearly perceive here in the light of the fulfilment what he only obscurely, as through a mist, descried. He intends Him who is set for a sign that is spoken against. After this sign has appeared and been rejected, the judgment begins on the earthly Jerusalem. Persons escaped from this great catastrophe go to the heathen to publish to them the glory of Jehovah (ver. 19). And the heathen world turns to Jehovah, and in grateful love brings along with it to the holy mountain the scattered members of Israel that had been visited with judgment. These are as a meat-offering which Jehovah receives from the hand of the Gentiles as willingly as He welcomes a pure meat-offering from the hand of an Israelite (ver. 20). And then from Gentiles and Jews a new race arises. The wall of separation is removed. The LORD takes priests and Levites indiscriminately from both (ver. 21). The new life which throbs in men, as well as in heaven and earth, is eternal life. Hence the new race of men stand on the new earth and under the new heaven eternally before the LORD (ver. 22). And all flesh will then render to the LORD true worship forever (ver. 23). But the wicked, of whom the Prophet had declared at the close of the first and second Ennead that they have no peace, will be excluded from the society of the blessed, to be a prey of the undying worm and unquenchable fire, and an object of abhorrence.

2. For, behold, the LORD——my glory.—Vers. 15-18. The Prophet sees the LORD come to judgment in flaming fire, and he beholds His chariots rush along as a tempest. The image is here, as Ps. xviii. 9, 13, borrowed from a thunder-storm. It appears to me better to regard מרכבתיו as second subject to יָבֹא than to supply in the translation the substantive verb. For the chariots are not in themselves like a stormy wind, but their rolling is compared with the rushing of a tempest. The plural is certainly the proper plural. For as an earthly commander of an army is accompanied by many chariots, so too is the "LORD of hosts." KLEINERT justly observes on Hab. iii. that the elements, clouds and winds, as media of manifestation, are compared with Jehovah's horses and chariots. In Ps. civ. 3 the LORD is expressly described as He who "maketh the clouds his chariot." הָשִׁיב אַף cannot possibly denote here as Job ix. 13; Ps. lxxviii. 38, to take away wrath. Here retribution is the subject of discourse. We must, therefore, compare places such as Hos. xii. 3, where השיב standing alone means to recompense, and Deut. xxxii. 41, 43, where it is joined with נָקָם in like signification. In the day of judgment they who have sown evil must reap the wrath of God as necessary harvest (comp. Gal. vi. 7). God will render his anger to them in the form of חֵמָה, i. e., of burning fury (comp. xlii. 25; lix. 18), and his rebuke (comp. xxx. 17; l. 2; li. 20), in flames of fire (comp. xiii. 8; xxix. 6; xxx. 30). Fire must serve not only to indicate the violence of the divine wrath, but also as a real instrument of judgment. For the first judgment of the world was accomplished by water (Gen. vii.), the second will be effected by fire. At the first act of the second judgment of the world, the destruction of Jerusalem, fire was not wanting (comp. JOSEPH. B. J. VI. 7, 2; 5, 5). With fire and sword, igne ferroque, the LORD judges. [" What is here said of fire, sword and slaughter, was fulfilled not only as a figurative prophecy of general destruction, but in its strictest sense in the terrific carnage which attended the extinction of the Jewish State, of which, more emphatically than of any other event outwardly resembling it, it might be said that many were the slain of Jehovah." ALEXANDER. D. M.]. Ver. 17. Here people are spoken of, who make a religious consecration of themselves by sanctifying (comp. xxx. 29; lxv. 6; Ex. xix. 22; Numb. xi. 18 et saepe) and purifying themselves (מטהר in Isaiah only here, comp. Lev. xiv. 4, 7, 8 et saepe; Ezra vi. 20; Neh. xii. 30; xiii. 22). They do this אֶל־הַגַּנּוֹת (comp. i. 29, 30; lxi. 11; lxv. 3). The preposition אֶל might be taken, with Hahn, as a case of constr. praegnans, if it were possible to find the idea of motion to a place latent in the verbs הטהר and התקדש. We must, therefore, take אֶל in the sense of "in relation to, in respect to," i. e. = for (comp. e. g., 1 Sam. i. 27; Ezek. vi. 10). [In performing their lustrations they have respect to the gardens as places of worship. Translate: that purify themselves for the gardens, not in the gardens as in the E. V.—D. M.]. The words אחר אחר בתוך are very obscure. The old translators (LXX., TARG., SYR., ARAB., THEODORET, SYMMACHUS, HIERONYMUS) were evidently puzzled with the text, and conjectured its meaning rather than explained it according to certain principles. The later interpreters can be classified according to what they understand by אֶחָד (אַחַר, אַחַת, the last is the reading of the K'ri). SEB. SCHMIDT and BOCHART think (after SAADIA) of one of the trees, or of a reservoir in the garden, behind or in which the lustration was performed. Others refer אחד to an idol. ABENEZRA thinks that אחת (K'ri) is Astarte. Very many interpreters (after SCALIGER) take אחד to be the name of a Syrian divinity, Ἀδωδος, who is called in EUSEBIUS (Praep. Ev. I. 10) King of gods. And this explanation has been the rather adopted, because MACROBIUS (Saturn. I. 23) gives as the meaning of this name "unus;" a statement which is manifestly owing to his want of knowledge of the language. CLERICUS sees in אחת the name Ἑκάτη. BEN. CARPZOV, who is followed by HAHN and MAURER, understands an idol of some kind. STIER, not satisfied with Antichrist, who is thought of by NETELER, understands under the one the "idol of the world in the strictest sense, whose place of concealment is the tree of knowledge in the midst of the garden." MAJUS (Œcon. p. 984) takes אחר אחר in the sense of praeter unum, i. e., beside the only true God (Deut. vi. 4) they follow an idol set in the midst. But this meaning the words will not bear. That explanation has most in its favor, which refers אחד to a human being. Here we must set aside as philologically untenable the view which, after the Targ. Jon., and the Syriac, would in any way bring out the sense alius post alium. After the example of PFEIFER in the Dubia Vexata, it is better to understand a person placed in the midst who acted as leader, initiator, or hierophant. So GESENIUS, HITZIG, HENDEWERK, BECK, UMBREIT, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH, SEINECKE, ROHLING. בָּתָּוֶךְ is understood by HITZIG, HENDEWERK, BECK, UMBREIT, EWALD of the middle of the house, the impluvium, the court. But KNOBEL, DELITZSCH, SEINECKE, ROHLING think of the hierophant standing in the midst, so that אַחַר is not to be understood in the local sense, but in that of acting after, or imitation. EWALD proposes instead of אחד אחר to read a double אחר; BOETTCHER would strike out the words אחר אחד. CHEYNE regards the place as quite corrupt. It seems to me that the words אחר אחד בתוך are either a corrupt reading, or a later expression current in those Babylonian forms of worship. But we have not hitherto been able to explain their meaning satisfactorily. [That Babylonian rites are here referred to is a gratuitous assumption. Of the interpretations put upon the statement that purify themselves for the gardens after one in the midst, the one most entitled to our acceptance is that which regards it as descriptive of a crowd of devotees surrounding their priest or leader, and doing after him the rites which he exhibits for their imitation. DELITZSCH is so satisfied with this explanation that he declares that it leaves nothing to be desired. The use of אחד, one, has its reason in the opposition of the one leader of the ceremonies to the many repeaters of the rites after him. D. M.]. אכלי בשר החזיר is one of the subjects of יסופו. Comp. on lxv. 4. שֶׁקֶץ stands frequently in Leviticus parallel with שֶׁרֶץ, reptile, e. g., Lev. xi. 20, comp. ibid. vers. 10, 23, 41. Probably, then, reptiles, such as the snail, lizard and the like, are here chiefly intended. עַכְבָּר is the mouse (comp. Lev. xi. 29; 1 Sam. vi. 4 sqq.). On edible mice, or rats (glires) see DELITZSCH, Comment. in loc., BOCHART, Hieroz. II. p. 432 sqq., HERZ. R.-Encycl. XIV. p. 602. ["The actual use of any kind of mouse in the ancient heathen rites has never been established, the modern allegations of the fact being founded on the place before us." ALEXANDER. This commentator contends that the Prophet is still treating of the excision of the Jews and the vocation of the Gentiles. And although the generation of Jews "upon whom the final blow fell were hypocrites, not idolaters, the misdeeds of their fathers entered into the account, and they were cast off not merely as the murderers of the Lord of Life, but as apostates who insulted Jehovah to His face by bowing down to stocks and stones, in groves and gardens, and by eating swine's flesh, the abomination, and the mouse." Isaiah would naturally make prominent, in assigning the causes of divine judgment, the most flagrant transgressions of the law that prevailed in his own time. We have had many examples of his practice to depict the future in the colors of the present.—D. M.]. Ver. 18 is very difficult. It appears to me impossible to obtain an appropriate sense from the text as it stands. I must therefore hold it to be corrupt. The old versions do not enable us to detect any corruption that has taken place since they were made. They all give such translations that they evidently suppose the present Masoretic text. They all use the first person in the rendering of בָּאָה. But this does not justify our inferring a difference of text. It is merely a free translation. The predicate to ואנכי is wanting. Some would supply יָדַעְתִּי [as the E. V.], or אֶפְקֹד (DELITZSCH), as was done in some manuscripts of the LXX. But is it possible that the writer omitted the predicate? ["The ellipsis is like that in Virgil Quos ego (Aen. I. 139), and belongs to the rhetorical figure of aposiopesis: and I, their works and thoughts—(will know to punish)." DELITZSCH. If an ellipsis is to be supplied, there is none more facile than that assumed in the English version, and which can plead the support of the Targum. But it seems to me better to retain the aposiopesis of the original, with KNOBEL, EWALD, ALEXANDER and KAY. The last mentioned has this remark: "The sentence is interrupted; as if it were too great a condescension to comment on their folly,—so soon to be made evident by the course of events. And I —as for their works and their thoughts, the time cometh for gathering all nations."—D. M.]. So much can be seen from ver. 18, that God's judgments will rest on a bringing to light not only of the works, but also of the thoughts of the heart (Hebr. iv. 12). בָּאָה is according to the accents to be taken as a participle. The feminine is to be understood in a neuter sense [i. e., it is used impersonally]. בָּא stands for the arrival of the right moment: it is come to this that all nations, etc., comp. Ezek. xxxix. 8. The words קַבֵּץ אֶת־כָּל־הַגּוֹיִם seem to be borrowed from Joel iv. 2. On the other hand, the Prophet Zephaniah (iii. 8) seems to have had this place of Isaiah before him. The expression כל־הגוים והלשנות does not occur exactly elsewhere. We can compare, on the one hand, Gen. x. 20, 31 (comp. ver. 5), on the other, Dan. iii. 4, 7, 29, 31; v. 19; vi. 26; vii. 14. Comp. Zech. viii. 23. If this expression really belonged to a later age, we should find in it a confirmation of the supposition that the text of ver. 18 also has been corrupted by an interpolator. ["The use of the word tongues as an equivalent to nations has reference to national distinctions springing from diversity of language, and is founded on Gen. x. 5, 20, 31, by the influence of which passage and the one before us, it became a phrase of frequent use in Daniel, whose predictions turn so much upon the calling of the Gentiles (Dan. iii. 4, 7, 31; v. 19). The representation of this form of speech as an Aramaic idiom by some modern critics is characteristic of their candor." ALEXANDER. Some suppose the glory of Jehovah which all nations will be assembled to see to be a gracious display of His glory, and others think that a grand manifestation of judgment is here referred to. In the preceding part of the chapter a revelation of both grace and judgment is foretold. We can take the expression in a general sense for the revelation of Jehovah's perfections. But here a difficulty arises. If in this verse all nations are represented as gathered, as having come to see the glory of the LORD, where are the distant nations who are to be visited according to the following verse by those that have escaped from the judgment? The seeming inconsistency is removed, if we regard ver. 19 as describing the way in which the nations will be brought to see the glory of God, and take the ו as causal: For I will set a sign, etc. For this causal force of ו comp. on lxiv. 3. This is better than to suppose, with DELITZSCH, that all nations and tongues in ver. 18 are not to be understood of all nations without exception.—D. M.].

3. And I will set——all flesh.—Vers. 19-24. [This verse explains the gathering of all nations mentioned in the previous verse. The Hebrew often employs the simple connective and where we would use for.—D. M.]. The mention of פְּלִיטִים, ver. 19, implies that the judgment from which they have escaped is not the general judgment. After it there will remain no nations on the earth to whom the messengers could come to announce Jehovah's glory. That judgment, then, from which the messengers have escaped, must be only the first act of the general judgment, i. e., the judgment on Israel. If we consider this place in the light of fulfilment, we must take the destruction of the theocracy by the Romans for this first act of the general judgment, which the Prophet views together with its last act or last acts, just as our LORD does in His oratio eschatologica, Matth. xxiv. They who have escaped from that dreadful catastrophe which befalls the church of the Old Covenant are the church of the New Covenant, for whose flight and deliverance the LORD has so significantly cared in that discourse (Matth. xxiv. 16 sqq.). If this is the case, what opinion have we to form regarding the sign, which the LORD, according to the words commencing ver. 19, will set "among them," i. e., among those on whom that first great act of judgment has fallen? The expression שׂוּם אוֹת occurs Gen. iv. 15; Ex. x. 2; Jer. xxxii. 20; Ps. lxxviii. 43; cv. 27. It alternates with נָתַן or עָשָׂה אוֹת (Deut. xiii. 2; Josh. ii. 12; Judges vi. 17; Ps. lxxxvi. 17 et saepe). Of these forms שׂוּם אוֹת is the most emphatic. It denotes, we might say, setting a sign as a monument for general and permanent observation. To regard this sign as a signal to call the nations does not suit the context [?], for the nations are not called to the judgment upon Israel. The announcement is rather borne to them. CALVIN's explanation "I make a sign on them," namely, on the elect for their deliverance, is justified by the language; but the suffixes in בָּהֶם and מֵהֶם refer to those who are judged, and not to those who are saved. The old orthodox explanation, according to which the "sign" is the Spirit poured out upon the disciples as evidence of their divine mission, is exposed to the same objection. When, on the other hand, HITZIG and KNOBEL consider as the sign, the judgment upon the heathen, a great slaughter, there is this objection that it is to the heathen that they who escaped the judgment go. And when STIER refers the sign to the judgment upon Israel, it seems strange that mention should be made of the sign after the description of the judgment and its happy consequences, and they shall come and see my glory. [But if we regard the ו at the beginning of ver. 19 as explicative or causal, this objection falls away.—D. M.]. EWALD, UMBREIT, DELITZSCH, SEINECKE think that the escape of some from the all-destroying slaughter is itself the miracle. But is it something so extraordinary and wonderful that individuals should escape from a slaughter, be it ever so bloody? I would not say with the Catholic interpreters that this אוֹת is the sign of the cross. But I think that Luke [Simeon] when he, ii. 34, speaks of Him who is set for a sign which shall be spoken against had our place before him. And I would refer the sign of the Son of man (Matth. xxiv. 30) to the same source. It was the purpose of God, which Isaiah here announces without knowing how it should be fulfilled, that out of the ashes of the old covenant the phœnix of the new should arise. [ALEXANDER, who sees in the פְּלִיטִים who go to the nations the first preachers of the Gospel, who were escaped Jews, saved from that perverse generation (Acts ii. 40), thinks that the sign to be set denotes "the whole miraculous display of divine power, in bringing the old dispensation to a close and introducing the new, including the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, on the one hand, and, on the other, all those signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost (Heb. ii. 4), which Paul calls the signs of an apostle (2 Cor. xii. 12), and which Christ Himself had promised should follow them that believed (Mark xvi. 17). All these were signs placed among them, i. e., among the Jews, to the greater condemnation of the unbelievers, and to the salvation of such as should be saved." But if we compare Isa. xi. 10 and its connection with the place before us and the context, it would appear that Messiah is the sign here spoken of.—D. M.]. The following names of nations represent the entire heathen world. The Prophet designedly mentions the names of the most remote nations to intimate that to all, even the most distant peoples, the joyful message (εὐαγγέλιον) should come. Respecting Tarshish (comp. on ii. 16.) The name Pul occurs as the name of a people only here (as name of a person, comp. 2 Kings xv. 19). In Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 10; xxx. 5, the name פּוּט is mentioned in conjunction with לוּד. The LXX., too, have in our place Φούδ. In the places in Jer. and Ezek. just cited the LXX. have Λίβυες for פּוּט. BOCHART understands by Pul the island Philae. Most scholars hold the identity of פּוּל and פּוּט, and assume either an error in writing, or an interchange of ט and ל (HITZIG). Regarding פּוּט, it is pretty generally held, after the LXX., to be Libyia. EBERS, indeed, affirms that on the Egyptian monuments Punt or Put always denotes a country east of Egypt, namely, Arabia. We must in regard to this point defer a decision. It is not quite certain what people we have to understand under לוּד. In Gen. x. 13 לוּדִים is named as the first son of Mizraim; but there, too, in ver. 22 the fourth son of Shem is called Lud. EBERS holds, with ROUGEMONT (L'age du bronze), the son of Shem for the Lutennu, i. e., Syrians, while according to him the Ludu or Rutu are the native Egyptians in opposition to the non-Egyptian elements of the kingdom of Pharaoh. EBERS properly leaves it undecided whether these native Egyptians, or "the fourth son of Shem" is here meant. We cannot apply to the place before us a strict ethnographical measure. We cannot expect that the Prophet should mention the nations of only one part of the world, or that he should mention the nations in regular succession. He means only to name very distant peoples. Do the Egyptians who are never called in the Old Testament by another name than מִצְרַיִם belong to these? The Ludim are celebrated as archers also in Jer. xlvi. 9. Under Tubal (Gen. x. 2; Ezek. xxvii. 13; xxxii. 26; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1) the Tibareni, a tribe in the south-eastern corner of the Black Sea, are, since the time of BOCHART, supposed to be intended. That יָוָן are the Greeks is universally acknowledged (comp. Gen. x. 2; Ezek xxvii. 13; Dan. viii. 21; Zech. ix. 13). There will take place a centrifugal and a centripetal motion. After the judgment on Israel, the holy centre will be forsaken, yea, trodden down (Luke xxi. 24; Rev. xi. 2). The escaped of Israel will carry out from the destroyed centre the salvation of Israel to the heathen. The heathen will receive it; but Israel shall not be mixed with them. —[But the escaped Israelites who brought salvation to the Gentiles have been in fact blended with the Gentiles who embraced it. That these escaped Israelites should remain distinct from the converted Gentiles is not here affirmed.—D. M.]—But when the time shall have come (according to Paul: "when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in," Rom. xi. 25), a centripetal streaming back will take place, which will find the Israelites still existing among the nations. But they are no longer hated, but loved and highly honored. Jerusalem will again have become a centre, but not for Israel only, but for all nations. The nations will then flow to Jerusalem (ii. 2 sqq.; lx. 4 sqq.), and take with them the Israelites who will now know aright the LORD their God.—[ALEXANDER understands the subject of הֵבִיאוּ, ver. 20, to be the messengers of ver. 19; but the subject of the verb is clearly "the heathen won for Jehovah by the testimony of those escaped ones" that had gone to them. The messengers could hardly be supposed to be those who supply the multifarious means of conveyance mentioned here. They who do this are, moreover, evidently regarded as different from the children of Israel named at the close of the verse. If the subject of the הֵבִיאוּ is the Gentile nations, then your brethren would naturally be regarded as the scattered Jews rather than the converted Gentiles. Comp. Zeph. iii. 10: "From beyond the rivers of Cush will they (the Gentiles) bring my worshippers, the daughter of my dispersed, to me as an offering (מִנְחָה)." This passage of Zephaniah is an abbreviation of what Isaiah here says, and determines the sense of אֲחֵיכֶם as referring to the Jews. See KEIL on Zeph. iii. 10.—D. M.]—The nations will conduct back the scattered Jews most honorably. On horses, in chariots, on couches (comp. Num. vii. 3), on mules (פְּרָד only here in Isaiah), on dromedaries (כִּרְכָּרוֹת, ἅπ. λεγ. from the root כָּר, currere, saltare), will they be brought. And this bringing of His people the LORD will regard as a precious, unbloody offering which the Gentiles render to Him. Heretofore the Gentiles durst not tread the temple of Jehovah to make offerings on His altar in the holy place. But then they will be admitted to this service; and their offering will be as acceptable to the LORD as a pure מִנְחָה presented to Him by Israelites (comp. lvi. 7; Mal. i. 11; iii. 3). יָבִיאוּ is not to be taken as the future, as if in the present time the meat-offering were not brought in a clean vessel. But it is the imperfect which indicates a lasting condition. בֵּית׳ is Acc. localis in answer to the question where? For the act of offering is performed in the house of Jehovah by the presentation of the offering (xliii. 23), not on the way thither. But the offering of the Israelites as a מִנְחָה consists not in offering them in the house of the LORD, but in bringing them to the house of the LORD. The Gentiles, who bring them thither on their horses, mules, etc., are, as it were, the clean vessel (comp. xviii. 7; Ps. lxviii. 32). But a still greater thing will happen. The Gentiles will be admitted not only to the congregation of Israel; they will also be admitted to the office of priests and Levites. However much the Prophet is seen to be governed in respect to form by the time to which he belonged, we clearly perceive how in respect to the substance he boldly breaks through the limits of the present time, and prophesies a quite new order of things. For it was a fundamental law of the old theocracy that only those belonging to the tribe of Levi could be admitted to the office of Levites and priests. But in the glorious time future the middle wall of partition (Eph. ii. 14) will be taken away. Then twain will be made one; there will be one flock and one Shepherd (John x. 16). Then the LORD will choose not only out of all the tribes of Israel, but also from the Gentiles, those whom He will add to the Aaronic priests and to the Levites. We are not to explain לַכֹּהֲנִים and לַלְוִיִּם for priests and Levites, but in addition to the already existing priests and Levites. All things will become new. The explanation which refers מֵהֶם, ver. 21, to the אַחִים (ver. 20) is at variance with the context.—[Against this interpretation, which applies of them to the restored Israelites, an interpretation which, beside Jewish writers and GROTIUS, HITZIG and KNOBEL have put forward, it may be objected that the promise in this view of it would be needless, as the priests and Levites would not have forfeited their right to their hereditary office by a foreign residence. HOFMANN shows well how it suits the context to understand וְגַם מֵהֶם of the Gentiles: "God recompenses this bringing of an offering, by taking to Himself out of the number of those who make the offering, priests, who as such are added to the Levitical priests." Instead of I will also take of them, as in the E. V., translate: also of them will I take, etc. The expression implies that those to be chosen to the offices of priests and Levites are not the ordinary and regular priests and Levites.—D. M.]—The time will be that of the καινὴ κτίσις. Without it that fundamental change could not be conceived. For in it the powers of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος manifest themselves. In ver. 22 there are two thoughts combined into one: for as heaven and earth so shall ye also be new, and this new life will be eternal. In vers. 23 and 24 also we perceive this singular blending of what belongs specifically to the present, and of what belongs to a totally different future. The Prophet still sees the old forms of worship, Sabbath and new moon. But at the same time the relations are so fundamentally new that what was not possible even to the Israelites will be possible to all flesh.—["The Prophet, in accordance with his constant practice, speaks of the emancipated church in language borrowed from her state of bondage." ALEXANDER.]—The males of the Israelites, from their twelfth year, had to appear before the LORD three times in the year. To appear every new moon and Sabbath would have been impossible even for the inhabitants of circumscribed Palestine. But according to the Prophet's declaration, this will be in that remote future possible for all flesh. Comp. for a real parallel Zech. xiv. 16. I do not see what objection can be made to taking חֹדֶשׁ and שַׁבָּת in a double sense here. חודש (renovatio) is first, the new moon, then, the month beginning with the new moon, governed, as it were, by it. מדי־חדש בחי׳ is pro ratione mensis novilunio suo, i. e. every month on the new moon belonging to it. And מדי שבת בשבת is every week on the Sabbath belonging to it. שַׁבָּת is used even in the Old Testament in the signification of week, Num. xxiii. 15; comp. the parallel place, Deut. xvi. 4. And in the New Testament σάββατον and σάββατα denote a week.—[But there is no need of taking חדש and שבת in a double sense. We cannot take שַׁבָּת in a double sense in Zech. xiv. 16 and 1 Sam. vii. 16, where the construction is similar. Comp. these places with the one before us to see that there is a valid objection, which our author did not see, to the construction which he proposes.—D. M.]—The last verse carries out more fully the refrain: There is no peace to the wicked (xlviii. 22; lvii. 21). The Prophet has here, too, the outlines of the topography of the old Jerusalem before his eyes. As this has outside its walls, but in its immediate neighborhood, a place into which all the filth of the city is thrown, because it was a place profaned by abominable idolatry, namely, the valley of Hinnom, he conceives of Gehenna as adjacent to the new Jerusalem. Our Lord appropriates this view of the Prophet so far that he, too, describes γέεννα as the place "where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched" (Mark ix. 43-48). רָאָה with following בְּ denotes a qualified seeing, as with pleasure, with abhorrence, with interest. [Here with horror, as appears from the last clause.—D. M.] (Comp. ver. 5; liii. 2; Ps. xxii. 18; liv. 9; Gen. xxi. 16; xliv. 34, et saepe.) Regarding the worm that dies not and the fire that is not quenched, we are to guard against the extremes of a gross material view and of an abstract ideal one.—["Ordinarily, the worm feeds on the disorganized body, and then dies; the fire consumes its fuel, and goes out. But here is a strange mystery of suffering—a worm not dying, a fire not becoming extinct; a remorseful memory of past guilt, and all-penetrating sense of Divine justice." KAY.—D. M.]—דֵּרָאוֹן is found besides here only Dan. xii. 2. The root דרא does not occur in Hebrew. The word is explained from Arabic roots which denote repellere, taedio, contemtui esse. ["The Prophet had spoken in xxxiii. 14, also, of 'everlasting burnings.' He, whose lips have been touched with the 'live coal' from the heavenly altar, understood that Holy Love must be to all that is unholy 'a consuming fire'" (Heb. xii. 29). KAY.—D. M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On lxv. 1, 2. Our LORD has said, "He that seeketh findeth" (Matt. vii. 8). How, then, does it come that the Jews do not find what they seek, but the heathen find what they did not seek? The Apostle Paul puts this question and answers it, Rom. ix. 30 sqq.; x. 19 sqq.; xi. 7. [See also x. 3]. All depends on the way in which we seek. LUTHER says: Quaerere fit dupliciter. Primo, secundum praescriptum verbi Dei, et sic invenitur Deus. Secundo, quaeritur nostris studiis et consiliis, et sic non invenitur." The Jews, with exception of the ἐκλογή (Rom. xi. 7), sought only after their own glory and merit. They sought what satisfies the flesh. They did not suffer the spirit in the depths of their heart to speak,—the spirit which can be satisfied only by food fitted for it. The law which was given to them that they might perceive by means of it their own impotence, became a snare to them. For they perverted it, made what was of minor importance the chief matter, and then persuaded themselves that they had fulfilled it and were righteous. But the Gentiles who had not the law, had not this snare. They were not tempted to abuse the pædagogical discipline of the law. They felt simply that they were forsaken by God. Their spirit was hungry. And when for the first time God's word in the Gospel was presented to them, then they received it the more eagerly in proportion to the poverty, wretchedness and hunger in which they had been. The Jews did not find what they sought, because they had not a spiritual, but a carnal apprehension of the law, and, like the elder brother of the prodigal son, were full, and blind for that which was needful for them. But the Gentiles found what they did not seek, because they were like the prodigal son, who was the more receptive of grace, the more he needed it, and the less claim he had to it. [There is important truth stated in the foregoing remarks. But it does not fully explain why the LORD is found of those who sought Him not. The sinner who has obtained mercy when he asks why? must have recourse to a higher cause, a cause out of himself, even free, sovereign, efficacious grace. "It is of God that showeth mercy," Rom. ix. 16. "Though in after-communion God is found of those that seek Him (Prov. viii. 17), yet in the first conversion He is found of those that seek Him not; for therefore we love Him, because He first loved us." HENRY. D. M.].

2. On lxv. 2. God's long-suffering is great. He stretches out His hands the whole day and does not grow weary. What man would do this?

The disobedient people contemns Him, as if He knew nothing, and could do nothing.

3. On lxv. 2. "It is clear from this verse gratiam esse resistibilem. Christ earnestly stretched out His hands to the Jews. He would, but they would not. This doctrine the Remonstrants prove from this place, and rightly too, in Actis Synodi Dodrac. P. III. p. 76." LEIGH. [The grace of God which is signified by His stretching out His hands can be, and is, resisted. That figurative expression denotes warning, exhorting, entreating, and was never set forth by Reformed theologians as indicating such grace as was necessarily productive of conversion. The power by which God quickens those who were dead in sins (Eph. ii. 5), by which He gives a new heart (Ezek. xxxv. 26), by which He draws to the Son (John vi. 44. 45, 65), is the grace which is called irresistible. The epithet is admitted on all hands to be faulty; but the grace denoted by it is, from the nature of the case, not resisted. TURRETTIN in treating De Vocatione et Fide thus replies to this objection, "Aliud est Deo monenti et vocanti externe resistere; Aliud est conversionem intendenti et efficaciter ac interne vocanti. Prius asseritur Isa. lxv. 2, 3 quum dicit Propheta se expandisse totâ die manus ad populum perversum etc., non posterius. Expansio brachiorum notat quidem blandam et benevolam Dei invitationem, quâ illos extrinsecus sive Verbo, sive beneficiis alliciebat, non semel atque iterum, sed quotidie ministerio servorum suorum eos compellando. Sed non potest designare potentem et efficacem operationem, quâ brachium Domini illis revelatur qui docentur à Deo et trahuntur a Patre, etc." Locus XV.; Quaestio VI. 25.—D. M.].

4. On lxv. 2. (Who walk after their own thoughts.)
Duc me, nec sine, me per me, Deus optime, duci.
Nam duce me pereo, te duce certus eo.

["If our guide be our own thoughts, our way is not likely to be good; for every imagination of the thought of our hearts is only evil." HENRY. D. M.].

5. On lxv. 3 sq. "The sweetest wine is turned into the sourest vinegar; and when God's people apostatize from God, they are worse than the heathen (Jer. iii. 11)." STARKE.

6. On lxv. 5. [I am holier than thou. "A deep insight is here given us into the nature of the mysterious fascination which heathenism exercised on the Jewish people. The law humbled them at every turn with mementoes of their own sin and of God's unapproachable holiness. Paganism freed them from this, and allowed them (in the midst of moral pollution) to cherish lofty pretensions to sanctity. The man, who had been offering incense on the mountain-top, despised the penitent who went to the temple to present 'a broken and contrite heart.' If Pharisaism led to a like result, it was because it, too, had emptied the law of its spiritual import, and turned its provisions into intellectual idols." KAY. D. M.].

7. On vers. 6, 7. "The longer God forbears, the harder He punishes at last. The greatness of the punishment compensates for the delay (Ps. l. 21)." STARKE after LEIGH.

8. On lxv. 8 sqq. ["This is expounded by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 1–5, where, when upon occasion of the rejection of the Jews, it is asked Hath God then cast away His people? He answers, no; for, at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace. This prophecy has reference to that distinguished remnant. . . Our Saviour has told us that for the sake of these elect the days of the destruction of the Jews should be shortened, and a stop put to the desolation, which otherwise would have proceeded to that degree that no flesh should be saved. Matt. xxiv. 22. HENRY. D. M.].

9. On lxv. 15. The judgment which came upon Israel by the hand of the Romans, did not altogether destroy the people, but it so destroyed the Old Covenant, i. e., the Mosaic religion, that the Jews can no more observe its precepts in essential points. For no Jew knows to what tribe he belongs. Therefore, they have no priests, and, consequently, no sacrifices. The Old Covenant is now only a ruin. We see here most clearly that the Old Covenant, as it was designed only for one nation, and for one country, was to last only for a certain time. If we consider, moreover, the way in which the judgment was executed, (comp. Josephus), we can truly say that the Jews bear in themselves the mark of a curse. They bear the stamp of the divine judgment. The beginning of the judgment on the world has been executed on them as the house of God. But how comes it that the Jews have become so mighty, so insolent in the present time, and are not satisfied with remaining on the defensive in their attitude toward the Christian church, but have passed over to the offensive? This has arisen solely from Christendom having to a large extent lost the consciousness of its new name. There are many Christians who scoff at the name of Christian, and seek their honor in combating all that is called Christian. This is the preparation for the judgment on Christendom itself. If Christendom would hold fast her jewel, she would remain strong, and no one would dare to mock or to assail her. For she would then partake of the full blessing which lies in the principle of Christianity, and every one would be obliged to show respect for the fruits of this principle. But an apostate Christendom, that is ashamed of her glorious Christian name, is something more miserable than the Jews, judged though they have been, who still esteem highly their name, and what remains to them of their old religion. Thus Christendom, in so far as it denies the worth and significance of its name, is gradually reaching a condition in which it will be so ripe for the second act of the judgment on the world, that this will be longed for as a benefit. For, this apostate Christendom will be the kingdom of Antichrist, as Antichrist will manifest himself in Satanic antagonism to God by sitting in the temple of God, and pretending to be God (2 Thess. ii. 3 sqq.). [We do not quite share all the sentiments expressed in this paragraph. We are far from being so despondent as to the prospects of Christendom, and think that there is a more obvious interpretation of the prophecy quoted from 2 Thess., than that indicated.—D. M.].

10. On lxv. 17. [If we had only the present passage to testify of new heavens and a new earth, we might say, as many good interpreters do, that the language is figurative, and indicates nothing more than a great moral and spiritual revolution. But we cannot thus explain 2 Pet. iii. 10–13. The present earth and heavens shall pass away; (comp. Isa. li. 6; Ps. cii. 25, 26). But how can we suppose that our Prophet here refers to the new heavens and new earth, which are to succeed the destruction of the world by fire? In the verses that follow lxv. 17, a condition of things is described which, although better than the present, is not so good as that perfectly sinless, blessed state of the redeemed, which we look for after the coming of the day of the LORD. Yet the Apostle Peter (2 Pet. iii. 13) evidently regards the promise before us of new heavens and a new earth, as destined to receive its accomplishment after the conflagration which is to take place at the end of the world. If we had not respect to other Scriptures, and if we overlooked the use made by Peter of this passage, we should not take it literally. But we can take it literally, if we suppose that the Prophet brings together future events not according to their order in time. He sees the new heavens and new earth arise. Other scenes are disclosed to his prophetic eye of a grand and joy-inspiring nature. He announces them as future. But these scenes suppose the continued prevalence of death and labor (ver. 20 sqq.), which, we know from definite statements of Scripture, will not exist when the new heaven and new earth appear (comp. Rev. xxi. 1-4). The proper view then of ver. 17 is to take its prediction literally, and to hold at the same time that in the following description (which is that of the millennium) future things are presented to us which are really prior, and not posterior to the promised complete renovation of heaven and earth. Nor should this surprise us, as Isaiah and the other Prophets place closely together in their pictures future things which belong to different times. They do not draw the line sharply between this world and the next. Compare Isaiah's prophecy of the abolition of death (xxv. 8) in connection with other events that must happen long before that state of perfect blessedness.—D. M.].

11. On lxv. 20. [" The extension of the Gospel every where,—of its pure principles of temperance in eating and drinking, in restraining the passions, in producing calmness of mind, and in arresting war, would greatly lengthen out the life of man. The image here employed by the Prophet is more than mere poetry; it is one that is founded in reality, and is designed to convey most important truth." BARNES. D. M.].

12. On lxv. 24. [It occurs to me that an erroneous application is frequently made of the promise, Before they call, etc. This declaration is made in connection with the glory and blessedness of the last days. It belongs specifically to the millennium. There are, indeed, occasions when God even now seems to act according to this law. (Comp. Dan. ix. 23). But Paul had to pray thrice before he received the answer of the Lord (2 Cor. xii. 8). Compare the parable of the importunate widow, Luke xviii. 1-7. The answer to prayer may be long delayed. This is not only taught in the Bible, but is verified in Christian experience. But the time will come when the LORD will not thus try and exercise the faith of His people.—D. M.].

13. On lxv. 25. "If the lower animals live in hostility in consequence of the sin of man, a state of peace must be restored to them along with our redemption from sin." J. G. MUELLER in HERZ. R.-Encycl. xvi. p. 45. [" By the serpent in this place there seems every reason to believe that Satan, the old seducer and author of discord and misery, is meant. During the millennium he is to be subject to the lowest degradation. Compare for the force of the phrase to lick the dust, Ps. lxxii. 9; Mic. vii. 17. This was the original doom of the tempter, Gen. iii. 14, and shall be fully carried into execution. Comp. Rev. xx. 1-3." HENDERSON. D. M.].

14. On lxvi. 1. [" Having held up in every point of view the true design, mission and vocation of the church or chosen people, its relation to the natural descendants of Abraham, the causes which required that the latter should be stripped of their peculiar privileges, and the vocation of the Gentiles as a part of the divine plan from its origin, the Prophet now addresses the apostate and unbelieving Jews at the close of the old dispensation, who, instead of preparing for the general extension of the church and the exchange of ceremonial for spiritual worship, were engaged in the rebuilding and costly decoration of the temple at Jerusalem. The pride and interest in this great public work, felt not only by the Herods but by all the Jews, is clear from incidental statements of the Scriptures (John ii. 20; Matt. xxiv. 1), as well as from the ample and direct assertions of Josephus. That the nation should have been thus occupied precisely at the time when the Messiah came, is one of those agreements between prophecy and history, which cannot be accounted for except upon the supposition of a providential and designed assimilation." ALEXANDER after VITRINGA. D. M.].

15. On lxvi. 1, 2. What a grand view of the nature of God and of the way in which He is made known lies at the foundation of these words! God made all things. He is so great that it is an absurdity to desire to build a temple for Him. The whole universe cannot contain Him (1 Kings viii. 27)! But He, who contains all things and can be contained by nothing, has His greatest joy in a poor, humble human heart that fears Him. He holds it worthy of His regard, it pleases Him, He enters into it, He makes His abode in it. The wise and prudent men of science should learn hence what is chiefly necessary in order to know God. We cannot reach Him by applying force, by climbing up to Him, by attempting to take Him by storm. And if science should place ladder upon ladder upwards and downwards, she could not attain His height or His depth. But He enters of His own accord into a child-like, simple heart. He lets Himself be laid hold of by it, kept and known. It is not, therefore, by the intellect [alone] but by the heart that we can know God.

16. On lxvi. 3. He who under the Christian dispensation would retain the forms of worship of the ancient ritual of shadows would violate the fundamental laws of the new time, just as a man by killing would offend against the foundation of the moral law, or as he would by offering the blood of dogs or swine offend against the foundation of the ceremonial law. For when the body, the substance has appeared, the type must vanish. He who would retain the type along with the reality would declare the latter to be insufficient, would, therefore, found his salvation not upon God only, but also in part on his own legal performance. But God will brook no rival. He is either our All, or nothing. Christianity could tolerate animal sacrifices just as little as the Old Testament law could tolerate murder or the offering of abominable things.

17. On lxvi. 5. ["The most malignant and cruel persecutions of the friends of God have been originated under the pretext of great zeal in His service, and with a professed desire to honor His name. So it was with the Jews when they crucified the Lord Jesus. So it is expressly said it would be when His disciples would be excommunicated and put to death, John xvi. 2. So it was in fact in the persecutions excited against the apostles and early Christians. See Acts vi. 13, 14; xxi. 28–31. So it was in all the persecutions of the Waldenses, in all the horrors of the Inquisition, in all the crimes of the Duke of Alva. So it was in the bloody reign of Mary; and so it has ever been in all ages and in all countries where Christians have been persecuted." Barnes.—D. M.].

18. On lxvi. 10. "The idea which is presented in this verse is, that it is the duty of all who love Zion to sympathize in her joy. The true friends of God should rejoice in every real revival of religion, they should rejoice in all the success which attends the Gospel in heathen lands. And they will rejoice. It is one evidence of piety to rejoice in her joy; and they who have no joy when souls are born into the kingdom of God, when He pours down His Spirit and in a revival of religion produces changes as sudden and transforming as if the earth were suddenly to pass from the desolation of winter to the verdure and bloom of summer, or when the Gospel makes sudden and rapid advances in the heathen world, have no true evidence that they love God and His cause. They have no religion." Barnes.—D. M.

19. On lxvi. 13. The Prophet is here completely governed by the idea that in the glorious time of the end, love, maternal love will reign. Thus He makes Zion appear as a mother who will bring forth with incredible ease and rapidity innumerable children (vers. 7–9). Then the Israelites are depicted as little children who suck the breasts of their mother. Further, the heathen who bring back the Israelites into their home, must do this in the same way in which mothers in the Orient are wont to carry their little children. Lastly, even to the Lord Himself maternal love is ascribed (comp. xlii. 14; xlix. 15), and such love as a mother manifests to her adult son. Thus the Israelites will be surrounded in that glorious time on all sides by maternal love. Maternal love will be the characteristic of that period.

20. On lxvi. 19 sqq. The Prophet describes remote things by words which are borrowed from the relations and conceptions of his own time, but which stand in strange contrast to the reality of the future which he beholds. Thus the Prophet speaks of escaped persons who go to Tarshish, Pul, Lud, Tubal, and Javan. Here he has rightly seen that a great act of judgment must have taken place. And this act of judgment must have passed on Israel, because they who escape, who go to the Gentiles to declare to them the glory of Jehovah, must plainly be Jews How accurately, in spite of the strange manner of expression, is the fact here stated that the Gospel of Jesus Christ was proclaimed to the Gentiles exactly at the time when the old theocracy was destroyed! How justly does he indicate that there was a causal connection between these events! He did not, indeed, know that the shattering of the old form was necessary in order that the eternal truth enclosed in it might be set free, and fitted for filling the whole earth. For the Old Covenant cannot exist along with the New, the Law cannot stand with equal dignity beside the Gospel. The Law must be regarded as annulled, in order that the Gospel may come into force. How remarkably strange is it, however, that he calls the Gentile nations Tarshish, Pul, Lud, etc. And how singular it sounds to be told that the Israelites shall be brought by the Gentiles to Jerusalem as an offering for Jehovah! But how accurately has he, notwithstanding, stated the fact, which, indeed, still awaits its fulfilment, that it is the conversion of the heathen world which will induce Israel to acknowledge their Saviour, and that they both shall gather round the Lord as their common centre! How strange it sounds that then priests and Levites shall be taken from the Gentiles also, and that new moon and Sabbath shall be celebrated by all flesh in the old Jewish fashion! But how accurately is the truth thereby stated that in the New Covenant there will be no more the priesthood restricted to the family of Aaron, but a higher spiritual and universal priesthood, and that, instead of the limited local place of worship of the Old Covenant, the whole earth will be a temple of the Lord! Verily the prophecy of the two last chapters of Isaiah attests a genuine prophet of Jehovah. He cannot have been an anonymous unknown person. He can have been none other than Isaiah the son of Amos!

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On lxv. 1 sq. [I. "It is here foretold that the Gentiles, who had been afar off, should be made nigh, ver. 1. II. It is here foretold that the Jews, who had long been a people near to God, should be cast off, and set at a distance, ver. 2." Henry. III. We are informed of the cause of the rejection of the Jews. It was owing to their rebellion, waywardness and flagrant provocations, ver. 2 sqq.—D. M.]

2. On lxv. 1–7. A Fast-Day Sermon. When the Evangelical Church no more holds fast what she has; when apostasy spreads more and more, and modern heathenism (vers. 3–5 a) gains the ascendency in her, then it can happen to her as it did to the people of Israel, and as it happened to the Church in the Orient. Her candlestick can be removed out of its place.—[By the Evangelical Church we are not to understand here the Church universal, for her perpetuity is certain. The Evangelical Church is in Germany the Protestant Church, and more particularly the Lutheran branch of it.—D. M.]

3. On lxv. 8–10. Sermon on behalf of the mission among the Jews. Israel's hope. 1) On what it is founded (Israel is still a berry in which drops of the divine blessing are contained); 2) To what this hope is directed (Israel's Restoration).

4. On lxv. 13-16. ["The blessedness of those that serve God, and the woful condition of those that rebel against him, are here set the one over against the other, that they may serve as a foil to each other. The difference of their states here lies in two things: 1) In point of comfort and satisfaction. a. God's servants shall eat and drink; they shall have the bread of life to feed, to feast upon continually, and shall want nothing that is good for them. But those who set their hearts upon the world, and place their happiness in it, shall be hungry and thirsty, always empty, always craving. In communion with God and dependence upon Him there is full satisfaction; but in sinful pursuits there is nothing but disappointment. b. God's servants shall rejoice and sing for joy of heart; they have constant cause for joy, and there is nothing that may be an occasion of grief to them but they have an allay sufficient for it. But, on the other hand, they that forsake the LORD shut themselves out from all true joy, for they shall be ashamed of their vain confidence in themselves, and their own righteousness, and the hopes they had built thereon. When the expectations of bliss, wherewith they had flattered themselves, are frustrated, O what confusion will fill their faces! Then shall they cry for sorrow of heart and howl for vexation of spirit. 2) In point of honor and reputation, vers. 15, 16. The memory of the just is, and shall be, blessed; but the memory of the wicked shall rot." HENRY.—D. M.]

5. On lxvi. 1, 2. CARPZOV has a sermon on this text. He places it in parallel with Luke xviii. 9-14, and considers, 1) The rejection of spiritual pride; 2) The commendation of filial fear.

6. On lxvi. 2 ARNDT, in his TRUE CHRISTIANITY I., cap. 10, comments on this text. He says among other things: "The man who will be something is the material out of which God makes nothing, yea, out of which He makes fools. But a man who will be nothing, and regards himself as nothing, is the material out of which God makes something, even glorious, wise people in His sight."

7. On lxvi. 3. [SAURIN has a sermon on this text entitled "Sur l'Insuffisance du culte exterieur" in the eighth volume of his sermons.—D. M.]

8. On lxvi. 13. As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you. "These words stand, let us consider it, 1) In the Old Testament; 2) In the heart of God always; 3) But are they realized in our experience?" KOEGEL in "Aus dem Vorhof ins Heiligthum, II. Bd., p. 242, 1876.

9. On lxvi. 24. The punishment of sin is twofold—inward and outward. The inward is compared with a worm that dies not; the outward with a fire that is not quenched. This worm and this fire are at work even in this life. He who is alarmed by them and hastens to Christ can now be delivered from them.—["It is better not to fall into this fire and never to have any experience of this worm, even though, as some imagine, eternity should not be eternal, and the unquenchable fire might be quenched, and the worm that shall never die, should die, and Jesus and His apostles should not have expressed themselves quite in accordance with the compassionate taste of our time. Better, I say, is better. Save thyself and thy neighbor before the fire begins to burn, and the smoke to ascend." GOSSNER.—D. M.]

A LIST OF HEBREW WORDS

INTENDED TO FACILITATE A COMPARISON OF THE VOCABULARY OF CHAPTERS XL—XLVI WITH THAT OF THE PASSAGES OF PART FIRST WHOSE GENUINENESS IS UNDISPUTED.

Under I. are included, for the sake of brevity, only the passages of Part First acknowledged as genuine.
Under II. are included the disputed passages of Part First, as well as chapters xl.—lxvi., according to the following table:—

I.	i—(ii. 1-4)—xii.		xiv. 24—(xv.—xvi. 12)—xx.		xxi. 11—xxiii.
II.		xiii.—xiv. 23.		xxi. 1-10.		xxiv.—xxvii.
I.	xxviii.—xxxiii.		xxxvii. 21-35.
II.		xxxiv.—xxxvii. 20.		xxxvii. 36—xxxix.	xl.—lxvi.

The passages ii. 1-4, and xv.—xvi. 12, though included under I, are, as not undisputed, quoted with brackets. Absolute ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, marked ἅπ. λεγ. abs., are such as occur nowhere else in the Old Testament. Relative ἅπαξ λεγ., marked ἅπ. λεγ. rel., are such as occur but once in Isaiah. For further remark on this List, see Introduction, pp. 20, 21.
